Substitute the particle 'Anti' for 'Free' in the above paragraph, and Mr. M. will have produced a splendid description, and moreover a just one, of the degrading association of the forms of religion, with antimasonry. 'Every subtle machination against human happiness, or civil liberty, and every mighty effort for the oppression of mankind, has covered and characterized its designs by the sanctity of religion.' Show us more subtle machinations against human happiness, more wily attacks upon civil liberty, and a more tremendous effort for the oppression of mankind, since the days of the persecuted Round-heads and Covenanters, than antimasonry furnishes. Show us more 'unholy purposes,' more 'pestilent passions,' that have actuated the bosoms of any revolutionists since Adam's fall, than have governed the conduct of anti leaders. What motives, or purposes, or passions, but such as govern the acts of fallen spirits, produced the Anderton, Witherell, and Murdock stories? Are these religious gentlemen so very observant of the forms of religion on other occasions? Hear their language and shudder at its profaneness—follow them to their places of retirement, and mark their sinuous track—pursue them into their ordinary life, and hear them calculate the effect of 'prayers' on the strength of their party.

'It has been used to infuse malice into the heart of bigotry, nerve the arm and kindle the fires of persecution, and prop the throne of tyranny.' Yes, antimasonry, clothed in the solemn garb of religion, has entered the sanctuary, and spread around her, even there, the elements of discord and ungodly strife—the 'malice of bigots' she has roused into action, and directed against the exemplary and virtuous—the arm of persecution she has 'nerved,' and the 'fires' of extermination she would enkindle, had she the power to do it, with impunity.

Does any one doubt the correctness of this portraiture, let him examine without prejudice, the constituents of the antimasonic party, and peruse again and again the history of its progress, its manœuvres, its stratagems. Let him inquire, who are its most influential members? Are they men of tried virtue, and patriotism, or are they men who have been 'weighed in the balance and found wanting?' Are they men of fixed principle and liberal views, or are they time serving politicians, contemptible trimmers? Are they men who have heretofore enjoyed the public confidence, and betrayed it for selfish purposes, for personal aggrandizement? or, are they men of stern integrity, and uncompromising virtue—men whose only motive is the promotion of their country's welfare, and the perpetuation of its invaluable institutions? Ask the Hon. Messrs. Holley, and Spencer, and Southwick—ask, if you please, the Reverend Messrs. Thacher and Bernard, and Pease, and just compare their answer with their lives, and the truth will be manifest.

And 'prop the throne of tyranny.' Yes, antimasonry has long been a principal support of despotism. The tyrants of Spain and Portugal, and Russia, have watched with the utmost jealousy Masonic lodges, and at length persuaded that their doctrines were subversive of despotic authority, and republican in their tendency, suppressed their lodges, and expatriated them forever from their firesides and homes. Freemasonry spurns alike the tyrant and the bigot, the anarchist and the factionist, and maintains through evil and good report, consistency of character, consistency of purpose.—[Belchertown Sentinel.]

ANTIMASONIC SYMPHONIES.

NO. XII.

A PREMIUM SONG.

Tune.—Honest Rogues.

Come all honest Anties who hate honest men,
Who defame and abuse them, by deed, word or pen;
Let's merrily dance round our magical ring,
And the Anties' proud chorus let's merrily sing:
*Oh! a band of bold Anties ne'er stick at the truth.
But practise, in age, what they learn in their youth.*

Come, join in the circle—there's no one denied—
Provided to no moral duty he's tied:
As diplomatists say, 'tis a 'sine qua non'
To put morals off—when the Anties put on.
Oh! a band of bold Anties, &c.

Then let us join hands—for there's no need of hearts—
We'll each practise over our several parts;
And when we enact, 'mong the people, our farce,
What is wanting in merit—we'll make up in brass.
Oh! a band of bold Anties, &c.

As to faith—that's mere cant—it don't trouble us here,
We keep, from such trammels, our consciences clear:
Though strange it may seem, we have consciences still—
But they're very complying—they bend to our will.
Oh! a band of bold Anties, &c.

Whenever you think you can better your case,
You may turn, twist and shuffle, with very good grace;
For the bonds that unite us are not very strong,
And when you desert us—you'll do us no wrong.
Oh! a band of bold Anties, &c.

Now who can refuse to chime in with our song?
There's no honest motive to keep you here long!
It is true that we put down all secrets but one:
And that is—to see our own int'rests well done.
Oh! a band of bold Anties, &c.

So come noble Anties, who hate honest men,
Who defame and abuse them, by deed, word or pen;
Let's merrily dance round our magical ring,
And the Anties' proud chorus let's merrily sing:
*Oh! a band of bold Anties ne'er stick at the truth.
But practise, in age, what they learn in their youth.*

Our friend of the Hartford Antimasonic Intelligencer, seems to have some misgivings as to the ultimate success of antiism. The New-York, and Vermont, and Pennsylvania elections may have some influence on the equanimity of his reverence's mighty mind. Iscariots and Judasites have not as much power as our friend supposed. Hear him. 'If it takes a whole age to extirpate Masonry from our country, very well.' How resigned, how immensely patient! 'True patriots will not be disheartened at the prospect of a long war. The issue will be glorious when it comes.' No doubt of that, friend Strong, some scattering rays of its future 'glory,' have already reached us via New-York, Vermont, and Pennsylvania. 'Antimasons are not contending for themselves, or some favorite chiefs, but for freedom, for the country, and mankind. Posterity will reap the reward of their labors, and bless their memories.' Even as they bless the memories of Robespierre, Danton, and Marat. 'Those who oppose their endeavors, will be looked upon by future generations, as the enemies of liberty, and the minions of despotism.' Precisely as Washington, and Warren, and Lafayette, Hamilton, Jefferson, and Franklin are now looked upon by all honest men, and friends of their country. 'But the work shall be accomplished.' Who has the hardihood to doubt it? Noble D. Strong says it shall be. His proclamation has gone forth, 'hear O ye heavens, give ear O earth.' 'Secret societies are incompatible, both with civil and religious liberty,' and the inordinate curiosity of vagabonds, renegadoes, and hypocrites.—'They are in structure and principle opposed to christianity.' What think you of the Washington Society, of which, we are told, you had the honor of being a member? or the Phi Beta Kappa society, if your scholarship would entitle you to admission? 'They cannot exist in a community of equal rights. The idea of equal rights where secret societies exist, is absurd.' Wonderful logic, unanswerable demonstration! Is not this a land of equal rights? How long has Masonry existed among us? From time immemorial, and to the close of time it will exist.—'The present, however, is an interesting crisis.' It is, indeed, so. The hypocrite lays aside his mask. The knave is free to acknowledge his villainess. The pigmy politician mounts the hobby of renunciation, and gallops over perjury and slander, into consequence and place. The bigot, and the fool, and the knave, follow in his train, and shout his praises. 'Freemasonry must either rule, or be suppressed.' Show us your evidence. 'It will rule unless it is suppressed.' Then it will rule wisely and the people shall rejoice. When the righteous govern the land is made fat. 'It must be suppressed or their is an end of civil liberty.' How dreadful the thought, how terrible the anticipation! The powers of Antiism associated with the powers of darkness and bringing into the field their combined forces, and uniting all their energies, will fail to produce this result.—After their agony shall be over, and a sane state of mind have returned, it will appear that the 'mountains have laboured and brought forth a mouse.'

[Belchertown Sentinel.]

The antimasons are quite peaceable since the New-York election. Although they had strained every nerve for the last three months before the election; although they had set every engine in operation, and put forth every murder story in its most glaring light, and had practised every artifice to make the people believe them; although 'good enough Morgan's' were hatched up in almost every district,—when the election came, the people 'spoke for themselves;' and it was then the leaders of that party saw their fondest hopes dampened and their brightest prospects blighted. They then saw that the people of the State of New-York were not to be deceived. They saw that the spirit of freedom, which has ever reigned in the hearts of the American people, still reigned in the State of New-York.

Immediately after the abduction of Morgan, many of the people in the western part of that State began to look with a suspicious eye upon the Masonic institution, and that excitement spread throughout the State; but when they saw antimasonry becoming political, and in the hands of aspiring demagogues; when they saw it made a hobby for broken down politicians to rise again into power; when they saw men of integrity and virtue put down to make room for office hunters who had once proved themselves unworthy of the public trust, they began to think they had seen enough of Antimasonry, and they have said 'thus far shalt thou come, and no farther.'

How long will it be ere Vermont will speak in the same language, and spurn antimasonry from her borders? How long will our Legislatures be crowded with broken down politicians, seeking for every office which it is in the power of that body to bestow, and these claiming them as a right, because they are whole hog antimasons? Let Vermont follow the example of New-York, and antimasonry will trouble her no more.—[Vermont Standard.]

THE WITHERELL HUMBUG.—In our paper of the 10th inst. we inserted an article purporting to be an investigation of the Witherell affair in the form of a certificate over the signature of A. T. Bush, and headed The People vs. John Brown. This article was copied from the Cayuga Patriot, the editor of which stated that he obtained it from a handbill received through the post office, purporting to be from the office of the Sandy Hill Herald. This now proves to have been a base deception and forgery.—

We copy the following on this subject from the Cayuga Patriot of last week, and in our next we shall endeavor to make room for the legal investigation of this affair in a suit between The People vs. Alonzo Hyde, which is mentioned in the extracts below.

We publish in this paper, an account of the legal investigation of the Witherell affair, which we believe to be the same that originally appeared in the Sandy Hill Herald, and to which allusion was made in an extract in our last from the Union Village Courant. The Handbill received here during the election, and which was copied into our paper of the third inst. we now think must have been a forgery. How it was put into circulation, and whether it was intended to do away the effect of the GENUINE account of the investigation, perhaps those who put forth the Antimasonic Handbill, headed 'BASE FABRICATION,' can inform us, as they declared, that they knew some days previous, that such a paper as the forged document was prepared for circulation. It has been published in several of the western papers, where it appears to have been circulated in handbills, before it was received here, and it was seen in this village even by several of the antimasons, before it came into our possession. We were led to believe it genuine, by various summary statements, in the eastern papers, relating to a legal investigation, which exposed the Witherell affair as a contrivance of the antimasons, which we are now satisfied alluded to that in the case of Hyde. The following remarks, from the Buffalo Journal, accord with our views and with them we close the subject.

'As the former account most pointedly impeached Mr. Witherell as an actor in the fraud, and as much of our comment was upon this part of the pretended testimony, it is proper we here state that, the actual investigation, though it does not fully clear Mr. W. from suspicion, does not implicate him so deeply, nor in the same way as our publication did. We will not comment farther here upon the promised proceedings, except to state that they prove, most pointedly, a more wide spread knowledge of the trick, among the anti-masonic party, than even the forgery claimed it to have had!'

It is well known that Weed visited New-York just previous to and during the days of the late canvass, and that he called upon several high Masons, and urged them to support Mr. Granger, who, he asserted, cared nothing for antimasonry, and would be a good friend of Mr. Clay after the election; and to oppose Gov. Throop, whom he represented as an antimason! It is well known that he was successfully aided by his besetting associate of the Commercial Advertiser, a Royal Arch Mason, in inducing Masons to support Mr. Granger and oppose Gov. Throop. And yet this man has the audacity to charge the indignant rebuke of political antimasonry by the independent electors of the eastern counties, as the effect of Masonry, and assails Gov. Throop and his friends for having received, what he and his associates obtained for Mr. Granger probably in much greater number,—Masonic votes.

THE WITHERELL AFFAIR.—We feel called upon to state, that no trial or examination was ever had before A. T. Bush, Esq., that has been made public through the medium of the Herald, or any other source within our knowledge. The only trial or examination that has been had in relation to the Witherell farce, which has acquired more consideration abroad than in the neighborhood of the pretended transaction, was had before S. D. Brown, Esq. of Hartford, where Witherell resides, which we published on the 28th ult. Not having seen the publication alluded to, we know nothing of its contents only what common reports say. Some of the over wise antimasons of this county, have attempted to create the belief that we sent forth the publication spoken of. Whether it originated among antimasons for an after election subject to talk about, and was a similar manufacture to the pretended attempt to assassinate Witherell, we do not pretend to say, but consider it a forgery from some source, which ought to be discountenanced by every man. The facts that came out on the examination before S. D. Brown, Esq., were sufficient to convince any candid man that the pretended outrage was got up for political effect, or that there was nothing in it.—Such is the general belief in this county, and particularly in the neighborhood where Witherell resides.

[Sandy Hill Herald.]

THE QUESTION SETTLED.—Antimasonry is no more—it has since the election received a vital blow—it is dead. Mrs. Lucinda Morgan, the afflicted widow of Capt. William Morgan, is married. This celebrated woman, who, like Niobe, was all tears and affliction—whose hand was ever held forth to receive contributions from the sympathetic antimasons—who vowed eternal widowhood—pains and penance, is married, and married—'tell it not in Gath'—to a Mason!

MARRIED.

In Batavia, on Thursday last, by the Hon. Simeon Cummings,* Mr. GEORGE W. HARRIS,† to Mrs. LUCINDA MORGAN, widow of the late Capt. William Morgan.

The whole Antimasonic party is not alone the sufferer from this treacherous defection of one of their prominent lions or lionesses of the west, but we have some reason to apprehend that a sighing awain has been cruelly treated in this business. Our friend Frank Granger, who is in single wretchedness, it is whispered had an eye upon the widow Morgan, and it was recommended by Thurlow Weed and his cabinet, as an admirable stroke of policy to perpetuate the existence of Antimasonry by perpetrating matrimony with the afflicted widow; but it is also circulated at the Canandaigua tea tables that Mrs. Capt. Bill Morgan, finding that Frank was not Governor, for more than three days fairly 'gave him the bug to hold,' or in other words jilted him. We have heard of many political somersets in our time, but this is the cleanest we ever read of—a whole party of more than 100,000 voters utterly prostrated and left struggling on their backs by the defection, secession, abduction and abandonment of a single woman.

We learn that couriers have passed between Albany and Canandaigua, on this occasion, and that T. Weed will raise an important legal question before the Court of Errors, whether this marriage of Mrs. Morgan is legal—it not having been seven years since the absence of her husband, and no positive proof of his death having been adduced. Weed says, that had she postponed her marriage until after the next Presidential election, she might have had thirty-six husbands for all that he cared, but to be abandoned at this juncture is truly afflicting.

At the next session of the legislature, the afflicted antimasons will be in a dreadful quandary. What is to be done? Mr. Maynard will, no doubt, make a long report on the awful event. Mr. Tracy will spread out his hands, and invoke all the spirits of eloquence to bring down vengeance on those who have intrigued Mrs. Morgan into matrimony. A few days ago, we thought something was in the wind.—Capt. Miller—the famous Captain of Batavia, advertised his press and types for sale. The marriage has forced him to retire disconsolate from the field; no more excursions to Seneca Lake—no more trips to Canandaigua waters—no more meditations in the neighborhood of the Cayuga marshes. There is no doubt that this most unfortunate defection of Mrs. Morgan has been produced by the intrigues of the rascally Clay Masons in Oneida, Montgomery, Rensselaer Albany and Colombia counties. The project was no doubt furthered by the Grand Chapter of the State, and the most unholy means used against the integrity of the antimasonic party to influence the too susceptible heart—to fascinate the pretty eyes; and carry by a coup de main, the lovely and charming Mrs. Morgan.—We understand that such is the consternation produced on the mind of Col. Stone and the antimasons, by the fair one's defection, that he intends to proceed (all his expenses to be paid by any party,) to the interior of the state—to ferret out the intrigues of the Masons in this matter, and expose their awful machinations to an indignant world.—Let there be light.

THE BOQUET.

From the Hampshire Sentinel.

MR. EDITOR:—Our old fashioned Thanksgiving being at hand, when local animosities should be buried at the festive board, and as family bickerings may be allayed by a sensitive sneeze; let those who are suffering under this excruciating malady, read the following stanzas, by Peter Pindar, and I am sure the sarcasm will produce the desired effect. CLARA.

JOHN AND JANE.

Hail wedded love, the bard thy beauty hails,
Though mix'd at times, with cock and hen like sparrings;

But calms are very pleasant after gales,
And dove-like peace much sweeter after warrings.

I've read, but I've forgot the page, indeed,
But folks may find it if they choose to read,
'That marriage is too sweet, without some sour,
Variety oft recommends the flower.
Wedlock should be like punch, some sweet some acid;
Then life is nicely turbulent and placid.

A picture that's all light,
Lord! what a thing! a very fright!
No; let some darkness be display'd,
And learn to balance well with shade.'

John married Jane; they frown'd, they smil'd—
Now parted, and now had a child;
Now tepid showers of love; now chilling snows;
Much like the seasons of the year;
Or like a brook now thick, now clear;
Now scarce a rill, and now a torrent flows.

One day they had a desperate quarrel,
About a little small beer barrel,
Without John's knowledge slightly tapt by Jane;
For Jane, to oblige her old friend Hodge,
Thought asking leave of John was fudge;
And so she wisely left the leave alone.

It happen'd that John and Jane had not two beds,
To rest their angry, frowning brace of heads;
Ergo, they had but one
To rest their gentle jaws upon.
'I'll have a board between us,' cried the man—
'With all my spirit, John,' replied the wife;
A board was placed according to their plan:
Thus ended this barrier at once, the strife.

On the first night the husband lay
Calm as a clock, nor once wink'd over;
Calm as a clock, too, let me say,
Jane never squinted on her lover.

Two, three, four nights, the sultry pair,
Like two still mice, devoid of care,
In philosophic silence sought repose.
On the fifth morn, it chanc'd to please
John's nose to sneeze,
'God bless you dear,' quoth Jane at John's loud noise.
At this John gave a sudden start,
And popping o'er the hedge his head,
'Jane, did you say it from your heart?'
'Yes John, I did, indeed, indeed!'
You did?—Yes John, upon my word,
Zounds, Jane! then take away the board!'

THE DYING.

[From the New-England Review.]

Oh! bring me flowers—my dearest,
And wreath them in my hair,
Thou beautiful—The fairest ones—
And let them wither there;
Wild roses and the fragile lily—

The blossoms of a day,—
And twine them on the brow of one
As perishing as they.

I may not see them growing
In wild wood or in glen;
I may not tread upon the green
And fragrant earth again;
Yet leave the casement open,
That the blue and blessed sky,
The tree tops and the pleasant hills
May greet my closing eye!

And gather ye around me,—
The friends whom I have loved—
The eyes that ever shone with mine—
The hearts which I have proved
In calm unweeping sorrow,
Oh, let the loved draw near,
And let each low, familiar tone
Fall on the dying ear.

I know that death is near me,
And yet I fear it not—
It is but shedding sunshine on
The shadows of my lot—
A welcome from the spirits
Of the pure and sin-forgiven—
The lifting of the curtain fold
Which shadows Earth from Heaven!

THE LATIN AND GREEK LANGUAGES.

So sensible were the Romans of the influence of language over national manners, that it was their most serious care to extend, with the progress of their arms, the use of the Latin tongue. The French, for nearly two centuries past, have adapted and carried into practice the same principle.—The French is now the general language of diplomacy, and of the several courts of Europe.

The ancient dialects of Italy, the Sabine, the Etruscan, and the Venetian, sunk into oblivion; but in the provinces, the east was less docile than the west to the voice of its victorious preceptors.

The obvious difference marked the portions of the Roman empire, with a distinction of colors, which, though it was in some degree concealed during the meridian splendor of prosperity, became gradually more visible as the shades of night descended upon the Roman world.

The western countries were civilized by the same hands which subdued them. As soon as the Barbarians were reconciled to obedience, their minds were to any new impressions of knowledge and politeness.

The language of Virgil and Cicero, through with some inevitable mixture of corruption, was so universally adopted in Africa, Spain, Gaul, Britain and Pannonia, that the faint traces of the Punic or Celtic idioms were preserved only in the mountains, or among the peasants. Apulcius and Augustin will answer for Africa; Strabo for Spain and Gaul; Tacitus, in the life of Agricola, for Britain; and Vellius, Paterculus, for Pannonia.—To them may be added the language of the inscriptions.

The Celtic was preserved in the mountains of Wales, Cornwall, and Armorica. It may be observed that Apulcius reproaches an African youth, who lived among the populace, with the use of the Punic; whilst he had almost forgotten Greek, and neither could nor would speak Latin. The greater part of St. Austin's congregations were strangers to the Punic.

Education and study insensibly inspired the natives of those countries conquered by the Romans with the sentiments of that people; Italy gave fashions, as well as laws, to her Latin provincials. They solicited with more ardor and obtained which more facility, the freedom and honors of the state; supported the national dignity in letters and in arms; and, at length, in the person of Trajan, produced an emperor whom the Scipios would not have disowned for their countryman.—Spain alone produced Columella, the Senecas, Lucan, Martial, and Quintillian.

The situation of the Greeks was very different from that of the Barbarians. The former had been long since civilized and corrupted. They had too much taste to relinquish their language, and too much vanity to adopt any foreign institutions. Still preserving the prejudices after they had lost the virtues of their ancestors, they affected to despise the unpolished manners of their Roman conquerors, whilst they were compelled to respect their superior wisdom and power.

There is not, it is believed, from Dionysius to Libanius, a single Greek critic who mentions Virgil or Horace. They seem ignorant that the Romans had any good writers.

The influence of the Grecian language and sentiments was not confined to the narrow limits of that once celebrated country. Their empire, by the progress of colonies and conquests, had been diffused from the Adriatic to the Euphrates and the Nile.

Asia was covered with Greek cities, and the long reign of the Macedonian kings had introduced a silent revolution into Syria and into Egypt.—In their pompous courts those princes united the elegance of Athens with the luxury of the East; and the example of the court was imitated, at an immense distance, by the higher ranks of their subjects. Such was the general division of the Roman empire into the Latin and Greek languages.

To these may be added a third distinction for the body of the natives in Syria, and especially in Egypt. The use of their ancient dialects, by excluding them from the commerce of mankind, checked the improvements of those barbarians.—The slothful effeminacy of the former, exposed them to the contempt—the sullen ferociousness of the latter, excited the aversion of the conquerors. Those nations had submitted to the Roman power, but they seldom desired or deserved the freedom of the city; and it was remarked, that more than two hundred and thirty years elapsed after the ruin of the Ptolemies, before an Egyptian was admitted into the senate.

It is a just though trite observation that victorious Rome was herself subdued by the arts of Greece. Those immortal writers, who still command the admiration of modern Europe, soon became the favorite objects of study and imitation in the western provinces.

The elegant amusements of the Romans were not, however, suffered to interfere with their sound maxims of policy. Whilst they acknowledged the charms of the Greeks, they asserted the dignity of the Latin tongue, and the exclusive use of the latter was inflexibly maintained in the administration of civil as well as military government. The emperor Claudius disfranchised an eminent Grecian for not understanding Latin.

The two languages exercised at the same time their separate jurisdiction throughout the empire;

the former, as the natural idiom of science; the latter, as the dialect of public transactions. Those who united letters with business were equally conversant with both; and it was almost impossible, in any province, to find a Roman subject, of a liberal education, a stranger to Greek and Latin.

Times.

[From an English Paper.]

THE TEMPLARS—3 VOLS.—There is considerable ability in this tale, which is we understand, the first production of a very young man. From the word Templars, it would naturally be imagined that the novel was one of a chivalrous and romantic character, and had reference to the warlike achievements of the famous Knights Templars of old, whom Sir W. Scott has introduced with such consummate effect into his splendid romance of 'Invanhoe.' The reader that takes up the 'Templars' in the expectation of meeting with any incidents of the nature we have alluded to will find himself egregiously mistaken, for the tale refers for the most part to the adventures of three young Templars at Lincoln's-inn, and instead of the scenes being laid out on the Continent, among the hallowed cities and deserts and mountains of the Holy Land, it is chiefly confined to London, and in the last volume to Ireland. The characters of this novel are well and consistently sustained throughout; one or two of them—that of Dermot Wharton in particular—exhibits no slight power and originality.—The denouement is very skilfully brought about, and the dialogue is lively, familiar, and uniformly natural. Although the novel is one which carries both knowledge of the world and power of entertainment. We subjoin an extract descriptive of an angry interview between two young Lincoln's Inn Templars named Dudley Ayrton and Gerald Moore—the latter of whom has led the former from temptation to temptation, till at last he has all but consummated his ruin. The interview takes place at a gambling house.—

'Dudley's very heart swelled within him almost to bursting, with indignation and passion, to think that the wretch, who had led him to distress, and who had been benefitted so considerably by his kindness, should neglect him at such a time, when he had no one else to whom he dare apply—and that he should refuse his assistance too with so provoking coolness, and the very means, as acknowledged but a brief hour before, actually in his hand—it was more than Dudley's vehement temper could withstand—the idea of treachery, which had more than once intruded itself into his mind against his earnest attempt to prevent it, now flashed out into actual conviction—

"Not help me, Gerald?" he exclaimed, as the indignation and astonishment prevented for a moment his further utterance, and allowed his friend to repeat—

"I neither can, nor will."

"You will not?" Dudley retorted violently—you base, worthless wretch!—you shall not? I have indeed already been too long deceived by your vile specious arts."

"What do you mean, Sir?" hastily demanded his companion, at the same time assuming a lofty air, and putting himself into somewhat of a threatening attitude "do you mean to insult me, Sir?"

"Insult you, indeed?" returned Dudley, with unmixed contempt, as the other shrunk from him, not a little abashed; "no you are past that—insult cannot reach such a mind as Gerald Moore's."

"I don't understand you, Mr. Ayrton," interrupted Moore, as his former cool pretended indignation changed to real passion; "Explain yourself, Sir, have I not a right to do what I please with my own—answer me that, Sir!" and as he made demand, he walked up close to Dudley, and re-assumed an attitude he wished to be intimidating.

"Your own!" sarcastically repeated Dudley, his lip curling with bitterest ire,—"your own, indeed!" and at the same time he calmly put up his arm and pushed him back.

"Yes, Sir, my own!" returned the other his valour some little cooled by Dudley's firm, resolute manner—"what do you mean to imply?"

"That you are a villain—a vile, despicable villain!" Dudley's passion was so excited by the effrontery of one, whom his full convictions now told him was no better than an infamous sharper that, upon his again approaching him with apparent resolution to demand an explanation—Dudley at the moment understood it otherwise—he met him half way, and with one well directed blow had felled him to the ground, ere he was aware what he had done.

'The skulking coward lay trembling at his feet in expectation of further chastisement; but Dudley felt that he had already gone too far—that it was a degradation to have touched so infamous a scoundrel; he strode past him without another look, and the next moment had relieved himself of his presence.'

MISCELLANY.

AN EXTRACT.

Although the exercise of thanksgiving to God, belongs exclusively in the lower creation to man, yet it requires no wayward flight of the imagination to people the universe with grateful existences; to see homage paid by all Nature to her Deity; to hear the glad voice of praise, from all animate and inanimate beings, spontaneously rising up before the throne of Heaven. Creation is full of eloquence; and is forever pouring forth in rich floods its perfume, its radiance and its harmony to the praise of Divine Majesty. We seem to hear the voice of gratitude in the joyous song of the happy birds. We see its pure, sweet offering in the vernal flowers, that unfold their bosoms to the glorious day, and exhale their odors to the canopying heavens. We hear its whisperings in the gentle breeze that kisses in its airy flight the timid foliage.—We trace out its voice in the soft gurgling of the mountain rill. Its louder notes we hear in the whirlwind and the storm. Its noble homage we witness in the lower bendings of the forest, or the still more majestic heavings of the hoary ocean.

And were we to leave this dark spot of earth and direct our higher flight amidst the burning stars of heaven, we should there behold another and a still grander manifestation of thanksgiving in the eternal harmony of revolving spheres.—Then could we say with the inimitable Addison:

'What tho' in solemn silence all
Move round this dark terrestrial ball:
What tho' no real voice nor sound
Amid the radiant orbs be found:
In reason's ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious voice:
Forever singing as they shine,
The hand that formed us is divine.'

It was by the indulgence of imaginations like the present, the Psalmist, that 'sweet singer of Israel,' was led to call upon all nature to praise the Lord. 'Praise ye Him, sun and moon; praise Him, all ye stars of light. Praise the Lord from the earth, ye dragons and all deeps; fire and hail snow and vapors; stormy wind fulfilling his word: mountains and all hills: fruitful trees and all cedars: beasts and all cattle, creeping things and flying fowl. Let them praise the name of the Lord, for His name alone is excellent, His glory it above the earth and the Heavens.'

Such apostrophes are very natural to the poet and imagination; and where we can almost see the homage and hear the praise of nature offering up around us, it is useless to break the spell that binds us. It is better to indulge the illusion, and perhaps we may thereby imbibe something of the Heavenly spirit, and be led to raise our hearts and our voices, in harmony with dumb nature in offering unto God the acceptable sacrifice of thanksgiving. Then in the language of Thompson, nature's own poet, shall —'Man superior walk

Amid the glad creation, musing praise,
And looking lively gratitude.'

IRISH CIRCUMLOCUTION.—Observing one day an unusual commotion in the streets of Derry. I inquired of a bystander the reason; and he, with a mellifluous brogue, replied in the following metaphorical manner.—The rason Sir? Why, you see that Justice and Little Larry O'Hone, the carpenter, have been putting up a picture-frame at the end of the strate yonder, and they are going to hang one of Adam's copies in it. What's that? —'Why, poor Murdock O'Donnel.' Oh there's a man to be hung? —'Do they put up a gallows for any other purpose?'—'What's his offence?'—'No offence, your Honor; it was only a liberty he took.' Well what was the liberty? 'Why you see, Sir, poor Murdock was in delicate health, and his physician advised that he should take exercise on horseback, and so, having no horse of his own, he borrowed one from Squire Doyle's paddock; and no sooner than he was on his showlders than the Devil put it into the cracher's head to go over to Kellogreen cattle fair; where he had a good many acquaintances; and when he was got there, Murdock espied a friend at the door of a shebeen house, and left the animal grazing on the outside whilst he went to have a thimbleful of whiskey; and then, you see, they got frisky, and had another, and another, till poor Murdock went slap on the binch; and when he wouke up, he found the cracher gone, and his pocket stuffed full with a big lump of money. In short, said I, you mean to say he has been a horse stealing?—'Why Sir,' he replied stammering and scratching his head, they call it so in England.—[Bernard's Retrospections.]

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 11, 1830.

To the Editor of the Boston Press.

SIR—The following letter was handed to Mr. MOORE, Editor of the Boston Masonic Mirror. My purpose was to let it be known in a few words that the remarks upon me, in the Mirror of the 12th inst. were not authorised by me; and that their credibility must rest upon the veracity of their writer. By giving my letter an insertion in his paper of the 27th inst. he might have made an atonement for a wrong; as he has not, it is now offered for publication in the Press, if you deem it of sufficient importance.

29 Nov.

C. P. SUMNER.

BOSTON, 24 Nov. 1830.

SIR—Your paper of the 12th was left at my door on the day of its date. The account you have therein given of our interview on the 6th demands my reprobation. I do not know to whom you allude when you speak of your unprincipled and reckless persecutors; but if your allusion be to the Suffolk Committee, I have no participation in your feelings, for I have no belief that those gentlemen have done you any injury.

With regard to my opinion of Masonry, I would have it understood that it is the same now as when expressed in writing and published about a year ago; except that

—'Every day's report

has strengthened and confirmed it. It was formed upon deliberate reflection and communicated to my friends some years before any excitement had arisen upon the subject; and it is not likely to be reversed by any further investigation that time or inclination will allow me to give to it; the belief you avow to the contrary notwithstanding. If, however, I should at some far distant day wish to be known as the friend of Masonry, I shall think it my duty to declare my wish in writing, and may ask your aid in giving it publicity: until that time, no man of delicacy will assume any such unsolicited service.

It is not for me to use towards you the language of coarse rebuke, but I hope that your readers, however they may esteem you, will not be able to see the impress of candor or of truth in those remarks upon me which appeared in your paper of the 6th, nor in those of the 13th instant, printed side by side with that gross vituperation upon Elder Witherell. The public do not demand any such remarks. They add no respectability to the cause that accepts their aid.

C. P. SUMNER,

No. 20, Hancock Street,

To the Editor of the Masonic Mirror.

The character and origin of opinions is an interesting subject for philosophical investigation. One man's mind is stored with borrowed opinions, which he obtrudes upon the public, with the judgment and feeling of a garrulous pedler. We can procure them on any subject, of every nature, and at our own price in money or barter. Another forms his opinions with as much care as the jeweller bestows on his gold, before it reaches the show case. They bring an uniform price, and are sought after with great avidity, by the whole community. A third steals his opinions, and, like stolen goods, they are disposed of to persons not in want, and much below the usual rate. A fourth has no opinions at all, and is like a hotel, the home for everybody and nobody: a kind of stranger in the world, knowing or professing to know many men and many things, without possessing a knowledge for what purpose or design they were created. He acts more from the habit of imitation, than from any inherent principle of his nature. His mind seems to be the creature of circumstances; the humble servant of a notional imagination, without the superintendence of a directing judgment; as the owl affects to be wise, and stares at the light; but sees less and less, the wider he opens his eyes. Shall we be too severe by placing Charles P. Sumner, Esq. in the latter class? With all the charity we can command, we conceive not. Some twelve months ago, this gentleman ventured to give his opinion about a subject which, as he confessed, he was acquainted with, and which he was not acquainted with! He humbly avowed his ignorance, and forthwith proceeded to teach and enlighten! He placed this letter in the hands of a party the most violent and unwieldy, that ever existed in this country. Indeed, we know of no history which can give a parallel to it; save that of the Spanish Inquisition. At the same time, he did not wish to be understood as belonging to the antimasonic party. He neither approves of their measures or disapproves. He wants to be a member of that party and not a member. He is like the ass between two haystacks—he has not will enough to go to either; and, like that sagacious animal, we suppose, he must die without the support of either. He has a great many opinions, but is not officer enough to marshal them. He talks to be heard, and not to be heard; and in all his talk, though it is now white, and then black, he most respectfully declines taking sides. Now, to be plain with Mr. Sumner, we know of no term so perfectly representing his character, as a timid antimason; possessing the disposition, without the courage to persecute the Masons. He will deny this. But we would ask, how he can avert the stigma from falling upon his head, as one of that party, since his course, wherever he has acted, has been to aid the antimasons!

By the prefatory note to the editor of the 'Boston Press,' it will be seen that Mr. Sumner had previously handed his letter to us, as now appears, for publication in the Mirror. We did not give it publicity; and it may be proper that we should here state the reasons, by which we were influenced. We will endeavor to do so in as few words as practicable.

1st. The representations and palliating expositions made to us by Mr. Sumner in our interview with him on the 6th of November, were such as to excite our sympathy and commiseration. They were such as to induce us to believe that, he had been grossly deceived, and incautiously led to embrace the interests of a combination of unprincipled aspiring demagogues, for whose objects he had no affection, and in whose feelings he had no participation.—The reading of his letter left no other impression on our mind than that, in consequence of the publication of his views, as expressed to us, he had again been beset and harassed by these men, against whose interests they militated; and, from a want of intellectual stability and nearly independence, he had been literally compelled, not to disavow the correctness of what we stated as the result of our interview, for that he does not and cannot controvert; but to re-embrace sentiments and opinions which, in fact, were not congenial to his own feelings. And we were strengthened in this opinion by the belief that, if the views set forth in his letter were dictated by his own judgment, unbiased by others; if they emanated from his own heart, and were really called for, in his opinion, by any remarks that we had made, he would have communicated them to us at a much earlier period. He would not have delayed the business eleven days. Indeed, we are told it was known to and declared by certain antimasonic gentlemen that Mr. Sumner had communicated such a letter to us, even before it was known to our most intimate friends, and before we had an opportunity, had we been so disposed, to give it publicity. Entertaining these views, and with this fact before us, we came to the conclusion that the letter had been elicited by the false representations, importunities and perhaps, threats of men who would use the influence attached to Mr. Sumner's name by his official station, as the crafty fox used the paw of the cat. We thought, therefore, that we were doing him an important service in throwing the veil of charity over his mental imperfections, and want of moral courage.

2d. His letter was impertinent and insulting. What interest has Mr. Sumner in any matter of controversy that does exist, or may have existed, between us and the Suffolk Committee? At whose bidding does he appear the champion of that committee? He gratuitously expresses his belief that those gentlemen have not done us any injury.—Personally perhaps they have not; but to the Masonic Institution, the Suffolk Committee, or their constituents, by encouraging base impostors and promulgating base and slanderous reports and fabrications, have done more injury than any other similar body of men in the United States. Was not the circulation of the Auderton story, a fabrication evincing a degree of moral depravity and baseness of purpose before unheard of, doing an injury to us, or rather to the Masonic Institution? Who were the movers in this transaction? If not the Suffolk Committee, as such, it was the party they represent. Perhaps the Suffolk Committee is of a higher character than any other committee, of which the party can boast; but a dozen men cannot redeem hundreds of their vicious associates, especially when those associates are the leaders of a vile and unprincipled faction. Further, by what right does Mr. Sumner take up the gauntlet in defence of Elder Witherell? Admit our remarks on the Elder to be 'gross vituperation,' we cannot perceive why Mr. Sumner should interest himself in the matter; unless, from the circumstance that they happened to be 'printed side by side,' with the account of the 'interview,' he unwarrantably converted the declaration that the Elder was a 'wretch whom the common hangman would feel it a degradation to execute,' into a reflection upon himself. We have yet to learn that we are accountable to the 'Sheriff of the County of Suffolk,' for the character of those remarks; and if 'they add no respectability to the cause that accepts their aid,' we should think that, to Mr. Sumner, as an enemy to that cause, it would be a matter of gratulation. Every word in the English language has its proper meaning, and a proper time for its use; and if ever there can be a time in which words, representing bad principles and bad men, ought to be used, and used liberally, we believe the present to be that time.

3d. His letter is irrelevant. He does not deny, or attempt to controvert, a single sentence contained in our account of the interview; nor does he pretend that we, in any particular, misrepresented him. Does he not, on the contrary, by his silence, tacitly admit the truth of what we said? He says 'their credibility must rest upon the veracity of their writer.' Be it so. Charles P. Sumner is not the man to 'impeach the veracity of their writer.' If he mean to indicate by this insinuation, a wish to make a personal matter of the controversy, we are ready to meet him on that ground. We can bring to the contest a character as unspotted and a heart as pure as he, or any of his antimasonic brethren. But, perhaps fortunately, the credibility of most of the remarks in question, does not rest entirely on the 'veracity of their writer.' Put enough of this, at present. He says our account of the interview 'demands his reprobation,' without condescending to state his reasons, or to inform us wherein we have done him injustice. Is this honorable? Is it gentlemanly? Is it fair? If we have misunderstood him, and, consequently misrepresented him, as an honest man, it was his duty to inform us wherein we had done so. Like others, we are liable to err; but none are more free to acknowledge when they err; nor more ready to redress a wrong. But instead of taking this course, he unqualifiedly condemns the whole account, and, like a mad-man, darts off in a tangent, to tell us his views of the Suffolk Committee, and to defend Elder Witherell! Under such circumstances, we thought that in suppressing his letter we were doing him an act of kindness. It is true that the remarks in the Mirror of the 13th, were not authorised by Mr. Sumner. Yet they were written and published, in consequence of his having called on us, with a complaint that we had done him a 'wrong' in our comments of the 6th. They were designed as explanatory of what we had previously said, and if we are judges of our own feelings, they were written in the spirit of kindness, candor and forbearance; and they were in strict accordance with the tenor of our conversation with Mr. Sumner. We signified to him our intention to make the explanation; that we did, and he made no other objection than that, he did not ask us to publish anything more, than what our sense of justice might dictate. And if we have any cause to regret having done what we did, it is that we extended to him that degree of kindness, which he so ill requites.

In the remarks that appeared in the Mirror of the 13th, we stated that it afforded us peculiar gratification that, from a personal interview had with Mr. Sumner, we were enabled to assure our readers that, aside from the letter he believed himself called on to indite, in replication to certain questions proposed to him by the notorious 'Suffolk Committee,' he had had no connexion or communication whatever with the antimasonic party; excepting an individual instance when, being solicited, he attended one of their meetings, at which a single question was stated for his consideration; his answer to which not meeting with their entire approbation, a second was not proposed. This declaration was made to us, in reply to the question, 'Have you not been accustomed to meet in secret conclave with our unprincipled enemies, to concert measures for the destruction of the Masonic Institution?' And when we were about to remark that, he must be aware of the dishonorable means resorted to by our persecutors, he checked us by declaring that he was not 'aware of anything,' that he read nothing upon the subject, either Masonic or antimasonic. It may not be irrelevant here to remark, that in an interview we had with him about a year ago, he voluntarily made the same observation to us, and declared that what he had previously had to do with the subject, had almost made him crazy, and that he did not wish to be driven quite to madness. In answer to the inquiry, 'Do you approve of such scurrilous publications?' (meaning the handbill from which the 'doggerel stanza' was extracted,) he replied that he did not, and hoped that nobody thought so bad of him as to suppose that he did. Our reply was that we hoped we had not a right to think so.—He then remarked that he was 'that poor old man we represented him to be;' [an inference of his own, for we never made any such representation,] that he had but a few years longer to live, and that he wished to live them quietly and to go down to the grave in peace. This was said somewhat pathetically, and we then thought sincerely. Our sympathy was excited. We thought that, through the weakness of a decayed mind and the ill-advice and importunities of designing unprincipled men, he had been led into difficulties, the consequences of which, he began to perceive and was desirous to avert. From the sincerity of our hearts, we pitied him and were disposed to yield the 'vantage ground,' we at least, believe we then occupied, and to render him what aid we consistently could to retrieve himself. But like the viper, he has turned upon us, with an intent to sting the hand that fostered him.

That Mr. Sumner told us that, in his letter to the editor of the Transcript, he did not design to implicate the City Police, nor to cast a disreputable reflection upon the Masonic Institution, HE DARES NOT TO DENY. He several times, and in the most positive terms, declared that he intended only to disavow his knowledge of the author of the 'doggerel stanza,' and his disapprobation of the calumnious reflection. He did not say, in so many words, that he did not consider himself a member of the antimasonic party; but from his positive declaration that he did not read their publications; that he did not meet or co-operate with the leaders of that party, and from the triumphant manner, (accompanied with suitable jesticulations,) in which he assured us that, his answer to the question above alluded to, was not very satisfactory to them; and from the general tenor of his remarks, we did conclude, and we still think very justly, that he did not so consider himself. As to his being 'known as the friend of Masonry,' we never so considered him. We admitted that he 'entertained opinions prejudicial to the interests of the Institution,' and merely expressed the belief that, should he ever deem it of consequence to investigate the matter, his candor, (for we then really thought he did possess some portion of this virtue,) would prompt him frankly to acknowledge that such opinions were founded in error. Is this representing him as the 'friend of Masonry?' If it be, then indeed we have assumed an 'unsolicited service.' In truth, after what we had seen of Mr. Sumner's vacillating course, in relation to this subject, we did not care enough about his friendship or his enmity, to assume the 'service' of telling the world of either, even though he had solicited us so to do. What we did say was said, (as we then thought,) partly in justice to the man, but more out of compassion for his feelings, than from any wish to make it appear that he was 'the friend of Masonry.' Masonry wants no such friends. She wants no friends who 'entertain opinions prejudicial to her interests.'

Mr. Sumner says that his opinion of Masonry is strengthened and confirmed by

—'Every day's report

On what does his opinion rest? Certainly not on facts of which he has personal knowledge; for we can prove, by his own acknowledgment, that he does not know enough of Masonry to gain admittance into any Lodge in the United States. And by what reports is it strengthened and confirmed? By the reports of certain sub-committees, who have given currency to more slanders and lies than they will be able to atone for, by an age of penitence and contrition! His opinion was deliberately formed. How can a man deliberate upon a subject, about which he knows nothing? What investigation has he made? He has not read anything on the subject of Masonry or antimasonry. Whom, save the wise Suffolk Committee, has he consulted? That they may have enlightened him, we do not deny. But then is he not like the erudite and sagacious judge of old, who, having heard one side of the question, decided that the case was clearly made out, and he was satisfied without hearing the other? Finally, we are glad that Mr. Sumner has taken a decided stand in this matter. We despise the man who, on any subject of public interest, from sinister motives, occupies what Gov. Throop facetiously terms a state of 'betweenity.' We had rather have twenty open manly enemies, than one secret treacherous foe. There is more danger to be apprehended from a single 'snake in the grass,' than from a hundred in the highway. And now that Mr. Sumner has openly declared himself as the enemy of Masonry, could we believe that he had not done so through fear, or the hope of 'fee or reward,' though we should entertain the utmost contempt for his principles, we should have greater respect for the man.

CONGRESS.—The second session of the 21st Congress commenced at Washington on Monday. The President's message was delivered on Tuesday. This session, says the New York American, ought to be a busy, for it must be a short one, as its term expires on the 3d of March.—The Senate will be occupied almost immediately after the meeting, by the trial of Judge Peck, of Missouri, who was impeached by the House of Representatives, at the last session, and whose trial was set down for the 2d Monday of December by the Senate. There are several witnesses, it is understood, already in attendance from Missouri; and as all such proceedings are necessarily dilatory, much time will probably be consumed by this trial. Of general and exciting questions that may be brought forward for the consideration and decision of Congress, that respecting the removal of the Indians will probably be among the first; for, unless taken up now, it will be too late, seeing that Georgia, as far as the Cherokees are concerned, has determined to extend her legislation over them.

The Gazette says, 'our foreign relations, including the commercial treaty with Turkey, the opening of the W. India ports, our claims upon France, &c; the Indian Affairs; Internal Improvement; the Tariff; the reduction of duties on several articles of prime necessity, including sugar; and the renewal of the United States bank, will probably be the leading subjects in the message. The charter of the U. S. bank has five years to run, but the holders of stock in that institution, nevertheless are looking out for another touch from the President. The New-York Commercial of Tuesday says:—'The money market has been in a feverish state for some days, and the apprehension of a renewed attack upon the National Bank, has caused a rapid decline of the stock of that institution for several days past. For this panic we can perceive no good reason.'

CHOOSE YE.—The Genesee Republican published at Le Roy, hitherto professedly neutral, has declared against the antimasonic and in favour of the Republican party. The editor remarks, 'whenever we have attempted to be independent, or to intimate it to be our desire, we have had to writhe under the antimasonic curse.' What else could have been expected from a party that professes to wage an exterminating war—that to be consistent can acknowledge no neutral ground, and would of course first shoot those who are on the fence asking quarter, before they attack the adversary on the other side. The Le Roy Editor further observes, 'Antimasonry has insulted, abused, brow-beat, blackguarded us wherever it could meet us. We could not pass on the sidewalk without meeting its vengeance, nor stop at a place of public resort, without in their own phrase, being mounted by a dozen anties, devoid of decency and strangers to the least spark of civility.' This is all true no doubt. The usual courtesies of political warfare have all been forgotten by the antimasonic soldier. He sees in every opponent a 'kidnapper,' a 'cut-throat' or what is worse a 'Regency man' and claiming to belong to the only pure race alive, to be exclusively pious and patriotic, he deals with all others accordingly, and is not sparing of abuse which he substitutes for argument. But the Editor of the Genesee Republican has made his choice.—he says, 'Hereafter we shall support the General and State Administration, and yield the Republican party what support we are able to give.' So be it; and again we say to others 'Choose ye also.'—[Buffalo Republican.]

In Charlestown, Mr. Amasa Hartwell to Miss Mary Patch.

In East Cambridge, on Tuesday evening, by Rev. Dr. Fay, Mr. John Slade, jr. (firm of Lambert & Slade,) of this city, to Miss Lucy, youngest daughter of Joseph Lord, Esq.

In Ipswich, Mr. James Potter to Miss Rhoda Brown.

In Carlisle, Mr. Simon T. Fletcher to Miss Cerena Green.

DEATHS.

In this city, on Saturday, the Hon. Aaron Hill, the former Postmaster of this city for a number of years. He has been a member of the Senate, and a Councillor in the Legislature of this Commonwealth.

In Shrewsbury, on the 16th Nov. (between 6 and 7 o'clock, P. M.) JOEL NURSE, Esq. aged 63 years.—The circumstances attending the decease of this excellent man are indeed melancholy. It appears that he was returning with an ox-team from his Mills, where he had been at work; and when within eighty rods of his dwelling house, the oxen were frightened by a dog, and ran against a stone, which overturned the cart. At this moment Mr. Nurse attempted to save himself by jumping from the cart; in doing which his foot slipped and he fell, and broke his spine.—The cart probably struck him. When taken up he was asked if he were badly hurt, to which he replied that he was broken all to pieces. This, we are told, was found to be literally true. He was carried to his dwelling house, where he died, between 8 and 9 o'clock. He was able to speak and retained his reason until a few moments before his death. He was an efficient and much esteemed member of the Masonic family, by whom his loss will be deeply felt. As a man, he was honest; as a friend, warm and generous; and as a citizen, industrious and enterprising.

In South Reading November 27th Captain James Gould, aged 70. He was an exemplary member of the church, a worthy and exemplary Mason, and a useful citizen, and possessed the confidence respect, and esteem of all who knew him.

THE WREATH.

[From the New-York Standard.]

THE CRUSADER'S FAREWELL.

I go beneath the banner cross
Unto the holy mount of God,
My sword to wield its trusted force
Above the christians' blood-red sod.

I go, to wrest our heritage
From the fierce grasp of the infidel,
To win the glorious war we wage,
Or fall, where many a brave one fell.

There is one tie, the true vow given
Unto yon flower of purity,
But with a soldier's trust in heaven
I leave her, holy man, to thee.

Oh, shield her, father, and the blight
Of the cold world, oh save her from;
There is no fear of ruffian might
To harm her in her castle home.

Yet when the eastern wave brings back
Cold whispers as it passes o'er,
And the eastern wave has left a track
Of purple on the sunlit shore;

Then calm her gentle spirit's pain,
Soothe, lest its trembling fire depart,
Oh shield her, father, whisper then
Of comfort to her sinking heart.

And should the light of hope grow cold,
The halo of the heart decay,
Deeming her warrior's fate is told
In foreign lands, far, far away—

Tell her it is no stranger land
Though deluged in stranger blood,
But christian heart and christian hand
Are there in sacred brotherhood.

Tell her the soul has power to range
With that it loves, o'er earth and sea
And time and change may not estrange
The living tie of memory.

Tell her there is a mystic link
Mid spirits that have loved so well,
And she would guard on danger's brink,
And she would save him if he fell.

There is no other fear than this
That we may never meet again:
The trampling hoof, the deep abyss,
The mangled form, the groan of pain—

There is no thought of agony
For scenes of blood when spirits part:
What fear I of earth's power with thee
Thou cross of God, upon my heart?

And yet the holy ties that clasp
My spirit in her spirit's sway.
Enduring till life's latest gasp,—
Oh why should sorrow wear away!

Tell her that blessed spirits guard
God's soldiers to the Sepulchre,
And heaven's bright, chosen, best reward
Will be at last returned to her.

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

From the Hampshire Sentinel.

TO REV. DAVID PEASE,

RENOUNCING MASON, ANTIMASONIC LECTURER, &c.

No. 8.

Sir—You vehemently exhorted your hearers to an immediate adoption of your principles of proscription, and urged them to embark in an incessant warfare. Nothing short of the entire destruction of Masonry, and the utter extermination of her members, would satisfy your ardent patriotism. You spurned at all attempts at compromise, or conciliation. An unconditional surrender of their rights and privileges, and an unqualified renunciation of their faith and hopes, would, alone, satisfy you. Let me assure you, sir, that the benevolence of your disposition beamed, through the pallid surface of your visage, with peculiar radiance, and the charitable inclination of your feelings must have secured you many friends. O, how amiable is the preacher of sedition! how transcendently lovely the advocate of undying strife! how irresistibly attractive the dulcet tones of the herald of discord! How excellent doth he appear, when compared with the dull preacher of equal rights, the dry defender of the liberty of thought, speech, and action, and the insipid advocate of moral punishment!

You told your hearers, in substance, that Masonry must not be suffered to die quietly, or to cease to attract followers through its unpopularity, or to become gradually disused; but, it must be killed outright, it must be held up as a spectacle of derision,—it must be persecuted even unto death. These sentiments, and this language, well become the humble minister of peace, and speak volumes in favor of the righteousness of your views. You said, also, that a Mason must not be permitted quietly to withdraw himself, and refuse attendance on her communications, but, must be pursued, and harassed, and goaded till he would purchase peace, by crying out 'I am no Mason.' For said you, unless this be done by our patriotic band, the wily Masons will perpetuate this tremendous evil in some new shape, and casting aside its name and form, retain its substance unimpaired. The retiring Mason, too, unless compelled to renounce publicly, and put himself entirely without the pale of the institution, will cherish toward this idol, fidelity in his heart, and when the storm shall have passed by, he will again openly espouse her interests, and re-enlist under her blood-stained banners. Verily, sir, this course of remark evinces more common sense than the tenor of your discourse exhibits. You were, methinks, not altogether unmindful of the precept 'Make to yourself friends of the mammon of this world,' for you found yourself an outcast, and wished others to become so, that you might have a 'community of grief.' Had you, here, stayed your destroying hand, and disorganizing tongue, this portion of your philippic, would have passed unnoticed. But you were not content with this measure of abuse. You must apostrophize an absent brother, and with frontless impudence, inquire 'where is he, the skulker? why is he not present to hear the truth?' Modest sir David, did he not know the truth as well as thou?—if he do not, it is a sorry compliment truly to his understanding. Now, sir, let me ask, wherefore you made this inquiry? You knew full well that the worthy clergyman, who stately ministers to your former congregation, was a retiring Mason. What good motive could you possibly have had, thus to outrage decency and order, by pointing the attention of your hearers to him? What benefit could it be to them, and manifestly it was intended as no honor to him? I again ask, why did you make the inquiry? He knew the truth as well as you, and had the right of staying at home, if he pleased, and pursued his right in the exercise of his own discretion. Did you want his countenance? Were you chagrined because of his absence? Did you regard it, as a practical denial of your doctrines, and a silent refutation of your calumnies? We perceive, sir, 'where the shoe pinched,' and acknowledge the justness of your inferences. It was his attachment to principle, and his love of order, and harmony, that influenced his stay. He is the last man, unless I mistake his character, that will patiently listen to clerical slander, or countenance the outpourings of clerical demagogues, or mingle in any any strife, or become identified with any party. 'Why did he not come to hear the truth?' What truth? He heard soon enough of your confessing yourself conversant of the Morgan conspiracy, and of your shameful sundering of the obligation of promises—he heard soon enough of your degradation of the ministerial office and of your amalgamation with vileness and guilt—he heard soon enough of your flagrant misrepresentations, and daring impositions. He knew the truth, having learned it, at pure fountains, and had good reason to believe, that the truth would be perverted, he, therefore, felt it his duty to stay away, and frown silently, on the whole proceeding. He thus lent his influence to the cause of order, and expressed, by his conduct, his disapprobation of your doctrines and conduct. It is no part of my business, nor is it my intention to pronounce his eulogy. I have been constrained thus far, to present you in contrast, and I must say that I think the contrast might be profitably pursued. His ambition, and yours, seem to me, to centre on objects entirely different. The spiritual and final interests of the people committed to his charge seem to be high objects of his regard, and to command his constant efforts, and most untiring exertions. Your noble aims seem circumscribed by the petty circle of affairs, and your boldest efforts, directed to the removal of incumbents, and the elevation of sycophantic followers. He cannot persuade himself, that the high objects, to which he is dedicated, will be furthered by his mingling in party strife, or by his promoting local discords, or by his fanning the flames of contention, he, therefore, holds himself aloof from all causes of excitement, and devotes himself, heart and soul, mind and strength, to the business of a spiritual watchman, enforcing his doctrines, and exemplifying his precepts, by a uniformly consistent life and conduct. You, sir, on the contrary, seem to have bid farewell to the quiet business of training souls for heaven, and to have boldly launched your bark on the tempestuous ocean of politics. Forsaking the peaceful pastures of the shepherd, you have rashly entered the field of combat, armed and equipped, for temporal fight, illustrating the doctrine that in the latter day 'wolves in sheep's clothing, shall scatter the flock.' And does the Rev. sir David Pease, this knight of many hos-ors, this saint of high degree, find fault with this modest, and retiring and inoffensive course of his brother? Would sir David think him any nearer heaven, any more godlike, to renounce his present mild and scriptural course, and travel with him the rounds of professional slander, openly proclaiming his renunciation of promises, and his shameless abandonment of his former recorded opinions, and his villanous traduction of his former friends and benefactors? Moral treason and perjury are rare, and unusual, recommendation of christian ministers, perhaps, they are, however, conclusive evidence of fitness, I do not pretend to judge, not having yet beheld this great new light, that eclipses the radiance of all other luminaries. But of one thing, sir, I believe myself competent, from light received from ordinary sources, to judge correctly. In my apprehension, this apostrophe of yours to an absent brother, was insolent, and abusive and intended to create disturbance and disaffection between him and his people. It was so received by many that heard you, and to what other motive can it be attributed? It illustrated no point in your discourse, nor added weight to any of your remarks. It seemed to be dragged in, 'neck and heels,' for this purpose. And viewed in connexion with your application for a house at Amherst, about that time, and your saying to the owner, that you expected to preach at Belchertown, it amounts to almost positive proof of your intention. The intelligent, and moderate portion of your audience, wondered at your weakness, and pitied your indiscretion.—Can this be the same pious and humble sir David, who formerly dwelt so much on his spiritual ecstasies, talked so often of his humility, and wept so frequently over his depravity, and hardness of heart, and prayed so earnestly for all men, especially for the 'household of the faithful?' How changed, how fallen, how infinitely degraded! 'The way of the transgressor is indeed hard.' 'The wages of sin is death.'

Yours, &c.

EXTRACTS FROM MR. MAYNARD'S REPORT.

We continue our extracts from Mr. Maynard's 'Report of the effects of Freemasonry on the Christian Religion.' This gentleman manifests a degree of candor and ingenuousness of feeling, truly wonderful for an anti. His urbanity and mildness commend him to our respectful attention, and his apparent sincerity to our favorable regard. We heartily approve the bland and conciliating spirit of his Report, but regret, exceedingly, that he has not sustained his positions by authorities to which we might refer, and judge for ourselves of the character of the evidence received by him, as conclusively settling the question he discusses. Where, and of whom, did Mr. M. learn the fact, that Masonry professed to be a religious institution? This is news to us, and we should be happy to examine the evidence on which the assertion is founded.—We have taken all the degrees of ancient Masonry, and have yet to learn that it is a religious institution, or makes any pretensions to this sacred character. No intelligent Mason, no one at all conversant with the origin and history of the order, no one who values his character for consistency, would make this claim. To maintain that Masonry is a christian institution, involves the destruction of its claims to antiquity. The seven first degrees, called degrees of ancient Masonry, date their origin long before the christian era, it were preposterous in the extreme, therefore, to pretend that an institution was a christian one, that existed long prior to christianity itself. Here, then, we may find an easy explanation, and perfectly satisfactory from its very nature, why the first degrees, in their devotional formula, do not recognize the advent office, and mediatorial sacrifice of the Saviour. But is it therefore irreligious—is it therefore antichristian? This is the great question to be solved—this is the gist of inquiry. It requires of its initiated a belief in the existence and superintending providence of a Supreme Divinity, and teaches the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and of an eternity of rewards and punishments, and leaves all questions of creeds, and modes of worship, to the soundness of individual discretion. With the various christian, or antichristian sects, and forms of faith, it has neither connexion nor fellowship. Ancient Masonry practically says,

His can’t be wrong, whose life is in the right.’

The orders of knighthood, usually denominated modern Masonry, have a different origin, and reverently recognize the Redeemer as the true Messiah. Mr. M. himself admits that the degree of Knight Templar, so recognizes him. Now, it is perfectly easy to account for this distinct recognition in this degree, and not in the preceeding, and the fact implies neither want of faith in the sacred revelation, nor want of a just sense of dependance, on the acknowledged Author of all our mercies. The orders of knighthood originated during the crusades for the recovery of the holy land, and the knights of the various orders acquired much reputation for their daring bravery, matchless prowess, unconquerable virtue and ardent piety. Under the appellations of Knights of Malta, Hospitallers of St. John, and Templars, they obtained much wealth, and distinction. Did Mr. M. know these facts? If he did, he ought in justice to his liberality and candor to have stated them, and shown the reasons of the distinction.

No judicious and well informed Mason ever claimed for Masonry the high honor of being a religious institution. He does, indeed, claim for her the next highest place, as being a moral, and benevolent, and charitable institution. He does indeed claim for her the crown of virtue, and panoply of innocence, the spotless robe of rectitude, and the laurels of excellence. All these attributes, for aught that appears by Mr. M.’s Report we may justly claim. He makes war upon the institution, as claiming to be a religious one, and fights manfully the shadows of his own imagination, and glories in his victory over faults of Anti creation. Hear his own language, and then judge ye if his premises and conclusions be right. He says,

‘It parades its mystic symbols, in profane performances, as the emblems of great and dread realities. Freemasonry has a creed, but it is no creed of any denomination of the worshippers of God. Unlike all, and equally adapted to every faith; except, perhaps, only in the degree of K. Tem. there is no recognition of the Redeemer. Other than that degree, the creed of Freemasonry is equally the faith of all, and the faith of none of the children of men, who acknowledge a Supreme Being. It is not Christianity, or the Handmaid of it, but an impious substitute for it. By estranging the mind from the doctrines of the gospel, it inevitably prepares its chambers for the lodgment of infidel principles. It harmonizes as well with the tenets of the Jew, the Pagan, the Mahometan, as with those of the humble follower of Christ.’

The idolatrous Persian, who prostrates himself in blind adoration before the sun, and worships it as the source of light, and life, and intelligence, and the wild son of the forest, who loads his altar with victims, mingles his unintelligible adorations with the precious incense, as it ascends to the Great Spirit, and consecrates himself with the delusive expectation of the country beyond the hills, the Pagan, who flies to the fountains, and hopes in its sacred waters, rather than in the exhaustless fountain of redeeming grace, to wash away the pollutions of his soul; the Turk who kneels at the mosque, lays his hand on the koran, and says, ‘Allah, there is but one God, and Mahomet is his apostle,’ the descendant of Abraham, who reposes in undiminished faith, upon the future advent of the Messiah, embrace the creed of Freemasonry, with the same cordiality and confidence as the believers of Christ, who rest their only hopes of redemption and heavenly felicity, upon the merits of the atonement.

‘Freemasonry,’ he says, ‘has a creed, but it is not the creed of any denomination of the worshippers of God.’—True, she has a creed, and would that it were the creed of every denomination of the worshippers of God. What is her creed? Universal benevolence to all mankind. ‘Faith in God, hope in immortality, and charity to all men.’ ‘Friendship, morality, and brotherly love.’ ‘Temperance relief and truth.’ This is the Mason’s creed, and would that the Anti Convention had been actuated by its benign influence. True the christian and the heathen, the savage and the sage, can mutually offer sacrifice on this altar of universal benevolence, and reciprocally surrendering their prejudices and peculiar theorems of faith, heartily take each other by the hand, and sing the choral song of universal love. And has it, indeed, come to this, that an institution confessedly producing such results, is assailed as wicked, and traduced as profane, held up as the object of unceasing scorn; and declaimed against as the seducer of innocence and corrupter of virtue? ‘Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon.’ We had supposed that an institution having power to tame the ferocity of the savage, to humble the arrogance of the Pagan, and to soften the asperities of sectarian intolerance, was desirable and praiseworthy. But it seems we were mistaken. The pure light of Antism discloses numerous spots and blemishes even in our most unsullied garments. The piercing rays of the new light penetrate the caverns of secrecy, and disclose the mysteries of centuries, and introduce them to mortal vision, in all their soul chilling deformity. The emanations from this newly discovered luminary seems to possess new reflective, and reflecting properties. What is in fact lovely and desirable, as seen through this medium, appear hateful and disgusting—what is in fact innocent and commendable, appears clothed in the garments of guilt, and deserving the scorn and reproach of all men—what is in fact benevolent, and pious, and humane, appears inordinately selfish, impious, and inhuman. Had Mr. M. exhibited his proofs, perhaps this high wrought paragraph would have merited a better epithet than pompous and unmeaning declamation. As it is, naked of evidence, but richly clothed in the garniture of words, we can consider it only as a splendid effect to prolong his report, and dazzle the imagination of his hearers.

NO. XIII.

PROSPECTIVE VIEWS.

Come, gentle Hope!—now that our sinking cause
Has nor the people’s flattering, loud applause,
Nor claim of honesty, nor chance of gain—
Come, ease each Anti of his growing pain!
Our dismal papers have outlived their day—
Our squibs, and handbills too, have passed away—
Our old associates shun us when we meet—
Our neighbors too avoid us in each street.
Alas! that ever we should see such change,
Where fancy gamboled in unbounded range!
We thought each office would be ours to give:
Now ‘none so poor’ as in our sunshine live.
We said each beaver would most lowly bend
To John of South—and Jacob of North-end.
We did believe that, be they well or ill;
All men would swallow Abner’s Anti-pill.
Oh, change of changes! How reverse our plan!
E’en Parson Thacher sinks the pop’lar man!!
When he goes down, our small-fry must beware;—
They’ll fall entrapped in some Masonic snare.
You’d scarce believe it, but the folks do say
They know and watch each Anti night and day.
Just hear. I happened to be out one night,
And did expect to see some dreadful sight—What’s that?—Oh, heavens! some Mason—or some ghost!

Dear me—’tis nothing but a harmless post.

I dont know how it is with other men,

But never shall I have my peace again.

My very shaddow harrows up my fears:

Give back my peace—I’ll give my very ears.

If skill of Anties such diseases cure,

They have both ‘bane and antidote’ I’m sure.

I must be rid of this vexatious clan,

And try to be, once more, an honest man.

We are requested to state that Mr. Elisha Bigelow, and Elijah Crane, both of this town, having in early stages of the Antimasonic excitement joined the party from an honest belief that its motives were pure and disinterested, that they are now impressed with the conviction that the same is marked by the most corrupt and unhallowed principles, and as friends to order and morality, deem it a duty not only to themselves, but to their country to secede, and forever separate from the cause of antimasonry.—Chelsea Advocate.

GERMINATION UPON MERCURY.—M. J. Pinot read to the Academy of Sciences, of Paris, a memoir, in which he certifies that a grain of Lathyrus odatus, after being steeped in water, was placed on mercury covered with a very little water; that the germination proceeded as usual, and the radicle descended into the mercury to the depth of eight or ten lines. Having placed this grain in a state of suspension and equilibrium above the surface of the mercury, the radicle descended into the metal in the same manner, though the least resistance seemed as if it would disturb the equilibrium which maintained it.—[Bib. THE BOQUET.

THE DEATH BED OF BEAUTY.

The following beautiful lines are by J. O. ROCKWELL,
Editor of the Providence Patriot.

She sleeps in beauty like the dying rose
By the warm skies and winds of June forsaken;
Or like the sun, when dimmed with clouds it goes
To its clear ocean-bed, by calm winds shaken;
Or like the moon, when through its robes of snow
It smiles with angel meekness—or like sorrow
When it is smoothed by resignation's glow,
Or like herself,—she will be dead to-morrow.

How still she sleeps! The young and sinless girl!
And the short breath upon her red lips tremble!
Waving almost in death, the raven curls
That float around her; and she most resembles
The fall of night upon the ocean foam,
Wherefrom the sun-light hath not yet departed,
And where the winds are faint! She stealeth home,
Unsullied girl! an angel broken-hearted!

Oh, bitter world! that had so cold an eye
To look upon so fair a type of heaven:
She could not dwell beneath a winter sky,
And her heart strings were frozen here, and riven;
And now she lies in ruins—look and weep!
How lightly leans her cheek upon the pillow!
And how the bloom of her fair face doth keep Changed! like a stricken dolphin on the billow.

Look on her now! the deep blue veins of blood
Stand out upon her neck—the ice is blending
With summer streams—and now the crimson flood
Is frozen as it flows; that sun descending
That gave her light, and what shall save her now?
Her azure eyes are like the frozen violets,
And cold as marble is her polished brow,
And death is written on her silken eye-lids.

LINES ON SEEING AN EAGLE PASS NEAR AT AUTUMN TWILIGHT.

BY GRENVILLE MELLEN.

Sail on thou imperial bird,
Of quenchless eye and tireless wing!
How is thy distant coming heard,
As the night's breezes round the ring!
Thy course was 'gainst the burning sun
In his extremest glory! How!
Is thy unequalled daring done,
Thou stoop'st to earth so lowly now?

Or hast thou left thy rocking dome,
Thy roaring crag, thy lightning pine,
To find some secret, meaner home,
Less stormy and unsafe than thine?
Else why thy dusky pinions bend
So closely to this shadowy world,
And round thy searching glances send,
As wishing thy proud pinions furled?

Yes, lonely is thy shattered nest,
Thy eye is desolate, though high;
And lonely thou, alike, at rest,
Or soaring in the upper sky;
The golden light that bathes thy plumes
On thine immeasurable flight,
Falls cheerless on earth's desert tombs,
And makes the north ice-mountain bright.

So comes the eagle-hearted down;
So come the proud and high to earth,
When life's night-gathering tempests frown
Over their glory and their mirth:
So quails the mind's undying eye,
That bore unveil'd fames noontide sun;

So man seeks solitude to die,
His high place left—his triumphs done.

So round the residence of power,
A cold and joyless lustre shines,
And on life's pinnacles will lower
Clouds dark as bathe the eagle's pines:
But oh! the mellow light that pours
From God's pure throne, the light that saves;
That with a mellowed lustre soars,
And sheds a radiance round our grave.

MISCELLANY.

[Selected and Prepared for the Mirror.]

IMAGINATION, GENIUS, TASTE.

Imagination is that faculty of the mind which calls forth and combines ideas, with great rapidity and vivacity, whether congruous or incongruous.

Genius is that faculty which calls forth and combines ideas, with great rapidity and vivacity, and with an intuitive perception of their congruity or incongruity.

Taste is that faculty which selects and relishes such combinations of ideas as produce genuine beauty, and rejects the contrary.

These definitions are simple, but I trust correct; and if so, Imagination is the basis of the whole; taste may exist without genius; and genius without taste; but neither can exist without imagination. Yet imagination is neither taste nor genius, since though absolutely necessary to the subsistence of these powers, the great mart that furnishes them with their daily food, it may also exist without them. We often meet with persons who have a strong and active propensity to combine ideas, without any attention to their natural agreement or connexion; and with such imagination lords it over the judgment. Such combinations are soon made, for they cost no trouble, like those the judgment are engaged in.

Lovers and madmen have such soothing brains,
Such shaping phantasies that apprehend
More than cool reason ever comprehends.
The lunatic, the lover, and the poet,
Are of IMAGINATION all compact.
One sees more devils than vast hell can hold;
That is the madman. The lover all as frantic,
Sees Helen's beauty in a brow of Egypt.
The poet's eye in a fine frenzy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven,

And as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name.—Shaks.

This indeed is the language of philosophy, though put in verse. The madman, the lover, and the poet, are described as being joint subjects to the dominion of the imagination; while the general current of their ideas from its vehemence, abruptness and audacity, is denominated a phrenzy. But the phrenzy of the poet is distinctly stated to be of a superior kind to that of the rest; and is distinguished by the epithet fine, or delicate, refined, polished; and consequently imparts skill or regulation, taste, genius or both together.

Genius is therefore in few words, IMAGINATION WITH INTUITIVE JUDGMENT. It distinguishes the man of fine phrenzy as Shakspeare expresses it, from the man of mere phrenzy. It is a sort of instantaneous insight that gives us knowledge, without going to school for it. Sometimes it is directed to one subject, sometimes to another; but under whatever form it exhibits itself, it enables the individual, who possesses it, to make a wonderful and almost miraculous progress in the line of his pursuit. Sometimes it attaches itself to the sweet harmony of sounds, and we then behold an infant of eight or ten years of age, evincing the science and execution of an adult and finished musician. Sometimes it rejects the science of sounds and prefers that of numbers; and we behold a boy of twelve years old solving, almost instantaneously, arithmetical questions, which would cost an expert practitioner in the common way a labor of many hours. Sometimes we find it enamored of the beauty of colors or the charms of eloquence; and we are struck with the precocity of perfection which it evinces in either case. In other instances we see it descending to the arts and labors of common life, and diffusing intuitive knowledge among the multitude. Go to the busy Change and you will find some individuals allowed by general consent to have a peculiar genius, or talent as it is often called, for commerce; in other words, who are capable of calling forth and combining commercial ideas, with great speed and vivacity, and with that intuitive perception of their agreement or disagreement, which leads them to the most judicious results, which the surrounding crowd would only be able to attain by a long catenation or process of inquiry. Go into the country, and you will find the same difference among our husbandmen and agriculturists; while some among them have no more imagination than the clod they cleave with their ploughshares, others seem to penetrate intuitively the nice order of vegetation, and never suffer a season to roll over them without wringing from it some important secret; as Aristæus, in the Georgics, from the pinioned form of old Proteus. Go to our manufacturing and mechanical towns; and you will in like manner meet with artizans and handicrafts who discover the same acuteness of intelligence, the same rapid combination of consenting ideas, the same superiority of genius or talent in their respective callings beyond that which is possessed by their fellows, as in the cases to which I have alluded to already.

Genius then is mental power; it acts by an invisible impulse, and appears often to act miraculously; and hence its name; a name common to all the world; derived from the Hebrew, copied thence into the Sanscrit, Arabic, and Chinese;—from the eastern tongues into the Latin, and from the Latin to our own, and almost every other language of modern Europe; and imparting in every instance, in its radical signification, a tutelar, a guiding or inspiring divinity. Genius should control the imagination to cause the pictures it paints to be of any value. To give full efficacy to the daring flights of the imagination, not only genius, but Taste, must associate with it; to reflect and relish such combinations of ideas as produce beauty and reject the contrary; which is the appropriate office of taste. Taste and genius cannot but be favorable to virtue. They cannot exist conjointly without sensibility.

The mind thus constituted (with the faculties of imagination, genius, taste, and sensibility,) has its pains as well as its pleasures; nor are its pains few or of trifling magnitude;

Yet murmur not, nor deem the fates reserve
No drop of solace mid the bitter stream;

Virtue is yours; and still each trembling nerve Oft proves an avenue to bliss supreme.
 Ye cannot wade through filth that dulness dares;
 Your nobler spirits soar above the clod;
 Ye must be pure while yet your bosom bears
 The clear unsullied impress of your God.
 Nor does the world, in every scene that springs,
 Nor Fancy's self, portray perpetual gloom.
 Feel ye no joy when sickness smiles and sings?
 When worth succeeds? or culprits meet their doom.

Lo! where yon vale unfolds its pictur'd site,
 And meads and corn-fields mix their gay attire;
 Sheep-cots and herds, and sprinkled cottages white,
 Stream, busy mill, deep wood and tufted spire.
 Can ermined guilt, when every scheme succeeds,
 Feel half the joy that stirs your generous breast,
 As, pleased you ponder o'er these simple meads,
 Compute their charms, and share their balmy rest?
 And mark, untouched by city broils, the reign
 Of rural comfort, cheerfulness and ease;
 Of health embloom'd from every sweet-briar lane,
 And faith and morals wholesome as the breeze.
 Go! climb yon castle cliff that meets the sky,
 And tells of times tradition cannot reach;
 And o'er the ruins, as you throw your eye,
 Of rocks and towers, with many a hoary breach,
 Say! does the wreck of nature and of art,
 The wild cascade, and echo undefin'd,
 The grandeur, and the solitude import
 No pleasing train of image to the mind?
 Or would ye change, for all that wealth can stake,
 Ambition's plume, or lawless pleasure's prime,
 The feelings then, that through the bosom wake,
 And rouse the soul to ecstasies sublime?
 Yet these; and countless sympathies like these,
 Of purest zeal, are yours, and yours alone;
 Guilt knows them not, nor dull unwieldy ease,
 For sensibility and taste are one.
 And well, thus gifted, may ye bear the thrill
 Of social sorrows and ideal wrong:
*The Æolian harp that heaven's pure breezes fill,
 Must breathe, at times, a melancholy song.*

HISTORICAL.

A TALE OF OLD TIMES.

Among those who previous to the French and Indian wars, left the more thickly inhabited parts of Massachusetts, and penetrated into the wilds of New-Hampshire, and 'Hamshire grants,' was the fierce and daring partizan Henderson. Alone he erected a rude log hut far beyond the most remote settlements; the haunts of the savage beasts of prey were near, and the smoke curled from the wigwam of the Indian, but a short distance from the habitation. The Indians often passed by the hut of Henderson, on their way to the white settlements; but woe was to him who came nigh with hostile intentions, for the summons of Henderson's rifle was fatal. From his earliest boyhood Henderson was acquainted with the wilds and stratagems of Indian warfare; his earliest days were spent in learning to use the deadly rifle, and before he had arrived at the age of manhood, many savages had fallen before his fatal aim. Henderson was tall, and strong—the strongest Indian warrior was not able to cope with him single-handed; many a savage had made the attempt, but he would hurl them to the ground; he would wield, with ease, his heavy hatchet, and hurl it as true to its mark, as the most expert Indian could his light tomahawk—he was so swift on foot, that he could out-speed the most active runner, and too wary to fall into the ambush of the subtle savage.

Like the original sons of the forest, who bore towards him a deadly hate. Henderson depended on his gun for sustenance. With his rifle he would bring the fierce catamount from the tallest tree, and the eagle from her nesting place, on the high cliff; the panther, and the wolf knew his skill and at night he rested himself upon their skins.—The nimble deer could not escape, and their wide-spreading antlers were hung up as trophies around his hut, while on the smoky rafters hung the gammons of the grizzly bear, who had been routed from his den by this 'almost indianized pioneer of the forest.' When the hatchet was taken up by French and Indians in 1755, a party of the latter made an attempt to surprise Henderson in his dwelling, and take him prisoner; but they did not succeed; the chief, with several of his warriors, fell before his fatal rifle, and the rest returned to their tribe, howling over their loss. Henderson now joined the corps of rangers commanded by Rogers and Putnam, and the narrative of many a daring exploit performed by him, while in that service, is still preserved in those traditionary legends of New England, that are fast falling into the shades of forgetfulness.

Putnam, with about forty of his rangers, were posted upon a small creek, near to its entrance of lake George for the purpose of watching the movements of the French and to intercept scouting parties that might be sent out. One evening, Henderson who was one of the party, took his post on guard at the mouth of the creek. For nearly two hours he carefully listened to every passing breeze but not a sound could he hear, save the occasional plunging of the musk-rat, ported along the shore. At length a light breeze sprung up, and blew directly from the lake up the mouth of the creek; a faint indistinct sound was swept along by the wind, and the quick ear of Henderson soon distinguished the splashing of an oar, although it was at a considerable distance, and carefully used.—He now withdrew, with great caution, more into the shades of the bushes, and extended himself on the ground, anxiously listening to the sound, but as the breeze died away, silence again reigned, and for a considerable time nothing occurred to interrupt it. A slight agitation was at length visible on the surface of the water; the splashing was distinctly heard at the mouth of the creek, and a canoe passed up; but so much in the shade of the opposite shore, that he was unable to distinguish who it contained. Henderson waited a few moments, and satisfied that he was a scout of the French that had passed, he cautiously launched a light canoe, that had been artfully concealed in the brush; placing himself in it, and giving a slight push, the frail vessel shot into the stream. But the last movement was made too hastily. For immediately a canoe passed down the creek with the speed of an arrow, endeavoring to regain the lake. Henderson now started in swift pursuit, and as he gained the creek, the moon, which had been obscured, emerged from the clouds and enabled him to discover the object of his pursuit, it was a large sturdy savage, who directed his way towards the French encampment. Every nerve was now strained to the utmost in pursuit; the light of the moon was too faint for Henderson to use his rifle, had he been under no fear of giving the alarm. They both handled their oars with great dexterity, and for some time the chase was continued with nearly equal velocity. The Indian, when he had drawn Henderson a considerable distance from the mouth of the creek, began to slacken his efforts, and prepare for a close combat. Henderson was soon so near his foe as to narrowly observe his movements. The gun of the Indian was suffered to lie useless, with the muzzle resting on the stern of his canoe; he stood erect, one hand grasped the oar, and with the other he brandished a tomahawk, which glittered in the moon-light; but he seemed loth to part with his weapon, until his foe had approached nearer to him. Henderson now took his heavy hatchet from his belt, and as he arose prepared for a desperate conflict; the Indian hurled his tomahawk, but the tottering of his canoe caused him to miss his aim; it whistled by the ear of Henderson, and fell harmless into the water, a few rods from him. The Indian, uttering the savage exclamation, 'ugh' seized his gun, and was bringing it to his face, when Henderson hurled his hatchet with a deadly aim; the Indian tottered for a moment, vainly endeavoring to raise his piece to his face, the gun dropped from his hands now palsied by death, and he fell upon the side of his canoe—it capsized; and the savage sunk to rise no more. Henderson now returned to his companions, who were unapprized of his absence. Three days after this, the engagement with the celebrated Molang took place, and the rangers, after having slain nearly five times their own number, effected their retreat to Fort Edward with but little loss.

Years had rolled away, and again the cry of war rang through our land; again the appeal to arms, was heard, and the hardy yeomanry of New-England. Britain had now armed herself to crush with the iron grasp of tyranny, the infant liberties of her colonies; her veterans, led by her most skilful officers, were now in arms, against a band of undisciplined yeomanry, who had hastily assembled in defence of what they held dear. In the New Hampshire regiment commanded by the brave Stark, was an aged soldier; he was tall, and his form but slightly bent, although his brow was furrowed with toil, and his head whitened by the storms of more than sixty winters. He was armed with a rifle that had the appearance of long, and careful use; on one side hung a horn filled with powder, and on the other a deer-skin pouch containing the leaden messengers—it was Henderson. He had again stepped forth at the call of his country, to stay the hand of the ruthless invader. On the ever memorable 17th of June, 1775, the regiment of Stark took a position on the left of the American redoubt; their deadly fire twice broke the steady discipline of the British troops, and caused them to fall back in great disorder. The rifle of the aged soldier had cut down three British officers, and was raised for the fourth, when the British troops delivered the enfilading fire of the third attack. Henderson fell, and died a martyr to his country's cause.—[Rural Repository.]

A COMPARISON.

Ingenuous and True.

Pleasures are few, and fewer we enjoy;
 Pleasure, like quicksilver, is bright and coy;
 We strive to grasp it with our utmost skill,
 Still it alludes us, and it glitters still.
 If seized at last, compute your mighty gains;
 What is it but rank poison in your veins?

SATURDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 18, 1830.

METEORS.—Several of these phenomena have recently been seen traversing our atmosphere. The Salem Register says a very brilliant one was observed in that town on Friday evening. Its course was apparently in a N. W. direction. The meteors which are seen shooting through the atmosphere in the night, it is generally conceded by philosophers and astronomers, originate from inflammable vapors, effervescing in the air. Those most common in our atmosphere are generally classed among those usually designated by the appellation of fire-balls. Heat and cold are powerful agents in producing various meteors; but these are only relatives, and different modifications of the same fluid: the former being its action from a centre, the latter its action from a circumference to a centre.—Though it is not known what connexion there is between heat, cold, and electricity, yet it is known that this last is very much effected by them; for heat makes bodies more pervious to electricity than otherwise they would be, and cold makes them less so. Hence the most violent electrical phenomena are observed in hot countries; while in the colder regions those that depend on a more moderate electrification, as aurora borealis, are more frequent.—[Vide. Ency. v. 5. art. met.] Violent electricity alone produces the phenomena of lightning, fire-balls, ignis fatui, and the aurora. In the phenomenon of thunder, evaporation and the other agents by which rain and hail are produced, are concerned. Fire-balls appear collected on the extreme boundaries of the atmosphere, whence the fluid is confined, as it were, in a concave shell, which it cannot penetrate in great quantities, in any particular place:—Dr. Blagden has successfully proved that they are 'great bodies of electric matter, moving from one part of the heavens, where to our conception it is superabundant, to another where it is deficient.' These balls can move only in a horizontal direction, and never fly perpendicularly up from the earth, as those often do which are formed near the ground.

Pliny mentions the appearance of several kind of meteors. He speaks particularly of a sanguineous kind, a flame as red as blood, which fell from heaven about the 107th Olympiad, when Philip of Macedon was concerting his plans for enslaving the republics of Greece. He saw one himself, while on watch in the Roman camp—a number of resplendent lights fixed upon the palisades of the camp, similar to those which sailors speak of as fastening themselves to masts and yards of ships. In tropical climates they are more common. Mr. Barham, while riding one morning in Jamaica saw a ball of fire about the size of a bomb, swiftly falling down with a great blaze. It penetrated the ground to a considerable depth; tearing up the soil in several places. The green herbage was burnt up near the holes where it entered, and a strong smell of sulphur continued for some time after. In 1676, a great globe of fire was seen at Bavaria, in Italy, about three quarters of an hour after sunset. It passed westward, at the rate of not less than one hundred and sixty miles in a minute, and at last stood over the Adriatic sea. It passed over all Italy, and could not have been less than 28 miles above the surface of the earth. It was distinctly heard making a hissing noise, similar to that of a firework.—Having passed away to sea, it was heard to go off with a most violent explosion. It was computed to be when at Bavaria, not less than a mile long, and half a mile broad. On the 18th August, 1783, one of these meteors appeared in England. It was seen in all parts of Great Britain, at Paris, at Nuits in Burgundy, and even at Rome. It is supposed to have described a tract of at least 1000 miles of the earth. It appeared to burst and reunite several times. It is thought its bulk could not have been less than half a mile in diameter. Its greatest velocity has been calculated at forty miles in a second. The illumination of these meteors is often so great as totally to obliterate the stars, to make the moon look dull, and affect the spectator like the sun itself.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.—The Message of the President, delivered on Tuesday at 12 o'clock, was received in this city on Friday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The President congratulates the members of the Senate and of the House on their return to their constitutional duties, and on the happy condition of the country. The apparent exceptions to the harmony of the prospect, he remarks, are to be referred rather to inevitable diversities in the various interests which enter into the composition of so extensive a whole, than to any want of attachment to the Union—interests whose collision serve only, in the end, to foster the spirit of conciliation and patriotism, so essential to the preservation of that union which, he most devotedly hopes is destined to prove imperishable.

WEST INDIA TRADE.

The negotiations and arrangements that have been made in relation to this subject 'secure to the United States every advantage asked by them, and which the state of the negotiation allowed us to insist upon. The trade will be placed upon a footing decidedly more favorable to this country than any on which it ever stood; and our commerce and navigation will enjoy, in the colonial ports of Great Britain, every privilege allowed to other nations.

TREATY WITH TURKEY.

By its provisions, a free passage is secured, without limitation of time, to the vessels of the United States, to and from the Black sea, including the navigation thereof; and our trade with Turkey is placed on the footing of the most favored nations. The latter is an arrangement wholly independent of the treaty of Adrianople; and the former derives much value, not only from the increased security which, under any circumstances, it would give to the right in question, but from the fact, ascertained in the course of the negotiation, that, by the construction put upon that treaty by Turkey, the article relating to the passage of the Bosphorus is confined to nations having the treaties with the Porte. The most friendly feelings appear to be entertained by the Sultan, and an enlightened disposition is evinced by him to foster the intercourse between the two countries by the most liberal arrangements. This disposition it will be our duty and interest to cherish.

RUSSIA.

I sincerely regret to inform you that our Minister lately commissioned to that court, on whose distinguished talents and great experience in public affairs I place great reliance, has been compelled by extreme indisposition to exercise a privilege, which, in consideration of the extent to which his constitution had been impaired in the public service, was committed to his discretion, of leaving temporarily his post for the advantage of a more genial climate.

If, as it is to be hoped, the improvement of his health will be such as to justify him in doing so, he will repair to St. Petersburg, and resume the discharge of his official duties. I have received the most satisfactory assurance that in the meantime, the public interests in that quarter will be preserved from prejudice, by the intercourse which he will continue, through the Secretary of Legation, with the Russian cabinet.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The negotiations, in regard to such points in our foreign relations as remain to be adjusted, have been actively prosecuted during the recess. Material advances have been made, which are of a character to promise favorable results.

Of the points here referred to, the most prominent are our claims upon France for spoliation upon our commerce; similar claims upon Spain, together with embarrassments in the commercial intercourse between the two countries, which ought to be removed; the conclusion of the treaty of commerce and navigation with Mexico, which has been so long in suspense, as well as the final settlement of limits between ourselves and that republic; and, finally, the arbitrament of the question between the United States and Great Britain in regard to the Northeastern boundary.

FRENCH CLAIMS.

The negotiation with France has been conducted by our Minister with zeal and ability, and in all respects to my entire satisfaction. Although the prospect of a favorable termination was occasionally dimmed by counter pretensions, to which the United States could not assent, he yet had strong hopes of being able to arrive at a satisfactory settlement with the late Government. The negotiation has been renewed with the present authorities, and, sensible of the general and lively confidence of our citizens in the justice and magnanimity of regenerated France, I regret the more not to have it my power, yet to announce the result so confidently anticipated. No ground, however, inconsistent with this expectation, has been taken; and I do not allow myself to doubt that justice will soon be done to us.

THE EASTERN BOUNDARY.

The steps which remained to place the matter in controversy between Great Britain and the United States fairly before the arbitrator, have all been taken in the same liberal and friendly spirit which characterized those before announced. Recent events have doubtless served to delay the decision, but our Minister at the court of the distinguished arbitrator has been assured that it will be made within the time contemplated by the treaty.

MEXICO.

I am particularly gratified in being able to state that a decidedly favorable, and, as I hope, lasting change, has been effected in our relations with the neighboring republic of Mexico. The unfortunate and unfounded suspicions in regard to our disposition, which it became my painful duty to advert to on a former occasion, have been, I believe, entirely removed; and the government of Mexico has been made to understand the real character of the wishes and views of this in regard to that country. The consequence is, the establishment of friendship and mutual confidence. Such are the assurances which I have received, and I see no cause to doubt their sincerity.

PORTUGAL.

Several alleged depredations have been recently committed on our commerce by the national vessels of Portugal. They have been made the subject of immediate remonstrance and reclamation. I am not yet possessed of sufficient information to express definite opinions of their character, but expect soon to receive it. No proper means shall be omitted to obtain for our citizens all the redress to which they may appear to be entitled.

THE INDIANS.

It gives me pleasure to announce to Congress, that the benevolent policy of the Government, steadily pursued for nearly thirty years, in relation to the removal of the Indians beyond the white settlements, is approaching to a happy consummation. Two important tribes have accepted the provision made for their removal at the last session of Congress; and it is believed that their example will induce the remaining tribes, also, to seek the same obvious advantages.

THE IMPOST REVENUE.

Among the numerous causes of congratulation, the condition of our impost revenue deserves special mention, in as much as it promises the means of extinguishing the public debt sooner than was anticipated, and furnishes a strong illustration of the practical effects of the present tariff upon our commercial interests.

THE TARIFF.

The object of the tariff is objected to by some as unconstitutional; and it is considered by almost all as defective in many of its parts.

The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust those duties with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry, is so completely incidental to that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to their inspection laws. This authority having thus entirely passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them; and, consequently, if it be not possessed by the General Government, it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry, and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely cannot be the case; this indispensable power, thus surrendered by the States, must be within the scope of the authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress.

The present tariff taxes some of the comforts of life unnecessarily high; it undertakes to protect interests too local and minute to justify a general exaction; and it also attempts to force some kinds of manufactures for which the country is not ripe.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

According to the estimates at the Treasury Department, the receipts of the Treasury during the present year will amount to twenty-four millions one hundred and sixty-one thousand and eighteen dollars, which will exceed by about three hundred thousand dollars, the estimate presented in the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury.—The total expenditure during the year exclusive of the public debt, is estimated at thirteen millions seven hundred and forty-two thousand three hundred and eleven dollars; and the payment on account of public debt for the same period will have been eleven millions three hundred and fifty-four thousand six hundred and thirty dollars; leaving a balance in the treasury, on the first of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-one, of four millions eight hundred and nineteen thousand seven hundred and eighty-one dollars.

THE POST-OFFICE.

The report of the Postmaster General, in like manner, exhibits a satisfactory view of the important branch of the Government under his charge. In addition to the benefits already extended by the operations of the Post-Office Department, considerable improvements within this present year have been secured, by an increase in the accommodation of stage coaches, and in the frequency and celerity of the transportation of the mail between some of the most important points of the Union.

Under the late contracts, improvements have been provided for the southern section of the country, and, at the same time, an annual saving made of upwards of seventy-two thousand dollars.

THE U. S. BANK.

The importance of the principles involved in the inquiry whether it will be proper to re-charter the Bank of the United States, requires that I should again call the attention of Congress to the subject. Nothing has occurred to lessen, in any degree, the dangers, which many of our citizens apprehend from that institution, as at present organized. In the spirit of improvement and compromise which distinguishes our country and its institutions, it becomes us to inquire whether it be not possible to secure the advantages afforded by the present Bank, through the agency of the Bank of the United States, so modified in its principles and structure as to obviate Constitutional and other objections.

It is thought practicable to organize such a bank, with the necessary officers, as a bank of the Treasury Department, based on the public and individual deposits, without power to make loans or purchase property, which shall remit the funds of the Government, the expenses of which, may be paid, if thought advisable, by allowing its officers to sell bills of exchange to private individuals at a moderate premium. Not being a corporate body, having no stockholders, debtors, or property, and but few officers, it would not be obnoxious to the constitutional objections which are urged against the present bank; and having no means to operate on the hopes, fears, or interests of large masses of the community it would be shorn of the influence which makes that bank formidable. The States would be strengthened by having in their hands the means of furnishing the local paper currency through their own banks, while the bank of the United States, though issuing no paper, would check the issues of the State banks, by taking their notes in deposit, and for exchange, only so long as they continue to be redeemed with specie. In times of public emergency, the capacities of such an institution might be enlarged by legislative provision.

These suggestions are made, not so much as a recommendation, as with a view of calling the attention of Congress to the possible modification of a system which cannot continue to exist in its present form without occasional collision with the local authorities, and perpetual apprehensions and discontent on the part of the States and the people.

The above extracts furnish a general idea of the prominent features of the Message. We have not room for more. The President recommends some change in the present manner of electing President and Vice President; and discusses fully the questions of the removal of the Indians, internal improvements, &c. The Message is unusually long, but very interesting.

QUACKERY.—The Upland, Penn. Union, gives the following particulars of the death of a young lady by the name of Haynes, daughter of James Haynes, of Chester township.

The circumstances attending the death of this amiable young woman, are lamentable indeed. She died the victim of the most abominable quackery. She had been for some weeks afflicted with a violent paroxysmal pain in the head, called by the physician who attended her, nervous rheumatism, or to speak (as he expressed himself,) technically correct, neuralgia; if my recollection of the term he used be correct. A quack from Baltimore, arriving in Chester, assuming, too, the sacred garb of a preacher of the everlasting gospel of truth, learns that she is ill, calls to see her, assures her that nothing ails her head, that it is her stomach that is affected; and that his wife had been held exactly similar for five years, and that after many doctors had failed in curing her, he had cured her himself; and assured Fanny that he would cure her 'by Saturday night,' (this was on Wednesday.) By harangues of this kind, he inspired her with confidence, and she was anxious that he should undertake the cure. He did undertake it, railing against everything that had been done, he commenced his puking and sweating operations, washing her all over with cold water, immediately on taking her out of the steam bath, with the intention, he said, of driving all the heat out of the skin, by sweating and then washing it off with cold water. This method was pursued until her strength was so far exhausted, that she could not sit up without fainting. He now, rather in despair probably, said, 'his wife was as good a doctor as he was,' and he would bring her from Baltimore; she came, and their joint efforts failed to bring relief.

Another quack is now sent for at Philadelphia; on his arrival, he condemned all that had been done; says 'the other doctors' have poisoned her, but that he could work it out of her; says she must be steamed twice more, although at this time she was continually drenched with a cold sweat, owing, very probably, to the skin having already been so long and so frequently subjected to the excessive stimulation of great heat and moisture as to have lost its power of contracting, so as to close the pores. But she was steamed twice more; the quack says she is too cold and must be heated, to effect this he commences giving her cayenne pepper, alone or in combination, (continuing, too, the emetics) till the throat,—and no doubt the stomach, became so inflamed that she died in a few days.—During all this time, too, the affection of the head, instead of yielding as her strength declined, was tenfold worse than it ever had been for a length of time before she died. But they pursued the one headlong course, unheeding all unfavorable changes and probably considering them as evidence of the doctor's poison coming out of her; as one of them with an air of great self-congratulation, exultingly observed, at a time when they had every reason to fear that she would not live from one day to another, 'the doctors poison is nearly all out of her.' Thus was cut off, in the spring time of life, this amiable young woman, and at a time, when her parents and herself were flattered with the pleasing prospect of a speedy recovery.

CANDID RENUNCIATION.—Mr. Samuel Dexter, of Frankfort, N. Y. having withdrawn himself from Olive Branch Lodge, and from the Masonic Institution, candidly makes the following declaration. It is a complete vindication of the general correctness and purity of Masonic principles, against the base and malicious accusations of our persecutors.

'I never considered, from any obligation which I took as a Mason, from the Entered Apprentice's degree to the Royal Arch, that I was bound to screen a man who had committed a crime against the laws of my country because he was a Mason—but, that I was bound to deal justly with all mankind.'

The antimasonic papers are crying aloud for the assistance of some writer of talents! 'We call on 'William Penn,' (say they) whose talents and sympathies have been seen.' Poor fellows! they will call in vain.—They will find it difficult to induce men of talents and character to participate in the infamy which attaches to them and to their cause. The cause originated with knaves and fanatics—none others will meddle with it.

THEATRE.—Miss Kelley has been engaged for six nights. She made her first appearance on Wednesday evening, in the character of Lady Teazle and Marian Ramsay. During her engagement, the celebrated spectacle of 'Cherry and Fair Star' will be brought forward, in which Miss K. will sustain the character of Cherry. Mr. Russell gives notice that he has made arrangements with nearly all the most eminent performers in the country. The tragedy of the Robbers, will shortly be produced. In rehearsal, a new Operatical Farce, written by a gentleman of this city.

The Providence Daily Advertiser states on the information of a correspondent, that the Hon. Edward Everett is dangerously ill at Washington. We know, says the Daily Advertiser, from a more direct source that Mr. Everett is severely indisposed, but we hope not dangerously. He arrived at Washington before the commencement of the session, but has been so ill as to be unable to take his seat in the House.

BARBAROUS.—At Philadelphia a man has been convicted of manslaughter, in causing the death of his wife by beating her. She was enceinte, and within two months of her natural accouchement. Delivery had not taken place when her remains were buried, but on being taken up 24 hours afterwards, by the Coroner, a dead infant was found in the coffin.—Let the villain be quartered.

JOSEPH J. KNAPP.—An application has been made to the Governor and Council, during their present session, for the pardon of J. J. Knapp. The Governor and Council have not granted the application, but have appointed the 31st day of the present month, between the hours of 8 and 10, for the execution of the sentence of the court against him.

HORRIBLE.—At Rochester, not long since, a lad of 13, while engaged in tending some machinery, was caught and nearly crushed to death between two wheels. One leg was amputated at the thigh, and his father, who is a notorious drunkard, took the limb to a surgeon and sold it for 37 1-2 cents, and with the money procured whiskey enough to keep himself drunk several days! Alas! for the depravity of human nature.

It is supposed that nearly 2,000,000 of lottery tickets are sold in New York annually amounting to more than nine millions of dollars! The Grand Jury of the city of N. Y. have presented this traffic to the common council, as a grievance, and requested that a law be drafted and presented to the Legislature for adoption, to suppress or restrict the trade in tickets.

A man named Rouseau was lodged in Doyleston, Pa. on the 30 Nov. for killing his brother. They had been hunting and on their return 'took something to drink,' but the prisoner took a drop too much, got angry and slew his brother.

THE WREATH.

[From the New-York American.]
THE LAST OF THE RED MEN.

The Sun's last ray was glowing fair
On craig and tree and flood;
And fell in mellow softness where
The lonely Indian stood.

Beneath his eye, in living gold,
The Broad Pacific lay;
Unruffled there, a skiff might hold
Its bright and fearless way!

Far! far! behind him, mountains blue
In shadowy distance melt;
And far beyond the dark woods grew,
Where his forefathers dwelt!

No breathing sound was in the air,
As, leaning on his bow,
A lone and weary pilgrim there—
He murmur'd stern and low:

'Far by Ohio's mighty river,
Bright star, I've worshipped thee;
My native stream—its bosom never,
The Red Man more may see!

The Paleface rears his wigwam where
Our Indian hunters roved;
His hatchet fells the forest fair,
Our Indian maidens loved!

A thousand warriors bore in war,
The token of my sires;
On all the hills were seen afar,
Their blazing Council fires!

The Foeman heard their war-whoop shrill,
And held his breath in fear;
And in the wood, and on the hill,
Their arrows pierce the deer.

Where are they now?—the stranger's tread
Is on their silent place!
Yon fading light on mo is shed,
The last of all my race!

Where are they now?—in Summer's light,
Go! seek the Winter's snow;
Forgotten is our name and might,
And broken is our bow!

The White Man came, his bayonets gleam,
Where Sachems held their sway;
And like the shadow of a dream,
Our tribe has passed away!

Cursed be their race! to faith untrue!
False heart, deceitful tongue!—
Hear me, O, evil Manitou,— Revenge the Indian wrong!

I hear him in the hollow moan
Of the dark heaving sea;
And whispers murmur in the tone,
Of vengeance yet to be!

What if no stone shall mark the spot
Where lonely sleep the brave?
Their mighty arm is unforget,
Their glory has no grave.

But to our foes we leave a shame—
Disgrace can never die;
Their sons shall blush to bear a name,
Still blackened with a lie!

So be it ever to their race,
False friends, and bitter cares!
By fraud they have the Indian's place,
The Indian's curse be theirs!

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

MOORE & SEVEY,

NO. 22, CORNHILL, (LATE MARKET-STREET.)

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

From the Hampshire Sentinel.
TO REV. DAVID PEASE,

RENOUNCING MASON, ANTIMASONIC LECTURER, &c.

No. 9.

Sir—You asserted, with all possible gravity, that ‘no man can live up to his Masonic obligations, and live up to his requirements in the church, and those of his country.’ This is, indeed, a singular proposition to come from a Rev. sir knight of the thrice illustrious order of the cross. Had it have proceeded from the inexperienced mouth of an entered apprentice, or even a master, I should not have thought it so singular, nor have regarded it, so wonderfully strange. Had it have come from an illiterate day laborer, or an uninformed artisan, I should not have marvelled at it, for the most absurd notions are pardonable in such men. But coming as it does from a professed teacher of morals, from an appointed minister of salvation, from an enthusiastic devotee of Masonry, and from a veteran saint, loaded with the orders of knighthood, I cannot but think it wondrous strange.

How, sir, will you have us consider this declaration?—Shall we regard it as a solemn confession that for some fifteen years, you knowingly and wilfully transgressed your obligations to the church, of which you are a pastor, and to your country, of which you are a citizen? You were, during that period, a Mason, an active, an enterprising, and a fearless Mason. Your zeal and activity, and talent at invention commended you to the brethren. You approved its doctrines, and applauded its practices, courted its favors, and aspired after its honors. You did more. You nobly breasted the shock of public obloquy, and fearlessly withstood the shafts of private malice. ‘Forgetting what was behind, you pressed forward in the van,’ till you outstripped most of your competitors, and ascended to the very summit. You even suffered persecution for ‘righteousness sake,’ and changed your residence, rather than sacrifice your principles, or abridge your rights. At this time of the ‘trial of your faith and patience,’ you well remember, you received our sympathies, and something more substantial than mere good wishes. And, now, sir, if to become a Mason be a crime, you are deeply stained with that guilt, and I very much question, whether adding to it the infamous guilt of apostacy, will in any degree lessen the original sin. If, to persevere from degree to degree, be adding sin to sin, how great is thy guilt, how immense the multitude of thy transgressions.—Thy late reform, and the loudest slanders of the faithful, will make, methinks, but a small atonement for this mass of error. Desertion to the enemy has much merit, I will concede, moral perjury still more, but both united come short of balancing the protracted account against you.—You advanced, from the first degree, by your own confession, with malice aforethought, knowing it to be evil, and ‘weeping in private’ over its heinous deformities. Treason, studied vituperation, wanton malediction, and untiring enmity, meritorious as they may be, will hardly obliterate the dark stains of such deliberate guilt.

How, sir, I again ask, will you have us understand this proposition? Would you have us understand, that so long as you continued an adhering Mason, you lived in known sin, in the constant violation of your covenant vows, and in the habitual indulgence of treasonable thoughts against your country? ‘No man can live up to his Masonic obligations, and live up to his requirements in the church,’ &c. You, then, by your own admission, fell short of your duty to the church, and your country, and this too, from love to that ‘abominable’ institution, ‘that vile sink of pollution.’ Miserable dicta! Or, will you have us understand, that during this period, you were spell-bound and locked in the arms of infatuation, so that you were unconscious of this enormous wickedness, till you were illuminated by the pure light, and disenthralled by the emancipating grace of antiism? Or shall we understand your declaration in yet a different sense, that during these years of Masonic fidelity, you, in fact, withheld your affections from Masonry, although you so often worshipped at her feet, and assured her of your most ardent attachment, and undying constancy? Or, yet, again, that your zeal was assumed for sinister and selfish purposes (for we well remember your readiness to solicit charity) and that you pretended to a sanctity of character to which you had no just claims? One or the other of these constructions, it seems to me, must necessarily be given to this proposition. Take which of them you will, and draw the proper inference, and if it can afford you any consolation, take it to your bosom. Which, sir, will you have us accept?—Will you be understood as admitting yourself, during this period, a wilful or infatuated, or hypocritical, or a malicious sinner? Methinks, it would best suit your character to select the third construction, for, your confession to the contrary notwithstanding, I do not think you deliberately wicked, nor can I believe that the splendid powers of your mighty mind were eclipsed by any shades of infatuation, nor am I thoroughly persuaded that selfishness alone, governed your conduct. Giving, then, full faith to your confession in this behalf, and admit that you did actually ‘weep in private’ and ‘groan in spirit’ while you lauded the institution and asserted stoutly her claims to antiquity, to extend benevolence and pure morality, how will you satisfy us of your present sincerity and honesty? As far as words and conduct are evidence of sincerity, so far, you furnished that evidence, abundantly, while a Mason. But the sequel proves that evidence to have been fallacious; and to have been assumed for the occasion. You now unblushingly declare, that ‘no man can live up to his Masonic obligations, and live up to his requirements in the church, and those of his country.’ The pregnant declaration stands unsupported by the least evidence, an enduring monument of your own weakness, and folly, and malevolence. This is, verily, too much. Who would have believed that so much sordidness and depravity lurked under such frankness of demeanor, and such apparent openness of heart? You never declined her service, never shrunk from the post of danger, never expressed a doubt of the righteousness of her cause, but on the contrary, you were ever a ready volunteer, in her behalf, sought the most responsible situations, and commended her to the uninitiated, both by precept and example. The plain English of all this is, that for some fifteen years, you have lived a conscience stricken hypocrite, knowingly violating your covenant obligations, and deliberately disregarding your country’s claims, and now, you come before this outraged public, with the language of confession on your lips, and impudently claim their confidence, and ask their charity.—As well might Arnold ask for military command, or Judas for apostolic authority. Who of ordinary discernment will believe your report? Who of ordinary understanding can believe it? for it wears indelible and infallible marks of falsehood! Ah, but the devil may tell the truth, so he may—but, how shall we know whether he tell the truth, or falsehood? It is the character of a witness, that entitles him to credit, and not the story he may tell.

MASONIC OBLIGATIONS.

Whenever a certain object is to be obtained, either of a religious, moral, or political nature, the antimasonic vindictive spirit is such, that all means, however base to accomplish their end, are resorted to, when their object is to destroy Masonic institutions. The end justifies the means, and some, either from bigotry, selfish or worldly motives, always will be found, deeply interested to effect whatever they contemplate. They seize on every circumstance, every opportunity, to add excitement to the enraged minds of the least reflecting portion of the community, and thus make them dupes of their nefarious zeal. Hence, those devoted to destruction, are consigned to popular outrage, under the appalling names of antisocial disorganizers, infidels, aristocrats and dangerous members of society. The conduct of these persecuting antimasonic gentry, may be fitly represented by the quaker, who had his ire stirred within him by a dog; who in the exercise of his best instinctive faculty, to appease his famishing appetite, purloined a leg of mutton. The quaker exclaimed, ‘thou villain! with my own hands I will not kill thee, for it is against my principles to take thy life; but I will give thee a bad name.’ Accordingly, he hugely vociferated, ‘there goes a mad dog.’ What followed is readily conceived, without entering into detail. The poor animal it was who suffered, the quaker and excited populace only were mad. Let those whom it suits apply the moral. There is nothing which can be said against the vilest miscreants, but has been attached to the society of Freemasonry; but antimasonic falsehood ceases to be slander, as fast as their nefarious views are exposed.

One of the charges adduced and exhibited in direful colours, is their supposed oaths and obligations; the forms of which, have been industriously circulated in all publications, devoted to abuse and vituperation. By them, it is said, that Freemasons, when initiated into the society, are bound by certain obligations. Without admitting, or denying any of the oaths, which have been published to the world through the medium of pamphlets, newspapers, or antimasonic harangues, there appears to be a suitable opening, at this period, to enter upon an examination of oaths administered for civil and religious purposes, confining ourselves, to such as are taken by officers, when they assume their official duties, and of those obligations, members of particular societies are placed under, to confirm their membership. Let us compare these oaths with man’s moral obligations to his God and his neighbor. It is apprehended, the nature of oaths, whether taken by the chief officers of government, by magistrates, by inferior civil officers, or by men, when becoming members of civil and religious institutions, is not generally understood. Every man, who believes the truths of Divine revelation, and a superintending Providence, and that all truths are of Divine origin, is under the highest obligations to his God, to observe His moral laws and live a life, in conformity thereto. Can any oath administered by man, add to, or diminish a man's moral obligation? Can any oath taken by man diminish the moral obligation he is under to his God and his neighbor?

There is no oath so binding as the moral law, which is effective on every man, who sincerely believes in such a divine code. He who disbelieves a divine code of laws, will be bound by no oaths administered by man. Do people imagine the chief officers of government are under stronger moral obligations to execute their respective duties by the prescribed oaths they take, when inducted into office? Is it believed, that magistrates are under greater moral obligations to do justice, by reason of having taken their official oaths? Those who believe an oath increases the moral obligations are more influenced by the forms than by the spirit, by the fear of man than by the love of God and his neighbor; consequently, are still under the bondage of sin and evil. What civil obligations are stronger than those that ministers of the gospel are under, who assume the province of preaching peace and good will to men, by their solemn inductions to their office? It is asked, whether they are under increased moral obligations, to perform their respective duties? We answer, no. Neither oaths nor obligations can, under any circumstances, supersede, add to, or diminish man's moral obligations. What then are the use of oaths taken by presidents, governors, magistrates, by members of civil and religious institutions? It will be asked, are they useless forms and ceremonies? It is answered, no. Those oaths are merely signs of induction to the respective offices. Not that they strengthen, or diminish moral obligation to our God, our country, and our neighbor. These oaths have respect to the particular duties of office only; for the presumption is, a good reputation, founded on punctual observance of moral obligations, renders a man worthy of office, otherwise it would not have been conferred.

Are individuals of religious societies under stronger moral obligations, for having publicly and solemnly assented to particular doctrines of a church, or creed of faith, renouncing at the same time the world, flesh and the works of satan? If such are believed to be made more sanctified, by the ceremony, it is strong evidence, that too great stress is placed on external ceremonies, and too little on moral obligations. No one will object to the forms of induction to any society. They become objectionable in consequence of the great importance attached to them, and thus may be instrumental in creating hypocrites.

The observation will justly apply to the peculiar forms of admission of members into all societies. Every society or denomination has equal right to prescribe its own forms of admitting members. But these forms cannot add to, or diminish their moral obligations. It is said Masonic societies, among others have their peculiar forms and obligations, of their initiation; these forms and obligations, whatever they may be, having respect only to their initiation, do not in the least impair their moral obligations to their God, and their neighbors. They are but signs of their fellowship and brotherhood, as all forms of admission into any society should be viewed. Human oaths are the necessary offspring of a corrupt state of society. Compared with the savage state, they are an improvement; but as the mind is opened to see and feel the powers of divine truth, their necessity will cease. Our moral obligations to love God with all our heart, and our neighbors as ourselves, is binding on all denominations, and whenever that period shall arrive, when divine truth will appear in the same light to all religious sects and denominations of men, contention and discord will cease, and peace and harmony will attune the universal song.

In that day, will the following prophecy be fulfilled:—
'The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion together; and the lion shall eat straw like an ox.—
And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea.' Again, thus saith the Lord, they shall teach no more, every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying know the Lord: for they shall all know me, from the least unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord, for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sins no more.'

When the time shall have arrived, when the preceding prophetic predictions shall have been fulfilled, all formal human oaths and obligations will cease and become obsolete. The law of God, will be the governing law of the world, our moral obligations will reign triumphant, in every heart and mind. At that happy and glorious period, the following divine injunctions will be observed from inmost principles of the soul, 'Swear not at all; neither by heaven; for it is God's throne; neither by earth; for it is his footstool; neither by Jerusalem; for it is the city of the great king; neither shalt thou swear by thy head; because thou canst not make one hair white or black. But let your conversation be yea, yea; nay, nay; for whatever is more than these cometh of evil.'

[From the Le Roy, Republican.]

THE WITHERELL HUMBUG.—But the forged handbill—there is the rub. It is something we do not exactly understand. We in the first place, when we first heard of the Witherell affair, and heard the antimasons in this village proclaiming it aloud in the streets as 'Another Masonic Outrage,' and saw with what joy they were elated, with the account of an attempt to murder a man, set it down as an electioneering trick, notwithstanding the Antimasonic presses throughout the country were endeavoring to raise another raw-head and bloody-bone story, to excite the public indignation against a certain portion of community, called Masons, by heading their articles with 'Another Masonic Outrage,' 'Attempted by Masons to Assassinate Elder Witherell!' (we suppose they meant the headboard,) &c. &c. The account itself proved, to our satisfaction, that this same Elder Witherell was concerned in the transaction. (Look at the question put by his son, 'Father, have you got home?') Start not, gentle reader, but we do actually believe that Elder Witherell was the man who committed the violent assault upon his own—headboard! and our opinion is strengthened by perusing the evidence given on the examination of Alonzo Hyde.—Is it not rather an improbable story that the Masons, on the eve of an important election, would commit such an outrage, knowing the excitement of the people at the time? Is it not more probable that it was a farce played by the Antimasons, and considered 'a good-enough Morgan until after election,' taking all the facts of the case into consideration?

We ask the people of Genesee, and we wish them to investigate the subject impartially and candidly, which party do you think was the author of the forged handbill? Was it the Republican party? What object could they have, in circulating such a story, and so short a time before election too? We say none: and we should suppose experience would teach any person that 'honesty is the best policy,' after the numerous exposures of Antimasonic falsehoods, forgeries, &c. brought forth in order to prop up the rotten and falling fabric of Antimasonry.

We have strong suspicions that this same handbill was manufactured by some few Antimasons, knowing that if they could once make the people believe that the forgery originated with the Republican party, they could then charge them with committing acts equally as base as themselves. Immediately on its appearance, the Antimasons were very anxious to bet as to the falsity of the handbill—some $100, some $50, others $20, and in fact almost any amount—and some wished to bet before they had seen the handbill. These, with a variety of other circumstances, warrant the above suspicion. If, on the other hand, it did originate with some person in the Republican ranks, we says, 'put in every honest man's hand a whip, and lash the rascal naked through the streets.' We shall use our best endeavors to ferret out the villain, or villains, who unnecessarily excite the community, already over-excited in this section of the State.

ANTIMASONIC SYMPHONIES.

NO. XIV.

A FAREWELL SONG.

Tune.—'Oh dear, Doctor.'

Anties, hear your masters' call,
Anties, listen, one and all,
Faint not, though your hopes be small
Ever to succeed.
What though some desert our cause?
Knaves, hold on with loud applause!
In defence of Anties' laws
We will freely bleed.

Who, that sees Masonic rite,
Who beholds the gaudy sight,
And does not grasp a lance for fight,
For honor and for fame!
Who that boasts a share of skill
Men to heal, or men to kill,
E'er would think so very ill
An honorable name!

Down with that Masonic crew,
Anties, to your work be true,
There'll be places made for you,
But keep the best for me:
For he who labors day and night,
To keep your falsehoods from the light,
Must surely have the highest right
In honored place to be.

Put on a patriotic grace
Put on a bold and daring face,
'Twould even be for me too base
To own our knavery:
We'll plaster all our tricks with care,
We'll prove that we were never there;
Then where's the Mason that shall dare
Resist our bravery.

Courage, all you Anti-men,
Though prostrate, we shall rise again;
You know we are but nine or ten
Who hope to get a place:
We'll quit the 'tag-rag' of our clan,
We'll join in some new party-plan;
So, each distinguished, leading man
Put on your boldest face.

Anties, 'don't give up the ship,'
Still 'keep a good, stiff upper lip,'
There'll be a hole through which we'll slip,
Though fortune still should frown:
While falsehood's pill can pass a throat,
While LYING is our common note,
There's nothing but the people's vote,
Shall put us Anties down.

ANTIMASONIC CONVENTION.—The Grand Antimasonic State Convention was held at Hartford on Wednesday, the 15th inst. The weather and travelling were unfavorable—and such as to put a damper upon the ardor of the delegates.

We understand that a 'great big Mason renounced the tarnal institution, and told 'em all about as how the Masons met at New Haven every year, to contrive some plan to get a King over the United States—so now they do the awful creatures!'—[Tolland Adver.]

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

PRACTICAL GEOMETRY.

[Concluded.]

PROB. VII.—To draw a great circle upon the sphere, making a given angle with a given circle. (Fig. 6.)

If the point of intersection be not given, assume one, as M. Draw from M, as pole, a great circle, N L N. From the sectoral chords take N L, equal to the chord of the given angle. Through M L describe the great circle M L, and it is that which was required.

Note.—By this rule the meridians are traced upon a globe, and by the preceding problem the parallels of latitude are drawn.

I cannot pass over this problem without urging upon all who are engaged in tuition, the importance of making their pupils not only project maps, but also actually trace the principal lines upon a globe. The impression thus made would be much stronger than could possibly be made by mere plain maps. For the purpose of practice, they may use a ball of about five or six inches diameter, painted white, upon which to trace all the lines with black lead pencil: this may be washed off with soap and warm water, whenever it may be required. The same method, too, should be adopted in the study of spherical geometry; and I am confident—and my confidence is founded on long experience—that a boy would learn more geometry in a single month, by a process of this kind, than he could in twelve, by merely studying the projected lines. Indeed, had not our own eyes seen, our own ears heard it, we could not have believed that models are denied to the pupils in the first places of education in this country; and that while the reasoning faculties are all upon the stretch to discover the nature of an argument, the imagination is tortured to believe that a flat figure is a solid body, and that two unequal lines upon paper must be equal in the represented solid!

I should recommend my readers to procure such a ball as I mention, and also a cylinder, for the following problems. In short, whatever you reason concerning, whatever you study, always have the object actually before you; so that you can turn it in what direction you please, and feel certain of the equality or inequality of those parts you are considering.

Were it not for fear of being tedious, I should even propose to allow pupils, instead of 'doing maps,' as a geographical exercise, to employ them to construct globes: but as the method of tracing the paper gores, so as to fit upon the sphere, could not be here introduced, I shall pass it over for the present. The thought is novel—by some it may be deemed wild; but the day will yet come when there will be no respectable school-establishment in which it shall not be introduced. These globes may be mounted at a small expense, and would be a source of pleasing remembrance to many a pupil long after he has entered upon the busy cares and anxieties of active life.

PROB. VIII.—To draw through a given point on the surface of a cylinder a line parallel to the axis, or, which is the same thing, in the direction of the length of the cylinder. (Fig. 7.)

Let A B E D be a perspective representation of the cylinder, and C the given point. With any convenient opening of the compasses, greater than C K, describe a circle cutting the circular end of the cylinder in M and N. Bisect the arc M N in K; then K C is the direction of the line whose position was required.

Note.—In this proposition it was supposed that the cylinder was 'squared' at the end. Where this operation cannot be performed, it will be requisite to find the position of the longest axis of an ellipse: but as such a case, I should think, could rarely occur, I have reserved the method of effecting it for that part of this series of problems which relates to the cone and its sections.

Fig. 7.

PROB. IX.—To trace a line, K L, upon a given cylinder opposite to a given line C K. (Figs. 7 and 8.)

Through the centre, s, of the circular end draw K R; and imagine the back of the cylinder, in figure 7, turned towards you, as in fig. 8. Take then any two points, n m, equi-distant from R; from those points, as centres, with any convenient radius (the same in both instances,) describe arcs cutting each other in L. — R L is the position of the line required.

Fig. 8.

PROB. X.—From any point, C, on the surface of the cylinder, to find the position of the plane of section which shall make a given angle with the axis.

Fig. 9.

Let the cylinder be so turned that K C, R L, shall occupy the positions denoted in fig. 9. Find C K, K R, R L, as in the last problem; C L (as the case may require,) equal to the sectoral tangent of that angle which would make the given angle equal to a quadrant.

If now B A be perpendicular to K R and passing through s, and A S be drawn parallel to the axis (Pr. 8.) in which A S, or A s, (as the case may require,) is taken equal to half the sum of K C and R L (or of K C and R L', when the case requires it,) we get S or s, the third point, which, with L and C, determine the plane of section required.

Note 1.—When the angle which the plane makes with the axis is half a right angle, the line C L, or C L', is equal to C C; a remark which will be used in the next paper, on the cycloid.

Note 2.—The chalk string held at C L, or C L', will mark the curve C s L, or C s L', upon the cylinder.

Having thus performed the principal problems which can occur in the practical geometry of the sphere and cylinder, and that without the aid of any inaccessible points or lines, I shall close the present paper by remarking, that in my future communications I shall aim at the simplicity, perspicuity, and illustration, which ought ever to be the object of him who writes for the purposes of instruction.

NEW TELESCOPE FOR YALE COLLEGE.

This instrument, which has been expected for some time past, but has been delayed by unavoidable difficulties in its construction, arrived about three weeks since, and is now mounted on its stand in the Philosophical Chamber. It was made by Dollond, of London, Optician to His Majesty, and is truly a magnificent piece of apparatus. It is an achromatic telescope, of 10 feet focal length, and 5 inches aperture, and is supposed to be the largest refracting telescope yet imported into the United States. When the eye tube for terrestrial objects is attached, the entire length of the tube is 11 1-2 feet, and its largest diameter is little more than 5 inches. The tube is of brass, and is mounted on a ponderous stand of the same metal. It is furnished with six different eye pieces for astronomical objects, varying in power from 55 to 450, and with four eye pieces for terrestrial objects, whose powers vary from 40 to 140.

The stand is of a new and peculiar construction, supporting the telescope in two points, the latter being counterpoised so as to be nearly at rest on its centre of gravity, throughout the quadrant of motion from the horizon to the zenith.

Notwithstanding the great size and weight of the instrument, its central motions are so well adjusted that it can be almost instantaneously directed to any point in the firmament—while its slow motions, adapted to the diurnal progress of a star or planet, are controlled by the slightest application of the hands of the observer to directors, connected with its vertical and horizontal rackwork. It would be premature, after so short a trial, to pronounce decisively on the merits of the instrument; yet the appearance of great finish and perfection, which every part exhibits, inspires full confidence that it will satisfy every reasonable expectation.—[N. Haven Herald.]

MOVING MOUNTAINS IN CALABRIA.

From each side of the deep valley or ravine of Terranova, enormous masses of the adjoining flat country were detached and cast down into the course of the river, so as to give rise to great lakes. Oaks, olive trees, vineyards and corn, were often seen growing at the bottom of the ravine, as little injured as their companions from which they were separated from the plains above, at least five hundred feet higher, and at a distance of about three quarters of a mile. In one part of this ravine was an enormous mass, two hundred feet high and about four hundred feet in diameter at its basis, which had been detached by some former earthquake. It is well attested that this mass travelled down the ravine near four miles, having been put in motion by the earthquake of the 5th of February. The momentum of the 'terre moveline,' or leaves, as the flowing mud is called in the country, is no doubt very great; but the transportation of masses that might be compared to small hills, for a distance of several miles at a time, is an effect which could never have been anticipated. The first account sent to Naples of these two great slides or landslips was couched in these words:—'Two mountains on the opposite side of the valley moved from their original position until they met in the middle of the plain, and there joining together intercepted the course of a river, &c.'

CLOTHES.

Keep the body warm in consequence of the air which they infold within them—atmospheric air being a non-conductor of heat. On this principle it is, that light spongy substances, such as furs and down afford the warmest clothing.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

[From the Ravenna Courier.]

The political conspiracy formed with Elder Witherell of Washington County, was of use in aiding Granger. Without that I do not believe he would have had as many votes by some thousands. It was circulated through the State, just on the eve of the election, and influenced many that were previously opposed to Antimasonry.—Though the people had been hoaxed by a mock Morgan, made out of Timothy Monroe, and frightened by a murder in Belfast which never took place, still those impositions were practiced by political demagogues whose business it was, like the scuttle fish, to muddy the waters to hide their deformity. They had yet to learn that a preacher of the Gospel could be so debased as to lend himself as a tool, for effecting so vile a purpose. The name of 'the pious Elder Witherell, a seceding Knight Templar,' who had renounced Masonry for conscience sake, carried weight with it, and gave a credit to the story which none of the other Antimasonic fabrications have had. The Elder began to be looked upon as a devoted Martyr, his wife as an untimely widow, and the noted headboard, on which were indented the marks of Masonic vengeance, was considered as an antimasonic relic, worthy of preservation.

To give the matter due importance, a second Lewistown Committee was organized, (on which were some of the very men who were engaged in the Conspiracy) who passed divers Resolutions, charging the Masons with the very act they themselves had committed!

It is now very generally believed that the plan of that Conspiracy was laid by larger heads than W's or J. Crary's. F. Granger, as you well know, was the head, and soul of the Philadelphia Convention. It is also well known here that the hopes of the Antimasonic party were placed on him, and that if they could succeed in electing him Governor of this State, he would then be a prominent person for them to take up as their Candidate for President. From this circumstance arose the anxiety of the Antimasons throughout the Union, for his election—and as it was thought in addition to his pretending to be a Clay man, and the association of Stevens as Lieut. Governor, who is a Workey, some further stimulus was needed to secure him success, it is believed, and the belief is warranted by circumstances, that the Witherell conspiracy was formed by the Leaders, at the Philadelphia Convention, to advance Granger's election, thereby rendering him prominent as a candidate for them to support for the Presidency. This will account for their making no nomination this fall, and appointing another Convention for that purpose at Baltimore. One thing that confirms this belief is, that John Crary, who was the immediate agent with Witherell and Halle, in the transaction, stands second in the antimasonic party to none but Granger, and in all the leading movements of the party, acts with Granger. Another is, some of the second, and third rate leaders, have since declared, that they knew it was a hoax when they first saw it.

Like other antimasonic plots it was deep laid, and its object was to throw unjust charges, and suspicion on the Masons and advance the antimasonic cause—the Agents, a Lawyer and a seceding Mason who disgraces the Ministry—the conspirators, the Philadelphia Convention.

Now the plot has failed, poor Witherell, who was like all seceders, but a tool, like a scape goat has to bear the whole curse. He is cursed, and denounced, in unmeasured terms, by the same spirits who seduced, and employed him; not for the part he bore in the conspiracy, but for not going the whole hog, and swearing, like a true seceder, as his Masters directed. His will, was undoubtedly good enough, but he was not prepared for the searching examination he underwent.

ELDER WITHERELL.—We published, a week or two since, an article purporting to be an examination of this gentleman before a magistrate, from which it was made to appear that he was the author of, or a participator in, an outrage on his own family, with a view to improve the excitement against Masonry, by representing the attack as proceeding from members of the fraternity, designing to take his life,—he being a seceding Mason. It is now fully ascertained that this pretended examination was a forgery, got up to rebut the effect of the pretended outrage. Both matters, it seems, were electioneering manoeuvres, calculated to have their effect for a day,—those implicated in the outrage probably thinking that a little farce to the tragedy would render the romance more complete.

The subject has, however, undergone an actual and thorough judicial inquiry, a report of which we have in our possession, copied from the Sandy Hill Herald, and from which it may fairly be inferred that the whole was a piece of mockery, and that Elder Witherell's hopeful family, from whom he was so conveniently separated for the moment, were the chief enactors of the scenes. The testimony of Mrs. Witherell and her son George was so contradictory as to be unworthy of belief. She was proved to be a brandy-drinker and subject to fits,—the son, a wild, intemperate fellow, not to be believed on his oath,—and the Elder himself testifies that, on ascertaining the facts, he 'took no measures to ascertain who they were' that perpetrated the outrage. Thus ends this bugaboo.

[Con. Herald.]

The antimasonic leaders complain of our want of forbearance towards them, and tell us that our course will never convince them. We never expected to convince them, or they ever would be convinced so long as the least prospect of their obtaining office remained. When men are aware that their principles and conduct cannot bear the test of reason, and that if their followers are reasoned with, they shall lose them, we consider it worse than useless, to offer arguments founded on reason, with a view to their conviction; it would be like casting pearls before swine.

Such is the case with the bigoted leaders of anti-masonry—they have discarded reason, and therefore cannot listen to it, they cannot endure its light; and there is more 'hope of a fool than of them.'—For these reasons we adopt our present course; not with the most distant idea of convincing one of the leaders of the party, but with a determination to hold them up to public scorn; and we are determined still to 'lash the rascals naked through the world.'—[Ver. Enq.]

MASONIC FORBEARANCE. The Vermont papers tell us that the Legislature of that State have repealed the act, incorporating the Grand Lodge; and that the Masons, with the power in their own hands, did not, by word or action, attempt to prevent it. Is this the proof which they have promised to bring, of the selfishness of Freemasons?—Does it look like standing by each other, 'right or wrong?' No. The Masons in Vermont, believed that the preservation of the public peace required a surrender of their rights, and without a voice raised or a hand moved, they gave them. Let our enemies go and do likewise—instead of stirring up strife, let them seek to allay it—instead of creating disturbances in families and communities, let them confine themselves to their own affairs, and give due weight to honesty and truth, and they will then have greater claims to respectability here, and salvation hereafter, than they have at present.—[Pawtucket Chron.]

THE BOQUET.

THE AQUILINE STANDARD.

Thou mountain-thron'd bird of imperial crest,
Of the sun glancing eye, and the storm daring breast,
Of the limitless flight and unfaltering pinion,
Wide and ancient on earth, as in air, thy dominion!
In thy shadow, the face and the mighty have rested,
And beneath thee the whirlwind of battle have breasted.

In the ages of old, from thy wild native home,
Thou descendedst to hallow the banners of Rome,
Oh! how glorious then was thy path in the sky!
When the universe quail'd at the glance of thine eye;
When beneath thee the legions so haughtily trod,
And beheld in thy talons the weapons of God.
When the nations, all marshall'd in countless array,
In the blaze of thy glory were melted away,
And thy broad wings were spread, the whole heaven
adorning,
From the isles of the west, to the home of the morning.

But the chains thou hast woven were eaten with rust,
And the throne of the Cæsars was levell'd in dust,
And its fragments were strewn thro' the world thou hadst won,
By the Frank and the Vandal, the Goth and the Hun.
And thy proud eye was humbled, and clouded its flashes,
And thy plumage of glory was trampled in ashes.

In ashes thy slumber of ages hast past,
And again thou hast given thy wings to the blast,
With more than the gift of the Phoenix endued,
The eagle of nations is doubly renewed.

Oh proud was thy flight, and yet prouder thy fall,
When thy plumes were unfurled in the armies of Gaul,
And the nations were wak'd by the wild thrilling cry.
That rent, like the shriek of a tempest, the sky.
Around thee a billowing blood-sea was spilt,
In a mountain of corpses thine eyrie was built,
By thy dark waving wings, burning cities were fann'd,
And over the ocean, and over the land
A starless and measureless midnight was cast,
Where the sun-dark'ning cloud of thy black shadow past.

Not such by thy last career, bird of the free!
May thy bright crest forever immaculate be!
Oh shelter the earth and unweariedly soar
In the heavens, 'til heavens and earth are no more!
Thy beak ever bloodless, thy glance ever bright'ning
Unwasted, untarnish'd thine arrows of lightning, Thy firm breast to the storm, and thine eye in the sun,

Till his long race of splendor, like thine shall be run.
And may his last beam gild with glory thy crest,
When the world's dying sunset shall crimson the West ! N

MARY OF THE VALLEY.

In a charming vale in the state of New Jersey, a few years since, dwelt a most charming being in the person of Mary Mayflower, familiarly called Mary of the Valley. So gentle was she, so modest, utterly without guile, that this familiar appellation was conferred upon her rather as an affectionate mark of distinction, than as a nick name of reproach or thoughtless levity; and was equivalent to saying, of all the inhabitants of the Valley, Mary was the loveliest.

It was not wealth that gave her this distinction, for she was in humble circumstances. It was not beauty, for she had not that fascinating charm to boast of. It was not wit, for she never hazarded the use of that dangerous weapon. It was not learning, for she had no more than the ordinary attainments of a common school village. Neither was it gayety of dress, or vivacity of manners, for she was plain in the one and retiring in the other.—What was it then that made her emphatically the Mary of the Valley—the entertainer of all hearts—of the rich and of the poor, the proud and the humble, the sinner and the saint? It was nothing else but the winning sweetness of her disposition, the conquering kindness of heart.

Mary Mayflower, was beautiful, but she was lovely, not striking at first sight, but taking the heart by degrees, and winning the affections, if I may so speak, inch by inch; never losing the hold she had once gained, and daily adding something to some one's stock of esteem and love. And all this without the least effort, purely by acting out herself, and appearing what gentle nature, a judicious bringing up, and a good moral culture had made her.

Authors of fiction are fond of regulating the temper and disposition of their heroes by the color of their eyes; and with the mild and gentle disposition, they have agreed to associate the blue eye. But in real life it may be otherwise, and nature may take it into her head to connect the gentlest disposition with the most sparkling eye.—But in relation to Mary of the Valley, an admirer of hers told me, that after several years acquaintance, he positively could not pronounce with certainty whether her eyes were black, blue, or hazel. Indeed says he, one must have been dead to their expression, who could coolly bethink himself to ascertain their color. But the color, if known, might easily fade from the recollection—the expression never.

With so much goodness, Mary of the Valley could not fail to be esteemed; for goodness will attract esteem, not only amongst the good, but even amongst those who have not the virtue to practice what they esteem. With so much gentleness, she could not live and not be loved; for gentleness is sure to win the affections; even of those who are destitute of that amiable quality.

Mary had many suitors—not because she was desirous of many, but because the invariable sweetness of her temper, the guileless sincerity of her heart, and the simple, the native attraction of her manners, irresistibly won the affections of many. With the general esteem and love of her acquaintance she could not fail to be gratified; but the marked attentions of so many sighing swains, were rather painful than pleasing. To meet the especial love of one, who was her joy, her pride; to give her own in return was her happiness. She had none of the cruel vanity of a coquette, who is fond of gracing her triumph with a display of broken hearts, and it was her wish to secure a friend, where she was compelled to refuse a lover.

But though Mary's unsuccessful suitors could no less than acquiesce in their rejection, there was one thing with which they generally took the liberty of being dissatisfied—and that was the nature of her choice, which to their great mortification, fell upon one, whom, from his silent attention and unassuming manners, they had scarcely considered in the light of a rival. To have the prize carried off without noise or bustle, was hardly to be endured.

James Columbine, usually called among his more forward acquaintances, Diffident Jim, led to the altar the boast of the Valley. And wherefore his success? He had not the means of competing with his rivals on their own ground. Their circumstances were affluent, his were humble.—Their apparel was costly and gay, his was cheap and plain. Their equipage was showy and expensive, his—alas! he had none. They drove in a gig and tandem, he walked on foot. Their manners were forward and fashionable, his were modest and retiring. They pushed their suit by the offers of balls, parties of pleasure, and public attentions, he only by the silent language of the countenance and noiseless assiduties. In few words, Diffident Jim, as they called him, had little else to boast than industry, honesty, good sense and a feeling heart. But these were every thing to Mary of the Valley, and she did not hesitate between the sterling value of gold in a plain box, and the worthlessness of tinsel in a gilded casket.

Such being the case, need I say that Diffident Jim and Mary of the Valley were made one?—Need I trace their footsteps to the scenes of domestic life? Need I speak of the children which grew like plants around their table? Need I say they resembled their parents—that every daughter grew up in her turn Mary of the Valley—and every son a virtuous and industrious, if not a diffident Jim? Need I say that the affections of the happy couple continued unimpaired to the last grasp? that they passed pleasantly the up hill and the down hill of life;—that diffident Jim was for many years the principal man of the town, esteemed and revered by all his acquaintance; and that Mary of the Valley was the revered and beloved pattern of all good wives and mothers, as she had formerly been of excellent daughters?

Having passed the downhill of life, they were scarcely separated at the foot. Within a few months they both passed the irremediable barrier. They were wept and remembered; and the unsophisticated inhabitant of the Valley, still pointing to two humble stones in the village church-yard, hastily brushes a tear from his eye, while he informs the traveller they are placed to mark the graves of Diffident Jim and Mary of the Valley.

EXTRACT.

Time, that relentless grave-digger, has withered year after year, the tall grass that grew on their graves; and the stones which mark their resting places have grown grey and mossy. Death, that gaunt old gentleman with small legs and taper fingers, has chilled the warm blood of many a freshed cheeked maiden since that venerable pair bowed silently to his call; and the earth has grown fat and pursey with the flesh of the tall and powerful. Let them rest in their slumbers, rocked by the rude earthquake and hushed into repose by the whirlwind and the storm. If I wet their graves with tears, the world will laugh at my weakness: if I pass them by unheeded, it will blame me for my coldness. So let them sleep—silently and lonely—with their predecessors and followers, 'til the last trump shall shake of the lethargy of the world, and open the portals of death.

Well, well—'tis a strange world, this! where the rich man, in his pride, is crushing the poor, and spurning the naked wretch from the touch of his garments, where vice, deceit and luxury are striving for the highest seat in the temple of God, and mocking the glory of the Creator. A little time, and the saucy winds will sneer over their graves, and mock them with their own nothingness. A little time, and their palaces of their glory and pomp, and their names, their honors, and greatness will be unknown in the world, and nothing shall remain to remind mankind that they once were.

I know not how it is with other men—but I often feel a cold chill of despair and desolation creep over me as I view the world in its loneliness. So lovely, and yet so heartless; so fair and yet so empty and vain. Go where I will, the same cold hand of despair is pressing on my heart, and freezing the warmth and buoyant feelings of nature.—There is no real happiness, nor joy, nor friendship on earth. Education may build its fancy-castles, and prepare ideal banquets for the soul, yet how hollow and empty their enjoyments, and sad and lonely their effect. Riches may feed the hopes of a miser's nature, and honors may still the ambition of a proud man's heart; but that dark and inexplicable gloom that lurks within the human bosom can never be dispelled in life. It is the nature of man to be unhappy, deceitful and sad—it is his doom to suffer in his life, that his repose in death may be happy and undisturbed—I would that the face of manhood was as illusive as that of youth, that the path of life might ever appear unclouded, and my vision bright and joyous.—[Vermont Pat.]

FANATICS.

Oliver Cowdry, David Whitmer and Martial Harris, have lately commenced preaching near Painesville, Ohio, stating that they had a new revelation which they call a codicil to the New Testament, and aver to have been written by the finger of God. They say that the world is to come to an end within fifteen years: that is, the incorrigible are all to be cut off. They have joined one elder Rigdon, once a Baptist, next a Campbellite, and now a disciple of the new Revelation. He and part of his flock, about 100, have been baptized in it, and are going or have gone west for a country, they know not where, west of Mississippi, where they say is a Holy Spirit, and there they are to establish a New Jerusalem into which will be gathered all the natives, who they say are descendants of Manasseh. They are led by the spirit and will know the ground when they place their feet upon it.

PROGRESS OF
LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

NO. I.

To patronize the efforts of genius, to foster the germe of intellect, as productive to the best effects on society, is a position which all will admit, whose minds are free from dogmatical influence, or extravagant enthusiasm. Ever since men first congregated, and began to cultivate an interchange of sentiment and feeling, there have existed a few, who, prompted by ambitious views, interested motives, or anticipated aggrandizement, have assumed the prerogative of dictating to the rest of mankind, how far they should advance in the study of literature and science: arresting the progress of mind with the appalling idea that God had revealed what was necessary for man to know, and to proceed farther was not only futile but impious. Some centuries subsequent to the Christian era, the fanatic Caliph Omar devoted to the flames 'the intellectual treasure, the science and arts accumulated from antiquity, by the taste, the learning and the munificence of many kings: observing that, 'the books, if they agreed with Koran, were superfluous and need not be preserved; if they differed from it, impious and ought to be destroyed!' Thus, though sorrow and repentance followed the barbarous deed, the precious fruits of ancient genius and learning, were irrecoverably lost. Fortunately for the cause of literature, there existed, even at this period, sufficient energy to revive the spirit, which the influence of bigotry and tyranny combined to destroy. But notwithstanding the arm of superstition was weakened, it still retained power enough to hold in subjection the objects of its original intent. In Egypt and Spain, we may view a picture of the times of which we speak; a picture interspersed with dark and gloomy shades. From these countries we may learn the inevitable consequences of restraining the natural progress of the human mind. Ignorance and tyranny have, heretofore, drenched the fairest portion of the earth in blood, and involved the descendants of the most enlightened people, in slavery and superstition. But the spell is broken; its power limited: the scales are falling from the eyes of the deluded—the light of science is beginning to shoot forth from the surcharged clouds of ignorance, purifying the atmosphere, and imparting to the benighted mind serenity and vigor.—The mind is recovering from its lethargy, new facts are added to the stock which is perpetually accumulating, and the river of knowledge runs deeper and stronger by the accession of every tributary stream.

We shall perceive by a retrospect of the early ages, that the deficiency of knowledge and refinement that then existed, was supplied by ingenuity; the offspring of necessity. The aborigines of some parts of America, communicated their ideas by quipos, or knotted cords.—Other nations, in proportion to their knowledge of the fine arts, made use of paintings, or hieroglyphics, as the fancy of a rude uncultivated mind might suggest. The latter species of writing was systematized among the Egyptians and carried to great perfection. Greece, though she made but little progress, in what art termed the useful arts, excelled very considerably in the cultivation of literature and the fine arts. 'The models of those which yet remain, are the models of imitation and the confessed standard of excellence.' The arts, during the administration of Pericles, shone with unprecedented lustre and reached the summit of perfection. The science of Architecture received, at this time, its greatest impetus.

'First, unadorned,
And nobly plain, the manly Doric rose;
The Ionic then, with decent matron grace,
Her airy pillar heaved, luxuriant last
The rich Corinthian spread her wanton wreath.'
Greece likewise excelled in the science of government and political economy. The institution of the Panathæan, the Olympic, the Pythæan, Nemean and Isthmæan games, formed an important instrument in establishing its future destiny. These games were not confined to gymnastic exercises, but were also designed as excitements to competition in the efforts of literature and science. They were the resort of poets and philosophers, the patrons of talent and worth wherever found, and in whatever garb they might appear. The earliest prose writers of Greece, were Phercydes of Scyros, and Cadmus of Miletus, whose influence in refining the rude manners of their countrymen, is sufficiently evident from the subsequent prosperity of their country.

CHRISTMAS.—This is the day on which the nativity of our Saviour is celebrated. It has been a question, agitated by divines, whether it be proper to appoint or keep any holy days, the Sabbath excepted. The advocates for such days contend that they have a tendency to impress the minds of the people with a greater sense of religion, that if the acquisitions and victories of men be celebrated with the highest joy, how much more those events which relate to the salvation of men, such as the birth, death, and resurrection of Christ, &c. On the other side it is contended, that their observance is bringing us again into that bondage to ceremonial laws, from which Christ freed us, and that such days, upon the whole, are more pernicious than useful to society. Whatever may be the merits of this controversy, it is not a matter of surprise, that an event so important and so affecting as the birth-day of the son of God, should be regarded by Christians as deserving of devout and joyful celebration. But it is to be regretted, that a day which piety has consecrated, and which ought to excite the most lively devotion in the hearts of those by whom it is held holy above other days, should be shamefully perverted from its sacred design and prostituted into an occasion of frolic and bacchanalian merriment. Christmas is a day of Christian devotion, intended to remind us of the mission of Christ. There can be no objection to rational festivity: it is a festival season. But it is not the season for irreligious or immoderate mirth; and those who religiously hold the day to be one of devotion, should resolutely discountenance the ungodly desecration of it by the ignorant and profane. According to Puck, the first footsteps we find of the observance of this day, are in the second century, about the time of the Emperor Commodus. The decretal epistles, indeed, carry it up a little higher, and say that Telesphorus, who lived in the reign of Antonius Pius, ordered divine service to be celebrated, and an angelic hymn to be sung the night before the nativity of our Saviour. That it was kept before the time of Constantine, we have a melancholy proof; for whilst the persecution raged under Dioclesian, who then kept his court at Nicomedia, that tyrant, among other acts of cruelty, finding multitudes of Christians assembled together to celebrate Christ's nativity, commanded the church doors, where they were met, to be shut, and fire to be put to it, which soon reduced them and the church to ashes! We are told by other writers on the subject, that in the earliest times of Christianity, the Church was accustomed to set apart a day for the special commemoration of the birth of the Saviour. For a time no particular day was universally observed; but the churches, in different countries, celebrated the nativity at such seasons as best suited their convenience, or best accorded with their views of propriety. It was not until about the close of the 5th century, that the 25th of December, (this day,) was agreed upon as the day to be thenceforward observed as the festival in memory of the birth of Christ. From that time, the day now known to us as Christmas Day, was observed, with great devotion and solemnity, by all Christian people, until the period of the reformation, when it began, for the first time, to be disregarded by some. The day is still observed and revered by the vast majority of Christians; and is annually celebrated with a variety of suitable religious services, and with many appropriate practices. Among these, observes an intelligent anonymous writer, there is scarcely any more striking, or more significant, than the custom of decorating the churches with evergreen—appropriate emblems of the perpetuity and unfailing glory of the spiritual dominion of that illustrious King whose nativity is celebrated. It was a tradition among the ancient Jews, that the promised Messiah would make his entrance into the world at the season when nature wears the aspect of dreariness, and no traces of vegetable life are to be seen, except in evergreens. They derived this impression from the passage in the Prophet: 'The glory of Lebanon,' (the cedar, which flourished so luxuriantly upon the heights of Libanus,) 'shall come unto thee, the fir tree, the pine tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary.'—Isaiah, c. 60. v. 13.

And they looked upon evergreens as emblems of the times of the Messiah, when they believed all plants and trees would be perennial; and the earth be blessed with perpetual fruitfulness and verdure. Traces of this beautiful idea are to be found in some of the writings of even heathen authors. And it is very distinctly expressed in Virgil's splendid Pastoral, called Pollio. Describing the happy effects of the birth of the illustrious child whom he predicted, he says:

'At tibi prima, puer, nullo munuscula culta,
Errantes hederas passim cum baccharé tellus,
Mixtaque ridenti colocassia fundet acantho.'

Buc. Ecl. IV. l. 18.

'Unbidden earth shall wreathing ivy bring,
And fragrant herbs, (the promises of spring,)
As her first offerings to her infant king.'

And again in the same poem:

'Molli paullatim flavescet campus arista,
Incultisque rubens pendebit sentibus uva,
Et dura quereus sudabant ruscida mella.'

Buc. Ecl. IV. l. 28.

'Unlabor'd harvest shall the fields adorn,
And clustering grapes shall blush on every thorn;
The knotted oaks shall showers of honey weep.'

From these expectations, associated with the event of the Messiah, the idea was taken by the primitive Christians of embellishing their Churches at Christmas. But whatever may have given rise to the practice, when the emblem is understood, the custom appears to have a most beautiful and edifying design.

MOSES THACHER.—By the following article from the Boston Recorder, it will be seen that this Reverend gentlemen's ministerial managements are held in no very high repute by his brethren of the Church. We shall probably be soon favored with the result of an Ecclesiastical Council, which we understand has recently been investigating the matter.

CHURCH ORDER.

Reasons assigned by the Church at North Wrentham, for withdrawing from their Masonic brethren and others, and being formed into a distinct and separate Church. Published by a vote of the Church, pp. 23.

The facts exhibited in this pamphlet, so far as they bear on the rights and usages of Congregational churches, (and it is only in this view that we advert to them) are as follows: Several months ago (for we find no dates) charges were preferred against a brother of the church in the North Parish in Wrentham, which on trial before the church, were substantiated. This brother appealed to a mutual Council and the church united with him in calling one.* By this Council, the decision of the church was sustained, the offending brother was required to make confession, and a form of confession was agreed on, which the church was advised to accept. The Rev. Mr. Thacher, Pastor of the church, with a minority of the acting members, being dissatisfied with the proposed confession, as not sufficiently full and explicit, and with the proceedings of the Council generally, on the 24th of Oct. 1830, requested to be dismissed from the church, 'for the purpose of being organized into a separate church.' The church wished time to consider this request, and adjourned the meeting. While the meeting stood adjourned, Mr. Thacher and those associated with him,—without waiting the decision of the church, or offering a mutual Council, or calling a Council of any description, assembled and formed themselves into what they call 'a distinct and separate church.' Of this new church, Mr. Thacher subscribes himself the Pastor. The pamphlet before us is addressed to the old church, and sets forth the reasons of Mr. Thacher and his friends for the measures they have taken. These measures as it seems to us, involve necessarily the following principles.

1. Aggrieved members of an acknowledged church have a right to withdraw from it—without a dismission or the advice of Council—whenever they may think proper to do so.

2. Being thus withdrawn, they have a right—without consulting the parent church, or seeking the advice of Council† to form themselves into a distinct and separate church.

3. The pastor of a church, when dissatisfied with the proceedings of a minority of the acting members, has the power and the right to dissolve his pastoral relation at pleasure. Mr. Thacher subscribes himself Pastor of the new church. Of course, unless he has two churches under his care, he no longer considers himself Pastor of the old church. His pastoral relation has, therefore been dissolved. But how? It does not appear that the church have dismissed him, or that any Council has been convened for the purpose. If dismissed at all, he must have dismissed himself.

4. A minister of the Gospel can become Pastor of a church without Installation. It does not appear that Mr. Thacher has been installed over his new church, and yet he subscribes himself Pastor.

We need not say that these principles, each and all of them, are utterly inconsistent with the rights and usages of Congregational churches, and, if generally adopted, would throw our churches into the utmost confusion.

* When we speak of the church here and in other places, we mean a majority of the acting members. It does not appear that in any of the measures relating to this subject, the church has been unanimous.

† It is insisted in the pamphlet before us, that the calling of a Council in any case, at the formation of a church, is unscriptural,

MORGAN TRIAL.—At the recent trial of James L. Gillis on the charge of participating in the alleged abduction of Morgan, (of which he was acquitted,) John Whitney, who was in the carriage that conveyed Morgan to Lewiston, testified under oath, that 'he knew of no restraint upon Morgan. He did not hear him threatened—he was not gagged, no, blinded, nor to his knowledge was he intoxicated. He heard some fault found with Morgan about the course he had pursued. Morgan manifested regret, and he (witness) understood from the company and from Morgan, that, Morgan was going west, secretly for the purpose of preventing Miller and his associates from, knowing where he did go—with the object in view to stop the publication of the book they were about to publish, and that he (witness) verily believed that this was the real object. Morgan complained of Miller and his associates—said they had led him astray, and he was sorry for it. He appeared perfectly satisfied in going off, and spoke of an arrangement to go. On the ridge road they stopped at two public houses, and at an orchard they got out, gathered and eat apples, Morgan among the others—each walking about at pleasure. There was no jug of liquor in the carriage, but there was some once brought into it in a tumbler. Witness took supper at Wright's and went on with the carriage to within ten miles of Lewiston. Witness does not know that Morgan was carried out of the state nor what became of him. The carriage was not closed at the time. He had no conversation with the Gillis who he saw at Beach's on the subject of Morgan. James L. Gillis did not ride in the carriage with Smith and himself from Victor to Canandaigua. Witness did not take tea at Acker's, nor was he about the post office that day or night except in coming in and going out from Canandaigua. The persons in the carriage were addressed by their correct names. He informed or engaged to inform those, who were going to the installation at Lewiston, that this carriage was on its way, and he expected to go himself with them. It was told to Morgan that he should be as well taken care of as though he published the book, if he did as he agreed. He does not remember of hearing any reason for putting Morgan into the carriage by force, but Morgan admitted that he had agreed with Loton Lawson that he had agreed to go, and appeared to apologise at the jail as not knowing what the arrangements were at the jail. Witness thoroughly understood that the only objects were to keep Morgan from Miller and his associates, and stop the publication of the book.'

JACKSON and CLAY.—The Nashville Banner, a paper that opposed the election of Gen. Jackson, from the belief that Mr. Adams was better qualified to discharge the duties of President of the United States, and not on party grounds, in reference to the next election, has the following fair and candid remarks:—

Gen. Jackson and Mr. Clay are, in our estimation, both able men, sincere patriots and faithful public servants. We cannot admit that either of them should be promoted, on account of his own personal claims, to the exclusion of the other. If the one has been slandered, so has the other. If the one has been extravagantly and unreasonably eulogized, so also has the other. Their prominent traits of character are not dissimilar. Both of them are strong-minded men, who, without the advantages of a thorough early education or much mental discipline in youth, have become, by their own vigorous efforts, pre-eminent in their respective scenes of action, and have been placed, by a combination of circumstances, at the head of the rival parties which divide our country. It matters little, so far as their individual merits and qualifications are concerned, which of them succeeds in the great struggle for the chief magistracy at the next election. The nation is interested only in regard to the principles and measures which the triumph of either may seem to sanction or tend to promote. It is surely no sufficient reason for turning out the present incumbent, that there is another great man whose talents and public services entitle him to popular favor and elevated station. Public offices, especially the highest public office, should never be conferred as a reward or personal benefit. The chief magistrate of the Union ought indeed to be a man of tried worth; past meritorious services may be important as evidences of qualifications. But the President should be elected, not merely because he has been slandered, nor even because he has been patriotic, eloquent, or brave; but because, in addition to those considerations, his principles are sound, his policy judicious, safe and practical, and his powerful talents and extensive influence are likely to be exercised, in that exalted station for the promotion of the permanent prosperity and glory of his country. It is not as a reward for past services or as a testimony of public gratitude, that the presidency should be conferred upon any man; but for the purpose of requiring further services, and to afford an opportunity of being still more eminently useful, thus increasing instead of discharging the debt of national gratitude.

THE UNION.—Judge Smith, Senator to Congress from South Carolina, in a letter to his constituents, expresses himself as being decidedly opposed to the strange and absurd doctrines of nullification, which he justly represents as being fraught with the most dangerous consequences and incapable of producing any practical good. On the subject of the Union he has the following pertinent remark.

The union of these states is the fairest political fabric that has ever been reared by the human mind. Its foundation was laid upon 'the lives, the fortunes, and the sacred honor,' of a constellation of illustrious patriots as ever graced a political assembly, of this or any other age. It was cemented with the blood of our fathers and our brothers. It has made our government the admiration of the world. It has been a pillar of fire to lead the benighted nations, of other regions, to the altars of rational liberty. It has led the world to believe that man was capable of self government, and practising upon its principles. It has given us proud eminence abroad, as a member of the family of nations. And it has shed a lustre upon the character of republics, to which the republics of antiquity never attained. But this lustre must fade and our national importance with it, if less than half a century should prove to the world, that a confederacy, founded on pure republican principles, had turned out an entire delusion.

FATE OF THE HORNET.—Captain Williams of the schr Texas, informs us that he saw at Brasses one of the Hornet's boats, which was driven ashore to the North of Tampico several months since, and in it were found a number of caps marked 'Hornet.' She was recognized by a Captain well known to Captain Williams, as a gig in which one of the Lieutenants of the Hornet frequently came ashore. Capt. William describes her as from 20 to 25 feet long painted black, with a white streak round her waist, and copper fastened. She is single banked, having two oars on one side, and three on the other. Since she came into the hands of her present owner, (a pilot at Brasses) she has been coppered, to preserve her from decay.—Capt. W offered him $100 to exchange her for his own boat in order that he might bring her home, but was refused.

The late arrivals from France bring the news of the capture and burning of Antwerp. The populace rose en masse, attacked and drove the soldiers from the city, taking the government into their own hands. Red hot balls and shell were fired from the citidal, and Congreve rockets from the ship. An immense quantity of merchandise was destroyed; and it is expected considerable losses will fall upon the merchants of this city. 200 houses were burned.

Great changes have taken place in the French Ministry.

☞ The Newburyport Herald informs us that Mr. Henry Short killed, the past week, on the flats near the Breakwater, a beautiful Swan, which measured from the extremity of its wings, over seven feet. The skin is preserved in the Museum at that place.

☞ A meeting of the Grand Lodge of this Commonwealth will be held in this city on Monday evening next, at 7 o'clock, for the installation of officers.

CONGRESS.—The trial of Judge Peck before the Senate of the United States, advances but very slowly. It is to be hoped that it will not last so long as cases of this sort commonly do.

The House of Representatives, by two distinct votes, have indicated a determination not to disturb the Tariff during the present session.

THE WREATH.

FRENCH REVOLUTION.

A 'Sovereign' proved beyond all doubt, —
In spite of Fortune's drillings—
To be in value far below
The sum of Twenty Shillings.

Poor fallen Charles, we pity him,
And own his fate is sore;
The X that stood behind his name
Is placed, alas! before;

And those who call him Charles the X.
Have learnt to look askance,
And now address him by the name
Of X King Charles of France.

But to our tale—The King got sick,
His cheeks were red as amber,
The wits of Paris saw and, said
That he should keep his 'Chamber.'

The mob grew wise, the Bakers vow'd
If things continued so
That he would soon be 'needing' bread
While they were 'kneading dough.'

The butchers would not bear the ills
That they were made to feel,
Th' uncommon calf would be disposed
To save the common 'weal.'

Cobblers saw things at their 'last stretch,'
Shoes could not well be more,
And swore upon their 'soles' that 'awl'
Oppression was a 'borc.'

The book keepers declared the King
(How infamous a scoff)
Had been too long upon their books,
'T was time to 'post' him off;

They even said his bills had reached
So fearful an amount,
That 't would be well to set him down
Upon his 'last account.'

The tallow chandlers thought all power
When once abused would cease,
Charles 'dip't' in sorrow's 'mould' might make
A monarch fit for 'Greece.'

The Barbers, too, were all astir,
And lathering up and down,
For first they 'polled the people's heads'
And then they shaved their 'Crown.'

The Actors said, the Ministers
Were playing some said farce;
The Braziers wondered where the King
Acquired all his brass.

And so indeed we must allow
His acts were rather bold,
But then he thought that men were made
To do as they were told.

Therefore we censure much the men,
Who made as you have heard
'Bon mots' upon their King while none
Would give him a good word.

When Fiction rises pleasing to the eye
Men will believe, because they love the lie;
But Truth, itself, if clouded with a frown,
Must need some solid proof to pass it down.

TO REV. DAVID PEASE,

RENOUNCING MASON, ANTIMASONIC LECTURER, &c.
No. 9.

[Concluded.]

It is an old maxim, sir, that was has been done, may be done. Your assertion, that 'no man CAN live up to his requirements in the church,' &c. is equivalent to saying, no Mason ever lived up to his requirements in the church, and to those of his country. One would think, that even the heartless apostate would shudder at such a villanous slander, and grow pale, when history and memory presented to his mind, the worthies of the past. Did you imagine yourself addressing idiots and dupes merely, men without information, and whose prejudices forbade their obtaining it? The school boy is competent to refute the above proposition, and spread defeat among the ranks of seceders, who defend themselves with such armor. Who does not know, that the most illustrious patriots, the profoundest statesmen, the wisest philosophers, and the most devoted ministers of the cross, have been distinguished for their attachment and zeal for Masonry? So long as the memory of Washington shall live, it shall be published, that he lived and died in full communion and fellowship with Masons. So long as the lightnings shall play in the heavens, and the thunders resound, it shall be made known that Franklin was Grand Master of Masons. So long as liberty shall be loved, and patriotism applauded, so long shall it be proclaimed, that Lafayette was an ardent and devoted Mason. So long as free institutions shall exist, and civil freedom have a name, shall it be proclaimed, that Warren, Knox, Gates, Green, Putnam, and every other general officer of our revolution, except the infamous anti Benedict Arnold, were consistent, and persevering, Masons. So long as devotedness to the best interests of our country, and the unceasing exercise of gigantic intellectual powers in her behalf shall be considered praiseworthy, so long shall the Masonic and patriotic virtues of Clinton be hallowed in the memory of his countrymen. So long as eloquence and learning and talents shall be esteemed, so long shall the Masonic essays of Pinckney and Emmet be preserved as a memorial of their greatness. The names of an immense multitude of men, illustrious for their acts of patriotism and benevolence, and distinguished by their numerous virtues, both among the dead and the living, are borne upon this proscribed roll. Martyn, Judson, Buchanan, Fisk, Ashmun, Bingham, and many other missionaries of the cross in heathen lands, are here enrolled. And have not these men 'lived up to the requirements of the church, and to those of their country?' It well becomes an insignificant Baptist priest, notorious only for his eleventh hour apostacy, and versatility of character, to arraign the motives, and impeach the conduct of such men. It reflects high honor, too, on the intelligence and virtue of your proselytes, patiently to listen, while such men are denounced as holding antirepublican and antichristian sentiments. A baser calumny, or fouler slander, never escaped the lips of man. Turn over the records of patriotism, peruse the biographies of saints and martyrs, and you will find the most illustrious of them, still more illustrious from their attachment to Masonry. On whichever side, you may turn your eyes, to the south or north, to the east or west, to the countries of the eastern or western hemisphere, and whenever you shall perceive a patriot distinguished for his personal achievements and sacrifices, you will find him adorned by the insignia of the order, a living refutation of this outrageous slander. And yet a professed preacher of righteousness, in saintly garb, and solemn tones, well knowing these facts, proclaims, that 'no man can live up to his Masonic obligations, and to the requirements of the church, and those of his country.' 'O shame! where is thy blush!' O impudence unexampled! put off thy brazen mask.

Yours, &c.

ANTIMASONRY IN STAFFORD.

For several days previous to the 6th inst. the following notice was posted up in the several public places in Stafford, viz.

'ALL the inhabitants of the town of Stafford opposed to Secret Societies, are requested to meet at Philip Orcutt's Inn, on Monday, the 6th day of December next, at six o'clock, P. M. to choose four delegates to the State Convention at Hartford, Dec. 15th, 1830, and to transact such other business as may be expedient.

(Signed by)

SAMUEL STICKLAND,
JACOB LEONARD,
ELI CONVERSE.

Stafford, Nov. 30, 1830.'

In pursuance to the above notice, the republicans of the town, who were not Masons, assembled at the appointed place in such numbers that the real Simon Pure anties found themselves in a minority. The meeting proceeded regularly to business, and organized themselves by choosing Garner Cady, Esq. Chairman, and Eliab A. Converse, Secretary.

The meeting then passed the following Votes and Resolutions, viz.

Voted, That we deem it INEXPEDIENT to be represented in the ☐ HARTFORD CONVENTION ☐ to be holden on the 15th of the present month.

Voted, That Hervy Waters, Joseph P. Pinney, and Garner Cady, Esqrs. be a Committee to draft Resolutions, and present them to this meeting.

That Committee made the following report—which was accepted, and the resolutions passed.

Whereas certain disappointed and disaffected individuals have, by false and unfounded charges, preferred against a very respectable and peaceable portion of the citizens of the United States, (hoping thereby to gain an unmerited station,) and by this means have created an unhealthy, disagreeable and dangerous excitement among an honest, sincere, and otherwise peaceable community; and whereas this state of things is effected by intriguing and secret Conventions, frequently assembled without public notice, and without even a local habitation or a name, your committee therefore, in consideration have seen fit to submit to this meeting the following Resolutions, for your disposal:—

Resolved, That we view with peculiar regret, (and not without fear for our republican institutions) the secret, designing and antirepublican course pursued by a certain class of citizens, calling themselves Antimasons, in proscribing and excluding as far as in their power, without distinction, the whole society of Freemasons, who for aught we are able to discover, are men as worthy of our suffrages as they were during the lives of the immortal Washington, Jefferson and others—then their companions, and unhesitating approvers.

Resolved, That we well recollect the indignation and horror which thrilled through the heart of every true American, on learning the facts of the proscription, persecution and torture of Masons, in that ancient and strong hold of bigotry and persecution, Spain, and that we consider the present spirit of antimasonry in this country, to be headed and directed by an inquisition in miniature, which, if it had the power, would not hesitate to use the same means as did that nefarious institution.

Resolved, That we look with agreeable sensations of sympathy and pleasure on the recent triumph of liberal principles in that hitherto devoted country, France—and that it is not easy to forget the great and good Lafayette, who in point of fact, if not in form, stands at the head of that great people—and that we also recollect, with emotions not easily to be forgotten, the approbation and esteem with which he was pleased to speak, during his recent visit to America, of the ancient and honorable Institution of FREEMASONRY, of which he has always been a constant and unwavering member.

Resolved, That the warning by which this meeting was called, together with the proceedings of the same, be signed by the Chairman and Secretary, and submitted for publication to the editor of the People's Advocate, a republican newspaper, printed in Tolland, in this county.

Resolved, That this meeting be dissolved.

GARNER CADY, Chairman.

E. A. CONVERSE, Sec.

Stafford, Dec. 6, 1830.

It appears that after this meeting was dissolved, the anties present, amounting to four or five only, organized themselves by choosing Nathan Bartlett, Chairman, and Cyrel Johnson, Clerk. They then adjourned the meeting to Friday, the 11th inst. assigning as a reason, that they did not approve of the proceedings of the previous meeting. On Friday they undoubtedly did the business to their minds, and entered on the next Hartford Convention course, two foundered ponies—real blue-pointers.

We are neither Masons nor antimasons—we knew nothing to the detriment of Masonry, but it certainly is in its favor that old broken down political hacks are ranged against it. We cannot think ill of an institution which has always numbered among its adherents the master spirits of the times—an institution which has been supported by such men as Washington, Jefferson and Lafayette—and whose professed duty it is to dry the widow's tear, and smooth the sorrows of the orphan. But who can say any good of political antimasonry. Who was it that accused the immortal Washington of PERJURY—and the high-minded and honorable Clinton of SELF MURDER? The question needs not to be answered—for there is but one faction in existence whose self respect is so far buried in love of power, as to permit such infamous blasphemy upon the posthumous fame of two such distinguished patriots.

Look at political antiism—its men and its measures—the principles they profess, and the doctrines they advocate! Who do you find in their ranks save political bigots and knaves?—men who have forfeited every claim they ever had to political honesty and fairness? We speak of party generally—there may be some exceptions—some who are honest in the opposition to Masonry: but we believe such instances are scarce, few and far between.

We like the manner in which our friends the democrats of Stafford met this proceeding of the antiies—it is worthy of commendation. There was no rioting and noise, no tumult—but a straight forward declaration, that the honest republicans of the town did not approve of an excitement which sets father against son, and brother against brother! It was merited rebuke to the hollow-hearted doctrine of political antiism, and we hope to see the example followed, until political antiism shall be without a local habitation or a name!

[From the Pawtucket Chronicle.]

MR. FOWLER:—Among the rubbish of scurrility which the Providence Free-Press contains, is an article over the signature of F. B. in which the writer pretends to disclose some of the transactions of Lafayette Lodge in this town. He states firstly, that the Lodge was 'started' about two years since; and that they 'scoured' the town to obtain candidates, one of whom Mr. A. G. Jr. soon became very conspicuous on the review of his awful oaths, &c. which led his brethren to furnish him with funds, to defray his passage and other expenses to Ohio, &c.

Were it not for the distracted state of the public mind which renders every statement in the anti papers common food for their patrons, whether true or false, a meeting would probably be called to refute the charge, above alluded to, as it would not require twelve hours to obtain the signatures of one hundred as good men as this town can boast of, to prove the entire falsity of F.B.'s statements. But if Gabriel himself should descend from the realms of glory with a contradiction, he would be accused of Masonic influence, and his sayings pass unheeded. It is possible however that there may be some in the anti-masonic ranks who can still hear with both ears, and if this be the case there may be some attention paid to the following facts.

First:—Lafayette Lodge went into operation five years ago, last month, as will appear by the date of the Charter, and not about two years since as Mr. F. B. states.

Secondly:—Among the brethren who joined that Lodge there never has been the least dissatisfaction manifested, with regard to the oaths or anything else which Masonry inculcates, (except Mr. Collier who has seceded.)

If the Editor of the 'Free Press' or any of his coadjutors wish for information on this subject—if they wish to learn the doings of Lafayette Lodge, the following circumstances which can be proved, may be of use to them. Soon after the organization of the Lodge, a petition was received from a gentleman residing about one and a quarter miles from Diamond Hill Plain, whose christian name began with C. and his surname with B. the petition was unanimously rejected, the reasons for so doing were many, one of which by a person who had formerly lived a near neighbor to Mr. F. B. was, that he had once found him in his Granary stealing corn. How many F.B.'s there are in this town in the phalanx of anti-masonic office seekers, is not known to the writer of this article; the character of the piece however (in the Free Press) and the gentleman suspected are the same to a nicety.

[From the Geneva Gazette.]

MORE PROSCRIPTIONS.

By reference to an article which we copy from the Ontario Messenger, and to which we invite the attention of all candid men, it will be seen that the work of proscription, which commenced in the town of Gorham in this county, is in full operation in the town of Richmond. In the former town, all Masons are stricken from the list of petit jurors, and from the list of grand jurors in the latter. Will it, can it be any longer denied that anti-masonry is intolerant and proscriptive? Will candid, honest honorable men countenance or support a party which thus openly charges upon the best and purest of our citizens, that they are utterly heedless of their obligations of an oath, and which presumes them, without exception, capable of committing cool and deliberate perjury? Are the honest and sober minded inhabitants of this county willing to sanction a doctrine so alarming, and a practice which aims at the sacrifice of many of the best men among us? Can it be longer doubted that the subversion of our civil compact, and the utter disorganization of society would be the disastrous fruits of the ascendancy of political Anti-masonry in this state? We have arrived at the crisis which is, indeed, alarming, and which calls for the prompt interposition of the constituted authorities and of the friends of order and of law. That arbitrary exercise of power which would wantonly exclude a man from the jury box, might, with equal justice, so far as principle is concerned, deprive him of his property, his liberty, or his life. We suggest and recommend the passage of a law, by the next legislature, making it a misdemeanor, and punishable by a fine of imprisonment, or both, intentionally and wilfully to exclude from the list of grand or petit jurors any person or persons possessing the legal qualification of a juror. The passage of such a law has become necessary to protect our citizens in the enjoyment of their rights, and to an impartial administration of justice; in our judgment, it should be put in operation with as little delay as possible, and its violation punished with severe penalties.

The following is one of the most sacred and invaluable provisions of the constitution of this state.

Article Seventh, Sec. 1.—'No member of this state shall be DISFRANCHISED, or deprived of any of the RIGHTS or PRIVILEGES secured to ANY citizen thereof, unless by the law of the land, or the judgment of his peers.'

[On the first page of this paper will be found the remainder of the testimony, adduced in the Witherell case. Let the public peruse it with candor and attention, and if one single doubt of his guilt remains, we shall be disappointed. And the Elder's crime once proved, what can the public think of a party who seeks to sustain him?—What can be thought of men who will take advantage of such baseness, to further their cause? Men who would swear innocent persons to the scaffold, for the purpose of implicating a party, whose virtues they have never tried to imitate. And further what must be thought of a cause, which requires such acts to sustain it? Will any believe that its advocates have the good of their country at heart—that they are patriots or honest men?

Should men who tell you that they have foresworn themselves, be believed? Should men who persuade to perjury be trusted? Should men who pay a price for oath breaking, be relied upon? Is the common liar a christian—and if he is, is he who lies and swears to it, a saint?—Let these questions be answered, and then tell us if the anti-masonic party be pure, patriotic and religious. Tell us if there be no hidden motive for these persecutions.—Let each individual who reads this article, answer for the particular circle of his own acquaintance. Within your view of the anti-masonic party, is there no individuals at work, whom for years, even during the whole time of your knowledge of them, have been dishonest and designing men? Are they all as spotless as they would make you believe they were? Is there none who, in your opinion, are endeavoring to shade a bad character, by making others appear worse than themselves? If there is none, then your lot has been cast in a district, which few, very few have seen or known.—[Pawtucket Chron.]

CONSTRUCTING REFLECTING TELESCOPES.

One of the fundamental laws of optics may, in reference to curve surfaces, be put into this form:—In the reflection of light, the incident and reflected rays form equal angles with a tangent to the curve at the point of incidence.

Let ADB (fig. 1.) be a central section of a speculum perfectly parabolic, of which CD is the axis, D the vertex, and F the focus. Since, from the nature of the parabola, every diameter, GH, and its focal chord, GF, make equal angles with the tangent, KGE, drawn through its vertex, G, every pencil of rays, HIG, parallel to the axis, CD, (which according to the law specified above, is always reflected in the direction GF, so that the angle FGE equal HGK,) meets CD, after reflection, in the same point, F, the focus of the paraboloid; consequently there is no aberration of rays, that is, no confusion of images, at the focus of a perfectly parabolic speculum. The image which is there formed of an object indefinitely distant is perfect, depending for distinctness* conjointly upon the magnitude of the speculum and its reflective power.

The case is very different with the spherical speculum. In this case, AB, (fig. 2.) being a central section of the speculum, of which CD is the axis, D the vertex, and O the centre, it is evident that any pencil of rays, HIG, parallel to the axis (reflected according to the fundamental law, in the direction GF, so that the angle FGE equal HGK) meets CD, after reflection, in a point, F, which always bisects OE. And since OE increases according as the point G recedes from the vertex D, the point F must advance outward from its limit, the bisection of the radius, OD, till the angle, DOG, becomes 60°; beyond which, of course, single reflection, so as to meet the axis, ceases.—In a spherical speculum, therefore, all the pencils of rays coming from an indefinitely distant object, which are reflected from the circumference of any given circle whose centre is D, meet at a point of the axis peculiar to themselves; that is, every cone of reflected rays has its vertex in a different point of the axis between the limit of the point F and D. This occasions the aberration of a spherical reflector. A succession of images is thus formed, less perfectly blended as the point F recedes from its limit nearest to O; consequently no perfect image whatever can be formed by parallel rays reflected from a spherical surface. The confused image, however, which is formed, approaches perfection in proportion as the angle, DOG is diminished. Hence Mr. Barton will readily perceive, that of specula formed of the same materials, and containing the same quantity of reflecting surface, that is the best which is a portion of the largest sphere.

Your most obedient servant,

WELDING IRON AND STEEL.

Sir,—I send you the following, which originally appeared in this town some years since, in a work of like character with yours, and which I deem of sufficient importance to entitle it to a place in your Magazine. Many times the facts therein stated, exist when the smith is often ignorant of the remedies to apply.

As iron and steel are compounded more or less with sulphur, copper, and arsenic, which if they predominate too much, will prevent their being welded sound, it may be of some importance to blacksmiths to know what remedies to apply in such cases. When iron is compounded with sulphur, it is apt to burn before a welding heat can be raised. In this case a little unslacked stone lime should be pounded up very fine to be used instead of sand. Lime will absorb the sulphur and enable the smith to weld it sound. If but a small quantity of copper enters into the composition of iron, it will render it brittle when hot, and tough when cold. In this case salt, or sal-ammoniac, should be used with the sand, which will evaporate the copper and prevent the iron from breaking when it is very hot. Arsenic generally predominates in iron that is very brittle when cold. A small quantity of saltpetre should then be used with the sand for welding. Iron or steel that is entirely free from either of these pernicious substances will work sound, weld with ease, and be very tough when cold. This is what is called good iron. The same may be said of steel.

A fault too often found with blacksmiths is, that their work is not sound, when in fact the fault is in the iron they have to work. A little attention to ascertain the qualities of iron, and to apply the proper remedies, will enable them to make their work sound, or, at least, as good as the quality of the iron will admit. In welding iron and steel together for edge tools it will be of service, (at least it can do no harm even if the iron and steel is ever so good,) to have a little lime, salt and saltpetre mixed with the sand commonly used in welding. This mixture makes an excellent flux for welding, and at the same time prevents the iron from burning, and enables the smith to raise a sufficient heat to weld it perfectly sound, even to the centre of the bar.—[Eos. Mech. Mag.]

AN IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.

An interesting paper on the beautiful and brilliant light, produced by the action of oxygen and hydrogen gases upon common lime, was read at the last meeting of the English Royal Society. The chemical action of these gases upon the carbonates, furnishing a variety of singular and beautiful experiments has been long known to the veriest tyro in the science. But the practical application of the light evolved from common lime by the agency of these gases is said to have been first suggested by Lieut. Drummond of the British Navy. Its effects were lately exhibited in London in the presence of a large number of distinguished scientific gentlemen of that metropolis. A temporary light house was erected a few miles below Blackwell, and the light from the lime is said to have been ten times more brilliant than the revolving lights upon the coast. Indeed so powerfully bright was the light emitted that when the revolving shade precluded a directed view its bare reflection from a neighboring wall was distinctly visible to the spectators at the distance of ten miles. It also exhibited the singular phenomenon of sending its rays across the horizon in a most brilliant and beautiful manner. This appearance and that of the reflection will of course depend upon the state of the atmosphere, as the least haze or moonlight will almost entirely prevent them.

The action of these gases upon a ball of lime about the size of a common playing marble, is said to produce a light so painfully brilliant, as to be even more annoying than gazing upon the meridian sun. The light emitted was found equal to the combined light of 260 wax candles.

This discovery is at present undergoing an examination by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and others—previously to its being practically applied to light-houses. The cheapness of the material, the facility of its management, the uniformity and brilliancy of its light as well as the little danger of its communicating fire, would at first view and without any particular examination, seem to recommend it highly for such an application.

DETECTION OF ALLOY IN SILVER.

Oersted has made an ingenious and novel application of the magnetic multiplier. He finds that if a good electromagnetic multiplier, with double needles, be suspended by a hair, or a thread of unspun silk, between two pieces of wrought silver, differing only one per cent. in the quantity of copper they contain, so sensible an effect is produced upon the needle as to render this a more accurate method of proof than the common touchstones. Small trial-plates are made of different degrees of purity, and the piece to be tried is compared with them in the following way; a thin piece of woollen cloth is dipped in muriatic acid, and laid upon the trial plate, after which the piece to be tried is brought into contact with the acid and the wire of the multiplier. The deviation of the needle shows which contains the most alloy, and another trial plate must be employed till the needle ceases to be affected, when both are of equal fineness. In coming to a conclusion on this point, however, several circumstances are to be taken into consideration. Wrought silver goods are generally deprived of a portion of their copper by the action of acids, so as to render the surface finer than the inner part of the metal; the proof plates, therefore, must be prepared in the same way. Another source of error in the indications of the needle are the unequal polish and size of the two pieces of metal; the latter of these is especially difficult to overcome when the surface of the metal to be proved is not plain, when, instead of muriatic acid, a dilute solution of caustic potash is employed, and the result is unlike, it is shown that copper is not the only alloy, but that brass is present; and the potash solution renders that which contains brass so positive, that it seems considerably purer than the trial plate. This is the case also in a very high degree when the alloyed metal contains arsenic, for example, when what is called white metal has been used for an alloy.

This mode of proof is exceedingly interesting, in a scientific point of view, and cases may occur in which it may be employed with advantage; but the sources of error can scarcely be ever so completely done away with as to make it a practical instrument in the hands of the silversmith, as Oersted seems to expect.—Berzelius, Asberattelse, p. 123.

A subscriber, who wishes to know how he may ascertain, whether his bushel measure is correct is informed, that the dimensions of a bushel, by statute, are, 8 inches deep, and 18 1-2 inches wide or in diameter. By calculation, it is found that a vessel of these dimensions contains 2150.41 cubic inches. This will afford farmers an opportunity of finding the number of bushels in a bin, without the trouble of taking it out for measurement.—They have only to find the length, breadth, and depth of the grain in inches, as it lies in the bin, and multiply these numbers together, and divide the product by 2150.41; the quotient will be the number of bushels; this rule may be of use to farmers in determining the dimensions of their cribs.—[A Country Paper.]

YELLOW DYE FROM POTATOES.

A French paper disputes with Sir. John Sinclair the honor of having discovered a yellow dye in the potato flower. The discovery is stated to have been made in 1794, by M. Dambourny, a merchant at Rouen, who published a treatise respecting it at the time of discovery.

LITERARY.

LIVING WRITERS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

NO. I.

We are deeply indebted to the living writers of Great Britain for the rich and varied productions with which they have embellished literature. The moderns have been considered as dwarfs perched upon the shoulders of the giants of antiquity. By this comparison the praise of originality and superior genius is bestowed upon the ancients, while the credit of greater elevation and a keener vision possessed by the moderns is made to depend upon their accidental position, and an artificial stature.

After a long deliberation upon this subject, we are not disposed to admit the proposition. We yield to the classic ages their full share of glory, but we believe it would be an easy matter to draw a picture of modern refinement, which compared with outlines transmitted us from the early times, would be Hyperion to a Satyr.

In every branch of useful knowledge, in all the domestic arts, in the works of fancy, in the elaborations of science, in the tender or the heroic effusions of poetry; the moderns may claim an unrivalled superiority. From this field of delightful investigation however, on which we have so often gazed with a determination fully to explore it, we must now turn aside.

Our object is to give our readers a brief sketch of the principal writers of Great Britain in our own time, and if we shall be happy enough to strew a single leaf in the laurelled path of these admirable persons, or make them known to one unconscious admirer on this side the water, our own wishes will be accomplished.

As we mean to pursue some method in our brevity, we will follow the order of the alphabet, and begin with Abernethy, a writer on physiology and pathology. This eccentric man was born in London, 1765, and commenced his profession at St. Bartholemew's hospital. He soon after became a lecturer and an author. His surgical observations, his lectures, his articles in Rees' Cyclopaedia, and his bold and successful attempt to tie the external iliac artery, completed his fame. His peculiar ideas on the subject of the stomach's being the cause of most diseases, and his opposition to a very minute division of the department of surgery, added to a brusquerie of manner, and great independence of mind have imparted an air of originality to his character. The wits and magazine writers have taken great liberty with these peculiarities and the New Monthly Magazine has been furnished with some excellent articles in relation to them. His medical practice is extensive, but he is not very courteous to his patients in general. A lady consulted him on some occasion, and began with a list of aches and pains. 'Doctor,' said she, 'whenever I lift my arm it gives me excessive pain.' 'What do you lift it for then,' said the doctor, 'you are a great fool for your pains!' We may set him down, notwithstanding his oddities, as a great man in his profession, and occupying a conspicuous place in public estimation.

Frederic Accum is another name on our list. He has been humorously called 'Death in the pot,' for having in the zeal of chemical analysis detected poison in all the various solids and liquids on which flesh is doomed to feed. The brew house, the bake house, and the milk house, have been as-soiled by Accum as the receptacles of drugs, dry bones, and pulverised chalk. He is a Westphalian by birth and is sixty-one years old. We do not know whether he still keeps a shop, as he did some years since, in Compton street, but his lectures on chemistry, his numerous essays on mineralogy, chrysallography, chemical agents and tests, on gas lights, on the adulterations of food and culinary poisons, and a vast number of other subjects, have received the decided approbation of the scientific. He is, if we mistake not, a lecturer at the Surry Institution.

Among the living writers in England of whom the American public know but little, is John Adolphus, an English lawyer. He is the author of a history of George the III, which is a work of reputation. His biographical sketches of the French revolution were a violent effort to injure the republican cause, and are written in the spirit of prejudice. His latter works are contributions to the annual register, besides some pamphlets. His name is frequently found in the reports of the Bow street office, where he often appears at examinations.

Miss Lucy Aiken is the next on our list. She is the daughter of a learned physician, the sister of Arthur Aiker, the writer on natural history, and the niece of the celebrated Mrs. Barbauld. Her first work was a translation from the French, and appeared in 1800, under the title of 'The Travels of Orlando round the world.' From this period to 1812, she was engaged in executing several minor works. She then brought out the life of Zuinglius. Her recent works, the courts of Queen Elizabeth and James 2d, have established her fame. It is said some historical inaccuracies are to be found in them, but in addition to the pleasing style of the composition they discover the author's familiar acquaintance with her subject. But we must now conclude our present desultory article. We have about seven hundred writers on our list, from which we propose to select those worthy of an introduction to our friends and readers. They will not however, expect anything but a brief and rapid sketch of each individual, and of course many pleasant anecdotes and personal traits must necessarily be omitted.—[Alb. Advertiser.]

ANECDOTE OF BURNS.

Than Burns perhaps no man ever more severely inflicted the castigation of reproof. The following anecdote will illustrate the fact. The conversation one night at the King's Arms, Dumfries, turning on the death of a townsman, whose funeral was to take place on the following day. 'Bye the bye,' said one of the company addressing himself to Burns, 'I wish you would lend me your black coat for the occasion, my own being rather out of repair.' 'Having myself to attend the same funeral,' answered Burns, 'I am sorry that I cannot lend you my sables, but I can recommend a most excellent substitute; throw your character over your shoulders that will be the blackest coat you ever wore in your life-time.'

Reynolds, the dramatist, when about to appear in the character of a novelist, was complaining to a friend of the many difficulties he encountered in his new undertaking; the latter replied—'Think when the work is over, of the pleasure of correcting the press.' 'Ay!', rejoined Fred. Reynolds—'and when that work is over, think of the press having the pleasure of correcting me.'

THE BOQUET.

THOU WAST NOT THERE.

[By Robert Sweeny.]

I stood within a brilliant hall,
Among the young and gay,
And joyous was the festival;
And loud the revelry.
Why was my spirit dark and dull
Where all seem'd free from care?
Why was my heart so sorrowful?
Thou wast not there.

Another sang that simple song
I oft had heard from thee,
And merry voices 'mid the throng
Recall'd thy notes of glee.
I could not listen to that strain,
That mirth I could not share;
The song, the glee, alike were vain—
Thou wast not there.

Around me flitted many a form,
In graceful movement light,
Their cheeks with youth's pure pleasures warm,
Their eyes with rapture bright.
I thought on one as light as they,
As exquisitely fair,
And turned in bitterness away—
Thou wast not there.

Can splendor to the aching heart,
For vanish'd friends atone?
Can pleasure charm us when we part
From those we love alone?
Oh no! the humblest cot on earth
With thee I'd rather share,
Than dwell in courts, if 'mid their mirth,
Thou wast not there.

MISCELLANY.

ERUPTION OF MOUNT GALOUNGOUN.

In a foreign Journal we have met with a circumstantial description of the eruption of Mount Galoungoun, in the island of Java, on the 8th of October, 1822.—Mount Galoungoun is situated in the southern part of the district of Soumadang, and is part of the chain of mountains which divides that district from Limbangan. At the foot of it is a valley surrounded by hills, which is watered by two rivers, the Tji Tandor, and the Tji Woulan, which are formed by the union of a great number of streams which take their rise in the mountain. The country between these two rivers was one of the most fertile, pleasant and populous parts of the whole province. There is no tradition of any previous eruption in this mountain, but some months before this disaster, some remarkable appearances had been observed in the streams descending from it such as an unusual agitation of the water, and a sulphurous and a bituminous smell and taste.

Between one and two o'clock in the afternoon of Oct. 8, a violent explosion was heard from the side of the valley, and a thick column of black smoke was seen to arise from the foot of the Galoungoun extending some distance in the air with a terrific force. Soon the mountain was entirely enveloped in a black cloud which darkened the whole country. The explosions were continually repeated with increasing force, which made the whole earth tremble. The mountain then threw out to a prodigious height enormous bodies of flaming lava,* mixed with burning sulphur. These burning masses were thrown beyond the river Tji Tandor which is more than ten leagues from the mountain. The rivers obstructed with these enormous masses of burning lava, were transformed into boiling streams, the overflowing of which arrested at every step the wretched fugitives, and doomed them to a painful and cruel death in the midst of rivers of liquid fire, or of boiling water. The rivers above named, and the Tji Toasse, and the Tji Kounir floated down in great numbers the bodies of men and animals, and the inhabitants of the lower districts saw whole houses, with their tenants still living, floating down these swollen and hoated streams, without the possibility of giving them relief. The clouds which enveloped the mountain were illuminated from time to time by the most vivid flashes of lightning, accompanied with a deafening roar of thunder, by which many inhabitants of the forest, beyond the reach of the eruption, were killed. At 3 o'clock the eruption had attained its greatest degree of violence. At that time there fell a shower of cooled lava, mingled with ashes, which destroyed all the plantations within a circuit of more than twenty-five leagues. Nearer the water a reddish sand obscured the air, and covered the fields. About 4 o'clock the explosions became less violent, and at 5, there reigned a death-like silence, the air gradually cleared up and the mountain became visible. A more dreadful scene of devastation was never witnessed. For a distance of six leagues from the water, where a few hours before were flourishing villages and a happy population, not a house, a plantation, a forest, or a living being was to be seen, but the whole had been buried under a boiling mass, which had now become a blueish color, but which retained its heat for a long time after. Farther from the seat of the volcano the scene was still more dreadful. There were to be seen the lifeless and half consumed bodies of men, women and children, who had escaped wounded from the burning flood, or had been intercepted in their flight, and the still living who were seeking in vain for an asylum amidst the general destruction. On the 9th, 10th, 11th, it rained without interruption, and the wretched inhabitants who had fled from their houses, were left without shelter, and were intercepted in their flight by the overflowing of the rivers, and the destruction of all the bridges.

In the evening of the 12th, there was a new eruption, very violent and accompanied by two violent shocks of an earthquake. This was accompanied by neither fire nor lightning, to interrupt the deep darkness which settled over the terrified inhabitants. On the morning of the 13th, it was observed that the summits of Mount Galoun-goun were changed. The tops were broken off, and the side from the border of the valley presented an immense crater, opened in the form of a semi-circle, and forming a frightful gulf. New hills were formed, and the course of several rivers were entirely changed.

The Resident of the province, as soon as he heard of these disasters, repaired to the neighborhood, and took every measure in his power to suc-

*We translate this lava for want of a more appropriate term, though said not to have been lava, properly so called, and in this respect the eruption was different from those volcanic phenomena, heretofore known.—[Daily Adv.]

cor the sufferers. It was found, on a thorough official inquiry, that 114 villages were destroyed, 4011 persons perished many were severely wounded, many horses, cows and oxen were destroyed, many rice and coffee plantations were destroyed, and others greatly damaged, 41 canals for irrigating rice plantations were destroyed, and 46 were damaged, 775,795 coffee trees were destroyed, and 3,851,742 were either destroyed or damaged.

STATE OF SOCIETY IN RUSSIA.

The middle class of Russian society has vastly improved of late years; the constant intercourse of foreigners--the excitement of emulation, and the increase of trade, have filled the purses, without clogging the brains of the merchandize.—Among this class of people, although kept at a suitable distance from the dignity of a lieutenant of the chevalier guards, there is much information and much sound sense, they are gradually emancipating their minds from the bigotry of their ancestors; they have mostly condescended to relinquish the goatish appendage of a board and the national costume has given way to the general continental dress. In the higher classes of society, of course, all the good and all the bad qualities of the mind are jumbled up together. The females receive a good education, and are in general sprightly, witty, and, well informed in accomplishments, with the exception of music—in this last there is a lamentable deficiency. The young ladies of the nobility are always conversant in three languages, French, German and Russian, but the Russian is not a studied language, and I have known many of the age of fourteen who could not write it; indeed, I shall not subject myself to contradiction, when I mention, that about eight years ago, the governor general of Moscow began to learn to write his own language—for all conversation among the higher classes, and all written communications, are almost entirely made in the French language. I remember a young gentleman at Moscow, a sharp, clever, intelligent lad, who spoke English, French, German and Russian, but could not write the latter—They are all miserably defective in reading: the difficulty of getting books, and the still greater difficulty of publishing, have been the great draw backs to positive learning. There is much good and polished society in Russia; and among the first rate nobility, men of the best behaviour and sound talents are to be found. It is out of the first society, between the second rate nobility—I mean those who principally reside in the country—that all the vulgarity, and all the barbarity of the ancestors have not been eradicated.

RUSSIAN MANUFACTURES.

Russia is making great progress in her different manufactures: the duties on foreign articles are immensely heavy, and the new tariff has by no means lightened the tax. Officers in the army are obliged to wear cloth manufactured in Russia, the example has been set by the emperor, and notwithstanding its coarseness, is in very general use. The mines are prolific, and the whole of Russia internally, assuming a new and interposing feature. But that which is most requisite is most neglected—agriculture. A stranger can form no idea of the miles of woods through which he traverses, and which if cleared, might be turned to a much better use than sheltering wolves and bears. After passing Ichora, about thirty miles west from Petersburg, nearly the whole route to Moscow is one intermenable forest. Turning the attention to agriculture. Establishing villages, and making a few free men, would add more to the respectability of Russia than all the late aggrandizement.

MAGIC TABLE,

FOR FINDING THE AGE OF ANY PERSON.

Rule.—Let any person tell on which column or columns, he finds his age—add together the first numbers of those columns, and their sum is the person's age.

Suppose, for example, that a person says that he sees his age in the first, second and fifth column, then the addition of one, two and sixteen, (the first numbers of said columns,) gives 19 for the person's age.

N. B. The above combination was originally made by a Quaker in Pennsylvania, about 15 years ago; but as it only extended to No. 63, we have carried it to twice the extent so as to answer for any old as well as young peoples' age.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, JANUARY 1, 1831.

To OUR PATRONS we tender the customary salutations of the season.

PROGRESS OF
LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.
NO. II.

The great master poet of antiquity, whose genius for the sublime and beautiful, and whose faithful descriptions of ancient manners are familiar to the classic reader, gave an impulse to the rising literature of Greece, than which nothing could have contributed more to facilitate her progress to that goal, at which she shone with such distinguished lustre. In pursuing the progress of the muses, our attention is arrested by the unlimited fancy and sublime imagery of Pindar, the easy, graceful style of Anacreon, the exquisite taste of Sappho, the admirable morality of Euripides, the delicate wit and purity of Menander. Although we look in vain for an equal to Homer, they all had their influence in forming the manners and improving the literature of their country. The writings of these men had an influence in producing the diversities of taste among their countrymen, which led to the more profound studies of geometry and astronomy, ethics and dialectics. Thales acquired so great a knowledge of these sciences that he was enabled to teach, with considerable success, the rational doctrine of the existence of an overruling Providence. Followed by Socrates, the master of Xenophon and Plato, who exploded the polytheistical superstition of his countrymen, the effulgent beams of revelation burst forth with unequalled splendor over benighted man, subdued the stubborn propensities of his heart, and bid him acknowledge his dependence on a mysterious omniscient Being. The philosophy of Plato, who founded the Academic sect, produced a more extensive influence over the minds of men, than that of any other of the ancient philosophers: his ideas of the Divinity are the most sublime and rational. The principles of the "sceptical sect" of Pyrrho, and the doctrines of the Stoics, though better suited to the idolatrous state of the times, when contrasted with the rational systems of Socrates and Plato, vanished as the virgin dew before the morning's sun.

The advancement Greece had made in literature and science, and the refinement which she had attained, began to attract universal attention.

"Et post Punica bella quietis quasi caput.

Quid Sophocles, et Thespis, et Aeschylus utile ferrent."

By a free communication with Greece, the rude and illiterate Romans acquired the principles of that knowledge which ultimately placed them at the head of the nations. Through this channel they became acquainted with the first principles of the legitimate drama. Previously they had only a kind of satirical dialogue, or versus facientium, recited by the vulgar to excite merriment. Little or no attention was given to the art until about the time of Ennius, when it received the encouragement of the literati, and continued to progress while the literature of the empire flourished. Cicero has, perhaps very justly, ranked Cæcilius among the best of the Roman comic writers; and the tragedies of Aetius and Pacuvius were esteemed pre-eminent. It has been remarked, that the age of Cicero was the golden age of Roman literature, and emphatically styled the Agustan age. The correctness of this remark may not be generally admitted, for many of the writers who lived in that age are admired more for their antiquity than elegance of diction—"petitis ab antiquitate quam elegantiam, sumitis in illis sententiarum gravitas, sed in qua sapientia verborum cultum desideratis." It is, however, pretty certain that the literature of the Romans had, at this time, arrived at its acme. Philosophy rose to a high rate of cultivation; and Sallust, one of the finest writers who flourished in that age, was the first who applied it to the study of events. The greatest obstacle to the progress of literature, at Rome, was their jealousy of foreigners. This was carried to such a height, at one time, that the principal men were compelled to send their sons to Athens, and other cities, for an education. The prevailing love of luxury, at length, corrupted the morals of the people, hastened the decline of the sciences, and with it the overthrow of the empire. This event, and the final subjugation of Italy by the Lombards, checked, for many centuries, the progress of learning.

FREEMASONRY IN FRANCE.

We find by the perusal of Paris files at the Atheneum, that the progress of Freemasonry in France keeps equal with the march of liberal politics and enlarged philanthropy. The papers make frequent mention of the progress of the Craft in all parts of Europe, and the two Americas, and particularly in the United States, giving the facts of the imposing ceremonies of the Laying of the Corner Stone of the Masonic Temple in this city.

The Paris Moniteur of Oct. 19, furnishes the following account of the meeting of the Grand Lodge of France, on the preceding day, to celebrate the accession to the throne of a Citizen King, and Brother; and the glorious days of July. The fete was brilliant. All the Halls of the City Hotel were improved for the occasion, and decorated with tri-colored flags, interspersed with the Banners of the Lodges. The brethren present exceeded five hundred and fifty,—more than one third of whom were the Representatives of Lodges, of all the great cities of the kingdom.

The Grand Lodge was opened in ample form, by his Excellency the Marshal Duke of Tarentum, (Macon-en.) Deputy Grand Master, aided by Lt. Gen. Count Rampon, one of the Peers of France. The seats were filled with high public functionaries, civil and military, and by the "grand dignitaries of the Masonic Fraternity."—Among them we noticed General LAFAYETTE, surrounded by a cortege, composed of M. Girard de l'Ain; the Secretary General of the Prefecture of the Seine, and the elite of the honorable citizens and Counsellors of State. M. de MERILHOU, and M. JAY, the eminent writer, pronounced Addresses on the occasion. M. Bouilly, author of "Deux Journées," delivered a poem in praise of Masonry; and M. de FOURNAI, in couplets complete with fancy and fire, celebrated the virtues of the Patriot King and his august family.

At the banquet which followed, the health of the King was given, with three times three, and received with every mark of respect, love and gratitude. Count de LAMORDE, aid-de-camp of his Majesty, responded with an appropriate toast. The Festival closed with a contribution for the benefit of the wounded on the "memorable days," and with prolonged acclamations of "Long live the King, Liberty and Freemasonry!"

THE WITHERELL AFFAIR.—It will be recollected that a full account of the proceedings had in the "Judicial Investigation" of Elder Witherell's Head-board murder, before Slade D. Brown, Esq., in the case of the People vs. Alonzo Hyde, was published in the Mirror of the 26th November, together with the examination purporting to have been had before A. T. Bush, Esq. It is now generally admitted that this last examination was fabricated by the antimasonic party, in order, if possible, to divert public attention from, and destroy the credence of the first and genuine account. These accounts differ in no essential particular. The substance of the fabricated examination is fully corroborated by the evidence elicited on the trial of Hyde. There is only this difference—the fabrication makes the Elder the principal, and the genuine examination only an accessory; and in this particular we believe the fabrication comes nearest to the truth. It was unquestionably drawn up by men fully acquainted with all the facts in the case, and we are willing, for once, to give full credence to their statement. The report of the proceedings had before Justice Brown, having been, by some antimasonic presses, declared a forgery, the following certificate has been obtained.

CERTIFICATE.

"I do hereby certify, that the statement of the proceedings and examination in the case of the People vs. Alonzo Hyde, published in the Masonick Record and Albany Literary Journal, of the date of the 30th of October last, is a correct detail of the material part of the proceedings, and testimony had before me, as therein stated, in consequence of proceedings legally instituted before me as a magistrate. For proof of the genuineness of my signature to this you can call on J. L. Wendell, Esq. Reporter of the Supreme Court, P. D. Beekman, Esq. Law Agent, or Messrs. Israel Williams and Anthony Blanchard, Esqrs. all or any one of whom will, I presume, readily recognize my hand writing. Hartford, Washington county, N. Y. November 27, 1830.

"SLADE D. BROWN, Justice of the Peace.

"To the Editor of the Masonick Record."

Some of our antimasonic logicians reason, that if Witherell were depraved enough to commit the act charged upon him, he would be also knave enough to swear it through court. Not so. The commission of the act, though perhaps actionable, does not involve so much personal danger, as would the commission of the crime of perjury.

CHURCHMAN'S CALENDAR.—This is the title given to a very excellent little pocket almanack, just received by R. P. & C. Williams. It is an ecclesiastical register, containing the lunations, eclipses, rising and setting of the sun and moon, and time of high water: an accurate notice of all the festivals and fasts of the Episcopal Church, list of the clergy, societies, &c. &c. We copy the following notice of Christmas as, in some degree, corroborative of the remarks on the subject, in our last; and to shew the manner in which the festivals are severally noticed in the little annual before us.

'Christmas Day, (the 25th of December,) is the day devoted to the celebration of the birth of our blessed Saviour, who left the glory of his Father, and for us men, and our salvation, took upon him our nature.

Christmas day should be kept as holy as Sunday. And we should not banish our seriousness so soon, as to partake of amusements in the evening. Luke ii. 6-21

This feast of our Saviour's nativity seems to have had its beginning in the first, or, at least in very early times of Christianity.

The words 'at this time,' in the collect for Christmas day, need not to be so rigidly interpreted as if the precise time were fixed by the church, and made a term of her communion. They are capable of being understood in a due latitude, and do necessarily imply no more than we commemorate, at that time, the blessing of our Saviour's birth and incarnation. In which sense it may well be said, that he was at this time born. And surely those who differ about the precise time of his birth, may, notwithstanding, join at once in the observance of a holy festival set apart in remembrance of it.

In the determination of the precise and real day, antiquity itself has been divided as well as modern times; and about the year 500, the twenty fifth of December became the general observation of the church on this occasion.

To celebrate no day, because the exact day cannot be ascertained, is the likeliest way to bring the great mystery of our Saviour's incarnation first into contempt and then into oblivion.

The practice of embellishing and ornamenting churches at this great Festival is explained by Dr. Stokely. He observes, that the ancients expected that our Saviour was to be born at the winter solstice, and the great advent was to happen when evergreens flourished. 'The glory of Lebanon (the cedar) shall come unto thee, the fir tree, the pine tree, and the box tree together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary.' Isa. lx. 13. Many passages to the same purport occur in the Old Testament.

! The late news from Europe is of a highly interesting character. The Wellington Cabinet has resigned, and is succeeded by a Whig Cabinet, with Earl Grey for First Lord of the Treasury, and Mr. Brougham for Lord Chancellor. The Earl of Winchelsea, in the House of Lords, on the 3d November, remarked that the 'present Ministers were not in possession of the confidence of the country'. Such was their unpopularity, he believed that were it not for the influence of their office, they could not find in the new Parliament fifty votes to support their Administration. For the peace and safety of the country, he hoped ere long to see another set of men in their place, for they could not hold office without endangering all the institutions of the country.'

The Duke of Wellington was burnt in effigy at Carlisle, Nov. 14th; and 15th, Sir Robert Peel.

An extraordinary sensation was created in London Nov. 8th. by the announcement that the visit of their Majesties to the city, which was fixed for the following day, had been postponed, under an apprehension that the occasion would be employed by disorderly persons to create a tumult.

Accounts from different parts of Britain speak of great excesses being committed by the laboring classes. Mobs and burnings were frequent. On Sunday morning, Nov. 14th, a mill at Albury was discovered to be on fire, and the occupant, on opening a window when the first alarm was given, was fired at with slugs.

The burnings and other destruction of property continued in Kent, and the people were in the greatest state of consternation. The Scots Greys and other military corps were on the alert, performing duty.

Handbills of a most inflammatory character had been issued in London. The following is from one of them: 'To arms! to arms! liberty or death! London meets on Tuesday next. It is a glorious opportunity which ought not to be lost for revenging the wrongs which we have so long endured. Come armed and victory must be ours.' Another ran, 'Liberty or death! Britons, friends, and countrymen, the time has arrived. London meets on Tuesday.—Six thousand cutlasses have been issued from the Tower. These cursed Police will now therefore, be armed. But come armed and we shall triumph.'

On the 9th, after the breaking up of a meeting, in London, over which Mr. Hunt presided, the tri-colored flag, with 'Reform' printed upon it was exhibited, and a cry of 'Now for the West end,' was instantly raised—all the individuals composing the meeting, amounting to 500, sallied forth in a body, shouting 'Reform!' 'Down with the Police!' 'No Peel!' 'No Wellington.' They proceeded to the Strand, (on their way to the House of Commons,) where they were opposed by the Police—a general fight ensued, and some broken heads were received. The Police being timely assisted by the E and B divisions, the mob was dispersed.

On the 8th, two troops of artillery and two companies of sappers and miners arrived at the Tower, from Woolwich. The ditch of the Tower has been filled with water and the workmen are employed in erecting gates in the passage way leading to the Tower wharf. Orders were given that no persons should be admitted through the Tower, but passengers were allowed to enter the gates near Tower stairs and proceed along the wharf to the Iron gate. Orders were also issued at the War Office to the Commanding Officers of the Life Guards, Royal Horse Guards, and the three Battalions of the Foot Guards, now doing duty in London, for the whole of the men to be called into the different barracks at half past five o'clock, and there to continue all night under arms. The same precaution was taken as respects the first battalion of Grenadier Guards, now doing duty in the Tower, and the gates were kept closed during a great part of the day. An extra guard was also marched to the Magazine in Hyde Park. Several detachments arrived in and near London, in the course of the day, consisting of the Second Regiment of Life Guards from Brighton, the Scotch Greys from Windsor; part of the Regiments of Lancers, from Hounslow and Hampton Court; and were billeted in Chelsea, Putney, and that neighborhood. The second battalion of Grenadier Guards under the command of Col. Lord Saltoun, arrived, by forced marches, from Windsor and Brighton.

A London paper of the 30th says, the Tower is now completely closed against the public; and no person is allowed to enter except those who reside, or have business within the fortress; and every one presenting himself at the gates for admittance, is questioned with 'what's your business?' The bastion and batteries are put into a state of defence; several stones and sand bags, and an immense quantity of ammunition, are piled up in various places, and pieces of ordnance have been raised on the roofs of several houses and towers capable of bearing the weight.

The Duke of Wellington, as High Constable of the Tower, has directed the works in progress.

The laboring people have risen in almost every part of the country, burning mills, machinery, corn-stacks, houses, &c. What the result will be, is not easily predicted. The next arrival will be looked for with great interest.

On the 5th November, the British Government, having received the President's proclamation, opening our ports to British vessels from the British West Indies, issued an ordinance repealing the British Order in Council, which prohibited American vessels from the same ports.

Some further changes have taken place in the French ministry. Peace is pretty generally restored, and business is reviving. M. Serrurier, and suite, Minister to the U. States, were about to embark. M. Lasteysie, grandson to Gen. Lafayette, is an attaché of Legation.

MASONIC CELEBRATION.—at Cincinnati, Ohio.—LAFAYETTE LODGE, at Cincinnati, celebrated the successful result of the French Revolution, on Thursday the 25th Nov. last.

At sunrise a salute of 21 guns, at noon one of 18 guns, and at sun down one of 14 guns was fired. The uniform corps of the city paraded in Broadway at 3 o'clock P. M. and made a very handsome display. The tri-colored flag waved on the top of the Bazaar, throughout the day, and at night a most splendid supper was given, of which about 125 gentlemen partook. A band of music was in constant attendance, and in the course of the evening several speeches were made, and numerous songs sung. Everything passed off most happily. The following abstract from the Cin. American will exhibit most of the interesting particulars.

The members of Lafayette Lodge, of which the General is an actual member, (having been elected and signed the constitution, whilst in that city in 1825,) resolved to give some public demonstration of the gratification they felt at the prominent and efficient part taken by the 'great Apostle of Liberty' in the late glorious change in the French government. Having decided upon a convivial meeting, at the Bazaar, as affording the best field for the free, and untrammelled expression of feeling and sentiment, they invited their fellow citizens generally to join with them in the celebration. As nothing of the kind had been decided on, at a meeting of the citizens previously called to take some notice of the events of France, several gentlemen, not members of the fraternity, subscribed to the festive meeting. Invitations were extended to many distinguished citizens in Kentucky and Ohio; among others to the Governor, and Governor elect of the State; the Speakers of both Houses; the Hon. Jacob Burnet, U. S. Senator; the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas; Mayor of the City; Senator Miller; Gen. Lytle; and many others. The company commenced assembling at 7 o'clock, P. M. in the splendid Ball room of the Bazaar, which was illuminated brilliantly on the occasion. The military band played until the whole party had assembled. At eight o'clock, the company sat down in the banqueting room, to one of the most splendid collations ever presented in the West, prepared under the direction of Messrs. Guibert and Tosso, who have taken this noble building. Morgan Neville, Esq. presided, assisted by W. Greene, Esq. and Col. Carr and Pendleton—Mr. Allison Owen officiated as Master of Ceremonies.

In our next, we shall publish a portion of the sentiments given on the above occasion.

REV. MOSES THACHER.—We have not yet learned anything officially, of the result of the Ecclesiastical Council, recently held at North Wrentham, on the conduct of this celebrated antimasonic political priest; but a correspondent of the Gazette says, that after a session of two days, the Council determined that, 'his Reverence had been guilty of unchristian conduct in excluding Masons from the Communion table, and also decreed, that these excluded brethren be received again into fellowship.—Messrs Beecher, Codman, &c. were members of the Council.' This gentle reprimand we take to be a very civil intimation that the gentleman's services, as a minister of the gospel, are no longer required or acceptable. We doubt not that after the cause of disturbance and dissension, shall be removed, peace and harmony will be restored to the flock, that has been so long cursed by the 'unchristian conduct' of an unworthy Shepherd.

THE INDIANS.—A public meeting was held at York, U. C. on the 35th ult. at which the Lord Bishop of Quebec presided, to devise suitable measures for the conversion and civilization of the Indians in Upper Canada. The meeting was well attended, and 763 in donations, and 160 12s 6d in annual subscriptions, obtained on first opening the book. The intention of the society is not to interfere with those places where the Missionaries of the Methodist society have been so highly favored, but to direct its energies to the numerous tribes yet without the advantages of a christian ministry. The following is the number of Indians in Upper Canada;—Delawares 200, Chippewayans 160, Mohawks on Grand River 200, River Credit 220, Lake Simcol 500, Rice Lake 300, Grape Island 130, Mohawks elsewhere 250, Kingston Indians 100, number supposed to be in the western part of the Province 850. Total 3010. On an average each family is composed of four individuals.

! The Philadelphia Gazette states that, between the 1st of May last past, and the 24th Sept. forty persons were imprisoned in that city for debts which amounted, altogether to twentythree dollars and seventy three cents! The cost on this sum amounts to $ 70.20!!

In Russia the Cholera Morbus is raging with great violence. Letters from Moscow of Oct. 13th, say, the city is filled with alarm: everybody is quitting the place; 50,000 mechanics have emigrated, all the shops are shut up, and there is a complete stagnation of commerce. Of 8000 who were attacked by the disease, it is stated that 4000 died. At Astrackham the deaths are at the rate of about a hundred daily.

The intelligence brought by the Columbia, at New-York, strongly indicates a General War in Europe. Indeed a passenger who left London a few hours later than the latest printed dates, states that just before his departure, he saw an Extra issued from the office of the Courier, which states that Russia had actually declared war against France.

Peace has been restored to Belgium, the King of the Netherlands having accepted the armistice on the terms proposed in the conferences at London. Belgium is to be separated from Holland, and to be an Independent State.

Hon. Edward Everett is sufficiently restored to health to be able to attend to his duties in Congress.

THEATRE.—Mr. and Mrs. J. Barnes are engaged and will appear in the early part of the coming week.

To Correspondents.—We have examined the communication of 'A Brother;' and on reflection, have come to the conclusion that its publicity would be productive of more harm than good: it would lead to an uninteresting and profitless controversy. We respect the motives of our brother, but think he is unnecessarily alarmed.

Erratum.—In Magical Table, 28d line, of figures, 2d column, for the second '48' read 46.

THE WREATH.

[From the Lady's Book.]
WINTER.

I come, I come for the year is old:
And the fields have doffed their mantle of gold,
And tilting down from the shaking tree,
The blushing leaf falls willingly.

Droops to old Ocean the weary sun,
Ere the last of his radiant course has run;
And the early shadows of evening gray;
Close the bright round of the shorten'd day.

I come with my snow flake, spotless white,
With my frosty chain for the water bright,
With my pendants of diamonds for bush and tree,
And the cricket chirping so cheerily.

I come with the shouts of the festive throng
With the merry tale and the Christmas song,
With the laugh of the young, as the stocking pours
The torrent rich of its sugar'd stores.

I peep through the pane at the blazing hearth,
At the smile of age, and at childhood's mirth,
At the crowning babe, the applauding sire,
The steaming urn, and the cheerful fire—

At the blushing maid and the happy swain,
Seated apart from the merry scene,
While soft as the coo of the amorous dove,
Their whispered breathings tell of love.

I come with my mantle of feathery snow;
And breathe on the chilly pane as I go,
Till ruined tower and icy tree
On the frosty window tell of me.

But the whole of my fairy work is done,
When, from chariot bright, the blessed sun
Casts his warm glances on rill and brae,
Till the gladsome waters burst away,

Then buds the young leaflet, the gay birds sing.
Earth dons her green mantle to welcome the Spring—
Young Zephyr on flowery sweets reposes,
And wild bees sport mid the new born roses.

COME, LET US TRIP IT LIGHTLY LOVE.

BY S. WOODWORTH.

Come; let us trip it lightly, love,
Where Flora's sweets are blending;
The moon is beaming brightly, love,
With starry lamps attending.
The grove and hill, the mead and rill,
Have charms that must delight thee;
Then let us haste, their sweets to taste,
While zephyrs sighs unite thee;
An hour like this imparts a bliss
To souls of kindred feeling;
A pure delight, serenely bright,
Along the pulses stealing.

The evening star is peeping love,
From yonder paler cluiter,
The glassy lake is sleeping, love,
Enriched with borrowed lustre;
The babbling brook, with brighter look,
Meanders through the dingle;
The chirping notes, from insects throats,
In tuneless measure mingle.
An hour like this; which wakes to bliss
The hearts of meaner creatures,
Must surely light a smile as bright
On love's expressive features.

BASE CALUMNY REFUTED.

The following official answer of the Masonic Lodge in the county of Rensselaer, must put to rest the idle-headed, if not wicked, calumnies lately sent forth by the New York Commercial Advertiser. Col. Stone, its editor, seems to possess a prevailing passion, or infirmity, for misrepresentation. The practice of silent prudence in preference to loquacious folly might well be commended to his observance. If his virtue has not lost itself in his interests, a candid acknowledgement of his error may be confidently looked for.

The Troy Budget says, 'the article which the committee of Apollo Lodge have published must settle the question beyond controversy. The evidence they have adduced is conclusive. There is no escape from it. So also is the statement of the committee themselves. None can gainsay it. Where they are known their veracity cannot be questioned. They are all well known in this vicinity, as men of high respectability, and of unimpeachable integrity. It will not be believed in the community for a single moment, that they, or either of them, would publicly or privately lend their names to the sanction of an untruth. On political subjects, they entertain various opinions, and we well know that they have opposed each other in every political contest during the last three years.'

TO THE PUBLIC.

The New-York Commercial Advertiser of Nov. 16th, contains an accusation against the Masonic Fraternity, in this section of the State, in which the Lodges in Rensselaer county are especially referred to. The editor professes to speak from his own knowledge, and publishes the charges as the fruit of his inquiries on a 'flying trip' to this region, which he made for the express purpose of gathering information, and ascertaining the correctness of his own conjectures. The charge has been eagerly seized on and echoed by other papers. Under such circumstances it was deemed worthy of public notice; and at a meeting of Apollo Lodge, No. 49, held in the city of Troy, on the 23d day of November, the undersigned were appointed a committee to investigate its truth in reference to every lodge in the county of Rensselaer. We have performed that duty. The committee have had an opportunity of making personal inquiry on the subject of officers of some of the lodges, and to the Master of each of the other lodges in the county a letter, of which the following is a copy was addressed by our order:

Troy, Nov. 24, 1830.

Dear Sir: In the New York Commercial Advertiser of the 16th inst. an article appeared, that you may perhaps have seen, in which there is a charge that the lodges in this county engaged in the last election in their Masonic character—that Masons adjusted their electioneering plans 'in lodges,' and 'directed the secrecy, which covers their proceedings, to the dark work of political management and intrigue.' As far as Apollo Lodge is concerned, the charge is utterly false, and I presume it is equally so in relation to every other lodge in the county. We are of opinion, in Troy, that some notice should be taken of an allegation so direct and pointed, and appearing in a paper which has not heretofore been ranked as antimasonic. At a meeting of our lodge therefore, last evening, a committee was appointed to correspond with all the lodges in the county, and make a public statement of facts, on the subject, as soon as their answers shall be received. We would request the favor of you to inform us whether the charge in the Commercial Advertiser is in any degree true, as applied to your lodge—and whether, in any one of your lodge meetings, the subject of election was ever, in any way, mentioned or alluded to. By order of the committee.

JOHN D. WILLARD, Chairman

On account of the absence of one or two of the gentlemen to whom the above circular was addressed, it did not reach them till the present week. We have now received answers from every lodge, but think it unnecessary to publish them at length. We annex the reply of Col. Howard, of Stephentown, who is at present Master of the lodge in that place—it is a fair specimen of the tenor of them all.

Stephentown, Nov. 26, 1830.

Dear Sir—I have just received yours of the 24th inst. and yesterday, for the first time, I saw the article in the Commercial Advertiser, to which it refers. I do not know whether I felt more of indignation or surprise at reading the charge, which that article contains; and in reply to your question, I answer distinctly and positively, that, as applying to our lodge, it is totally untrue, and that the subject of election was never in any way mentioned or alluded to in any meeting of our lodge. As individuals, the Freemasons of Stephentown will exercise their right of supporting such candidates for office as they think proper; but as Freemasons, they never have had, and they never will have, any thing to do with politics—the door of the lodge shuts out all political discussions. I have been a member of Friendship Lodge for more than seventeen years and in that time have been Master six or seven years; I have attended every lodge meeting for three years past; and in all the time that I have belonged to the lodge, I never heard the most remote allusion, in lodge meeting, to any political subject. I have also attended frequently the Grand lodge of this State, and Grand Chapter, and many subordinate lodges and chapters in this State and elsewhere; I think I know something of Masons and Masonry; and I should be as much surprised to hear a political discussion in a lodge of Freemasons, as I should to see a clergyman dancing in the aisle of a church. I am yours respectfully,

NATHAN HOWARD.

JOHN D. WILLARD, Esq.

From each of the lodges in the country, a reply has been received as distinct and explicit as the above; and each of them contains a positive answer in the negative to the questions that were proposed. As relates to our lodge it will be sufficient to state that the last meeting before the election, was held on the first Tuesday of September, and neither at that meeting, nor at any one previous, was the subject of election in any way referred to. We therefore pronounce the charge in the Commercial Advertiser of the 16th November, in reference to the lodges in Rensselaer county, utterly untrue in every particular, and in all its parts; and there is no fact or circumstance which could, in the slightest degree, authorize, or justify, or furnish a shadow of foundation for such a report.

The fraternity, to which it is our pride to belong, is a social and benevolent institution, embracing within its pale men of every religious faith, and of all political persuasions. The principles of equality, which it inculcates, are doubtless favorable in their tendency, to the growth and perpetuity of republican institutions; but political discussions are, by the very tenets of our order, excluded from every lodge. As Freemasons, we have nothing to do with political subjects. But, in connecting ourselves with the order, we have not relinquished, or forgotten our rights and duties as citizens and men, and in these latter characters, until we are utterly disfranchised and deprived of our privileges by the forms of law, we shall continue hereafter as we have done heretofore, to give our support openly and fearlessly, to those candidates for public office, whose election, in our opinion, will best promote the public good.

13th Woman—Exercising the only dominion that never requires reform.

After the regular toasts were through, many volunteers were given. We have room only for the following.

VOLUNTEERS.

By Wm. Greene, Esq.—Liberty: Liberty spread every where over the face of the earth:—That sort of Liberty, the essential principle of which is VIRTUE:—May its spirit animate all Governments wherever existing, whether administered by PRIESTS, KINGS, or Presidents.

By Allison Owen (master of the ceremonies.)—The memory of our late Grand Marshal, Christian Carson Febriger.

The following toast was transmitted by the Hon. Edward King of Chillicothe, an invited guest:

The Lafayette Lodge of Cincinnati—Proud may it be of its fellowship with that distinguished individual, who has consecrated his life to the arduous struggles of liberty against oppression, of good order against misrule, and of political freedom against despotic exactions.

By E. P. Langdon—Masonry, when compared with the various societies and institutions of men, is like the Lamb amongst the whole tribe of animals that inhabit the earth.

By an absent Friend—Lafayette. The 'Flag Ship' of Liberty: it has 'weathered' three of the 'longest gales' that ever blew, and now 'rides' triumphant over the 'foundered craft' of despotism and tyranny.

By J. F. Conover.—Freedom political, literary, and religious. The War of 1812 demonstrated that Americans will maintain it for themselves—the American youth at Paris, who so nobly fought during the memorable 'three days' proved that Americans will also maintain it for their friends.

By Mr. Maguire.—Lafayette; his rising glory in '76—meridian in '89—and refulgent in July, 1830.

By R. T. Lytle (W. Master of Lafayette Lodge.) The catalogue of worthies whose names adorn the Rolls of our Order—Masonry may point to them with pride, and say, as the mother of the Gracii, said of her sons 'These are my jewels!'

By G. Graham—The memory of Kosciusko, Pulaski, De Kalb, and Steuben: The advocates of free principles, and the general benefactors of mankind. [All Masons.]

By B. Drake—The Lafayette Lodge of Cincinnati.—Whilst it bears the name of the venerable hero of three Revolutions, it will never need the spirit of ant Masonry to preserve its integrity.

By R. Gilbert—Our Brother, Gilbert Mortier, the Marquis Fayette: Once the prisoner of Olmutz, now the hero of two continents, royalty is dimmed in his presence and the crown dependent on his fiat, may he die in the blaze of his glory and ascend to the heaven of heavens.

By Griffen Yeatman—The words of Washington at his parting with Lafayette: 'You have served an apprenticeship to liberty; you may now go to France and set up for yourself.'

By a Guest—Washington and Franklin: Pressman and Composer of the work of the American Revolution, the former worked off the enemies of Independence, the latter aided in composing those lines which form the basis of the liberties we enjoy.

During the evening, Messrs. Graham, R. Lytle, and Conover, addressed eloquent and feeling remarks to the company, prefatory to the sentiments offered by them.—Mr. Lytle, Master of Lafayette Lodge, explained the history of Lafayette's connexion with the Lodge, and the reason why its members became active on the present occasion.

The company remained until a late hour, and separated pleased with the proceedings of the meeting.

MODERN PERSECUTION.

We will put down Masonry by the sword, if we cannot put it down without.—JACOB HALL.

NO. I.

Probably there never was, in any country, nor in any age, a political spectacle more singular than that which is involved under the name of Antimasonry. We say involved under that name; because whatever may have been its origin, or whatever may now be its ostensible objects, its purposes lie beyond the correction of supposed injuries and magnified dangers; and, wherever its insidious poison shall have insinuated itself into the political system it will corrupt and destroy every desirable feature of that system.

It is said that all secret societies are injurious to the public welfare—that the Masonic Institution is a secret society—and, therefore, that its operations are injurious. Besides, it is inferred that Masonry has its political influences; that its result must be, to produce party predictions and preferences. Now all this is taken for granted—is boldly put forth as a matter not to be controverted.

Without stopping here to comment on the folly of such a supposition, turn, for a moment, to that very body of men who make those solemn and grave charges. Is not Antimasonry itself a political combination, operating both publicly and secretly, to effect its exclusive objects?—Where is the honesty, where the integrity of that man, who charges upon a body of his fellow citizens a design of combining, in secret, to accomplish political purposes, and, at the same time, is engrossed, day and night, in private assemblies, devising and discussing the surest means to obtain the object of his own or of his exclusive friend's political ambition? Antimasons hold their District, Town, County, State and National meetings, avowedly for political purposes. They have their regular organization of political committees; and come to the polls with their political lists, ornamented with the more than equivocal talisman of 'Antimasonic ticket.' Where, we repeat, is the integrity of that man, who puts into the ballot-box a written contradiction to his own words—a libel to his own veracity! It was reserved for that combination of men, called Antimasons, to exhibit to the world this political paradox. It is indeed a distinction of some notoriety; and its merits shall have full operation, until its participants shall sink into obscurity and forgetfulness.

It is entirely certain, that no combination of men can long exist, unless its basis are founded on correct principles. And it is just as certain, that an Institution based on correct principles will long survive the ordinary changes of human affairs. For these reasons, we believe that the unprincipled coalition of Antimasonry, is not destined to sustain more than a very brief existence. And it is for these reasons, we have no doubt that the Institution of Masonry will long outlive the persecution of the present day. If the members are true to themselves and the Institution, it will most assuredly outlive even the enmity of its persecutors.

It remains, therefore, with the friends of Masonry, and not with its enemies, to say whether it shall endure. It must need meet with contumely, and reproach, and persecution. Some of its members will fall away, and, becoming corrupt and abandoned, will endeavor to hide themselves in the ranks of the enemy. We wish them no worse punishment than their own reflections. Their final accountability is with their Creator—and to Him, in his justice and mercy, we humbly leave them.

The Ontario Phoenix says that the 'budding fruit of Antimasonry has been blasted by the sirocco breeze of the Albany Daily.' If this be so, we thank heaven that we have lived so long. If we have blasted the budding of that which has already produced such deleterious and unhappy consequences in families and in society, we have done that for which we can most sincerely rejoice. If the bud bring such consequences, happy is it for the country that it never unfolded, and that its fruits did not become ripe.

ANTIMASONIC CONVENTION.

Of all the farces, that were ever played by men of common capacity and decency, that which was enacted, by what was called the antimasonic Convention on Wednesday, was most sublimely ridiculous. The whole affair would disgrace the reputation of a Venetian conspiracy—and in all that is foolish, idle, stale, flat and unprofitable, the proceedings of the insignificant Convention in question, take precedence.

The leaders of the antimasonic party, directed, the last summer, that delegates doubling the legislative delegation of the several towns in the State, should be chosen, and, on the morning of Wednesday, they boasted that two hundred delegates would be present; but when the Convention was called together, not fifty individuals presented themselves, including delegates and spectators.

After some considerable delay, Doctor Benjamin Case of Newport was chosen chairman—and a most shocking case did he make of it—and Anson Potter a hickory quaker, and Peter Briggs, were elected vice Presidents, to aid and assist the Dr., in the discharge of his awfully, solemn, and most extraordinarily responsible duties. Our young friend Walter Paine, was chosen Secretary, to the great discomfiture of John S. Harris, who expected the office and who on being informed that he could not enact the Secretary, wiped his nose, and muttered damnation.

The Reverend Benjamin F. Hallett, one of the most temperate, pious, and apostolic individuals of the age, acted a part of engrocer, and reader and spouter, assisted by Daniel Mowry, who on the occasion, for the first time this season, pulled off his fur cap, and made his obsequiousness to the illustrious assemblage. Parson Bernard's book was read;—the antimasonic almanack was produced, and after the Convention had wept most copiously, they wiped away their tears with the tail of a shirt which once belonged to Master Billy Morgan.

The Convention then began to speechify, and make big eyes at St. John's Lodge—then the Reverend Doctor Hallett, sang a monody written by himself on the abduction of Billy Morgan, set to music by John S. Harris and Isaac Wilkinson, accompanied by a jewsharp, played by Squire Titus, of Scituate. The meeting now adjourned; and the members took a drop of 'Barbers' best,' furnished by a distinguished individual; eat their crackers and cheese, and at six o'clock met again. At the second meeting they went to work, tooth and nail, to rip up Masonic Lodges; a petition to the General Assembly was drawn up, praying that body to demolish the lodges in that State, and to pull all the Masonic noses in the Union. The Reverend Doctor Hallett, was appointed one of the committee to procure signatures to the petition; and to get the people of this state to avow in effect, that every Mason in Rhode Island is a cut throat and a swindler, a drunkard and a knave, and that Benjamin F. Hallett is a saint, and an honest man, worthy of all respect, confidence and christian love and fellowship.

This convention, if it is entitled to that name, was composed of a most incongruous material—it was a mixed medley—a shocking concern too contemptible to be laughed at—too weak to be pitied—and too harmless to create any other feeling than that of absolute disgust.

Not content with disgracing itself, it had the hardihood to disgrace others, and the unblushing effrontery to nominate JOHN BROWN FRANCIS their candidate for Governor, and PELEG WILBOUR a senator! Thus has ended the farce; the subject is unworthy of any one's notice, and as we are mad with ourselves that we have noticed it, we dash away our pen, and leave it to receive the execration and eternal contempt of every honest high minded, and respectable citizen.—[Providence Lit. MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

[From the Boston Mech. Magazine.]

THE AIR PUMP SIMPLIFIED.

TO BE USED BOTH FOR EXHAUSTING AND CONDENSING.

Made by Codman and Claxton.—Boston.

This pump may be used either for exhausting or condensing, and besides being useful for all the experiments with common air it may be used for transferring gases from one vessel to another.

It consists, first, of a table made of mahogany, twenty-two inches square, with four legs resting on the floor; its height is several inches above that of the lecturing table; in the centre of the table a hole is cut, three inches diameter, for the admission of the pump barrel. The machinery of the pump is as follows:—one barrel, two inches internal diameter, and eight and a half inches long, a ground brass plate, ten inches diameter, is attached to one end of the barrel,—this plate rests on the top of the table, and the barrel projects through the hole before described. The piston is worked by a lever of the second order, having its fulcrum in the back leg of the table; this lever is attached to the piston rod by two vibrating rods, which assists in preserving the piston and rod in a direct line, coincident with the centre of the barrel.

The lever and handle is shown in figure 2, part of it being hid in the perspective drawing. On the table another ground plate, five inches diameter, is placed by the side of the plate mentioned above; a brass tube passes from this small plate to the pump barrel, and is inserted just below the valve which is situated near the top of the barrel. This valve opens downwards. There is another valve in the tube opening towards the small plate, and the piston is a solid one without a valve.

The mode of operation is as follows.—Place a receiver on the large plate; depress the piston, and the air will pass through by the valve into the barrel. In raising the piston the air is forced through the tube, and by another valve, when it escapes at the centre of the small plate, so that exhausting is performed by using the large plate, and condensing by using the small one; and no alteration in the pump is necessary, in changing from the one to the other. There is a screw by the side of the large plate to admit the air into the receiver, and another screw by the side of the small plate to allow the condensed air to escape. One of the valves may be got at by unscrewing a brass piece in the centre of the large plate.—The valve is attached to the under side of this brass piece. It is covered with a little cup to retain the oil, and keep the valve moist,—the other valve may be repaired by unscrewing the small plate. There is a cup screwed to the lower end of the barrel to prevent the oil from running down to the floor. The opening at A, fig. 1, is for a draw to contain the small articles used with the pump. It will be necessary to hang a weight of thirty or fifty pounds to the cross piece at B, this will keep the frame very steady. C is a bridle, with a screw, to hold down the condensing receiver.

SAFETY PUMP.

For detecting and removing the noxious gas found in wells. Invented by the Rev. J. F. Schroeder.

Having particularly examined into the advantages that may result from this improved pump, it being given to the world without an application for a patent, or any reward whatever, by its scientific, ingenious and humane inventor, we cheerfully recommend it to the notice of our citizens. It may be useful for ventilating sick rooms, churches and crowded assemblies, by constantly pouring into them a current of fresh air,* and expelling at the same time that which is impure and rendered unhealthy and offensive by being breathed through the lungs of the audience.

A new well in the rear of Union Church, at the northeast corner of Orange and Spring sts. in this city, [New York] was infected with a most deadly gas. On Friday, July 16th, a man attempting to descend into it, was instantly deprived of life; and a few moments afterward, another shared the same miserable fate, in an attempt to rescue his unfortunate companion.—On the following Tuesday morning, the Rev. Mr. Schroeder, in company with some friends, visited the melancholy scene of the calamity. They found the well, by actual measurement, to be thirty-nine feet deep. On lowering a lighted candle into it, the flame, when it was six feet from the surface of the earth, was suddenly extinguished. Impure air, it was inferred, occupied the remaining space of thirty-three feet below.

* It has been found better to remove the noxious gas from wells, mines, and sick rooms, &c. not by forcing pure air into them, but by pumping out the foul air, by placing the end of the inhaling pipe where the gas was most impure. In a well this pipe should extend to the bottom, (as it did in the present case;) but in a room the air is most impure at the top, of course it should be allowed to escape as high up as possible, by having the windows to slide from the top, or by an opening in the ceiling. In coal mines there are generally two kinds of noxious gases, carbonic acid gas (choke damp) at the bottom, and hydrogen gas (fire damp) at the top; the common air occupies the middle stratum. If only one pump is used to remove these, the inhaling pipe should have two branches, one terminating at the bottom and the other at the top of the mine; when the noxious air is removed, pure air will find its way by its own gravity.—[Ed. Mech. Mag.]

We have republished the foregoing article for the purpose of introducing the note by the editor of the Mec. Magazine, which we presume will prove interesting.

POWERFUL MAGNET.

An ingenious mechanic in this town, Mr. David Pearson, has discovered a method of making magnets, much more powerful than those hitherto in use. They are finished in the most elegant manner, and he communicates to them their extraordinary power, without the use of loadstone or any other magnet. He has made one weighing six pounds and four ounces, which sustained, when first charged, more than twelve times its own weight. Another magnet, weighing eight pounds, sustained a weight of 142 1-2 pounds for more than a month, and the weight was then separated only by a person climbing upon it. The great magnet in the Philadelphia Museum weighs 53 pounds, and its 'permanent maximum' is stated to be 134 pounds, about two and a half times its own weight. The Lynn Magnet sustains a body nearly eighteen times its own weight, and is therefore more than seven times as powerful.

Mr. Pearson has discovered that Magnetism is an extremely subtle fluid, disseminated thro' the earth, and acting with a tendency nearly parallel to the meridian. Its fluidity is proved by the fact that it can be communicated through glass, paper, and other substances, without any absolute contact. He remarks that he can coat the needle with tin, and afterward convey to it the magnetic power, so as effectually to secure it from ever rusting at sea. Some years ago Mr. Pearson obtained a patent for an improved Printing Press, and another for his rudder-slide, which have proved of so great utility in steering vessels. He was also the inventor of the famous machine for cutting brads for which a patent was obtained by Mr. Jacob Perkins, of Newburyport, the place where Mr. Pearson was born. These discoveries and improvements certainly entitle Mr. Pearson to be ranked among the benefactors of his time. He has gone beyond Dr. Godwin Knight, the original inventor of artificial magnets.—[Lynn Mirror.]

SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION.

A correspondent of the Troy Sentinel, relates the occurrence of several cases of spontaneous combustion.

While repairing the tow boats, large quantities of pitch and rosin are used, mixed with a quantity of coarse whale oil, to pay the seams and decks.

The kettle used is carried remote from the fire: the workmen apply this hot cement with a small mop made of woollen yarn. In one instance the mop took fire while in the hands of the workmen; in two instances they took fire lying on deck; and in another, the mop was placed against a pile of boards, when the men went to breakfast, in about half an hour the mop took fire from spontaneous combustion, and communicated fire to the pile of boards:—considerable exertion was necessary to extinguish the flames.

PASTE FROM HORSE CHEENUTS.

A German shoemaker has introduced the use of a paste made from horse cheenuts. The nuts are peeled, cut in pieces, well washed and dried; then bruised in a mortar, and boiled in the usual manner into paste, with water.

THE BOQUET.

For the Mirror.

THE DEATH OF ADONIS.

Extract from a translation of the First Idyllium of BION.

The death of fair Adonis I deplore,
The lovely youth Adonis is no more!
Ah! Venus! never more in purple rest,
For mournful sable change the flowery vest;
Thy beauteous bosom beat, thy loss deplore
Aloud with sighs, Adonis is no more!
For the lov'd youth these copious tears I shed,
And all the Cupids mourn Adonis dead.
Methinks I see him on the mountain lie,
The boar's keen tusk has pierced his tender thigh;
Well'ring he lies expiring on the ground,
And near him Venus all in sorrow drown'd;
I see the crimson flood fast trickling flow
Down his white skin that vies with winter snow;
I see the lustre of his eyes decay,
And on his lips the roses fade away.
Yet who can Venus from those lips divide,
Though their sweet kisses with Adonis died?
To Venus sweet, e'en now his breath is fled,
Yet all her kisses cannot warm the dead.
The fate of fair Adonis I deplore;
The Loves lament, Adonis is no more!
A deep wide wound is in his thigh imprest,
But Venus bears a deeper in her breast.
His beagles round a mournful howling keep;
And all the Dryads of the mountains weep;
But Venus, quite abandoned to despair,
Her locks dishevell'd, and her face all bare,
Flies through the thorny brake, the briery wood,
And stains the thickets with her sacred blood.
With piercing cries Adonis she bewails,
Her darling youth, along the winding vales;
While the blood, starting from his wounded thigh,
Streams on his breast, and leaves a crimson dye.
The mountains mourn, the waving woods bewail,
And rivers roll lamenting through the vale;
The silver springs descend in streams of woe
Down the high hills, and murmur as they flow;
And every flower in drooping grief appears
Depress'd, and languishingly drown'd in tears;
While Venus o'er the hills and valleys flies,
And 'Ah, Adonis is no more,' she cries.
(Along the hills and vales and vocal shore, Echo repeats, 'Adonis is no more.')
Soon as she saw him wounded on the plain,
His thigh discoloured with the crimson stain,
Sighing she said, and clasped him as he lay,
'O stay, dear hapless youth! for Venus stay!
'Our breasts once more let close embraces join,
'And let me press my glowing lips to thine.
'Raise, lov'd Adonis, raise thy drooping head,
'And kiss me ere thy parting breath be fled,
'The last fond token of affection give,
'O kiss thy Venus, while the kisses live;
'Till in my breast I draw thy lingering breath,
'And with my lips imbibe thy love in death.
'This farewell kiss, which sorrowing thus I take,
'I'll keep forever for Adonis' sake.
'Why didst thou urge the chase, and rashly dare
'To encounter beasts, thyself so wondrous fair!
Thus Venus mourn'd, and tears incessant shed,
And all the Loves bewailed Adonis dead.
As many drops of blood as from the wound
Of fair Adonis, trickled on the ground,
So many tears she shed in copious showers;
Both tears and drops of blood were turn'd to flowers.
From these in crimson beauty sprung the rose,
Corulean bright anemones from those.
Clad in a purple robe Adonis lies;

Surrounding Cupids heave their breasts with sighs,
Their locks they shear, excessive grief to show,
They spurn the quiver, and they break the bow.
No more are joyful hymeneals sung,
But notes of sorrow dwell on every tongue;
While all around the general grief partake
For lov'd Adonis, and for Hymen's sake.
With loud laments the Graces all deplore,
And cry 'the fair Adonis is no more.'
The Muses wailing the wild woods among,
Strive to recall him with harmonious song.
Alas! no sounds of harmony he hears,
For cruel Proserpine has closed his ears.
Cease, Venus, cease, thy soft complaints forbear,
Reserve thy sorrow for the mournful year.

NOTES.

1st. The time appointed for mourning for the dead, among the ancients was ten months, which was originally the year of both the Greeks and Romans.

2d. The anniversary of the death of Adonis was celebrated through the whole Pagan world. The ancients differ greatly in their accounts of this Divinity. Plutarch maintains that, he and Bacchus are the same; and that the Jews abstained from swine's flesh, because Adonis was killed by a boar. Ausonius, in epigram 30, affirms that, Bacchus, Osiris, and Adonis are one and the same. Langhorne.

3d. Ovid makes Venus institute this festival.—Metamorph. Book 10, at the end.

luctus monumenta manebunt
Semper, Adoni, mei, repetitaque mortis imago
Annua plangoris peragat simulamina nostri.

4th. The custom of catching the parting-breath may be compared with the 65 and 66 verses above, 'till in my breast,' &c. See a beautiful complaint made by the mother of Euryalus, in the Æniad of Virgil, Book 9, verse 486—

nec te tua funera mater
Produxi, pressive oculos, aut vulnera lavi, &c.

5th. 'In crimson beauty sprung the rose,' &c. Some authors say that anemones, and not roses sprung from the blood of Adonis. See Ovid's Metamorph. Book 10, at the end.

6th. All the beauties and graces that can possibly embellish a poem of this nature, are united in this delicate Idyllium of Bion; and therefore the most polite scholars, and the best critics of every age have deservedly esteemed it one of the finest and most perfect remains of antiquity.

7th. The poet Bion was a native of Smyrna, and lived about 300 years before Christ; 300 after Sappho, and 250 after Anacreon. Like Homer, who is supposed to have been born near the same place, Bion is said to have been the son of the river Meles; and this river, by after poets, is personified to mourn their deaths. Moschus, a cotemporary and probably disciple of Bion, in his Idyllium on the death of Bion, writes—

Meles! of streams in melody the chief,
Now heaves thy bosom with another grief;
Thy Homer died, great master of the song,
Thy Homer died, the Muses sweetest tongue;
Then did thy waves in plaintive murmurs weep,
And roll thy swelling sorrows to the deep.
Another son demands the meed of woe,
Again thy waters weep in long-drawn murmurs flow.
Dear to the fountains was each tuneful son,
This drank of Arethuse, that Helicon.

He sung Atrides' and Achilles' ire,
And the fair dame that set the world on fire.
This formed his numbers on a softer plan,
And chanted shepherds' loves, and peaceful Pan.
O hapless Bion! Poison was thy fate;
The baneful potion circumscribed thy date.
How could fell poison cause effect so strange,
Touch thy sweet lips, and not to honey change?
But soon just vengeance will the wretch pursue, &c.

How this poison was administered, or for what cause, is not now known, but probably by the command of some great man, or despot, in revenge for some ungrateful song of the Poet.

IDYLLIUM II. OF BION.

CUPID AND THE FOWLER.

A youth, once fowling in a shady grove,
On a tall box-tree spied the God of Love,
Perch'd like a beauteous bird; with sudden joy
At sight so noble leap'd the simple boy.
With eager expedition he prepares
His choicest twigs, his bird-lime and his snares;
And in a neighb'ring covert smiled to see
How here and there he skip'd, and hop'd from tree to tree.

When long in vain he waited to betray
The God, enraged he flung his twigs away;
And to a ploughman near, an ancient man,
Of whom he learn'd his art, the youngster ran,
Told the strange story, while he held his plough.
The grave old ploughman archly shook his head,
Smiled at the simple boy, and thus he said;
'Cease, cease, my son, this dangerous sport give o'er,
'Fly far away, and chase that bird no more;
'Blest should you fail to catch him! Hence away!
'That bird, believe me, is a bird of prey.
'Though now he seems to shun you all he can,
'Yet, soon as time shall lead you up to man,
'He'll spread his fluttering pinions o'er your breast,
'Perch on your brow, and in your bosom nest.'

RULES FOR SINGING AT CHURCH.

1. A man who sings at church, should always make a noise as loud as common thunder, and not bury his talents in a napkin: the more of a good thing the better.

2. If he sings tenor, he should as often sing through his nose as his mouth: he takes wind in at both passages, and why not send it out at both?

3. The nasal twang is so much the better, because it resembles the hautboy stop on the organ.

4. Besides, it is doing equal justice to make the mouth and nose both officiate at the same time.

5. If he sings bass, let him sing it with a vengeance; and if he cannot sing right let him sing wrong; but at all events put his shoulders to the work, and—bellow away.

6. He should never trouble himself about correctly pronouncing the words of the psalm or hymn: 'words are but wind,' and not only so, who can pronounce the words with his nose?

7. But if the singer chooses to pronounce the words, he should do it with a flourish and a sort of whirlwind in the mouth; in this manner they become magnified and circumvolved, and beautifully confused; there is no danger in all this; for they have already travelled once round the meeting-house.

An observance of these simple rules will vastly improve our church music.

LITERARY.

LIVING WRITERS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

NO. II.

Very few of us know any thing of such a person as Edwin Atherstone. Yet in his own country the author of the fall of Nineveh and the Midsummer Day's Dream is highly esteemed, and is possessed of a pleasing reputation. The latter poem was his first publication, his fall of Nineveh is a later work. Both these evince genius, and abound with dignity of thought and tenderness of feeling.

There is Mr. Anderson, a writer of biography and criticism, Mr. Ainsworth a writer of tales, and Captain Andrews, the traveller, of whom we also know very little. The fame of the Rev. Archibald Alison, the author of the celebrated work on taste, two volumes of sermons, and the memoirs of Lord Woodhouselee, will scarcely require a notice from us. Wherever the eloquence of the pulpit and the sound principles of criticism are regarded, the name of Alison will be pronounced with praise.

Doctor Arnott, a writer on natural philosophy, is well known in this country. His Elements of Physics have gone through several editions in England and one in America. This work is an admirable exposition of the laws of physics, and it has only one fault, that of making science too easy, and of bringing its admirable principles within the grasp of an idle contemplation.

Joanna Baillie has a reputation of much greater extent. It is the fame which attends genius rather than utility. She is the daughter of an eminent Scotch divine, the Rev. James Baillie, and the sister to Dr. Matthew Baillie, an eminent physician, who died in 1828. This lady as early as 1793; published her plays of the passions. She took for each play a single passion, and illustrated its character with dramatic effect. As is often the fate of genius, she met with the most unfair, and illiberal criticisms: her works were decried, and she was treated with but little kindness, notwithstanding her claims as a woman and a writer of talent. But the hour of trial soon passed away, and Joanna Baillie became the favorite of a discriminating public. Her celebrated play of De Montfort, has afforded her admirers a complete triumph, and those who live on the fame of others, a fine source of illustration and a fund of anecdote.

She published a second volume in 1802, a third in 1812, and, since then, several miscellaneous plays, and a collection of metrical legends of eminent characters.

Her works however, are rather for the closet than the stage. When De Montfort came out, Mr. Kemble was resolved to try its effects on the stage. Mrs. Siddons took the character of Lady Jane, and he that of De Montfort. The architectural scenery was of the most magnificent kind.—The famous Duchess of Devonshire wrote an epilogue and Frederick North a prologue to ensure its success. But though it had run, to use a theatrical phrase, for eleven nights, it was found unfit for representation.

It was the opinion of Mr. Southey, that her Basil is superior to Romeo and Juliet. Remorse, Bertram, and Fazio have been more fortunate in the representation than De Montfort was, and are frequently performed at the principal theatres.

The genius of Miss Baillie is of a metaphysical cast. She speculates profoundly upon all the motives which influence the mind and seems able to probe its deepest, deadliest wounds with skill and success.

Miss Baillie's poetic talent is also much admired, and some of her pieces are considered standard productions. Upon good authority, we give the following lines to Cupid, as fair specimens of her poetry.

Child, with many a childish wile,
Timid look and blushing smile,
Downy wings to steal thy way,
Gilded bow and quiver gay,
Who, in thy simple mien, would trace,
The Tyrant of the human race?

Who is he, whose flinty heart
Hath not felt the flying dart?
Who is he that, from the wound
Hath not the pain and pleasure found?
Who is he that hath not shed
Curse and blessing on thy head?

Many of our readers have probably heard the beautiful glee of the Chough and the row, in the opera of Guy Mannering, the words of which, so observedly admired, are also from the pen of this gifted lady.—[Albany Daily Advertiser.]

MISCELLANY.

THE KNIGHTS OF SAINT PATRICK.

In compliance with a request of an esteemed friend, we present to our readers, a sketch of the history and a detail of the rules and ceremonies of the order of the Knights of Saint Patrick. In September, 1782, the earl of the Temple succeeded the duke of Portland, as lord lieutenant of Ireland. This nobleman, who had then just married the only daughter of the patriotic Irish peer earl Nugent, was received, on his landing in Dublin, with the warmest greetings of welcome, as his connexion with one of the most popular noblemen in the kingdom enlisted for him the generous prepossessions of all the liberal parties in Ireland. The flame of enthusiasm, which was then kindled by the attainments of legislative independence, extorted, from the British ministers for Ireland, by the irresistible eloquence of Grattan, Flood, and other illustrious coadjutors in the Irish parliament, pervaded every heart of patriotic feeling and national sympathy. The viceroy and his amiable and beautiful consort, highly gratified at the warmth of their reception, declared that the most munificent patronage should be given to the Dublin manufacturers; and that the lord lieutenant was firmly resolved to employ the most active efforts to promote the happiness, concord, and prosperity of the Irish people. His short administration afforded a signal proof of the sincerity of his professions.—In the true spirit of liberality, which so laudably actuated him, to the advancement of the interests of the citizens of Dublin, and in the lively wish of elevating the national consequences to a luminous acme of grandeur, he instituted a new order of knighthood, called 'the illustrious Knights of St. Patrick.' By letters patent his majesty and his heirs, and successors, were to be sovereigns, and the lord lieutenant for the time being, was to preside as grand master. His Royal Highness, prince Edward, (late duke of Kent,) the duke of Leinster, the earls of Clanricarde, Antrim, Westmeath, Inchiquin, Drogheda, Tyrone, Shannon, Clanbrassel, Mornington, Courtown, Charlemont, Bective, and Ely, were nominated companions of the order. On the 11th of March, 1783, the knights were invested before the lord lieutenant in St. Patrick's hall at the castle, with all the imposing pomp and solemnity of chivalry—and on the 17th of March, (St. Patrick's day) their installation, which displayed a scene of gorgeous magnificence and splendor of pageantry, that resembled an oriental spectacle, took place in the cathedral of St. Patrick. As all the ladies that attended this grand and memorable ceremonial, wore Irish silks, the benefit derived by the citizens of Dublin, was immense. The present number of knight's companions are fifteen. We were present, in St. Patrick's cathedral, when the earl of Fingal, was installed a knight of the order by his late majesty George IV. We have already, in our description of St. Patrick's cathedral, given a sketch of the vast assemblage which the ceremonial collected on the occasion; yet it may, however, be acceptable to our readers, to have here a brief detail of the manner which the knights are invested with the order. All that taste could invent—that art could execute, or wealth could procure, seemed to be united in this splendid spectacle.—The genius of magnificence seemed to have presided over the dazzling scene, magic was in her train, and at her command shed over it the most radiant glories of enchantment; as the tout ensemble presenting the beauty and chivalry of Ireland was so novel, so various, and so beautifully attractive, as to impress the spectator, with the conviction that fancy, after having exhausted all her power in getting up the pageant, broke her wand, in the utter despair of being ever again able to conjure up anything equal to this sublime effort of her power. The long extended, pillared aisles, crowded with elegantly attired ladies, whose white waving plumes resembled the undulating foliage of a grove of silk cotton trees; the prelacy of Ireland crowned with their glittering mitres, and occupying purple draped stalls before the high altar, on the steps of which was enthroned the archbishop of Dublin, with his suffragans on either hand; and then the majesty of England seated on an elevated throne, attended by nobles in coronets, near the altar, in front of which were ranged the stalls of the knights, elegantly draped in azure satin, and decorated with banners, shields, and hatchments, all these powerfully contributed to produce a coup d'œil of grandeur, that should have been painted by a Barry, or a Shee, or described by a Byron or a Moore, to give a true and just delineation of its charms and beauty.

The costume of the knights was rich and beautiful in fashion and fabric. It consisted of blue silk surcoats, braided with gold and scarlet, and lined with white ermine; blue silk bonnets of the Spanish form, with white linings and full plumes of white and red feathers,—white velvet small-clothes, and silk stockings; and shoes of white morocco leather. On their left breast, suspended to a sky blue riband, they wore a saltire, encircled with brilliants:—in the centre of this medal, on a riband of pearl, encompassing the shamrock, bearing three crowns, is the motto of the order—'Quis separabit.'

The squires were tastefully arrayed, on this occasion, in white mantles, blue small clothes, with red puffing,—white bonnets lined with blue, and plumed with a single ostrich feather. Each knight was attended with three squires. After the Te Deum was chanted by the choir, the archbishop of Dublin read divine service; when that was over, the king descended from his throne, and knelt on a rich cushion, and made an offering of money at the foot of the altar, while the organs played a verse, we think, from the 21st Psalm—'The king shall rejoice in thy strength, O Lord.' The knights as soon as the king reached his throne, walking two by two proceeded up the aisle to the altar where they made their obeisance, and then turned round and did the like to the throne. The knight elect, Lord Fingal, was then conducted by his squires and four knights to the altar to make his offering, and afterwards to the foot of the throne, where the king conferred the honors of knighthood upon him, and while presenting him with the girdle and cross of the order, shook hands with him very cordially. The herald king at arms, by proclamation and flourish of trumpets, announced that the 'most noble and puissant earl of Fingal was a knight of the illustrious order of St. Patrick.'

It was at the special request of the monarch, that the venerable premier, earl of the Irish catholic aristocracy, was invested with the honor of this knighthood.

* The short lived administration of lord Shelburne, of which earl Temple was no inconsiderable support, determined his vice regency, to the regret of Ireland, on the 3d of June, 1783. — Floueden.

PROGRESS OF
LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

NO. III.

The Crusades, which engaged the attention of all that part of Europe which made any pretensions to civilization, ultimately produced a wonderful change in its government, laws, literature and manners. Unassociated by Commerce and unassisted by laws, civil dissensions and intestine broils corrupted the different nations and retarded the natural growth of civilization and refinement. But inspired by the same chivalrous motives and influenced by the same enthusiastic spirit, not only the martial nobles and monarchs of the age, but men in the most humble and pacific situations, ecclesiastics of every grade, and even women and children engaged with ardor in a cause deemed sacred and meritorious. A difference of opinion exists as to the effect the Crusades produced on the morals and literature of the world; but it will be generally admitted, by the well informed, that by associating the different nations of Europe in one common cause,—the scene of operations being in Asia,—what remained of Eastern magnificence and refinement, was made to circulate by this intercourse, to the western continent. It was principally, however, by the conquests of the Arabians, who, discovering some of the ancient authors, and justly appreciating the knowledge to be derived from them, procured translations into their own language, that many parts of Europe became acquainted with the literature of the Greeks and Romans. They founded Schools and Colleges in all the provinces which they conquered, and disseminated their acquirements in proportion to their conquests.

In considering the rise and progress of learning, we cannot pass over without, at least naming the great and virtuous ALFRED, whose exertions in the cause of English literature have perpetuated his name and insured to his memory the regard of the wise and ingenuous of posterity.—Neither should we forget Henry of Huntingdon, nor Geoffrey of Monmouth; names intimately connected with the earliest annals of English poetry and romance.

In the middle of the 13th century, appeared that most celebrated genius, ROGER BACON, the splendor of whose mind was like a bright star in a dark hemisphere: he emancipated himself from the trammels of the reigning philosophy, explored the subtleties of the scholastic divinity with an 'intuitive perspicuity, and had so little respect for the existing absurdities, though rendered venerable by time, that he declared the whole works of Aristotle fit only to be burned.' His discriminating judgment, and power of invention, were fully competent to investigate the various branches of knowledge to which he turned his attention. He made important discoveries in astronomy, optics, chemistry, medicine and mechanics; and is said to be the first who constructed telescopic glasses. His Opus Majus,—still extant,—was prepared at the request of Clement IV., a patron and friend to the learned.

It may be worthy of remark that, a little before the time of Bacon, societies were formed for the encouragement of poetical compositions, for which prizes were awarded. Considerable solemnity was observed on these occasions, and the most illustrious Ladies attended to decide between the rival bards.

The diffusion of learning at length began to be more extensive. In Italy, the writings of Dante, Petrarch and Boccaccio, tended greatly to fix the standard of the language of their country, and contributed essentially to the advancement of European literature. The English Chaucer, who flourished about the same period, evinced an extensive knowledge of the sciences, and exhibited all the talents of Boccaccio in the excellencies of his poetry. Even Spain,—the Bæotia of modern nations,—partially emerged from ignorance and barbarism, and produced many valuable works. The discovery of some of the writings of Quintillian and Cicero, by Poggio, prompted a further research and led to the recovery of several ancient manuscripts.—But the low state of learning among the vulgar, and the small encouragement afforded, restrained for a time, the active efforts of genius. A succession of liberal and enlightened Popes, however, gave a spring to polite literature and a diffusion of its influence over the rest of Europe.—But that which most effectually contributed to the advancement and universal dissemination of literature and science, and afforded a certain pledge of the progress and perpetuation of every mental acquisition, was the discovery by Faustus, of 'the heaven taught art' of PRINTING. Modern Europe is indebted to this discovery, more than to any other, for the highest improvement ever yet made in arts, sciences, learning, and refinement.

NARRATIVE OF A GREEK SOLDIER.

The above is the title of a work, of about 250 pages, written, or rather dictated, by Petros Mengous, containing anecdotes and occurrences illustrating the characters and manners of the Greeks and Turks in Asia Minor, and detailing events of the late war in Greece, in which the author was actively engaged, by land and sea, from the commencement to the close of the Revolution. New York, Elliott & Palmer, 1830.

We have not taken up this little volume for the purpose of cavilling and finding fault; this would be an idle task, for our brethren have already been at work in this their customary employment, and we dare say have exercised their ingenuity to its utmost—they are peculiarly addicted to this, and are remarkably clever at their adopted trade:—be ours an humbler task—let us select the beauties, or, at least, those passages we may deem of interest to our readers, and let the blemishes, if any there be, pass unheeded. We have room, at present, only for the following extracts.

Speaking of one of the principal Turks of the village where the author was born, he says:—'He had, I believe, but one wife; and probably the same may be said of about one half the married Turks. Though polygamy is allowed, all do not practice it. Deve-Zoglu, (for such was the name of the man) was esteemed a person of superior attainments by his Turkish acquaintances. This indeed he merited, in comparison with other Turks; for he possessed the rare accomplishment of reading, and discoursed of a great many subjects which his countrymen rarely approach. He made great pretensions to a knowledge of politics, and conversed so much about different countries, that the Turks thought him a sage. He was very friendly to my father, who would listen to his remarks, though sensible that he had not an idea of geography. He valued himself for his supposed power of foretelling future events; and indeed, he sometimes met with success in that way, which tended greatly to confirm a belief to a considerable extent prevalent among the Greeks, that the Turks are in possession of a book which gives them knowledge of futurity. He explicitly foretold the Greek war to my father, about a year before it commenced, and long before we had any idea of such a contest.—He had many Greek friends, but was also a friend of the Janissaries.'

The process of making Wine, &c. and the appearance of the Vineyard, is thus described:—

'The luxuriant appearance of our vines laden with fruit, made a strong impression on my mind when a child. My father had two vineyards, which I have just mentioned, which yielded about a thousand gallons of wine annually, and I became somewhat familiar with the manner of cultivation, and the process of making wine. The vines were planted at the distance of a pace, in straight lines, and were in full bearing on the fifth year. The stock is kept cut to the height of about three feet, and becomes of the thickness of several inches with age; putting out its branches with great luxuriance, and showing numerous and rich clusters. It is a plant of remarkable beauty.—The pruning is performed in February, when the spurs of the preceding months have only two eyes on each. The vineyards are protected from intrusion by walls or dry bushes. A dry sandy soil is most favorable, particularly if of a reddish colour. By the end of June, old style, or about the tenth of July, grapes are in abundance, and sell for the value of two or three cents a pound. Table grapes are often used for wine; but those of which raisins are made, yield wine of no superior kind, and are also dear. The soil of our village produced excellent soft wine, but in small quantity. It was so rich, that three cups of water added to one of wine, made a very agreeable drink.—When ripe, the clusters of grapes were plucked, and put into a vat, about six feet square, where they were pressed by men and boys, trampling them with naked feet. I have often engaged in this when a boy. The grapes, after this, are put into the press, from which the juice runs off, and by some is received in open reservoirs, by others in barrels, where it is allowed to ferment for forty days.—Vines will grow for a considerable distance up the mountains, but the fruit is in danger of being eaten by the jackals, which come down in great numbers. They give a short bark like a dog.'

'We preserved grapes by dipping them when ripe into boiling water; and this will preserve them for six or seven months. To make raisins, we took ripe grapes, dipped them in ashes and water, and laid them in the sun for a fortnight, after which they were packed in casks or drums. The ashes are thrown into the water, and allowed to settle at the bottom before it is used, thus forming a clear ley, so that no ashes remain on the grapes when they are withdrawn.'

Here we have the Turkish method of making Coffee:—

'The coffee grains are burnt and ground the same day they are to be used; and two or three tea spoonfulls being put into a little cup with water, it is placed on hot coals, removed when it boils up briskly, placed on and removed again once or twice more, and then carried to the guest, poured into a cup of German porcelain, standing in a small silver saucer. The price is about two paras, or half a cent. It is always drunk without sugar or milk.'

The above work is for sale by R. P. & C. Williams.

THE BELGIANS.—We know not to whom we are indebted for the following article. At this time it is particularly interesting:

Many intelligent persons have not, until lately, given sufficient attention to European affairs to understand the exact position and condition of the Netherlands. When the empire of Napoleon was broken assunder in 1814, new divisions of dominions were formed in Europe by the Allied Powers. The kingdom of the Netherlands, or Low Countries, was then created at the Congress of Vienna. The Dutch, or what was formerly the Republic of the Lower United Provinces, are strict and almost always exclusive Protestants; they speak a dialect of the German, and have always been noted for the phlegmatic coldness of their character.

The Belgians, who occupy the other provinces, are most warm and hearty Catholics; their language has no resemblance to that of their other fellow subjects, being essentially French, with a mixture of German, Spanish, and words of an uncertain origin; and to complete the contrast, they have always been reckoned the most fiery and free-thinking of mankind. Their history is one of contention with the various powers which have held them in subjection, until they were conquered from the Austrians during the Revolution, and incorporated into the French Republic. Separated by no natural boundaries, they soon assimilated with their fellow subjects, and in every point were viewed as a most important part of the nation.

Politically, the possession of both countries is essential to that predominance at which the rulers of France have always aimed. The Dutch provinces offered a long line of sea-coasts, favorable to their commerce, and affording the greatest facilities for rivalling Great Britain in Peace, or excluding her in war. Belgium, by its dense and active population, its admirable fortresses and its geographical position, presented a barrier to invasion from the north. The country, too, is fertile, abounding in coal, iron, and sulphur; and manufactures of various kinds are carried to an extent and a degree of excellence unknown elsewhere on the continent. These advantages were much increased during her connexion with France, which afforded a ready market for both raw and fabricated articles. To the allies these were sufficient reasons for placing them in other hands; and the crown was bestowed upon the Prince of Orange, Nassau, whose whole family had long governed the United Province, under the title of Stadtholder, and who brought the additional recommendation of having never sided with France.

These dispositions were pleasing to neither Dutch nor Belgians. The former had hoped to see their ancient republic revived, and looked with some suspicion at the crown which was to decorate the brows of their ruler. However, their old Constitution was to be adopted without many changes, and their vanity was gratified by the reflection that one of their own country and religion had been chosen for them.

The Belgians, on the other hand, were loud in their disapprobation. They considered themselves in a manner subjected to the Dutch, who they saw would have a predominance in the councils; besides, they looked with horror on a heretic Sovereign, who might well be inclined to overthrow their religious institutions. Their calamities were suspended by Bonaparte's return from Elba, when their country became the arena in which the fates of Europe were again decided. They took part with the allies by force, and no confidence was placed in their troops who were kept inactive behind the lines at Waterloo, and would have doubtless received Napoleon with enthusiasm, had the fortune of the day been otherwise.

Soon after that event, an assembly of Notables from the different provinces was convened, and a constitution submitted to them, which was certainly more liberal than could have been expected at that period. Much discussion, however, took place, and it underwent many alterations before it was ratified. The people are divided into three orders: the nobility—the inhabitants of towns who represent the commercial interests—and those of the country for agricultural. By these three orders of the people, are elected the representatives of the provincial legislatures: each of which manages the internal affairs of its own State and elects the representatives of the lower house of the States General or Congress of the whole Kingdom. The upper house is in number not less than forty, nor more than sixty, who are appointed by the King and hold their offices for life, but do not transmit them to their posterity. The lower house contains one hundred and ten. The council of State consists of 24 persons chosen by the King who preside at their meeting, and to whom all acts are presented for ratification.

MORE ANTIMASONIC VILLANY!

The following notice appeared in the Salem Register of the 20th ult. and created considerable excitement.

NOTICE.

'A confidential conversation between a dying man and his friend, overheard by the Nurse, has strengthened the apprehension of a most nefarious transaction, that took place in this vicinity a few years since. Any person who can give information of the strange disappearance of a man, supposed to have belonged to the county of Essex, between the years of 1810 and 1820, with the place of his abode; the description of his person, and any other particulars in relation to him, and will publish it in this paper, may bring to light an event of deep interest to several persons.

Should there be any objections to publishing such information, the name and place of abode, and the time when a meeting is desired, may be left with the editor of the Essex Register, directed to A. B. C. and the editor is desired to communicate this fact through the paper, as the person who caused this to be published, resides many miles distant.

A. B. C.

December 20, 1820.

The Salem Gazette of Tuesday, has the following.—We trust and believe that we shall soon be able to hold up the name of the author or authors, with that of the 'doctor in Boston,' to public execration.

THE 'A. B. C.' HOAX.—The conjecture thrown out in our last paper, that the advertisement signed 'A. B. C.' was nothing but a wicked hoax, has been since verified by investigation. Two gentlemen, whom the loss of friends about the period referred to in the notice had rendered interested, having satisfied themselves that the whole was an imposture, resolved to trace it to its source. They were so fortunate as to obtain a clue which led at once to the detection of the author, who resides in Lynn. They called upon him, accordingly, and demanded an explanation. He was exceedingly embarrassed and agitated, on finding himself thus detected; and it was not till after a severe cross-questioning that he was brought to confess that the advertisement was a tissue of wilful falsehoods. Finally, however, he acknowledged, item by item, that the dying man,—and the friend to whom he made a confession,—and the nurse who overheard it,—were sheer fabrications;—it was a falsehood that he (the advertiser) lived many miles from Salem;—and the name which he assumed when he carried the advertisement to the printer, was a false one. To exculpate himself he pretended that he was merely the tool of a DOCTOR in Boston.

It is difficult to assign an adequate motive for this shameful imposition, although it is conjectured to be political.—Be it what it may, however, nothing can justify it; and nothing should screen the perpetrator from such punishment as the law will award, for disturbing the community under false pretences. We shall probably be able to give names hereafter.

The Essex Register, of the 6th inst. has the following.

The A. B. C. affair is likely to become a matter of some notoriety. The advertisement was brought to our office by a man calling himself Marshall Brown, who stated that he acted as mere agent for another person, but assured us apparently with great candour and sincerity, that it was well grounded, and had reference to some serious and dark transaction, which, for particular reasons, could not at that time be explained, but that the whole matter should be explained to us at a suitable time. Under these assurances, we consented to publish the notice, and the bill for its insertion, made out in the name above mentioned, was paid by the man who brought it. A letter having been left at the office addressed to 'A. B. C.' the same person called a second time to receive it, and in a conversation on the subject of the advertisement, said that he had given us a fictitious name—that his name was not 'Marshall Brown'—and declined to give his real name, or any explanation of the advertisement—but still assured us that the whole should be made known to us in a few days. In the evening of the same day two men, (one probably the same who brought the advertisement, and another still unknown) waited upon the gentleman who left the letter at the office (who felt a great interest in knowing what the advertisement meant, a relative of his having disappeared in a mysterious manner, several years since.) They made very particular inquiries respecting the disappearance of the person alluded to; said that it did not meet the case, they refused to make any explanation of their mystery, and after inquiring respecting other similar cases, promised to call again, and went away. They called the same evening upon two other persons in the town, who, (it had been mentioned to them) had friends disappear in the same manner. The nature of the advertisement, and the mysterious conduct of these men, gave rise to various surmises and reports, the public mind was greatly agitated and excited. Rumour began to assume a serious aspect in regard to some of the persons in this town who had been connected with the missing persons. In the midst of this excitement a man who had not before been known in the business, called upon the gentleman who had addressed the note to A. B. C. and avowed himself to be the author of the advertisement. He refused to give his name, stated that he was an Antimason, inquired if the gentleman was a Mason, and made some explanation (confidentially) of the grounds of his notice. The gentleman said to him, that if what he had stated was his only grounds, he was not justified in making such a publication. He asked what hurt it had done? The gentleman stated to him wherein, it had been the cause of mischief, and repeated that he had done wrong, and that his conduct was unjustifiable.—He said that others, respectable men, acquainted with the circumstances thought differently, and mentioned the name of Dr. PHELPS, of Boston, as approving of the course he had taken. They then separated.

Another letter having been left at the office for the advertiser, we gave notice of the fact, and requested an interview with the author of 'A. B. C.', for the purpose of obtaining from him an explanation of the mystery. He sent another agent, but not with an explanation; he too refused to state who he was or from whence he came; he merely said that the advertisement was not a sham or an imposition—that it would very soon be explained to us, &c. In reply to some of our inquiries he said that he presumed 'the advertisement did not refer to any PARTICULAR case, but that it was intended to draw out something which MIGHT be important to the public.'

The mischief that the advertisement had occasioned in this town, induced a gentleman who was necessarily involved in the vague rumors spread abroad, with a friend, to seek the author; he was found, and proved to be Mr. JONATHAN BUFFUM, of Lynn, editor and proprietor of the Record, an Antimasonic paper published in that town, who acknowledged that a very essential part of the story in the advertisement, was fictitious, viz: the overhearing of a conversation between a dying man and his friend, by the nurse, but attempted in various ways to justify his conduct. The result of the interview was, that Mr. Buffum willingly gave the gentleman who felt himself injured, the notice for publication which appeared in our last, signed A. B. C.

As Mr. Buffum is the editor of a public print, it may appear surprising that his 'Notice' did not first appear in his own paper. But this would have been at once to expose the plot. The contrivers of it, (and we have been furnished with a list of names of every one of them,) chose to get it inserted in this paper, under the grave and deliberate assurance of perfect sincerity, and a promise to give the editor full satisfaction. The notice was then copied into the Lynn Record with the following comment: 'This looks rather dark and mysterious and we presume does not lessen the excitement which recent disclosures in relation to the murder of Mr. White has occasioned among our Salem friends.'

Thus Mr. Buffum chose to give a 'dark and mysterious' aspect to his own production, and to impress the public mind with an idea of his ignorance of the meaning or origin of the notice. But being detected in his tricks he resorts to boldness and impudence to sustain himself. In his paper of yesterday he publishes the following notice:

COMMUNICATED.

I noticed some remarks in the Essex Register relating to the famous A. B. C. affair. The editor of that paper it seems is not convinced that it is a real case; but says 'he must be aware, that if an imposition has been practised upon the public through our columns, we shall feel ourselves greatly injured, &c.' If the Editor is not yet satisfied with what he knows of the case, and will be patient, he will without doubt, know as much as he has a right to know. When he received the advertisement he was paid $1 50 cents—this was his price—and if he has any other legal claim on me it shall be satisfied. The public may rest assured that the ground of the A. B. C. advertisement is good.

A. B. C.

And now let the public judge of the honor and veracity of Mr. Buffum. After acknowledging that the principal fact in the notice signed A. B. C. was fictitious, he has the effrontery in the face of the community to assure the public that the 'ground of the A. B. C. advertisement is good.' That the whole is a fiction, there is no reason to doubt. That it was a contrivance to get hold of something, no matter what, which would 'fit the case,' or in other words, answer the purpose of the antimasonic party in Lynn, we fully believe. Some mystery, hanging over the fate of any individual in this vicinity, from which a Morgan story, or some other Masonic enormity could have been manufactured, would undoubtedly have 'fitted the case' to an iota. A party that resorts to such subterfuges to sustain itself, cannot long impose upon an honest community. The simple and well meaning men who have been engaged in this affair, will hereafter regret that they have suffered themselves to be deluded by the artful men who have planned and executed this imposition. The originators and plotters of the mischief will still go on in their career, for it is apparent by the insolent paragraph in the Record, that their 'consciences are eared as with a hot iron.' The exposure of their designs may have the salutary effect of opening the eyes of their deluded followers, and if it puts one honest and well meaning man on his guard, we shall not regret having been made the instrument of the imposition upon the public. We have as yet but partially exposed this shameful affair, and have foreborne to mention other names—names of men who ought to be above base artifices to deceive the public mind. Our remarks may be deemed severe—but we are convinced that the public will coincide with us in opinion, that they very nearly 'meet the case.'

New-Year's Address.

TO THE PATRONS OF THE MIRROR.

THE CARRIER'S DESTINY.

No Witch upon her broomstick placed,
No Wizard in his cell,
Had ever, with their mystics, traced
My fortune, or dared tell:—
The loveliest Maid in our town,
Or this far-honor'd city,
Had wrought the spell!—I noted down
Her hapless, heartless ditty:—
'I bind thee with a spell,' said she,
'I sign thee with a sign,—
*No rich man's gold shall light on thee—
No SILVER shall be thine!*

'And, trust me, 't is not that thy cheek
Is brazenless and cold;
Nor that thy lip 's ashamed to speak!
No, no; that lip is bold!
Nor that, a stranger to thy task,
Thou know'st not what to say!
No, no; thou knowest what to say—
With impudence thou 'rt grey!
Yet, while the 'suckle charms the bee,
And while the gas shall shine,
*No rich man's gold shall light on thee—
No silver shall be thine!*

'It is not that thy av'rice, aved
By dunning's numbing spell,
Shrinks from the task, or from the fraud
Which Carriers love so well.
Yet thou shalt shiver and shalt shake,
And 'Happy New-Year' cry;
And ope thy greedy hand to take,
What all will still deny.
I know not why, but they will close
Their doors full in thy face;
Thou'd'st better then turn round thy nose—
And thus give up the chase.

'Yet thou wilt grin the grandest grin
That ever 'devil' wore;
And thou wilt make a horrid din—
Perchance, be called a bore:—
And one shall give—perchance, hath given,
What only is not cash—
I mean, that, from the door-step driven,
Thou 'lt get, alas, the lash!
And they will laugh, and they will scoff,
And think it 'very fine!
But you had better then be off—
Their money 'll ne'er be thine.

'Go sit thee on a ten-foot rail
And rail away at them—
And bite the toughest copper nail,
And vent thy bitter phlegm;
Or, muse upon thy brethren's lot,
And count their treasures o'er;
Or, deem it all a godlike plot—
Perchance, to keep thee poor;
Or, build thy airy castles high
Upon fair Fancy's plain,
Then heave, alas, a heavy sigh
And pull them down again.

'I charm thee from the luxury
Of princes and of kings—
I give thee thread-bare Penury
With all her blessed things.
I bid thee wear the same old cloak,
That thou hast worn before—
And though it be all rent and broke,
Oh, mend it o'er and o'er;
For not a shilling shalt thou get
For cloak or for epistle;
No, no; not o'en enough to whet
Thy almost blunted whistle!

'Then stretch thy mouth from ear to ear—
Bawl with Stentorian throat—
Patrons, to thee a happy year!
Perhaps you'll change the note!

But obdurate still may they be—
Then change the note you swell
Transpose it down to minor b—
And trill it on the bell!
Then miss their paper once or twice—
(They'll understand the joke)
They 'll find what 's wanting in a trice
And they 'll take out their poke.
'And I will break the spell,' said she,
'And I'll take back the sign,
For then the COLD shall light on thee,
The SILVER shall be thine!

And now, kind Patrons, if you please,
Make true the Maiden's spell!
Oh, give me either one of these—
I love them both full well:—
And while the dew-drops gem the earth,
While joy let's fall the tear,
I 'll hail the hour that gave thee birth—
Thou morning of New Year!

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

From the Hampshire Sentinel.
TO REV. DAVID PEASE,

RENOUNCING MASON, ANTIMASONIC LECTURER, &c.

No. 10.

Let us now, sir, in conclusion, for our mutual edification, and convenience, briefly review the preceding epistles, and write out at length, your several confessions.—So choice a specimen of clerical consistency, and so lucid an exhibition of the seceder's motives ought to be long preserved. Let me commend it, sir, to your frequent perusal in the closet, for meditation upon its contents, may improve your heart, and amend your morals. A few 'tears' shed over it, might do honor to your tender sympathies, and a few 'groans' be not unbecoming your character.

I was of 'my own free will and accord, uninfluenced by friends,' but prompted by the love of distinction, initiated as an entered apprentice, and 'gave the brethren present, good reason to believe, that I was highly gratified,' though when reflecting upon this subject in private, 'I wept and groaned in spirit.' Yet at the very next communication, I was 'passed to the second degree,' and after the lapse of a month to the third. My conscience was somewhat quieted, though occasionally disturbed by meditating on the 'horrid oaths' I had taken. On consultation with my 'spiritual father' I was induced to proceed farther. And though 'my master had left me,' and 'my bed became a couch of thorns,' after a few months, I took the several degrees of the chapter, and was left to approve in the most unqualified terms of their spirit and tendency. By the kind partialities of my brethren, I was appointed chaplain of both chapter and lodge, and regularly officiated in said office, invoking on this 'vile institution' the blessings of heaven, and lifted up my voice in their behalf, while my conscience condemned it and them. I was foolish enough to accept of office, and was raised to the dignified station of high priest. I was so infatuated with the bewitching fooleries of this 'nonsensical thing,' as to attend punctually its communications, to the great grief and disaffection of my dear people. 'I am astonished, that I ever should have been pleased with so trifling a thing as Masonry, and should as soon think of studying Tom Thumb as a science.' My brethren treated me with much respect, and made me donations of money, clothing, &c. for which they have my heartly thanks. After my removal to Cazenovia; I came to Greenwich, a distance of near 200 miles, and took the orders of knighthood, and the further I advanced in Masonry, the more confirmed were my favorable impressions, though 'when I drank from the human skull I felt, as if the ground trembled.'—Now I loath and abhor it, 'confessing before God and man, my awful guiltiness,' though it is not unlikely, that I should have been as zealous a Mason now as ever, had it not been for the excitement at the west, and my expectation of becoming popular by secession. 'I was informed of the conspiracy to kidnap Wm. Morgan, yet dared not divulge the secret'—felt bound by my oaths. Now I think them not binding, that they contained nothing affecting my religion, or allegiance to my country, and my free consent was asked and obtained, before they were administered. I was made a Mason Nov. 11, 1811, and continuing zealously to support it till 1829, for eighteen years I was a worshipper of this profane idol, and a constant attendant on her wicked and blasphemous ministrations. 'No man can live up to his Masonic obligations, and live up to his requirements in the church, and those of his country.'

Such, sir, are in substance, your several confessions, and it will be readily admitted, that they are highly honorable to your christian character, and conclusive evidence of the purity of your intentions, and sacredness of your motives. Was your conduct, most Rev. sir knight, the legitimate fruit of Masonry, and this tissue of absurdities a necessary product of the institution. I might perhaps assent to the truth of your doctrines, and adduce your history as plenary evidence of their truth. For it is apparent as noonday, if you entered the lodge, an honest, discreet, and consistent man, you were materially changed before you left it. Such a bundle of inconsistencies, such a web of follies, as you now appear, is utterly irreconcilable with honesty of purpose, and purity of motive; Masonry, however, produces no such effects. You, incautiously, perhaps, did admit, that honorable men are to be found among Masons. We must look beyond this cause, then, for a solution of that inexplicable mystery, a seceder's motives.

'O my soul come not thou into their secret, and unto their assembly, mine honor, be not thou united.'

Hoping, sir, that you may profit by my labors, and if your evil genius should again lead you to abuse and traduce your former benefactors, and those with whom you had taken 'sweet counsel,' that you may utter truth only, and maintain consistency of character, I bid you a final farewell.

Yours, &c.

ROYAL ARCH.

[From the Belchertown Sentinel.]

The Hampshire Gazette, the oldest, and most extensively circulated paper in this county, and withal a judicious and well conducted print, last week records the fact, that Mr. Geo. W. Harris, a zealous antimason, was married at Batavia, Nov. 23d, to Mrs. Lucinda Morgan, widow of the late murdered Wm. Morgan. We have been in the habit of treating the assertions of the editor of the Gazette with great defiance, he being our elder brother, but in this instance, although his assertion is most positive, we are inclined to doubt his authority, and would respectfully inquire of our elder brother, how he knows Madam Morgan is a widow? We had supposed ourselves conversant with the evidence in this case, and have yet seen no positive proof that Morgan is dead, though we admit there is strong presumptive evidence in favor of that conclusion. But is the presumption so violent as to remove all reasonable doubt? If it be, then we confess ourselves over scrupulous in the admission of testimony. We rejoice that madam Morgan, whether wife or widow, is again married, and hope that her present protector will defend her, and her little ones, from the jaws of famine, and from the woes of intemperance, and treat her and them with becoming attention. The sympathy of the anties is rather light food on which to sustain a family of children, and this is all that was meted out to her, even by the illustrious members of the Anti National Convention. We do not wonder that she sought repose in the bosom of a kind-hearted and generous Mason, and bade a willing farewell to whining antiism.

How doth our elder brother learn that Mr. Harris is a zealous Antimason? We have good evidence that he was once a Mason, and that he was expelled for unmasonic conduct, before the Morgan outrage. He is a seceding Mason, but, is he, therefore, a zealous antimason?—This virtuous couple were joined in marriage, it would seem, by Hon. Simeon Cummings, a prominent Mason, and peculiarly obnoxious to the western anties. We would ask our elder brother, with all the due deference to his seniority in years, and superiority of judgment, how he can reconcile this fact, with the assertion that, Mr. Harris, or as the veracious Boston Christian Herald christens him, G. W. Harris, Esq. is a zealous antimason?—Nonintercourse with Masons is a leading doctrine of antiism—if Mr. Harris, therefore, were a zealous antimason, Judge Cummings would have been the last magistrate employed to solemnize the nuptials of this interesting couple. With unabated respect for the opinions of our elder brother, we are constrained to dissent from him in this instance. We cannot believe Mr. Harris a zealous anti, for his late truly charitable act savors not at all of the exterminating spirit of that pure sect.

The same paper informs us, that its editor had understood, that the Rev. Thomas Shepherd, of Ashfield, and the Rev. B. F. Clark, of Buckland, had recently renounced Freemasonry, and declared that they would have no further connexion with it. What an astounding announcement! Two good clergymen of the county of Franklin, probably, to keep their places a little longer, perhaps, from personal persecution, or to allay unholy excitement, are constrained to renounce and institution, patronized by the great and the good in every clime.—Does our elder brother know what has induced these Rev. Gentlemen to renounce Masonry at this late period? Were it from conviction of duty, we should think their conscience somewhat slow in its promptings. Did trouble assail their respective camps, persecution for opinion's sake? Did the devout and conscientious anties threaten them with dismission, and make renunciation the condition of their continuance among them? Renunciation, at this late hour, has no merit, no redeeming virtue, and can be prompted only, by local causes or mercenary motives. A man of independent mind, and upright views, and fearless heart, will scorn to purchase peace, by this humiliating expedient.

We would just inform our elder brother, for his especial consolation, considering his intense grief at the waning prospects of Masonry, that during the three past months, four reputable laymen have been received into the lodge in this town. Don't be dispirited, brother, we have weathered the storm, and are 'looking up.' Let seceders multiply around us, and renunciation follow renunciation, till the institution be emptied of every unworthy and heartless, and temporising member, and the 'pure salt' only remain.

Open and avowed antiism we are ready to meet at all times and all places, on fair terms, but secret, disguised, and covert antiism, we abhor. A good field and fair battle is all we ask, but poisoned arrows and ambuscades, covered trenches and masked batteries, we will eschew, as the pestilence that walketh in darkness.

Since the above was in type, we have understood, from unquestionable authority, that the Rev. Mr. Shepherd, whom we have always heard spoken of as an honorable man publicly withdrew his fellow-ship with Masonry on Than's giving day, not from any dislike to the institution, but in hope of allaying the antimasonic excitement kindled in his parish. Our informant says, he remarked to the people that he regretted the causeless excitement existing among them, and that after prayerful deliberation, he had concluded to surrender his connexion with an institution he had esteemed, lest the cause of religion might suffer through ignorance and unbelief. — [Belchertown Sentinel.]

For the Mirror.

MR. EDITOR:—I observed in a late Mirror, copied from the Belchertown Sentinel, some notice of Mr. N. D. Strong, of the Hartford 'Antimasonic Intelligencer.' We are not a little surprised at the honor you have shewn him; for in Connecticut he is considered quite an inoffensive sort of animal. True, he roars, and foams, and threatens; but what of all that? he hurts nobody. 'Our army swore terribly in Flanders, said my Uncle Toby.' He is continually snarling at the editors of all the papers in the state, save one, like his own, an insignificant thing, the very title of which is scarcely known; but they rarely give him the favor of a notice, except now and then, when he becomes quite obstreperous, and barks and snips too insultingly. Yet, contemptible as he is, he, nevertheless, is the means of doing some mischief in society, by promoting jealousies, dissensions, and prejudices. His influence, however, is principally confined to the ignorant and lower classes of community. In our large towns and villages, and among people of information, his scandalous productions have little or no effect. Except a few broken down politicians, and a set of self-conceited office-seekers, who can shift with every wind, the antimasonic party in Connecticut are at best but a sorry crew, possessing neither knowledge, talent, nor virtue. They read little and have little information, besides what they receive from their unprincipled sycophants, and antimasonic papers; and in these they place implicit confidence.

There are the characters whom Strong and his coadjutors, designedly mislead. I say designedly, for Strong, at least, professes to possess some information. In his address before a convention of antimasons at Norwich, Dec. 19th, 1828, and prominently trumpeted to the world in his paper, he says: 'The immortal Washington is arrogantly claimed by the fraternity as having been not only a Mason, but a great friend and patron of Masonry. But Washington was never a friend to Masonry.' He was so much a Mason, as to discover the design and the aim of the institution. He saw its growing influence in the government and the dangers it threatened to the constitution; he renounced it. Yes he renounced it. It was the noblest the most illustrious act of his illustrious life. I repeat it, Washington renounced Masonry. In the year 1796, in his last public act, as his richest bequest to his country, he gave to the nation, in his farewell address, a renunciation of Masonry.' 'To the high honor of that immortal man, be it said and ever remembered, that WASHINGTON RENOUNCED AND DENOUNCED FREEMASONRY.'

Now, we would ask any rational man, nay, even N. D. Strong himself, if he did not, at the time of uttering these expressions, know them to be base falsehoods? Can he be ignorant that Gen. Washington after 1796, held a friendly correspondence with the different Masonic bodies, in which he expressed his unequivocal opinion of the order, and in the most friendly terms? In his answer to the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts June 1797, he says 'my attachment to the society, of which we are members, will induce me always to contribute my best endeavors to promote the honor and interests of the craft.'

Now will Mr. Strong plead ignorance upon this subject? or will he acknowledge that he was guilty of a wanton and evil imposition on his hearers and readers?

But this is not all. Impositions of a similar nature are by him repeatedly palmed upon the public. Take one instance more and we have done with him for the present. Just before the annual election last April, our state was nearly inundated with Strong's paper gratuitously distributed, containing in glaring capitals 'Anderson's Belfast Murder Story,' evidently designed to influence the election. And tho' this story has been proved, to the satisfaction of every man of sense, to be a base forgery, still to the present time Mr. Strong is endeavoring to impose upon the credulity of his readers, by maintaining it to be a fact!—And many of them are weak enough to believe it. But we can assure Mr. Strong that he will have the consolation to work 'a whole age' before he can induce the majority of the intelligent citizens of Connecticut to become the dupes of political antimasonry.

MODERN PERSECUTION.

We will put down Masonry by the sword, if we cannot put it down without.—JACOB HALL.

NO. II.

It is frequently said that the people of the United States are in the highest enjoyment of social, religious, civil and political rights; that their situation, compared with the people of other countries, is truly enviable. And yet, we have among us men, and a regular, organized association too, the tendency of whose efforts is, to break down every support of our civil rights, and to embitter every social enjoyment. That weak men should be temporarily operated upon, that designing men should obtain some partial success, is neither new nor unexpected. But that a desperate and unprincipled faction should, under the name of Antimasonry, be sustained in an intelligent community, cannot fail to excite alarm in the mind of every real patriot, and painful emotion in the breast of every philanthropist.

Is it indeed true, that the topocracy of all governments and all associations is to be denied? And is it also true, that every principle that regulates human affairs contains within itself the germ of destruction? Are the principles of equal rights—the right of private judgment—of uncertain force and doubtful continuance? In what then do the boasted liberties of our citizens surpass the bond slave's tenure of service, or the condition of a degraded minion of an Eastern Despot? It has been said, and we have been taught to believe, that our fathers left us a glorious inheritance, in our free institutions; and that it is worthy of being transmitted to our children. We have felt that the blood, and the treasure, and the labors of our fathers, have hallowed the great, leading principles of our political institutions, and rendered them dear to us by choice, by sympathy, by conviction, by our dearest recollections. They are our inherited, natural rights; and rights too, of which we cannot be deprived without violence—not merely violence to individuals, but to the Constitution and Laws of the country. Let the bravest individual be robbed of one of his civil rights with impunity, and every man in the community may be stripped of the whole in detail.

The destructive tendencies of some newly disclosed doctrines and designs call upon every friend of his country, on every lover of civil liberty, to interpose his influence, and arrest the progress of these dangerous opinions. He who permits frequent invasions on his liberties to pass unnoticed and unresisted, will come at length to contemplate them without emotion—perhaps with indifference.

When freemen cease to be jealous, they are fitted to become slaves. And when the hand of a base traitor is looked upon without indignation, then the witness of the treason is prepared to submit to the boldest despotism. Liberal opinions and free institutions are the growth of ages. Tyranny and Despotism are the growth of an hour. The calm, generous and manly features of the former have, from age to age, been subjected to the envy, hatred and persecution of the latter. One of the worst species of despotism is found in a popular aristocracy. And when a people become so indifferent to their rights, so reckless of their free institutions, that designing and unprincipled intriguers obtain a lead in public affairs, then civil liberty is most in danger. Let the leaders in Antimasonry once obtain a paramount influence in the political affairs of our country, then farewell to all free institutions. We trust there is yet virtue enough in the people to guard us from a catastrophe so dreadful; and that, if we are doomed to destruction, it will not be consummated by a faction so revolting as Antimasonry.

VERITAS.

STOP THIEF!

Enoch Ely Camp, editor and publisher of the antimasonic Sun, has absconded, having abducted from its rightful owner about $250, which had been entrusted to him to bring to Sacket's Harbour for the bank in this village.—This is the person who, in company with his fit companion and associate, S. N. Sweet, has been holding antimasonic lodges about the country, and manufacturing antimasons at a shilling a head. The profligacy, the gross indecencies and shameless debaucheries of this fellow during his residence here, were matters of public notoriety; yet he was pampered by the pious and charitable antimasons, as a very paragon of excellence. Those whose tender consciences would not allow them to sit at the communion table with a brother who happened to be a Mason, could hold sweet converse with this antimasonic vagabond, with a knowledge of all his vices. For what though he was known to be a thief, had made a brothel of his shop, was daily, or nightly guilty of the most barefaced indecencies—was he not an antimason? This was sufficient to atone for all his sins, however abandoned or notorious. He could vilify and abuse those whose virtues he could not imitate; he could do the dirty work of a desperate faction; he could minister to the depraved appetites of desperate men. He was the fit instrument of a party whose only chance of success was in the ruin of everything which is virtuous or amiable in social life. And yet, the upholders of this young man, lay claim to all the piety and all the virtue. They were shocked at the wickedness of Masonry, yet they could countenance and pamper a thief and a debauchee. Even antimasonic females could grace his lodges with their presence, and by approbation and countenance encourage him in his career of vice.

Of honest antimasons it may be asked, does a good cause require, or does it employ the aid of such instruments?—They cannot plead ignorance of his character, for they knew it well. The men who employed and encouraged him, were as desperate as himself. With them no charge could be for the worse. Screening themselves behind his character, they could propagate through him, any falsehood, however gross, or any libel, however base, with impunity. It is not strange that such a party should seek out such a character for its advocate.

MASONIC.

It is with no small satisfaction we observe, that Mohawk Lodge, No. 266, and Mohawk Chapter, No. 83, unmoved by all the 'pomp and circumstance' of Antimasonic persecutions, the lies of traitors, the frowns of bigots and the sneers of fools, have continued to hold 'the noblest tenor of their way,' and to yield a prompt attendance to their duty. We have formerly noticed the valuable Library kept at their Masonic Hall, in Lanes, by which the benefits of the institution are extended to every individual composing the family of its members.

The following officers of Mohawk Lodge were chosen at its annual meeting on the 25th ult.—

John Moak, W. M.; Geo. N. Schuyler, S. W.; Jacob T. Smith, J. W.; John Christy, S.; Peter Meyer, T. Nicholas Schuyler, Jr. S. D., Ovid Pinney, J. D.; Nicholas Lawyer and John C. Eble, Stewards.

PROGRESS OF ANTIMASONRY.—We learn from the Bradford Settler, that a letter has been recently published in the antimasonic paper in that county which was stolen from the desk of E. Mason, Esq. Rather a bold step—but the broad folds of political antimasonry cover many deeds of wickedness of even a darker grade. The perpetrator of this act, will probably be a candidate for some office at the next election.—[Erie Gazette.]

RAIN, HAIL AND SNOW.

The water which we see descending from the clouds, in the fluid state of drops, or crystallized in snow, or congealed in hail, is in the final stage of that perpetually recurring journey, which some portion of this element is constantly performing through the atmosphere of our planet.

Lifted up perhaps from the surface of some remote ocean, by the process of evaporation, into the region of the winds, and subjected to a play of temperature infinitely varied, it may be the changes of its locality, have presented its beautiful evanescent apparition to all the nations of the earth, before that junction of coincidences happened, which produced its fall at our feet. This last change, which preceded and terminated its aerial career, was but another effect of the same extensively operating cause which produces, in the transparent atmosphere, the deposition of those minute particles of water which constitute a cloud, and which, when greatly increased in energy, assembles and pours them in rain.

The profuse precipitation of humidity which has received this appellation, is caused by a rapid commixture of opposite strata of air of different temperatures. The action of swift contending currents in the atmosphere, brings quickly into mutual contact vast fields of air over a given spot. The separation of moisture is proportionally rapid and copious; the particles conglomerate, and in temperate weather the deposition descends to the earth in the form of rain. In the cold season the aqueous globules, freezing in the mid air into icy spicules collect together during their descent, and become converted, ere they reach the earth's surface, into flakes of snow. Hail is formed under different circumstances, and generally in sudden alterations of the fine season, the globules of rain being congealed during their fall, by passing through a stratum of dry air.

The drops of rain vary in their size, perhaps from the 25th to the 1-4th of an inch in diameter. In parting from the clouds, they precipitate in their descent till the increasing resistance opposed by the air, becomes equal to their weight, when they continue to fall with a uniform velocity. This velocity is, therefore, in a certain ratio, to the diameter of the drops, hence thunder, and other showers in which the drops are large, pour down faster than a drizzling rain. A drop of the 25th part of an inch, in falling through the air, would when it had arrived at its uniform velocity, only acquire a celerity of 11 1-2 feet per second; while one of a 1-4th of an inch would acquire a velocity of 33 1-4th feet.

A flake of snow being, perhaps, nine times more expanded than water, would descend thrice as slow. Hail stones are often of considerable dimensions, exceeding sometimes the length of an inch; they may, therefore, fall with a velocity of 70 feet per second, or at the rate of about fifty miles in the hour. Striking the ground with such impetuous force, it is easy to conceive the extensive injury which a hail shower may occasion in the hotter climates. The destructive power of these missiles in stripping and tearing the fruits and foliage, increases besides in a faster ratio than the momentum, and may be estimated by the square of their velocity multiplied into their mass. This fatal energy is hence as the fourth power of the diameter of the hail stone.—Leslie. The celebrated Volta referred the formation of hail to the play of electricity among the clouds, and upon this theory proposed the erection of parapetals, or hail rods, in countries much exposed to the ravages of hail-storms. These upon the same principle as lightning rods, were to consist of lofty poles tipped with metallic points, and having metallic wires communicating with the earth. By this subtracting superabundant electricity from clouds, Volta imagined that the formation of hail would be prevented. These parapetals have been tried in Switzerland upon an extensive scale; but their success has not been proportionate to the expectations which were formed from a minute experiment.

The average quantity of rain which falls in the course of a year, in the neighborhood of London, according to Mr. Daniell's observations, amounts to 23 1-10th inches, or, if collected, it would form a sheet of water of that depth. The registers of the rain which have been kept in various parts of the United Kingdom have given results which have excited some doubt of their accuracy. Mr. Leslie thinks, that in general twice as much rain falls on the western as on the eastern side of our island, and that the average annual quantity may be reckoned at 30 inches. According to this estimate, the whole discharge from the clouds in the course of a year, on every square mile of the surface of Great Britain, would at a medium be 1,944,683, or nearly two millions of tons. This gives about three thousand tons of water for each English acre, a quantity equal to 680,000 imperial gallons.

The contributions of the several months to the production of this quantity, are stated by Mr. Daniell, and recorded in the British Almanac, to be in the following proportions:

January	1,488	July	2,516
February	9,746	August	1,453
March	1,440	September	2,198
April	1,786	October	2,073
May	1,953	November	2,400
June	1,830	December	2,426

The greatest average quantity, therefore, falls in July, and the smallest in February.

In comparing quantities which fall in the 24 hours, which constitute a day, the result of experiment shows that a greater amount of rain falls while the sun is below, than when above the horizon.

One very remarkable circumstance attending the fall of rain, is, that smaller quantities have been observed to be deposited in high than in low situations, even though the difference of altitude should be inconsiderable. Similar observations have been made at the summit, and near the base of hills of no great elevation. Rain gauges placed on both sides of a hill at the bottom, always indicate a greater fall of rain than on the exposed top.—Leslie.

If the whole of the waters which fall from the heavens were to return again, the evaporation from the ground might be sufficient alone to maintain the perpetual circulation. But more than one third of all the rains and snows are carried by the rivers into the ocean, which must hence restore this continued waste.

THE STEAM-ENGINE.

The name of the Steam-Engine, to most persons, brings the idea of a machine of the most complex nature, and hence intelligible only to those who will devote much time to the study of it.

But he that can understand a common pump may understand a steam engine. It is in fact only a pump, in which the fluid is made to impel the piston, instead of being impelled by it, that is to say, the fluid acts as the power instead of being the resistance. It may be described simply as a strong barrel or cylinder, with a closely fitted piston in it, which is driven up and down by steam admitted alternately from above and below from a suitable boiler; while the end of the piston rod, at which the whole force may be considered to be concentrated, is connected in any convenient way with the work that is to be performed.

The power of the engine is of course proportioned to the size of the piston, and the density of the steam; that is, if the area of the piston be equal to one hundred square inches, and the density of the steam equal to twenty pounds on the square inch, then the whole force against the piston will be two thousand pounds. In some of the mines in Europe there are cylinders and pistons on more than ninety inches in diameter, of which the pressure of the steam equals the effort of six hundred horses. The mechanical properties of steam are precisely like those of common air, hence any person, who is familiar with experiments in pneumatics, will readily see how the elastic force of the steam is capable of moving the piston, in the cylinder of a steam engine; and how by attaching a lever or other contrivances to the piston rod, motion may be communicated to pumps, mills &c.

Those who are not familiar with such experiments, may try for themselves the following—Take a goose quill, and a slice of potato, press one end of the quill on the potato, and cut out a piece which will be left in the quill; this may be blown by the breath to a considerable distance, or it may be pushed backward and forward in the quill, in imitation of the piston of a steam engine.

The steam after leaving the cylinder, is sometimes allowed to escape into the open air; this is called the high pressure engine, on account of the force of steam required to act against the pressure of the atmosphere.

In other engines the steam escapes from the cylinder into a vessel, kept cool by being surrounded with cold water. Here the force of steam is instantly destroyed; so that a vacuum is kept up, on one side of the piston, while the whole force of the steam presses on the other side.—This is called the low pressure, or condensing engine.

It is not an easy task to describe the manner in which the steam is made to act alternately at top and bottom of the piston, without a diagram, nor even with one, unless some parts are moveable. A real model of a steam engine, besides being very expensive and many of the parts hid from sight, is not easily managed by those whose business it is to teach. In consideration of the difficulties, a model has been contrived which is not very expensive, and easily managed. By this, a correct idea of the most essential parts of the steam engine may be easily obtained.

A FRIEND TO USEFUL KNOWLEDGE.

SULPHURIC ACID.

This substance was formerly obtained from green vitriol, or copperas, as it is often called, by distillation. Place a piece of copperas on a shovel and heat it, the sulphuric acid will be driven off by heat, and oxide of iron, or iron rust will be left.

This acid is now manufactured by burning nitrate of potash and sulphur in a chamber lined throughout with lead, having the floor covered with water. The nitrate of potash yields a great quantity of oxygen which combines with the sulphur and is absorbed by the water.

This acid is very caustic. It destroys the texture of cloth, turns wood black by burning the hydrogen and leaving the carbon; poured into water it makes it boil because a condensation takes place accompanied by an extrication of caloric. It has a great affinity for water; put a glass of acid in a half pint tumbler, and set it away, in a few weeks it will be full, having absorbed water from the air. The rise of liquid in the tumbler from week to week, affords a means of judging of the comparative dampness of the air. It will not be accurate however.

Sulphuric acid is very useful in the decomposition of many substances. If poured upon common table salt it separates muriatic acid which will rise in white fumes, and unites with the soda forming sulphate of soda, better known by the name of Glauber's salts. Dissolve borax in boiling water and pour in this acid, the boracic acid will, as it cools, be separated, and fall to the bottom, a white powder, drain off the liquid, dry the precipitate, and dissolve it again, adding acid as before, and white scales will sink to the bottom, which is boracic acid nearly pure. Pour sulphuric acid upon pulverized chalk, or limestone, and it will separate the carbonic acid from it, and combining with the lime, form sulphate of lime, or plaster of Paris. In like manner it separates fluoric acid from Derbyshire spar, nitric acid from nitrate of potash.

Sulphuric acid is found in nature. A stream of it runs from the ancient crater of Mount Idienne, Java, which destroys the vegetables in its vicinity. According to Humboldt, a stream of it runs from an extinct volcano, near Popayan. On account of its sourness it is called Vinegar River. Some springs of this acid have been recently discovered in Iron, Genesee county, N. Y. described by Prof. Eaton in Vol. 15th of Silliman's Journal.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SOLOMON SOUTHWICK.

A long time has elapsed since our friend Solomon and ourselves have interchanged the kind offices of mutual congratulation. Of late he has given a lucid exposition of his own affairs: He describes the difficulties and embarrassments which attended the incipient stages of his paper, and which hung over him like a thunder cloud, dark and potentous, surcharged with all the elements of ruin—explains 'the ways and means' by which he surmounted the huge obstacles which on every side saluted him and his with annihilation—touches with a master pencil the thousand secret intrigues that beset his magnanimous course—pours trays in vivid colors and animated feeling, the black, vile, infamous, infernal characters whose malice, envy and meanness sought, with a remorseless cruelty, to blast his prospects, and breathe the mildew breath of suspicion upon his glorious fame. If any man deserves the countenance, consolations, and hearty good will of anti-masonry, our friend does. He was the bold pioneer who first spanned the almost impregnable fastness, and threw the javelin into the bloated heart of that gigantic monster, Masonry, whose magic and whose sorceries have bewildered the heads of the great and corrupted the hearts of the good, and which bid fair to dissolve in its all-absorbing maw the whole republic, if not the whole earth. He comes down upon our much respected friend WEED—forewarns the antimasonic world of Weed's fatal ascendancy, and the foul means by which he procured that fatal ascendancy. He declares that he and his paper will stand, and we presume they will, till

'The stars shall fade away, the sun himself
Grow dim with age, and nature sink in years:
Unhurt amidst the war of elements,
The wreck of matter, and the crush of worlds.'

He denounces our friend of the Journal, as the rank, foul, and profligate Weed; speaks of his adventure to Washington; says that he has received an enormous sum of money, and is endeavoring to marry Clayism and antimasonry. He boldly affirms that the antimason attempted to bribe him to quit the capital of this great State, to soar 'over the hills and far away,' to roost among the towering oaks of the Alleghenies to overlook the affairs of the 'fierce democracy' of the land of Penn; but at this treacherous proposal, all the fiery indignation of his patriotic soul burst forth: out he came—described the villainous behaviour of his would-be assassins, which was as black and as irregular as the dreams of guilt, and finally shrunk back with unutterable contempt into his editorial chair, where,—as the sun to the stars,—he dispenses light, heat, and motion to his inferiors. Our friend Solomon has been abused—grossly and wickedly abused—by those rascally antimasons who have nothing in view but political and self aggrandizement. We invoke the sympathies of a generous community,—'redolent of love'—to contribute to the welfare of this veteran antimasonic champion.—[Craftsman.]

Joy is the medicine of life—the rational panacea; and by forcing the finer machinery of the organs into play, relieves the ever toiling heart.

THE BOQUET.

HYDROPHOBIA.

A Mr. Vale lately died in Cayuga county, N. Y. in a state of madness caused by the bite of a mad dog. When the paroxysms were coming on, suddenly sprang from the bed, exclaiming to those around him, 'Clear the room! Clear the room!—Bind me, and keep away from me!' On this a writer in the Auburn Free Press has made the following lines:

'Clear the room! Clear the room! Away—away,
Ye have known me in life's earlier day;
For my pulse beats strong, and my blood runs high,
And the maddening glare beams from my eye.
And I feel assured of my awful doom—
O haste ye away—clear the room—clear the room!

'Let my hands be bound and my limbs made fast,
And cords and strings over my body cast;
Poison's within me—it has tintured each vein—
It has filled each nerve with distress and pain—
It has clouded my brow by thoughts of gloom—
O haste ye away—clear the room—clear the room!

'I see thee, my loved one, my infant child!
With thy placid brow, and thy features mild;
Thy hand is stretched forth—but it may not be
That I never can clasp thee again to me:
I hear thy sweet lips, as softly they swell—
'Tis madness to bid thee, thou loved one, farewell!

'And she, the wife of my bosom, is there—
Her eyes full of tears, her brow full of care!
My mother—O God! must she witness me too!
My pangs and my groans as I bid earth adieu?
She follows her husband—and her son to the tomb!
Great God! I am mad! Clear the room! Clear the room!

They left him—O sad were the sounds that came,
With horrible yells which no tongue can name,
And wasted afar on the Sabbath air,
To seek that throne with the christian's prayer,
Where the humblest thought, and simplest word,
If spoken aright, cannot plead unheard.

He struggled—he raved—his distress rose high—
And horror and death gleamed forth from his eye;
Poison foamed on his lips—madness swelled on his breath—

All was still—We had witnessed the maniac's death!
And never will traveller gaze on his tomb,
But fancy will cry—Clear the room! Clear the room!

A FRAGMENT:

Translated from the French for the Tolland Advocate.

WHY DO I LOVE HER?

* * * * I have known her from infancy, and when all the little girls of her years were gaily careering round and playing, she neither played nor romped. Her look was expressive of the careless and foolish gaiety of infancy; it was a mirror of sweetness, of sensibility—surely angels must wear that look! Her sweet voice touched the heart as soothingly as the soft night-breeze sighs through the unstirred foliage—she refreshed the heart and purified it, even as the dew of the morning refreshes faded herbage.

* * * * When she bade me good morning, I a child like herself—was happy throughout the day—for already I loved her! Love her!—how natural it was in me, for, like myself, she was a being of emotions—even though they might prove grievous. Night's silence—the song of a bird—the sound of an instrument, particularly an organ, had for her an indefinable charm! Like me, she listened—and then tears would struggle to dim those bright eyes—then they would flow voluptuously, again renewing their streams—and always as with me!

* * * * The day came which completed her 15th year—the age of desires, of parties, of balls, of coquetry—yet she desired nothing more than previously—Only a victim to I now not what sadness, she wore more distraction in her air—became more absent. At times she appeared in society—and I also:—in the midst of youthful girls, beautiful from joy and health—I saw her pale and beautiful from suffering; and even while suffering, she smiled to see the joy of her friends! Oh! how much did I love her then!—does that surprise you? Then you would not give all the roses in the world for the simple violet made pale by the noontide heat! To the dazzling of the sun's scorching rays you would not then prefer its soothing beams, softened by evening! You would then better like to see the flash and glare of twenty lustres in a room of gold, than in your own chamber watch the exhausted lamp waver, flicker, and go out! Then can you not comprehend why I love her.

SHAKSPEARE AND BYRON.

That Byron wrote best when he wrote of himself and of his own, has probably been already made sufficiently apparent. In this respect he stands alone and apart from all other poets and this peculiarity extended much further over all his works, than merely to those which may be said to have required him to be thus personal. The great distinction, indeed, of his merits consists in that singularity. Shakspeare in drawing the materials of his dramas from tales and history, has, with wonderful art, given from his own invention and imagination the fittest and most appropriate sentiments and language; and admiration at the perfection with which he has accomplished this can never be exhausted. The difference between Byron and Shakspeare consists in the curious accident, if it may be so called, by which the former was placed in circumstances which taught him to feel in himself the very sentiments that he has ascribed to his characters. Shakspeare created the feelings of his, and with such excellence, that they are not only probable to the situations, but give to the personifications the individuality of living persons. Byron's are scarcely less so; but with him there was no invention, only experience, and when he attempts to express more than he himself knows, he is always comparatively feeble.—[Galt.]

Everything is great and wonderful in nature,—there is nothing which does not bear the mark of the workman, in some corner; the very irregular and imperfect things which we sometimes observe, imply regularity and perfection. Vain and presumptuous man! make a worm, which you trample under foot and despise; you are afraid of a toad; make a toad if you can. How excellent a master of his art is he, who fabricates those things which men not only admire, but fear! I don't request you to show your skill in making a man of sense, a handsome man or a beautiful woman; the undertaking is too hard and unequal: try only to make a deformed creature, an idiot, a monster, and I'm content.

LITERARY.

LIVING WRITERS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

NO. III.

We pass to the author of the O'Hara Tales. These have been attributed to Mr. Banim, and consist of Crochopre of the Bill Hook, The Fetches and John Doe. He is an Irishman by birth, and was on the pleasant side of thirty when he wrote these tales. He was already known as the author of the Celts and Damon and Pythias. In these tales the author has shown invention and discovered tenderness, while his groups are nevertheless coarse in their character, and are chiseled out of the commonest materials. Since then The Nowlans, the Boyne Water, The Croppies, and the Denounc'd, have all proceeded from the same pen. Mr. Banim is consequently allowed a high rank among the living writers of Great Britain.

We notice on our list the names of Mr. Barker, a writer on education, Mr. Barnes, a political writer, Dr. Baron, the esteemed author of a recent life of Dr. Jenner, and sir Jonah Barrington, whose own memoirs have afforded infinite amusement to the literary world. This gentleman is an Irishman by birth, and is still a judge of the Court of Admiralty in his native country. His skill as a 'good shot' and his opposition to the union, have been leading traits in his character.—He has written besides his personal memoirs, a history of the secrets attending the union of the sister islands.

It is needless for us to remark that his personal memoirs abound with the most extravagant narratives, and are received by all moderate people cum grano salis.

If any reader of these sketches has a fondness for the history of Baron Munchausen, or the memoir of Tom Thumb, he has a rich treat in store for himself, (provided he wishes to extend his reading in the personal memoirs of the modern Jonah.

We now come to the name of John Barrow, and we should be happy if we could give this venerable man some portion of that eclat, which his long services in the cause of science, and his able communications to the Quarterly Review have justly conferred upon him in his own country. If we mistake not he has an honorable situation in the admiralty and still displays the vigor of former years in discharging his duties.

He was originally an assistant in a mathematical Academy at Greenwich, and is an instance of the personal advantage which a knowledge of the exact sciences confers even on their humblest possessor. At the time of Lord Macartney's embassy to China, his mathematical talents brought him into notice, and he received the appointment of private secretary to the Ambassador. He continued with him in the same capacity when he was appointed Governor, of the Cape of Good Hope.—The qualities which distinguished Lord Macartney have justly been celebrated by his secretary and biographer. Among the most valuable works of Dr. Barrow, (we have forgotten to mention that he is a Doctor of Laws) is his early treatise on Mathematical instruments, particularly of the sector and plain scale, and his account of Southern Africa; with observations on its geology and geography, and its natural history.

He has published an account of his residence in China, containing some valuable speculations on the characteristics of this remarkable country, a voyage to Cochin China, an account of a journey to the Booshuana nation, dwelling at a remote point in the interior of Africa, and a life of Lord Macartney with extracts from his unpublished writings. His chronological account of voyages into the polar regions is his best work, and is a very valuable one.

Dr. Barrow is the writer who furnishes the Quarterly with its reviews of travels, and is the patron if not the originator of the voyages of discovery which have recently been made towards the frozen regions of the North.

Among his most admired articles in the Quarterly is his review of Capt. Parry's voyages. It is to be found, if we remember right, in the 59th number. To our readers, that on the subject of Pitcairn's Island is perhaps particularly interesting by its reference to Capt. Porter's cruise in the Pacific. We of course do not how to make due allowance for the national feeling which entered into the composition of that article. The term of civilized barbarian, was evidently applied under the smarting recollection of that gallant, that heroic defence of the Essex, when other 'civilized barbarians' violated the neutrality of a Spanish port, and consummated their vengeance on an inferior force. We can afford to overlook the petulance of a writer under a government to whose admiralty we have given so much business, and making due allowance for such a feeling in Dr. Barrow, we can recommend his writings generally as being of a most able and useful character.

MORAL.

[From the Christian Examiner.]

NATURAL DREAD OF DEATH.

It seems to us strange, it seems as if all were wrong in a world where, from the very constitution of things, death must close every scene of human life, where it hath reigned for ages over all generations, where the very air that we breathe and the dust we tread upon was once animated life—it seems to us most strange and wrong, that this most common, necessary expedient, and certain of all events should bring so much horror and desolation with it; that it should bring such tremendous agitation, as if it were some awful and unprecedented phenomenon; that it should be more than death—a shock, a catastrophe, a convulsion, as if nature, instead of holding on its steady course were falling into irretrievable ruins.

And that which is strange, is our strangeness to this event. Call sickness, we repeat, call pain, an approach of death. Call the weariness and failure of the limbs and senses, call decay, dying. It is so: it is a gradual loosening of the cords of life, and a breaking up of its reservoirs and resources.—So shall they all one and another, give away. 'I feel,' will the thoughtful man say—I feel the pang of suffering, as it were, piercing and cutting asunder, one by one, the fine and indissoluble bonds that hold me to the earth. I feel the gushing current of life within me to be wearing its own channels. I feel the sharpness of every keen emotion, and of every acute and far penetrating thought as if it were shortening the moments of the soul's connexion and conflict with the body. So it is and so it shall be, till at last, the silver cord is loosened, and the golden bowl is broken, and the pitcher is broken at the fountain, and the wheel is broken at the cistern, and the dust returns to the earth as it was, and the spirit returns to the God who gave it.

No; it is not a strange dispensation, Death is the fellow of all that is earthly, the friend to man alone. It is not an anomaly, it is not a monster in the creation. It is the law, and the lot of nature.

Not to thy eternal resting place,
Shalt thou retire alone.

Thou shalt lie down
With patriarchs of the infant world, with kings;
The powerful of the earth, the wise and good,
Fair forms and hoary seers of ages past,
All in one mighty sepulchre. The hills,
Rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun; the vales,
Stretching in pensive quietness between;
The venerable woods, rivers that move
In majesty, and complaining brooks,
That made the meadows green, and poured round all,
Old Ocean's gay and melancholy waste—
Are but the solemn decorations all,
Of the great tomb of man.

But of what is the tomb? Does the spirit die? Do the idlest affections of the soul go down into the dark and silent grave? Oh! no. 'The narrow house, and pall, and breathless darkness, and funeral train—these belong to the soul. They proclaim only the body's dissolution. They but celebrate the vanishing away of the shadow of existence. Man does not die, though the forms of popular speech thus announce his exit. He does not die. We bury, not our friend, but only the form, the vehicle in which, for a time, our friend lived. That cold, impassive clay, is not the friend, the parent, the child, the companion, the cherished being. No it is not; blessed be God that we can say—It is not! It is the material world that earth only claims. It is dust only that descends to dust. The gravel—let us break its awful spell, its dread dominion. It is the place where man lays down his weakness, his infirmity; his diseases and sorrows, that he may rise up to a new and glorious life. It is the place where man ceases—in all that is frail and decaying—ceases to be man, that he may be, in glory and blessedness, an angel of light!

Why, then, should we fear death, save as the wicked fear it? Why dread to lay down this frail body in its resting place, and this weary aching head, on the pillow of its repose? Why tremble at this—that in the long sleep of the tomb, the body shall suffer disease no more, and pain no more, and hear no more the cries of want nor the groans of distress, and far retire from the turmoil of life, that violence and change shall pass lightly over it, and the elements shall beat and the storms shall sigh unheard around its lowly bed? Say, ye aged and infirm, is it the greatest evil to die? Say, ye children of care and toil! say ye afflicted and tempted! is it the greatest of evils to die?

Oh! no. Come the last hour, in God's own time! a good life and a glorious hope shall make it welcome. Come the hour of release! and affliction shall make it welcome. Come the hour of re-union with the loved and lost on earth! and the passionate yearnings of affections, and the strong aspirations of faith, shall bear us to that blessed land. Come death to this body—this burden, tempted, frail, frailing, dying body! and to the soul, come freedom, light, and joy unceasing! come the immortal life! he that liveth, saith the conqueror over the Devil, he that liveth and believeth in me shall never die.

PROGRESS OF
LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

NO. IV.

On the discovery of the art of Printing, a new era commenced in the annals of the civilized world. Classical learning, criticism and poetry, made rapid advances; yet the dogmas of Aristotle kept possession of the schools of philosophy, and were so thoroughly engrafted into the doctrines of theology, that it required the most strenuous efforts of genius to eradicate them. A genius adequate to the undertaking, was found in Sir FRANCIS BACON, Baron of Virulam and Viscount St. Albans, the greatest philosopher of his age, whose brilliant talents and penetrating intellect enabled him to explore the deep abyss of heathenish superstition, and discover a sure mode of progressing in science by experiment and observation of nature. He held it as a maxim, 'that in the pursuit of truth, mankind must divest themselves of all the idols, or false notions, that possess the mind.' He considered philosophy as a 'vast pyramid that ought to have the history of man for its basis, an account of the powers and principles that operated in nature, for its second stage. But as for the summit, Opus quod operatur Deus, a principio usque finem;' he doubts its ever being acquired by man. The doctrines of Gassendi and Des Cartes, though designed to expose and refute the dogmas of the schools, were themselves too abstruse to have that effect in enlightening the minds of the common people, and improving the morals of society, to which the learning and ability of their respective authors would seem to have entitled them. The Royal Society of London, incorporated by Charles II., and the Royal Academy at Paris, instituted by Lewis XIV., contributed materially to the progress of literature and science. Both these societies are now in a very flourishing state and are justly classed among the first literary institutions of Europe.

In England, learning continued from this time, regularly and rapidly progressive; still philosophy had not yet entirely divested itself of the jargon of the ancients. But the genius of Sir ISAAC NEWTON, burst forth like a rapid fire, bearing down every obstacle in its way.

'Nature and nature's laws lay hid in night,
'God said let Newton be and all was light.'

He engaged while a youth, with ardour in the sublime studies and had laid the foundation of his immortal works, the Principia and Optics, before he had completed the twenty fourth year of his age. The best illustration of the astonishing excitement produced by the publication of these, is contained in the memento of the learned Marquis de l'Hospital, 'Does Mr. Newton eat, drink, or sleep like other men? I represent him to myself as a celestial genius entirely disengaged from matter.' Keil observes that 'if all philosophy and mathematics were considered as consisting of ten parts, nine of them are entirely of his discovery and invention.' Contemporary with him was John Locke, who rendered as much service in the science of logic and metaphysics, as Newton had done in mathematics and philosophy.

The progress of literature was commensurate with that of science. Trissino composed several epic poems in the Italian language, and was the first of his countrymen who wrote a regular modern tragedy. But the principal poetical compositions of the age, were the Orlando Furioso, Ariosto, and the Gerusalemme Liberata of Tasso. Subsequently, epic poetry received but little attention until the days of Milton. Lyric poetry, on the contrary, was cultivated with considerable success. The English lyric poetry of the sixteenth century, is familiar to the American reader; and the writings of Shakspeare, Surry, Harrington and Sydney, form an important group in every scholar's library. Dryden has brought this style of writing to great perfection. His 'Ode on St. Cecilia's day,' ranks superior to any thing of the kind, ancient or modern. The dramatic writings of the French, at this period, were moral, pure, and many of them models of a correct and polished taste. The most eminent historians of Europe, are Du Thau, Davila, Machiavel, Clarendon, Hume, Suvolet, Russell, Rollin, and Robertson.

THE A. B. C. HUMBUG.

The wickedness of this piece of villany is equalled only by the vileness of the Witherell transaction, and the moral turpitude exhibited by the actors in the Anderton imposition. It is of the same genus; representing in bold relief the same marks of human depravity. We know not in what terms to speak of such transactions. One is struck with astonishment at the appalling fact, that men, evincing such vileness and baseness of heart, as is evident in these cases, have an existence in our community; that such miscreants are prowling about in society, under the cloak of religion, seeking, like incendiaries, occasion to seize the fire-brand and light up the flame of falsehood and calumny. Can it be that society has arrived to that state of mental degradation; of wickedness; when acts of such horrible baseness, are to be tolerated? We are not prepared to believe this; yet such villanies are transacted, and their authors are counteranced in society as reputable men. They are permitted to carry on a persecuting crusade against a portion of the community, of whom no one honest man has yet dared to say ought that is disreputable. They are permitted to arraign the members of the Masonic Institution before the tribunal of public opinion, as cut-throats, infidels and traitors; when the development of every transaction in which they have been detected, furnishes indubitable evidence that there never was a more reckless combination of desperadoes, than are the very men by whom Masons are thus arraigned. Influenced by no moral principle, and regarding no law, human or divine, they leave no effort untried, however infamous and wicked, that are calculated to aid them in the attainment of their unhallowed purposes. The reputations of the living and the dead are alike violated. The grave is no barrier to their licentiousness. A life of patriotism, purity and usefulness, is no shield against their base and foul slanders.

If these men are not checked in their unrighteous career, we may safely predict that the time is not very distant when Christianity itself shall become their victim. Let Christians look about them; let them, while yet they have the power, strip the wolves that are lurking in the churches, of their false clothing; let them take warning from the sufferings to which their brethren in other sections of the country have been compelled to submit; from what they have recently witnessed in this immediate neighborhood, the evil spirit of discord and distraction has found its way among them, and when it shall have gained strength enough, if permitted to live so long, it will rear its hydra head and commence its desolating work. When that time shall fully arrive, and it assuredly will, if these political disorganizers and public disturbers are permitted to go on in their work of defamiation and detraction, the heart of the truly pious Christian will indeed be made sad, and 'Zion shall mourn.' The persecution now raging against Masons, is persecution for opinion's sake; and it would be madness to expect that it will end when it has spent its venom on the Masonic fraternity. 'Let the doctrine of proscription or intolerance in matters either of religion, morality or Masonry but once be established, and it requires no sagacity to foresee that amongst its earliest victims will be ranked the religious associations and perhaps institutions of our land. If one party takes upon itself to assert that combinations of men for a particular purpose shall not be tolerated, they may give rise to a party aiming at the overthrow of all associations whatever. Innovations are always dangerous, particularly in matters of opinion, and the advocates of intolerance to-day, may be made the victims of intolerance to-morrow.

We invite the attention of the reader to the following communication from our Salem correspondent.

Salem, January C. 1831.

GENTLEMEN:—I send you herewith several numbers of the Register and Gazette, by which you will perceive the getting up and the blowing up of one of the most villainous plots, which has ever occurred to disgrace the character of man, in the annals of Antimasonry. The A. P. C. advertisement, when first published, caused a great excitement here, as several persons had disappeared within the period referred to, and the agonized feelings of their families and connexions, were again harrowed up, by this abominably wicked contrivance. The object of these base men, was no doubt to obtain a knowledge of some person who had disappeared, and on a foundation of fact to rear a structure of falsehood, which should exactly 'meet the case' of another Masonic murder. The gentlemen who were instrumental in detecting these miscreants are neither of them Masons, and had no suspicion, when they commenced inquiry, that this was a branch from the L. pass of antimasonry. In addition to the facts stated in the Register of to day, I have the authority of one of the gentlemen who called on Buffum, to say that, B. asked him if he was a Mason, and when he replied he was not, Buffum said, with considerable emphasis, 'it is well for you you are not.' This gentleman's partner in business disappeared in the year 1816, under the influence of mental derangement, and if the inquirer had happened to have been a Mason, this probably would have exactly suited the case, and he would have been branded as a murderer and robber. Buffum further said, 'that if he had known that the robbery, (alluding to Crosby's,) would have taken place, the advertisement would not have appeared. A Masonic robbery and attempt to murder, I presume would very well have suited the case—Buffum disavowed being the originator of the advertisement; but said that it originated in Boston and was published by the advice of several respectable gentlemen, (antimasons I presume,) of Boston; and in his conversation with Mr. C. (the person he first called on,) he said that Dr. H. F. FIS of Boston advised to or approved of it. So that you will perceive that the ramifications of this wickedness are wide spread. From the character, I learn of Buffum, he can hardly be considered as a responsible person.—Vain, wilful, ignorant, zealous over much, and of an ill balanced mind, verging on insanity: he is a fit character, not less wicked but of more cunning and sagacity. There are, however, others known to be concerned with him in this, from whose standing in society, better conduct was expected; but the ferocious spirit of antimasonry tinges the whole breed. The righteous indignation of an insulted community is hardly sufficient punishment for these miscreants. Too long have they been permitted to vilify and outrage men, as far before themselves in moral goodness, as light is brighter than darkness. They should be made to feel the punishment of the law.

Yours respectfully

In addition to the above, we learn that Buffum denies that he wrote that part of the advertisement which relates to the conversation between the dying man and his friend, overheard by the nurse, (and which he admits to be fictitious;) but says it was written in Boston—says that part was written in Boston and part by himself. When Buffum was called on by some gentlemen from Salem, and an explanation demanded of him, he was so much embarrassed and in such a nervous tremor, (probably occasioned by a consciousness of guilt,) that he could not read the introductory letter presented to him.

In evidence of the lying spirit of these men, we will mention one or two facts. When the advertisement was left at the Register office, the person who left it, called his name Marshall Brown; but when the same person called again, on some business relative to the advertisement, he stated that his name was not Marshall Brown, and that, as he was only an agent in the affair, he did not wish to give his proper name. Now the fact is, his name was Marshall Brown and when he left the advertisement he accidentally told the truth: but, apprehensive that his associates might accuse him of possessing a single particle of moral honesty, and ashamed of himself that he had unconsciously perpetrated one honest act, he went immediately bare and denied his name! Another—when the publisher of the Register, (who by the way is not a Mason, nor has he any predilections in favor of Masonry,) asked Brown, or another 'authorized agent,' if Jonathan Buffum of Lynn was not the author of the advertisement, he positively declared that Buffum was not, to his knowledge, in any manner concerned in the business; when it is satisfactorily ascertained that this individual had accompanied Buffum from Lynn to Salem, and was then actually acting under Buffum's instructions! Once more—when the editor of the Register charged Buffum with being the author of the article in the Lynn Record, (of which Buffum is the reputed editor,) he said it was a communication; but the article was instantly produced, to which the signature of A. B. C. was attached, and Buffum covered with shame and confusion.

We mention these facts to show that among these men, falsehood is held in higher repute than truth. We have the names of many of the persons concerned in this vile transaction, and may hereafter give them to the public.

EXPULSIONS.—We are requested to state that WILLIAM D. SMITH, was regularly expelled from Libanus Lodge, Somersworth, N. H. on the 24th day of August last, for gross unmasonic and dishonest conduct. Said Smith is about twenty-seven years of age, of dark complexion, black eyes, about five feet and six or seven inches high, with black hair. When he absconded he had large black whiskers and had on a black suit of clothes. He has a scar on or about the end of the forefinger of the left hand, occasioned by an injury several years ago—said mark is so peculiar, that, once observed, it would never be mistaken. Said Smith was traced to Boston where he assumed the name of Deering, as appeared on the stage book for Pawtucket, R. I. He has since been heard of in Providence, R. I. He is a poor writer and reader, but makes much pretension to information, and is very apt to imagine himself insulted, and on such occasions, may be termed boisterous. He was originally a shoe maker, by trade; but for a few years past has carried on the hair-dressing business.

At a regular communication of St. John's Lodge, holden at Springfield, Vt. on 23th of Sept. last, NOAH SAMPFORD, EDMUND DARWIN and JONATHAN WESTER, of Springfield, and ADDISON STREETER and JEWETT BOYNTON, Jr. of Weatherfield, were expelled from said Lodge, for unmasonic conduct.

THE SOLAR ECLIPSE OF FEBRUARY.—The American Almanack for the present year, among a great variety of calculations relative to the Solar Eclipse, which will be visible throughout the United States, on the 12th. February next, has the following:—The central eclipse will enter the United States from Mexico, and will pass through the states of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, the north part of Georgia, and South and North Carolina and the south eastern parts of Virginia, and Maryland; thence proceeding along the Atlantic at the distance of 50 or 60 miles from Long Island, it will pass through the south eastern part of the Island of Nantucket, and thence to Halifax in Nova Scotia. The unobscured part of the sun will present an annular appearance at all places within about 35 miles on each side of this track, the ring will become more or less uniform in proportion as the place is nearer the central track. The duration of the annular eclipse in places where it is central, will be a little over two minutes. The path of the annular eclipse will extend to the town of Chatham in the county Barnstable, but no other part of the continent in the New England States, except the southern extremity of New Jersey and Delaware.

The eclipse will begin in Boston at 11 o'clock 43m 26s. A. M. The time of the greatest obscuration will be at 1 h. 2 m. 11 s.; the end will be at 2 h. 4 m. 53 s. 1-2s and the duration will be 2 h. 57 m. 22 s. 1-2 s. The Digits eclipsed will be 11 h. 27 m. 27 s.

HORRID MURDER.—The last Frederick (Md.) Examiner contains an account of the destruction of the family of a Mr. Newey of that county. It appears the whole family was murdered and the house set on fire. Mr. Newey was found lying on the floor nearly consumed, with his rifle by his side; Mrs. Newey, partly consumed, with stabs in several places; the two children, partly consumed, with the bed clothes under them wet with their blood; and the old man and the boy both consumed. Appearances seemed to indicate that the wife, sleeping in front, was first stabbed; that the husband, on reaching for his rifle, was prostrated by a blow with an axe and killed; that the two children were killed in bed; that the father-in-law, who, with the lad, slept in a chamber above, on coming down to ascertain the noise, was killed as he entered the room; and that the boy, after coming down, had nearly succeeded in making his way to the door, which opened to the road, when he was struck down. The principal villain in the affair is supposed to be a man named Markley, a nephew of Mr. Newey. He is 33 years of age; is heght about 6 feet, dark complexion and dark hair, stoops when walking, but is well proportioned and stoutly made. He had recently been discharged from the State Prison.

John Worrick, convicted at the late term of the Municipal Court in this city, of stealing eleven doubloons from Capt. Isaac Chase, late of the brig Moscow, has been committed for trial before the Supreme Judicial Court, which takes place on the first Tuesday of March next, on a capital charge of having administered poison, which caused the death of said Chase. Worrick was steward on board the Moscow, and is supposed to have mixed a certain quantity of arsenic in a dose of senna and salts, which Capt. Chase, being unwell, had ordered him to prepare. The body was examined by Dis. Channing, Flint, Smith and Lewis. In the stomach was found a small powder, which was declared by Dr. Webster, after a chemical analysis, to be arsenic.

YOUNG LADY'S BOOK.—The Patriot notices this beautiful volume in the following terms:—'The extreme beauty of the print and embellishments of this volume, does much credit to our publishers and artists. The numerous engravings scattered throughout its pages are equal to any we have before seen, executed by American artists. The volume is a reprint from the English edition, and we feel certain that the copy is but little inferior to the original. The book contains much useful and interesting information, on a great variety of topics. It is intended to combine all that is practically useful in the sciences, with all that is beautiful in the arts, forming a distinct chart of the useful and ornamental department of a lady's education. We think that this volume would be the most valuable New Year's Gift to young ladies that we have seen. It is for sale at the bookstore of R. P. & C. Williams.

AURORA BOREALIS.—The Montreal Gazette says that the Northern Lights, witnessed in this part of the country a few days since, were visible there, and in superior beauty, at the same time. 'We never recollect,' says the editor, 'to have seen the Aurora Borealis so very brilliant, and at the same time so fantastic, as on Saturday evening. A broad belt across the heavens extending from N. W. to S. E. was visible for a considerable period, while during the whole evening the sky was illuminated by the flickering lights, which played about in all quarters of the horizon.'

BOLIVAR.—The following is an extract of a letter received in New York, dated Carthagena, Dec 15:—'I lament to state that an express has just arrived which left Santa Martha on the 10th inst. at 8 o'clock in the evening, with the sad intelligence that the Liberator was dying at the country seat called San Pedro, having already received the sacrament from the hand of the illustrious Bishop of the Diocese. The people are not yet apprised of this melancholy event.'

ANOTHER SOLEMN WARNING.—A lovely daughter aged three years, the only child of Mr. Lewis Dunham, of this city, says the New York Evening Post, was last evening burned to death! The father was absent from home—the mother, while she went for a pail of water, left the child alone upon the carpet, amusing itself with toys. The candle was burning on the table. It was about two minutes when the mother returned; and on opening the door, she beheld her innocent little daughter enveloped in flames! She screamed aloud as she flew to the child, and caught her up in her arms. The cries of the mother and child gave alarm to the family in another part of the house, who all instantly rushed to the scene of calamity. It was too late to afford relief.

A physician was immediately brought in, but to no avail. The abdomen, chest and face of the little creature were literally burnt to a crisp, and presented a truly heart rending spectacle. About four hours of the most awful suffering that can be imagined, and her little heart was still!

Is the reader a parent? If he is, let this event be to you a solemn warning never to leave a little child, or little children alone with fire or with lights, for a moment. For what is there on earth that can heal the afflicted soul of this mother or bind up her wounded heart? Ay, or what in this world that she would not give, did she possess it, for the restoration of her only joy and her only hope?

It is thought the child's clothes took fire from the candle, as that was standing on the floor when the mother came in.

Richard Barrett, a native of Ireland, is desirous of finding his brother, Thomas Barrett, who came to this country about 30 years ago. Any information relating to said Thomas, may be directed to Richard Barrett Trenton, N. J. who has travelled 3800 miles, in America since July last, in quest of his brother.

LORENZO DOW.—This eccentric individual, having been nominated by some wag of the quill editorial, has thought himself called upon publicly to declare that he shall not offer himself as a candidate for the Presidency—not viewing his natural and acquired talents adequate to the approaching awfully important station from 33 to 37.

COST OF A REVOLUTION.—It is calculated that the French Revolution, from 1789 to 1815, cost a loss in lives of 25,702, 139 men. There have been in the same period, 62,889 fires, conspiracies and insurrections.

A reward of five dollars is offered by Mr Paul Cook of Fall River, Mass. for the apprehension of George Wheaton Allen, late editor of the 'Moral Envoy'—an antimasonic paper recently published in that place. He is charged with having stolen a lace veil from the store of said Cook.

The annual communication of the Grand Lodge of Maine takes place in Portland, on Thursday the 20th inst. at 7 o'clock P. M.

The annual meeting for the choice of officers of Mount Hope Lodge, will be held at Colrain Ms. on the twenty seventh inst. at one o'clock, P. M.

A few perfect copies of the present volume of the Mirror remain on hand, which will be furnished to new subscribers if desired. We would take this occasion to remind DELINQUENT SUBSCRIBERS, that the present is a season of the year when demands upon newspaper publishers are presented for adjustment. They know the rest.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Streeter Mr. John Brown to Miss Emiline Lewis.

In Roxbury, Mr. Daniel Dinsman, of Plymouth to Miss Rebecca Muncreaf.

THE WREATH.

[By the Author of 'My Early Days.'
'A LAST REMEMBRANCE.'

I never more shall see thee
Except as I now see,
In musings of the midnight hour,
While fancy revels free!
I'll never hear thy welcoming,
Nor clasp thy thrilling hand,
Nor view thy home, if e'er again
I hail our common land.

I have thee full before me—
Thy mild but mournful eye,
And brow as fair as the cold moon
That hears thy secret sigh.
There are roses in thy window,
As when I last was there;
But where hath fled the matchless one?
Thy young cheek used to wear!

Though parted, maid—long parted,
And not to meet again—
One star hath ruled the fate of both,
And seared our hearts with pain;
And though before the altar
I may not call thee bride,
Accept a token of the bond
By which we are allied.

I've found for thee an emblem
Of what hath fallen on me—
A leafless branch that lately crowned
A lightning stricken tree;
Torn from the pleasant stem it loved,
The severing scar alone
Remains to show that e'er it grew
Where it for years had grown.

For pledges of affection
I'll give thee faded flowers,
And thou shalt send me withered leaves
From Autumn's naked bowers;
The tears of untold bitterness
I'll drink instead of wine,
Carousing to thy broken peace—
Do thou as much for mine!

When e'er a passing funeral
Presents its dark array,
For thee, my maiden desolate!
I will not fail to pray.
Beneath the quiet coffin-lid
'T were better far to sleep,
Than live to nurse the scorpion Care
Within thy bosom deep.

The midnight wind is grieving—
Its melancholy swell
Doth make it meet to bear to thee
Thy lover's last farewell;
Farewell, pale child of hopelessness;
'T is something still to know,
That he who cannot claim thy heart,
Partakes of all its woe.

[London Paper.]

Ye gods, give monarchs what ye please,
Give me but home and rural ease:
Give gold to every sordid soul,
But keep me from its mean control;
Give me a modest share of wealth,
With peace, a wife, some books and health;
These are my wishes—speak ye great,
If this be pride, or pomp, or state.

ANTIMASONRY.—The Providence Literary Subaltern in an article headed 'Smith Wilkinson,' has the following remarks:

'Whilst we are on this subject, it may not be improper to express our views relative to a subject, which has already created no inconsiderable excitement, and given rise to feelings and emotions, that have a tendency, in many parts of the country to distract society.

As for Masonry, it is an institution, about which we know nothing more, than what we have been enabled to collect from Morgan's book, and the writings of Giddens and Bernard. It may be fraught with wickedness and corruption for aught we know; but if the books that we have read, be correct, and give a true and honest expose, we are unequivocally of opinion, that it is calculated to do more good than harm; and so far from being dreaded, should be looked upon with an eye of carelessness and indifference. So far as we have been enabled to discover, we have been convinced, that it should not be dreaded, but on the contrary should be cherished as an institution, that is calculated to do infinite good, and no mischief.—That it possesses all the benefits and unsurpassed advantages, which its friends have claimed for it, is an assumption that we do not think can be sustained by the existence of facts, or by the production of historical data.—The antiquity, or the order may not be correctly stated, and we very much doubt, if the society, has not on more occasions than one, been disgraced by the admission of unworthy members,

This is most certain; and to its eternal disgrace and misfortune, it admitted to its portals, the infamous William Morgan, a man who was a disgrace not only to himself, but to the age in which he flourished. His story is the story of iniquity; and can only have a tendency to reduce his memory if he be dead, in the honest estimation of every honest man. His biography, which has been impartially told by his friends as well as his foes, states that he had long led a life of dissipation; was an habitual drunkard; had on more occasions than one, been arraigned before the tribunals of his country charged with the crime of theft; and, at the time of alledged abduction, a Qui Tam action existed against him. It also appears by his biography, and the compact, that he entered into with Miller, his printer, that the only object he had in view in compiling his book, was the accumulation of money, at the sacrifice of every honest obligation, and at the expense of every ennobling principle. Such was the plain and unvarnished story of William Morgan, and is it not strange—is it not wonderful, that in an age like this, men of sense, of good principles, and of undisputed integrity, should rally around a man whose whole history, was too offensive for human contemplation!

There was a time, when we believed, that William Morgan, was not only forcibly abducted by a few men belonging to the Masonic order, but was cruelly put to death by them, and that opinion, we expressed in terms perfectly unequivocal, at a time when the antia-masonic excitement, was in its incipient stages; at a time, when but few believed that the misguided Morgan had suffered the horrors of assassination.

But our opinion has since changed; we do not believe that Morgan is dead; the story of his abduction we believe to be a sheer falsehood, got up at the onset for the double purpose of inducing the sale of Morgan's book, and assailing the political hopes and expectations of the honored and now lamented DeWitt Clinton. To produce the rapid sale of the book, it was essential that Morgan should be among the missing, and to produce the destruction of Mr. Clinton, it was important, that an impression should be fastened on the public mind that Morgan was murdered by the Masonic Institution,—an institution to which Mr. Clinton belonged, and of which, in this country he was a principal and main supporter: Morgan was of course among the missing; he was either secreted, or moved off to those remote sections of the country, to which communication and correspondence is exceedingly difficult of attainment. In those regions of the world, he now probably remains, and there he will remain, till it is perfectly convenient for him to return to his native country—whenever he may choose to do so,—and the sale of the book has been suspended, and the designs of the party have been accomplished. Then he will return, and with the audacity of a desperado, as he really is, will laugh the dupes to scorn and abash the credulous and idle multitude.'

[From the Essex Register.]

'A. B. C.'

The Editor of the Lynn Record, finding himself placed in a very awkward predicament, in consequence of his agency in the A. B. C. affair, has endeavored to explain the matter to his patrons and the public, in his Wednesday's paper, by 'stating briefly a part of what he knows of this case.' He says, that, 'about two months since, information was given to a gentleman of this town, that a person now living in this county, had made a disclosure of certain facts, which excited strong suspicions that a nefarious transaction had taken place in this vicinity, a few years since, the particulars of which, as related, it would be improper, in the present stage of the investigation to make public.' Upon the above we have to remark, that Mr. Buffum says 'There was a particular case, told to a gentleman at Lynn, by somebody, with certain facts, the particulars of which are also made known.' If certain facts were made known to a gentleman of Lynn, relating to a particular case, why did not Mr. Buffum and his Boston coadjutors, trace up the story from the clue given to them, rather than publish a notice in the Register, calling upon the public for any sort of information relating to any body, whose circumstances could 'fit the case?' Mr. Buffum says, he had in view, a particular case and certain facts, made known to a gentleman of Lynn, by a person now living in this County, who had made a disclosure. Why not, then apply to that person for more information, and through him, to the neighborhood where the nefarious transaction happened; and this must have been known, because it is said to have happened in this County.—Does 'this County' mean Lynn? If so, why publish the mysterious notice in a Salem paper? If 'this County' means Salem, why did Mr. Buffum go to three several persons in this town to make particular inquiries respecting the three several and distinct cases which were reported at this office? If Mr. Buffum knew the certain facts of his own particular case, why did he come or send to this office, so many times for the circumstances of other cases, which he must have known did not 'fit his case,' as well before as after he inquired of the different persons in Salem?

Mr. Buffum being aware that such questions would naturally occur to every one who read the exculpatory piece in his Wednesday's paper, has taken care at the same time to furnish an answer. His answer is, 'This notice was to draw out the names and residence of persons concerned, or give a clue to a case acknowledged by all to be dark, uncertain and mysterious!' How could Mr. Buffum, 'and the gentlemen in Boston interested in the cause of humanity,' consider a case 'uncertain,' of which they had certain facts, the particulars of which were related to them by a person now living in this County? and it must be recollected that Mr. Buffum & Co. place such confidence in this information, that they aver in Wednesday's paper, 'they honestly thought and still think it is founded on tragical fact.' Yet at the same time, they tell the public that these certain facts and this particular information, are acknowledged by all (meaning by all, himself and the 'Boston gentlemen interested in the cause of humanity') to be uncertain. In order to clear up the uncertainty which attends the certain facts disclosed by a person now living in the County of Essex, they publish a general notice to this whole community. Did these sagacious gentlemen expect the guilty persons would furnish evidence against themselves?

Mr. Buffum speaks of a confidential conversation which he held with one of the Salem gentlemen who called on him 'for an exculpatory paragraph,' and says, that this confidential conversation has been 'strangely perverted.' But how, Mr. Buffum does not show. It is one among a great many of his gratuitous assertions, of which his brain has proved exceedingly prolific throughout this whole affair. It stands without a shadow of proof, nay, we know it to be a false assertion. The gentleman alluded to, made no use of the confidential communication, deeming it altogether too frivolous to be repeated, even if he had felt himself at liberty to repeat it. This confidential conversation consisted in a communication to him from Mr. Buffum himself, of the certain facts which had induced him and the 'Boston gentlemen interested in the cause of humanity,' to pretend to believe that the disclosures made to them were founded in 'tragical fact.' But, unfortunately for Mr. Buffum, the gentleman alluded to had too much good sense and honesty, to be made a tool of. He declared at once to Mr. Buffum, that such 'certain facts,' were frivolous, and by no means would justify such a notice as that signed 'A. B. C.' That gentleman never disclosed those facts, as Mr. Buffum, first exacted of him a promise to that effect; but he declared at once to Mr. Buffum, and others in the presence of Mr. Buffum, that he deemed them idle, and amounting to nothing. By doing so he escaped from the hands of artful men, and at the same time exposed the intrigues of Messrs. Buffum, Phelps & Co. We say Phelps & Co. because Mr. Buffum has repeatedly said that Dr. Phelps knew and approved of all his doings in this case, and he acknowledged in this office, that the advertisement was written by a Boston gentleman, (a friend of ours who was present, understood him to say expressly Dr. Phelps) and sent down to Lynn to Mr. Buffum, who stated that he added a few lines and sent it to the Register office. The story of the dying man, his friend and nurse, (which he has admitted to be fact— tious) he acknowledged was written in Boston, but said he did not choose to point out what part he wrote himself. We have been informed by a gentleman who called at this office, that about six weeks ago, he was in Mr. Buffum's office at Lynn, where he was informed by Buffum himself, that he 'guessed there would be an excitement in Salem pretty soon.' The gentleman expressed some surprise at the remark, and told Buffum, that he did not think that the Salem people could be excited by the Morgan story. Buffum then repeated his remark, that there would be an excitement. This shows that Buffum had the A. B. C. notice in contemplation at that time, and that he was aware that it would produce just the same effect it did. Nay, he added to the notice, when copied in to his own paper, his opinion that such mysterious notice would not tend to allay the excitement which already existed among his Salem 'friends.'

The investigation of the secret and mysterious doings of Messrs. Buffum & Co. together with his confessions while undergoing a pretty severe examination at our office, and the evasions, subterfuges, and positively false statements by himself and his coadjutors, at different times since the mysterious A. B. C. plot began to develop itself, have exposed the whole intrigue to our entire satisfaction.—When it was objected to Mr. Buffum that the relation of the fictitious circumstances of the dying man, his friend and nurse, in his notice was reprehensible, he replied, that 'he did not think the public would be so squeamish as to reject that!' This shows what opinion Mr. Buffum has of the public, and how much regard he has for truth.

In his Wednesday's paper he says, 'in the mean time the investigation must be pursued.' By whom? He said in the course of his conversation at this office, that 'they had got hold of something, and he presumed there would be a legal investigation.' He has dropped the word legal in his paper, and now we presume the investigation is to be made by those who do not think it all a 'hoax.'

The gentleman of Lynn, who voluntarily wrote a part of the 'exculpatory paragraph' at the instance of the persons of Salem, who felt injured by the notice of A. B. C. is one of those who do not think it a hoax; for he added to that paragraph the words, 'This is not a hoax, but shall be explained in due time.' These words were stricken from the paragraph by request of the Salem gentlemen; but they were nevertheless written by that gentleman. Now, if the Road Commissioner* will pledge his name to the public that he has any good ground for his assertion, (for he is a gentleman whom we have been accustomed to respect) we confess that we shall be induced to consider the story with the attention which it deserves. If he does not, we do not know why he is not to be considered as connected with the knot of gross imposters who have got up this extraordinary plot.

We feel a reluctance to pursue any farther the inquiry into the names of the persons. We have no wish to touch them ourselves, and do not think the public desirous of having them drawn out from their sordid and grovelling condition, to excite either its disgust or contempt. The sub-agents of this impudent intrigue may rest in their obscurity, for we should feel humble in the pursuit and detection of meanness and worthlessness. This pursuit would prove to be a verification of the classical fable,

'So Proteus hunted in a nobler shape;
Becomes at last a puppy or an ape.'

We have pointed out the originators of the intrigue, and left no doubt on the public mind as to their motives and designs. Some of these men have a lofty bearing; and from their present stations or station which they have held are not altogether unfit to be pointed out for public reprobation.

Mr. Buffum may pretend as much as he pleases in his paper that this exposure comes from Masons. It is not the fact. No one who has been concerned in this exposure has any concern with that subject whatever. The exposure has been made, from the necessity we were under to vindicate the character of the gentlemen who were so greatly injured by the notice published in the Register, as well as to throw off from this paper any imputations from any quarter. As to the personal fears, which Mr. Buffum pretended to have, of assassination by Masons, he may, we think, be quite easy on that score; but, he has some reason to fear that just punishment which the laws of the Commonwealth will award to the publisher of false reports calculated to cause a great excitement, throw dark suspicions around individuals, and harrow up the feelings of families. This Mr. Buffum has done, and done it with a full belief that this would be the effect.

MODERN PERSECUTION.

We will put down Masonry by the sword, if we cannot put it down without.—JACOB HALL.

NO. III.

Except the horrible outrages committed on the Huguenots, the sufferings inflicted on the English Reformers, and the persecution commonly denominated the Salem Witchcraft, nothing has exceeded the recent excesses of the party called Antimasonic. Friends have been divided, families broken up, neighborhoods rent into factions, and towns thrown into confusion. Christians have suffered, ministers of God have been driven from their dwellings and associates, and churches subjected to this destroying tempest. It has swept over our land like a whirlwind; it has invaded every domestic, social, civil and political relation. Neither the hall of legislation, nor the temple of justice, nor the sanctuary of the Most High, has escaped its destructive progress. Abandoned and unprincipled men, from the miserable wretch whose low habits lead him to the kennels of vice, to the hypocritical pretender who ministers at the altar of God, have united in the unholy work of scattering firebrands and death.

Antimasonry has the preeminent merit of uniting men in one common cause, on whom virtue and intelligence never could have promoted union or sympathy. Virtue and intelligence! As well might the midnight assassin, the noon-day robber, and the pirate of the ocean, unite in support of a wholesome and well regulated system of laws for the protection of life, property and commerce! As well might the wandering Arab, the degraded Hottentot, and the native hunter of our forests, unite in support of civilization and refinement! But there is a principle, under whose absorbing influence even the leaders of antimasonry, with their party colored characters and patch work morality, find themselves thrown together and amalgamated, like the broken and disjointed vestiges of a whirlwind or a deluge. It is the only principle that could possibly unite men of such inclinations and habits. That principle is political ambition. It is a tremendous, overwhelming power, which unites the vicious, corrupt, abandoned and unprincipled in the hope of obtaining, by an unholy compact, what belongs only to the virtuous and intelligent.—It is an idol at whose dark footstool everything that is base and unworthy falls down in meek adoration. There the ties of friendship have but a feeble force; the obligations of truth find easy absolution; and the influence of morals readily yields to the varying force of circumstances.

The maxim there is, that each one is right, in promoting his own views of personal interest and aggrandizement; and, as the end justifies the means, that mean provarication and open falsehood are warranted in the prosecution of the interest of the party. Whether these detestable principles have been openly avowed, in so many words, is somewhat doubtful. For though the leaders have no integrity, they have some cunning, and would hesitate to proclaim doctrines that would be startling even to some of their numbers. But whether antimasonry is built up and supported by such practices, is as notorious as that the antimasonic party exists. And if antimasonry is to exist, in any shape, it must be by these principles and practices. Let it once include within the field of its operations an honest, open and manly policy, and there is an end to the party. It must, therefore, be a matter of consideration in their frequent, secret, midnight conclaves, whether the adoption of some new, nefarious project will further their views; or what is the same thing, whether an honorable and honest system of measures would not cause their immediate destruction. The matter is resolved then into self preservation. And, on the ocean of ambition, the boldest and most daring spirits will seize the means to the accomplishment of their wishes, be they what they may, while the timorous are lost in the sneers of their dishonest but bolder associates, and the contempt of honest men.

VERITAS.

Messrs. MOORE & SEVEY:

In the Mirror of the 1st inst. I notice my name conspicuously arrayed with the names of other persons, as connected with the antimasonic convention in this city the past winter. I had cherished the hope, that with the excitement of the moment, I should be permitted to retire without the pale of public notice; and, in the shade of obscurity, to feel that I was alike forgotten and forgiven by my Masonic and antimasonic friends. From this retreat and fancied security, you have been pleased, 'without money and without price,' to bring me forth; and in bold relief is my name suffered to grace the columns of the Mirror. Graciously and generous as apparently is this act of yours, I should render myself unworthy of your continued confidence, were I passively to content myself with the enjoyment of honors, gratuitously conferred, and altogether above the summit of my ambition—viz. the honors of political antimasonry. You will, therefore, confer an acknowledged favor, if in any future notice of the convention referred to, I may be suffered to escape your notice; having neither aided in the deliberations of this or any other convention, connected with Masonry or antimasonry; nor attended any meeting with a view of participating in measures. I do not, however, intend to convey the idea that at this or any other time, I should be averse to a candid and fair investigation of the principles of Freemasonry, in relation to their influence upon the moral and political institutions of our country. While I have freely avowed these principles, I have as freely avowed my determination never to lend myself to a spirit of persecution against those who may differ from me upon this or any other question. They were avowed to those through whose kindness I was chosen a member of the convention. They would have formed the ground work of a declination, had I been in the city or state, during its session, or have received notice of my appointment, previous to my leaving the city. They have guided my course in refraining from attending meetings of mere inquiry; with a single exception, and this by invitation of a friend at the door, and with the belief that the meetings were alike free to Masons, Jacks, or Anties. This however was not the fact in relation to this meeting. The political regeneration of the state, could be entrusted only to a secret meeting of its friends. It was upon this occasion, that I ventured to take a part in the deliberations of an antimasonic convention, by doubting the statement, not to say the veracity, of a gentleman who made a statement well calculated to fan the embers of opposition into a flame, which would, in its progress, consume the whole fabric of political Masonry, and leave the loaves and fishes, the honors and emoluments of office at the mercy of their more honest neighbors. It was upon this occasion that I remarked that, were I disposed to enter into a political crusade against Masons, I could seek an apology in the uncompromising spirit of those, whose bitterness of feeling had betrayed their judgment into acts of indiscretion,—adding, that if the gentleman would substantiate his position, I should feel it to be a duty to join any party whose efforts should tend to restore the public to the enjoyment of equal privileges. It was upon this occasion, that I was assured of the undoubted fact, that I was a half a century behind the age, in point of (physical) antimasonic information; and here, Messrs. Editors, I am content to remain, until I can prosecute my inquiries distinct from the advancement of political demagogues.

LYCEUM APPARATUS.

Next to suitable books and a good teacher or lecturer, may be reckoned cheap and effective apparatus. It should be such as is easily understood, durable, and not very liable to be put out of order; of this kind is a set of Pneumatic Apparatus, to be found at the usual places of deposit in this city.

Description. The pneumatic apparatus is put up in a case made of hard wood, divided by partitions, so as to receive a variety of articles, of various shapes. Under the cover is pasted a lithographic print, to explain the designs and uses of every article.

Fig. 1. Represents an air pump, for exhausting and condensing. It consists of a single brass barrel, five-eighths of an inch diameter, in which a piston moves about four inches; a ground brass plate, three inches in diameter, is attached to the lower end of the barrel; this is placed on top of a ground glass jar, (for such jars are furnished with the case,) to remove the air from within. By this apparatus several interesting experiments are performed. The ground plate has a hole through its centre, in which a valve is attached capable of being reversed. The piston can be made solid by inserting a screw prepared for that purpose, by means of which the pump may be used for condensing air into a vessel, as well as exhausting air from a vessel. There is also a projecting screw from the lower part of the pump, to which a glass tube or any vessel may be attached. The air is let in again by a side screw.

Fig. 2. A glass tube having the pump attached to the upper end, while the lower end stands in a bowl of water. When the piston is raised, a partial vacuum is formed in the tube, and the water rises. This is occasioned by the superior pressure of the air, on the water in the bowl outside of the tube; if the side screw be loosened, air is admitted into the tube, and the water descends to its level. On this principle water is raised in a common pump.

Fig. 3. A glass vessel attached to the pump. This may be made fast to the band, like a cupping glass; or a piece of india rubber stretched over its mouth, shows the effect of external pressure when air is removed from within. It also shows the effect of compressed air, when the condenser is used.

Fig. 4. A vessel having a thin bladder stretched over its mouth, which is burst with a considerable report, when the air is removed from the vessel. This is occasioned by the pressure of the atmosphere without.

Fig. 5. A bladder half filled with air. This is put inside of a glass jar. In pumping the air from the jar, we also remove it from the outside of the bladder; the air within, meeting with less resistance, expands and fills the whole bladder. On readmitting the air to the jar, it presses again on the outside of the bladder, and the air which is within the bladder resumes its former bulk.

Fig. 6. A small bottle inverted in a jar one third filled with water. On removing the air from the surface of the water in the jar, the air in the bottle expands and escapes through the water. If half the air has escaped, the bottle will be half filled with water, on letting the water into the jar; and will remain thus elevated until the air is removed again.

Fig. 7. Represents a balloon rising and falling in the water; the balloon is a glass vessel placed in the water in a glass jar, with the open end downwards; a portion of the air is removed by the pump, and water enough is admitted just to sink the balloon. After this, a very little movement of the piston will cause it to rise to the surface of the water. On the other hand, if the balloon be just light enough to float, a very little extra pressure on the surface of the water will cause it to sink.

Fig. 8. A block of wood suspended in water in a glass jar, having a lead weight to sink it. On removing the air from the surface of the water, air bubbles may be seen rising from the ends of the wood, which continue to rise copiously for some time. Wood-turnings or saw dust will sink in water, and carry air enough down with them, to buoy them up on removing the pressure from the surface of the water. The last four experiments depend on the expansive quality of the air.

Fig. 9. A small bell, suspended from the pump in a glass receiver. This is intended to show the difference of sound when placed in a vacuum; but it is not very perceptible in this small apparatus.

Fig. 10. A bell with its rim ground and placed on the plate of the pump. When well exhausted, it requires from forty to sixty pounds of power to remove it. This answers the purpose of the common hemispherical cups.

Fig. 11. A conical glass vessel furnished with a stop-cock and jet pipe, for a fountain in vacuo; with the pump attached in the position for exhausting the vessel.

Fig. 12. Shows the fountain in action, the pump being removed, and the end of the stop-cock placed in a bowl of water; it is then opened, and the water rises through the jet pipe and strikes the top of the vessel. This is caused by the pressure of the atmosphere.

Fig. 13. A glass flask furnished with a very small stop-cock for weighing air, the pump is attached to the position for exhausting the flask, which has previously been balanced as in figure 14 with the air in.

Fig. 14. Shows the flask suspended from one end of the scale beam. The flask being now exhausted of the air, the counterpoise preponderates; but on opening the stop-cock the air is heard to rush into the flask, and the beam gradually resumes its horizontal position; clearly proving that air has weight, and hence its pressure.

Fig. 15. A simple contrivance to show the resistance of the air. It consists of two broad but thin pieces of metal; these are made to revolve either edgewise or flatwise against the air, showing that a broad surface is much more resisted than a narrow one.

Fig. 16. A bowl, with a number of spots painted on the inner surface, to show the refraction of the rays of light. If the eye be placed so as to observe a spot near the upper edge of the bowl, and kept in that situation while water is poured in, the rays of light will be bent downwards and the whole of the spots will be visible.—The same effect takes place when the rising sun's rays strike our atmosphere obliquely, they are bent towards the earth, so that we actually perceive the sun before he is risen above the horizon.

Fig. 17. A copper air vessel, one third filled with water on which air is condensed to produce a fountain in the open air. This will serve to explain the principle of a fire engine. In this vessel, the air is forced in, upon the surface of the water; in the fire engine, the water is forced into the air-chamber under the air; the air in both cases acts by its elastic force to keep up a continual stream.—The air-chamber is extensively applied in hydraulic machinery.

Fig. 18. The same, with a revolving jet of water, on the principle of Barker's mill. This makes a circular shower of water in a vertical plane; about six feet diameter.

Fig. 19. A leather sucker and block. The leather should be well soaked in water. It is furnished with a brass knob in the centre, with a hole through it. This knob may be held between two fingers, while the hole is covered with the thumb. If it be placed flat on the block so as to exclude the air, on raising the leather the block will raise with it, but if you remove the thumb, the air will pass down the hole into the knob, and the block will fall. This is owing to the pressure of the air on the outer edge of the leather, while a vacuum is formed by raising the leather in the centre. It is said that flies walk on the ceiling or on a pane of glass, and that some animals attach themselves to rocks on this principle.

Fig. 20. A syphon. This consists of a bent tube, having one leg rather longer than the other. The short leg is put into a vessel of water; the end of the long leg is to be stopped with the finger, while the mouth is applied to a small tube to remove the air from the syphon. The syphon then fills with water by the pressure of air on the surface of the water in the vessel. If the finger be removed, the water will continue to flow from the longer leg as long as the water in the vessel is higher than the end of the pipe from which the water issues.

Fig. 21. A water pump, with a glass barrel, to show the action of the piston and valves. A vacuum is formed inside of the pipe of the pump by the moving of the piston. The water ascends by the pressure of the atmosphere, until it gets above the piston. Then it is sustained by the piston as it ascends, and by the lower valve when the piston descends. The atmosphere will support a column of water only to about thirty-three feet high. The working barrel with its piston and lower valve, should be placed considerably within that distance, on account of imperfections to which the pump is liable and the variation in the height of the water in the well.

Fig. 22. Water supported in an inverted glass vessel, the mouth being covered with writing paper. This experiment shows the pressure of the atmosphere, and may be performed by any one with a common tumbler or wine glass.

Fig. 23. Fermented liquor appears to boil in vacuo;—and water boils at less heat than in the atmosphere; shown in a glass jar, when the air is exhausted. The experiment with boiling water should be managed with care, on account of breaking the glass vessel. A common oil flask, with a well fitted cork attached to the screw of the pump will answer best.

Fig. 24. Smoke descends in vacuo. If a small lighted taper or piece of tobacco, be placed near the bottom of a glass receiver and the air be well exhausted, the smoke will be seen to descend.

Many applications of pneumatics to the common affairs of life, as exhibited by this simple apparatus, might have been given, but must be deferred until another time.

The price of a case containing apparatus for all the above experiments is $33. Sometimes a larger case, containing a preparation for the additional experiment of raising a 56 lb. weight by the pressure of the air, is furnished; the price of which is $37.

A FRIEND TO USEFUL KNOWLEDGE.

N. B. Apparatus of this kind should be cleaned as soon as possible after use. The brass work, if wiped dry and then rubbed with a cloth a little oily, will look well for a long time. Any glass vessel whose aperture is too small to admit a cloth, may be rinsed out first with soft water, then with alcohol or new rum, and suffered to drain. This will preserve a neat appearance. The valves of the pump should be kept moist with sweet oil.

COMPOUND MOTION.

If a body be acted upon by two forces in different directions it will move between them. Hence, if a ball be dropped from the mast head of a ship under sail, being held one foot before the mast, it will fall on deck one foot before the mast. It had, when dropped the forward motion of the ship; this, and the gravity, will cause it to descend in a line inclined from a perpendicular towards the prow of the vessel. If, at the moment the ball drops, the ship should stop, it would strike several feet before the mast.—If the ship was at rest, but, at the moment of dropping it, should sail, it would strike the deck several feet behind the mast.

THE SPIDER AND THE FLY.

BY MISS HOWELL.

Air—Will you come to the Bower.

The following is a lesson for all folks—great and small—from the infant to the Emperor of Russia—the grand Seigneur of Turkey, and the Queen of Portugal—or from those who play with toy cannons, to such as are now figuring on the theatre of War—

‘Will you walk into my parlor?’ said a spider to a fly;
 ‘Tis the prettiest little parlor that ever you did spy;
 The way into my parlor is up a winding stair,
 And I’ve many pretty things to show you, when you get there;’

‘Oh no!’ said the little fly, ‘to ask me is in vain
 For who goes up your winding stair, can ne’er come down again!’

‘I’m sure you must be weary with soaring up so high;
 Will you rest upon my little bed,’ said the spider to the fly,

‘There are pretty curtains drawn around, the sheets are fine and thin,
 And if you like to rest awhile, I’ll snugly tuck you in!’

‘Oh, no! no!’ said the little fly, ‘for I’ve often heard it said,
 They never, never awake again, who sleep upon your bed!’

Said the cunning spider to the fly, ‘dear friend what shall I do,
 To prove the warm affection I’ve always felt for you?’

I have within my pantry, good store of all things nice—
 I’m sure you’re very welcome,—will you please to take a slice?’

‘Oh, no! no!’ said the little fly, ‘kind sir that cannot be;
 I’ve heard what’s in your pantry, and I do not wish to see.’

‘Sweet creature,’ said the spider, ‘you’re witty and you’re wise
 How handsome are your gauzy wings, how brilliant are your eyes!’

I have a little looking glass upon my parlor shelf,
 If you’ll step in one moment, dear, you shall behold yourself;’

‘I thank you, gentle sir,’ she said ‘for what you’re pleased to say!’

And bidding you good morning now, I’ll call another day!’

THE TOMB.

‘When I look,’ says Addison, ‘upon the tombs of the great, every emotion of envy dies within me. When I read the epitaphs of the beautiful, every inordinate desire goes out. When I meet with the grief of parents upon a tombstone, my heart melts with compassion. When I see the tombs of parents themselves, I consider the vanity of grieving for those whom we must quickly follow. When I see kings lying by those who deposed them, when I consider rival wits placed side by side, or the holy men that divided the world by their contests and disputes, I reflect with sorrow and astonishment on the little competitions and debates of mankind. When I read the several dates of the tombs of some that died yesterday, and some six hundred years ago, I consider that great day, when we shall all of us be contemporaries, and make our appearance together.’

And does it require long time, days, weeks, months and years, to enable human beings to love one another? Does the human heart slowly and suspiciously lay up one kind thought after another till the measure of its affection be full? May gentle words and kindling smiles pass from the lips and yet the heart remain cold and untouched, and willing to lose sight of, and forget the object of its transitory tenderness? It may be so with some, it may be so with many, for the accidents of time teach different lessons, all equally necessary and wholesome perhaps to different hearts; but before human nature has been sorely tried, afflicted, or deceived, its temper is open to kindness and to joy; and attracted by the sympathies of a common nature why may not those who are strangers to day, be friends to morrow? Nor does the deepest affliction always close up the fountains of love in the human soul. The saddest turn often is sudden restoration to the gay and joyful; like light streaming in upon a prisoner through the bars of his dungeon, is the smile on faces not yet bedimmed by grief, to the man of many miseries; and he who hugs his sorrow close to his soul, will often, at once, lay down the rueful burthen to which he has so long clung with infatuated despair, at the sight of youth, beauty, and innocence, rejoicing before him in untamed, fearless, and triumphant bliss. There are often, also sudden revelations of sympathy made between human beings by a word, a tone, a look, or a smile; truth is then suddenly and easily conveyed into their spirits, and from that moment they rest assured of other’s affection and each others worth, as much as if they had been mutually known for years. If there were not these strong and prevailing tendencies in our nature, the paths of human life would be barren indeed; or the friendships that spring up over them would in general, be sown by the mercenary hand of interest or self love. But nature follows other processes; and love and friendship, at first sight, often spring up as necessarily as flowers expand from bud to blossom, in the course of a few sunny and dewy hours of one vernal morning.

FLORIO.

‘ECSTASY.’

The animal magnetisers of Paris pretend, that when they have thrown any one into a state of what they are pleased to call ‘ecstasy,’ the body is insensible of suffering; and they are just now circulating and attaching great importance to the case of an old lady of 64, who, having been thrown by them into a state of ecstasy, underwent, as they say, the severe operation of having an ulcerous cancer cut out of her neck, without experiencing the slightest pain! During the whole operation, adds the statement, she exhibited no sense of suffering, or even of sensation, until towards the end when she laughed like a person who was tickled, and exclaimed, Finissez, ne me chatouillez pas—‘leave off, do not tickle me.’ Previous to each dressing of the wound she was again magnetised with perfect success, and the cure was complete.

The most secret crimes are discovered so easily, notwithstanding all the care that has been taken to prevent their being brought to light; and such discoveries seem to result so naturally even from the darkest plots that the authors of those crimes could invent to hide their guilt, that one would think nothing but God could have produced those unexpected events: the number of these discoveries is so great, that those who are pleased to attribute them to chance, must own, at least, that from all ages the effects of chance have been most wonderful.

MISCELLANY.

ANNA ROYAL.

To the Courier and Enquirer.

CANANDAIGUA, Nov. 1830.

Gentlemen.—Where are the glittering ten thousand swords of gallantry which Edmund Burke talked of? Why do not the lazy scoundrels leap from their scabbards and avenge the insults offered to the Lady Walter Scott of the new world?—The sufferings which Maria Antoinette bore are nothing to mine. She only had her head taken off by the gentlemanly guillotine; but I have forty heads taken off besides the pulling out of ninety horns. I have suffered as much as the celebrated Hortensia, the fair philosopher of Alexandria or some other heathen city, whom the rascally monks and antimasons murdered on the banks of the Nile and then flung in to the river to make a breakfast for a crocodile.

I have scarcely slept a wink since I left Pittsburgh—that barbarous, ignorant, smoky, pitiful, rascally, dirty, dignity silly, murderous, antimasonic vagabond village. Have you heard how I have been used there by the antimasons? If there had been a spark of gallantry remaining, the carrier pigeons ought to have spread intelligence of the outrage from Maine to Georgia. A rascally Post Master refused to frank me a letter to you my honored friends, I mean to have him removed instantly. I know he has been dealing in coffin hand-bills. But the antimasons! the antimasons! ‘If you have tears prepare to shed them now;’—if your hearts ever bled, now let it pour forth floods. I went into an antimasonic shop in Pittsburgh to sell a black book; the people in it had a rascally, antimasonic, down look. I told them if they wanted to do any business they must get gentlemen behind the counter; that if they could beg or borrow or steal the tail of a monkey from any old Museum, and have it pinned to his coat tail, he might be carried through the country, and make a fortune by exhibiting an antimasonic or a Morgan rarity. What do you think he did? Why the fellow sneaked down stairs with a cowskin behind his back, and perpetrated an assault and battery on Mrs. Ann Royal. Oh! how my heart boiled! If I had not a fever on me at the time, I would have caught the villain and whipt him on the spot. He ran, however, like a greyhound into a dark chamber. What could I do with a leg which the Blue-skin in Vermont broke the other year, and which is not yet absolutely as good as new? I will not disgrace your paper by writing down his name; but it will be easily recognised. His countenance will bear witness—yes his Cam-like face will furnish prima facie evidence against him for almost any court of Justice, from a simple larceny up to a respectable burglary. Oh! if I had caught him how I could have nullified him, and disunioned every limb in his body. But these antimasons have the longest legs in the world, and bless me how they use them!

We must have the world reformed. The right of women are disregarded. If the nullifiers of South Carolina had any brains, which is rather doubtful, they would do something for the fair sex, instead of their stuff about the tariff and cotton bags. When I was last in New York, I mentioned the necessity of doing something for the recovery of the last rights of women to Russell Comstock.—He agreed with me decidedly, and said he meant to look for them amongst the lost rights of the states. I have no doubt but both have been hid away by the nullifiers. Give my compliments to Russell, and tell him I shall be glad to hear that he prosecutes his patriotic course.

But of these antimasons; they are the wickedest pack of rascals that ever crawled between heaven and earth—all but one. What one? you will ask with a smile. Why, then out it must come—my friend Frank Granger, who, contrary to my solemn advice, took their nomination and almost broke up the friendship, that, like a rose in the bud was just blooming into maturity between us. He has one of the most princely houses I ever saw, and then he is so hospitable, polite, kind, and chatty, besides doing dancing, carving and such like accomplishments, almost as good as an angel.

When I reached this place, he was in high spirits, about the election. 'I'm governor—I'm governor, Mrs. Royal,' cried Frank. 'You're a fool,' said I. The messengers were arriving every five minutes, with majorities from the 'infected district.' 'Mr. Granger,' says another scoundrel antimason, 1500 from Monroe—we have done wonders, must have a flour inspector's birth'—'Mr. Granger,' says another 'a majority in Cayuga—Throop is dished—I should be pleased to be canal collector.' Frank bowed, smiled, looked pleased and promised everything. Says 'to him, 'Frank do you believe these rascals, they tell you that you are elected—there is not one word of truth in them—you are no more elected than I am—they are deceiving you.' 'My dear madam,' said Frank, bowing low, 'these are very large majorities—I must think I'm elected'—and then he went to spouting Mr. Shakespeare's poetry about the crown, and all that.

Well, next day came and up comes Oneida like the rush of the Trenton Falls in a thunder storm—the Herkimer at his heels—then Montgomery—then Rensselaer—then Albany. 'Bring me no more reports.' 'Mrs. Royal give me your hand—the antimasons are all cheats—henceforth I turn my attention to philosophy and ruta baga—antimasonry I foreswear,' and then covering himself with a mantle like the immortal Cæsar, he sat down to one of the fattest roast turkeys, I think, I ever set my four old teeth upon. 'Frank,' said I, 'this turkey was never raised by an antimason.' Hang old Root! said he. 'Take care how you touch old Root,' said I, 'he is my friend.'

So you will see I have saved my honored friend Frank from that desolating scourge of antimasonry. I have snatched him like a burning brand out of the furnace. When I came through the Genesee county, I was told that my life was in danger. 'Let them try' said I, like the immortal Stark. 'Phineas L. Tracy is on the look out for you,' said some one. 'Let him come,' said I, 'I can thrash him any day—I have done it before in Washington, and I'll do it again.' Then there was a report that Fred. Whittlesey was a going to waylay me. 'He waylay me,' said I, 'the mean sneaking fellow—I am only afraid that he will sue me for damages. Oh! if I could only get him to knock a chip off my shoulder, and so I set round the law, I would give him one of the soundest thrashings that he ever had. Then came another rumor, that Bates Cooke and Thurlow Weed meant to make an antimason of me. 'If they do,' said I, 'I'll Tim-Munroe every hair on their heads—I'll Morganise them—I'll dish them—So the antimasons are down the Niagara, where they themselves put poor Morgan, for I have no doubt his blood is on their guilty heads—poor fellow.

My dear gentlemen, I shall be in New York soon,—present my sentiments to Mr. Charles King who, I understand has much improved of late—tell him to cut off his whiskers. Col. Stone, I suppose, is still sipping any body's wine, and smoking every body's segars. Secretary Dwight will be crawling out of his flannel, and organising the Church and State-Blue-Burgundy party, to overwhelm me in New York. Let him look out for squalls,—I'm not afraid of the world in arms—provided the antimasonic bears are all tied up.—Pray, how is 'good society' getting on? I have a few odd accounts to settle with them. What a glorious thing is the French Revolution, I have some thoughts of going over to see Louis Philip, and putting him in my Black Book. Thine for ever.

ANNA ROYAL.

'The language of birds,' says the late Rev. Gilbert White, in his 'Natural History of Selborne,' 'is very ancient; and, like other ancient modes of speech, elliptical; little is said, but much is meant and understood. The notes of the eagle kind are shrill and piercing; and about the season of nidification much diversified, as I have been assured by a curious observer of nature, who long resided at Gibraltar, where eagles abound. The notes of our hawks much resemble those of the king of birds. Owls have very expressive notes; they hoot in a fine vocal sound, much resembling vox humana, and reducible by a pitch-pipe to a musical key. This note seems to express complacency and rivalry among the males: they use also a quick call and a horrible scream, and can snore and hiss when they mean to menace. Ravens, beside their loud croak, can exert a deep and solemn note that makes the woods to echo; the amorous sound of a crow is strange and ridiculous; rooks, in the breeding season, attempt sometimes in the gaiety of their hearts, to sing but to no great success. The parrot kind have many modulations of voice as appears by their aptitude to learn human sounds. Doves coo in an amorous and mournful manner, and are emblems of despairing lovers.—The wood pecker sets up a sort of loud and hearty laugh. The fern-owl, or goat-sucker, from the dusk till day break, serenades his mate with the clattering of castenets. All the tuneful passeres express their complacency by sweet modulations, and a variety of melody. The swallow as has been observed in a former letter, by a shrill alarm bespeaks the attention of the other hivundines, and bids them be aware that the hawk is at hand. Aquatic and gregarious birds, especially the nocturnal, that shift their quarters in the dark, are very noisy and loquacious—as cranes, wild geese, wild ducks, and the like; their perpetual clamor prevents them from dispersing and losing their companions. In so extensive a subject, sketches and outlines are as much as can be expected; for it would be endless to instance all the infinite variety of the feathered nation. We shall, therefore, confine the remainder of this letter to the few domestic fowls of our yards which are most known, and, therefore, best understood. And, first the peacock, with his gorgeous train, demands our attention; but, like most of the gaudy birds, his notes are grating and shocking to the ear; the yelling of cats, and the braying of an ass, are not more disgusting. The voice of the goose is trumpet-like and clashing, and once saved the capital of Rome, as grave historians assert; the hiss also of the gander is formidable, and full of menace, and 'protective of his young.' Among ducks, the sexual distinction of voice is remarkable; for while the quack of the female is loud and sonorous, the voice of the drake is inward, harsh and feeble, and scarce discernable. The cock turkey struts and gobbles to his mistress in a most uncouth manner; he hath also a pert and petulant note when he attacks his adversary. When a hen turkey leads forth her young brood, she keeps a watchful eye; and if a bird of prey appear, though ever so high in the air, the careful mother announces the enemy with a little inward moan, and watches him with a steady and active look; but if he approach, her notes become earnest and alarming, and her outcries are redoubled. No inhabitants of a yard seem possessed of such a variety of expression and so copious a language as common poultry. 'Take a chicken of four or five days old, and hold it up to a window where there are flies, and it will immediately seize its prey with little twitterings of complacency; but if you tender it a wasp or a bee, at once its note becomes harsh, and expressive of disapprobation and a sense of danger.—When a pullet is ready to lay, she intimates the event by a joyous and easy soft note. Of all the occurrences of their life, that of laying seems to me most important; for no sooner has a hen disburdened herself, than she rushes forth with a clamorous kind of joy, which the cock and the rest of his mistresses immediately adopt. The tumult is not confined to the family concerned but catches from yard to yard, and spreads to every homestead within hearing, till at last the whole village is in an uproar. As soon as a hen becomes a mother, her new relation demands a new language; she then runs clucking and screaming about, and seems agitated as if possessed. The father of the flock has a considerable vocabulary; if he finds food, he calls a favorite concubine to partake; and if a bird of prey passes over, with a warning voice he bids his family beware.

The gallant chanticleer has, at command his amorous phrases, and his terms of defiance. But the sound by which he is best known is his crowing; by this he has been distinguished in all ages as the countryman's clock or larum, as the watchman that proclaims the division of the night. Thus the poet elegantly styles him,

'The crested cock, whose clarion sounds
The silent hours.'

CONJUGAL AFFECTION.—After the heat of the late contest in the streets of Paris had subsided, a woman was seen running about and eagerly examining every dead body in her way—he was looking for her husband. A gentleman who had watched her progress for some time, endeavored to console her with the hope of his being yet alive. 'No, he must be killed; I have not set eyes on him since morning; I hope in God I shall find his body, for he has got the key of the street door in his pocket.'

When you are elevated with reading a work, and your mind is inspired with noble and generous sentiments, seek not for any other rule to judge it by; it is good, and done by a masterly hand.

PROGRESS OF
LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

NO. V.

To follow the astonishingly rapid progress of every branch of learning and refinement of manners through the eighteenth century, is a herculean task, and one which we shall not attempt. Suffice it to say, that notwithstanding the series of wars and revolutions which have, heretofore, agitated Europe, science has been steadily progressive, and if literature has made no advances, it has lost nothing.—France, however, by too great severity in political and religious matters, compelled her men of genius to seek another country for the promulgation of their writings. The celebrated Bayle fled his country rather than have his writings pass the ordeal of a censorship; had he published them without, it would have been at the risk of his head. England was more politic; the consequence is, she stands preeminent in the literary world. The productions of Addison, Steele, Clark and Swift, exercised great influence on the manners of the age, and had more weight in rescuing their countrymen from the contagion of evil example, than those of all their contemporaries. They successfully resisted the encroachments of the deistical principles of Voltaire, Shaftesbury and Walston, which had corrupted the morals of society in other parts of Europe. Those chaste and correct performances 'the Spectator,' 'the Guardian,' and 'the Tatler,' most ably supported the cause of morality, and gave a character to every department of literature.

These improvements were, by no means, limited to the bounds of England; their influence extended through all Europe. The Germans, an industrious and plodding people, turned their attention to the abstruse sciences, and have produced some valuable works on experimental philosophy, natural history, chemistry and metaphysics; which exhibit intense research, and the most profound erudition. Russia, under Peter—the most enterprising monarch of his age,—experienced a greater change in her literature and arts than any other section of the world, and though she is still far behind her sister nations, the exertion of that sovereign gave an impetus which has rendered knowledge slowly, but gradually progressive. Sweden contributed her share in the production of many great and learned men; and Denmark was not backward in patronizing the arts and sciences;—she cultivated mathematics, astronomy, zoology, and botany with considerable success. Neither did Italy remain inactive, though she had many difficulties to encounter:—In music, poetry, drawing, painting and sculpture, she was not behind the most polished European nations. In fine, there is no part of the civilized world that has not participated in this general diffusion of knowledge, and none that is not in a great measure indebted to it for its civilization, its morals and manners.—Even the most distant and rude nations of the earth have felt its influence and acknowledged its blessings. The miserable devotee on the Ganges, the half-famished pagan on the Hologang Ile, the wild inhabitant on the Mississippi, and the isolated cannibal on the Pacific, are taught to cultivate the soil, to renounce their errors, to acquire a knowledge of the supreme, to kneel at the altar of the same God.

In considering the advance of literature and science, we must not omit noticing our own country. It is true we cannot exhibit so many important inventions and discoveries, nor boast of so splendid a catalogue of names, as either England or France; yet we are proud to enrol a Franklin, a Hutton, a Watt, a Fulton, a Bently, a Cooper, a Chandler, an Irving, a Perkins, and many others, who, when placed at the side of European genius, would lose nothing by the comparison. Our Republic has had many obstacles to encounter in laying the foundation for a glorious and permanent superstructure; it has been shaken by party, and almost severed by dissensions; and the encouragement afforded has been totally inadequate to call into action the latent powers of superior intellect. The genius of our country has, too generally, been compelled to seek for patronage in foreign climes; or contend with the frowns of adversity, and reap its laurels as a reward. But these times are fast passing away, encouragement begins to be extended, and will, it is believed, be commensurate with native talent and intellect. It is the dictate of sound policy, and the present age is too wise and enlightened to neglect it.

Though many parts of the earth still remain in a state scarcely emerged from barbarism, the arts of civilization and refinement are beginning to receive the attention of all. The South American Republics are cherishing and cultivating the genius and learning of Europe. Ambitions to take an elevated rank in the scale of nations, and liberal in their patronage, literature and science, notwithstanding the difficulties incident to a recent emancipation, are making rapid progress; thus establishing on an imperishable basis, the Temple of Liberty. This is the surest pledge that can be given of the permanency of any government, and the only method of improving the morals and manners of a people.

END OF FIRST SERIES.

[We call this the end of the first series, because we have but sketched the outlines of an immense and splendid picture; and we may add, to us an interesting one.—We may hereafter attempt the filling up; not with the expectation however, that we shall be able to do more than to furnish a few of the most prominent features. If we do this acceptably, we shall have accomplished all that we aimed at.]

Rev. MOSES THACHER—Result of council.—We have before us the result of an Ecclesiastical Council, convened in the North Parish of Wrentham, on the 14th ult. by 'Letters Missive' from the church in said Parish. Dr. Beecher and Rev. Mr. Wisner, of this city, were present. The first business, of the Council, after having organized, was to adjourn to the meeting house for a public hearing. A committee consisting of Rev. Dr. Beecher and Rev. Mr. Maltby, was appointed to wait on Mr. Thacher, and invite him, and those members of the church associated with him, to be present, and to make any statements which seemed to them proper. With this invitation the Rev. gentleman did not comply. The council then proceeded to attend to the papers presented to them by the Committee of the Church; also certain questions proposed for their consideration; of which it is not necessary for us here to speak in detail. They refer to the laws and usages of church government; and such of our readers as feel particular interest in the matter, we refer to the 'Result' itself. The proceedings of Mr. Thacher are pronounced to be precipitate and irregular, for the following reasons:—1st. The usual and proper steps were not taken to endeavor to reclaim the majority of the church from their alleged errors. No efforts were made to obtain the advice and aid of sister churches in the removal of those alleged errors, but on the contrary, the proposal of the church to Mr. Thacher to call in a Mutual Council was declined.—It was not, therefore, to be presumed that those alleged errors could not be redressed in the usual and regular way; and of course, a case was not found to exist, justifying unusual and irregular measures to obtain relief, which ought to be found before such measures are resorted to in any case.

2nd. The course taken by Mr. Thacher, and those who have acted with him in forming themselves into another church, was precipitate and irregular. It was precipitate. At a meeting of the church held on the Sabbath, October 24th, at the close of public worship in the afternoon Mr. Thacher, and those acting with him, made a written application to be dismissed for the purpose of forming a new church. The church appointed a week from the next Saturday, to attend to their request;—a time, in the judgment of this Council, as early as could be reasonably demanded or expected for the consideration of so important a subject.

Mr. Thacher stated to the church, that if they did not have an answer then, they should consider it a refusal.—Mr. Thacher and a part of those who had signed the paper, requesting a dismission, met the next morning at 10 o'clock, and formed themselves into a new church. The course was irregular. The proper course for Mr. Thacher, and those acting with him, to have taken, if they felt themselves conscientiously impelled to separate from their brethren, would have been, to have waited till after the adjourned meeting of the church, and the consideration of their request, before taking any other step. Then, if their request was refused, and they felt constrained to proceed, they should have proposed a Mutual Council; and, if that was refused, called an Ex-Parte Council for advice. And if they could not conscientiously follow that advice, then, and not till then, would have existed the extreme case, which justifies individual believers, or a company of them, situated in the midst of other churches with which they have been in fellowship, in resorting to their original rights.

3d. The irregularity of this course is further evinced by the fact, that, in pursuing it, Mr. Thacher has been led to take the ground that he is no longer moderator of the church in the North Parish in Wrentham, and by implication, that he is not its pastor, although he was regularly settled over them as their pastor, and has never been dismissed by an Ecclesiastical Council, nor by any act of the church, nor even given them any official notice that he no longer considers himself their pastor and moderator.

4th. In these proceedings, Mr. Thacher and those who have acted with him, have also VIOLATED THEIR OWN SOLEMN COVENANT ENGAGEMENTS WITH THIS CHURCH; one of the articles of whose covenant is as follows:—"We do severally submit ourselves to the government of Christ Jesus in this church, and to the regular administration of his government in this church. We do covenant to attend the worship of God and the ordinances of the Gospel with this church, so long as God continues us in this place. And we do also severally promise, to be accountable to this church as long as we live, unless our relation to it be regularly discharged. These duties we promise and covenant to perform." And Article 16th, of the Articles of discipline of the church is as follows:—"It is expedient for a church to obtain the judgment and advice of other churches in important and difficult cases." Here is an express recognition of the principle that the regular way for the church to proceed in important and difficult cases is, to obtain the judgment and advice of other churches, and a solemn engagement, by Mr. Thacher and those members of the church associated with him, to govern themselves by this principle; which recognition and engagement they have wholly disregarded in their late proceedings.

In view of these statements and positions, the Council are of opinion, that in these proceedings of Mr. Thacher and those members of the church who have acted with him, the means ordained by the Head of the church to secure to its members, and to the whole body, personal rights and liberty of conscience and the influence of church discipline, have been disregarded: measures which, happily, have not yet ceased to be efficacious, and which, in this instance, it seems to the Council, have been neglected in circumstances in which their benign influence might have been secured, with the prospect of giving efficiency to the discipline, and restoring the harmony, of this divided and afflicted church, and in which no extreme case of necessity, authorizing a departure from the scriptural usages of the Congregational churches of New England, has existed or does exist. Nor can this Council perceive without alarm and sorrow of heart, an example set, in haste and in a moment of temptation, which is calculated to interrupt that fellowship and order of our churches which for two hundred years, have lent so powerful and tranquilizing an influence to both our religious and civil institutions.

ENCAMPMENT.—A meeting of the Boston Encampment will be held at Washington Hall, on Monday evening next, at 6 o'clock.

For the Masonic Mirror.
THEATRICAL.

MONDAY. Wives as they Were, and Maids as they Are.—Sister of Charity, and First of April. The entertainments of this evening were appropriated for the Benefit of Mrs. Barnes; but, in consequence of the inclemency of the weather, the receipts barely covered the expenses. The excellent comedy of Wives as they Were went off with great eclat. Lord Priory was well performed by Mr. Barnes; but not so well as we expected. The volatile Mrs. Dorillon, was an excellent character for Mrs. Barnes.

The Sister of Charity is the title of a new piece, which in its present condition, is quite a 'mysterious affair.' It may have been intended for a very interesting Melo Drama, but to say the least, it is poorly got up. The plot, if there be any, is so developed by the incidents, as to render it almost an impossibility to form any conception whatever of the play. St. Ursula by Mrs. Barnes, was in our opinion, the only redeeming character in the whole affair.

TUESDAY. Peter Bell, the Wagoner. Turnpike Gate. First of April. Peter Bell is one of the most interesting pieces we have ever met with. The plot is easily understood. Baptiste, the murderer, and Durand his confederate in crime, were both admirably adapted to the powers of Messrs Scott, and Smith. The Drama is by the author of Luke the Laborer, and will no doubt take a high stand among the Melo Dramas of the day.

Barnes' Crack may be considered peculiar to himself; for this reason, his pliz was not wrought into the many curious shapes, which we have heretofore been accustomed to see displayed in this character.

WEDNESDAY. The Will and Cherry and Fair Star.—Mr. Barnes' Sir Solomon Cynic, was admirable. Messrs. Barret, Smith and Pearson, also acquitted themselves very satisfactorily in their several characters.

The Mermaid Song by Mr. Johnson was a wonderful display of vocal powers. His cadences, thrills, and shakes are precisely after the manner of Miss Kelly. We understand that his imitations of Madame Feron and Miss Fisher are equally successful.

Cherry and Fair Star has been revived this season with all its original splendor. Many of the beautiful scenes, which are exhibited in it, and credited to Mr. R. Jones were, if we mistake not, painted by Haddock. E.

THE STORM.—The most violent snow storm that we have witnessed for some years, commenced in this city on Saturday morning last. The wind was strong from the N. E. The storm continued with violence for about thirty hours. It is thought, (for no accurate calculation can be made,) that about two feet of snow fell, on a level. The Traveller remarks:—'Most of the streets in the city were entirely blocked up, and there was little passing on Sunday. On the 'neck,' were two or three drifts from twelve to fifteen feet in height, and in that vicinity too, a bank was raised to such an elevation before a gentleman's door, that he dug a passage through, and left quite a formidable archway overhead. All the mails due on Saturday, with but a single exception, arrived in the course of the evening. At 10 o'clock same night, the Southern mail with four passengers, left the city and did not arrive at Brighton, (5 miles,) until 6 o'clock on Sunday morning. The passengers left Brighton on their return at 11 o'clock, A. M. and reached the city eight hours after! The Albany mail via Brattleboro', started between six and seven Sunday evening, and the Keene, N. H. at five o'clock, Monday morning, both on horseback.'

THE INDIANS.—A battle took place between the Osages and Pawnees on the Arkansas in November last, in which the former were victorious—killing 18 of the latter and bearing off their scalps in triumph. A St. Louis paper states that a party of Sioux Indians attacked three traders on their way to St. Louis, killed one and wounded another—the third escaping unhurt. The same paper states that another party of traders had been attacked and nine killed—also, that one man had been killed by the Mandans.

Extract of a letter to the publishers, dated Washington, Alabama, Dec. 22, 1830.

'Brethren:—Agreeable to promise in a previous letter, I now have the pleasure of addressing you again. I attended the communication of the "Grand Lodge of Alabama," begun and holden in Tuscaloosa on the 6th inst. I shall transmit you the "Proceedings" as soon as printed. Never did I spend a more pleasant and happy time. With us, were our Governor, Gabriel Moore; President of the Senate; Speaker of the House of Representatives; and five or six Ministers of the Gospel. Nothing but friendship and brotherly love prevailed. Business of much importance was transacted. During my absence from this town, our worthy and distinguished brother James B. Mathews, W. M. of our Lodge, departed this life; an obituary notice of which I enclose, from the Planters' Gazette. His loss is severely felt by the community, more especially so by the brethren of our lodge; his funeral will be preached on the 27th inst. when will be present, a large number of the brethren.'

See obituary notice.

Another ridiculous farce.—The impudence of the antimasonic party in this city, is equalled only by the vindictive spirit which is stamped on all their proceedings.—After having been literally kicked out of Faneuil Hall, and hooted at by the boys when out, they have again had the unblushing effrontery to petition the City government for the use of that consecrated place, on the 19th, 20th, and 21st of May next, that they may reenact in open day, the most foolish, wicked and contemptible farce that ever disgraced the city of Boston! George Odiorne heads the petition! We know not the object, but presume there is some dusky transaction in contemplation. It is thought a sister state may furnish at least one delegate. However, let the object be what it may, it is to be hoped that the city authorities will not again permit that place to be prostituted to the vile purposes of an infamous persecuting faction; that they will have firmness enough to preserve it from the pollution which its perversion to such purposes would heap upon it.

LEGISLATURE.—We make the following extract from a report of the proceedings of the Senate on Wednesday, as reported for the Salem Register, and give it to our readers without comment.

'The committee on the Judiciary made a report, asking to be discharged from the further consideration of an order (introduced by Rev. Mr. Thacher, a distinguished Antimason) relative to extra-judicial oaths. On motion of Mr. Thacher, the consideration of the Report was assigned for Wednesday next, when a debate on the subject of Masonry, &c. may be expected.'

AWFUL VISITATION.—'On Monday last, says the Miner's Journal, (printed at Pottsville, Pen.) a man was brought before a magistrate in this borough, on a charge of having attempted to rescue a prisoner from custody. On examination, he denied the act of which he was accused, and, with awful emphasis, 'hoped that the Almighty would strike him dead if he were guilty!' The words were no sooner uttered, than he fell down speechless and insensible! If this be true, it goes further to prove the existence of an omnipresent, superintending Providence, than all the metaphysical speculations that have bewildered the minds of men, since the creation of the world. And from the character of the Journal, in which it is said to have originated, (if it did so originate,) we have no doubt of its truth. Let the infidel, the atheist, read and reflect well on this single fact, and deny the existence of a God, if he dare!

☞ We would call the attention of our readers to the letter of W. W. Blake, Esq. published in another part of this paper. It seems that Mr. Blake's name, like that of Deac. Kendall's, was placed on the list of 'Suffolk Delegates,' without authority, and contrary to his known views and wishes.

BUNKER HILL AURORA.—This excellent paper has been enlarged and otherwise much improved. The last number contains a great variety of original miscellaneous and literary articles, all of which evince a good degree of taste and talent. We observe some original poetical articles of much merit. The series of numbers on the 'Early History' of Charlestown, the first of which appeared on Saturday, will be read with much interest, if successfully pursued. The Aurora is decidedly the best and most valuable paper published in Middlesex, and merits the liberal support of the intelligent yeomanry of that county.

Fires.—By an official return made to the Board of Aldermen, by the Chief Engineer, on Monday evening, it appears that the number of fires which have occurred the past year, is 52—estimated loss of property and buildings, $54,720—insured $33,295—27 false alarms. It is a remarkable fact that no dwelling house, excepting one or two ten-foot buildings, has been destroyed during the last year.

The Bunker Hill Aurora of Saturday states, that 'a company of gentlemen have purchased Winnisimmet Ferry, and the Williams' Farm in Chelsea, and contemplate running a steam boat line from the landing at the North end in Boston, to the landing in Chelsea. The boats are intended to convey stages, carts, carriages, and all other vehicles, passengers and baggage—and thus shorten the distance and avoid the bridges between Chelsea and Boston. A house is undergoing repairs near the landing in Boston, and a new house will probably be erected on the Chelsea side.'

OBITUARY.

Died, near Washington Antauga County, on Thursday the 9th inst. Mr. James B. Mathews aged 31.

It is truly melancholy to reflect how often from the course of nature, we are necessarily compelled to announce the death of an esteemed, and beloved friend.—One at whose demise society sustains an irreparable loss.—'Such was the deceased,' whose name we now with a painful duty enrol on the list of mortality. He was a native of Georgia, born in Warren County and moved to this state in 1818. At a period when the enterprising settler had made but few improvements, when society was in a crude, contentious state, greatly in need of a useful man—just such a man as he was, Mr. Mathews located himself at Washington, and shortly afterwards was chosen Clerk of the County Court. An office which he held for eight years, discharging its complicated and arduous duties in the most able manner. Being a fine scribe, a man of sound sense, possessing an astonishing judgment, and one too, of pleasing and affable manners all combined, of course, rendered him an 'Able Helpmate' in the community in which he resided, and in the age in which he lived.

He was a perfect master of business. There was no instrument, no writing but what he could draw up with the most correct, elegant, and despatchful manner imaginable. The duties which he was daily called upon to discharge, some of the most responsible character, had served to make him a keen observer whilst nature had blest him with a fund of ingenuity. He could actually discover a flaw in an instrument of writing when the deep read and practical attorney would pronounce it to be perfectly correct. And often when performing the functions of his own office, able and learned members of our bar, have been known to apply for his assistance, appealing to his better judgment.

It is well known that he was considered by men from other Counties, who had repeated opportunities of judging, to be the best, most expeditious Clerk in the State. The fact is, he seldom or ever was at a loss in any thing he undertook—if a man had difficulty to encounter with in discharging a debt, settling a will—or if he wished to ascertain a certain point of law, no matter if obscurity was upon the face of it, Mr. Mathews was the man to give advice, to expound his justice, to yield him consolation. But he lives no more! He is gone! No longer do his friends visit his ever cheerful fireside—the chords of life have been rent asunder and silently he has sunk into the arms of death.
Washington, Dec. 11th, 1830.

THE WREATH.

THE FORCE OF NATURE.

'T was on a cliff, whose rocky base
 Battled the briny wave,
 Whose cultured height, their verdant store
 To many a tenant gave;

A mother led by rustic cares
 Had wander'd with her child,
 Unwean'd the babe, yet on the grass,
 He frolick'd and he smiled.

With what delight the mother glow'd
 To mark her infant joy,
 How oft would pause amid her toil,
 To view her beauteous boy.

At length by other cares estranged,
 Her thoughts the child forsook,
 Careless he wander'd o'er the grass,
 Nor drew his mother's look.

Cropt was each flower that caught his eye
 When wand'ring o'er the green;
 He sought the cliff's uncertain edge,
 And pleased survey'd the scene.

'T was then the mother from her toil
 Turn'd to behold her child—
 The urchin gone! her cheek was flush'd,
 Her wandering eye was wild.

She saw him on the cliff's rude brink
 Now careless peeping o'er,
 He turn'd and on his mother smiled,
 Then sported as before.

Sunk was her voice, 't was vain to fly,
 'T was vain the brink to brave;
 Oh nature! it was thine alone
 To prompt the means to save;

She tore her 'kerchief from her breast
 And laid her bosom bare;
 He saw, delighted left the cliff,
 And sought the banquet there.

The following lines are true, intense, sublime and can scarcely be surpassed in excellence. The author is unknown.

What is beauty? what an eye
 Of azure or of ebony;
 What a bosom, wild and warm,
 A rosy lip, an angel form;
 What a soft and snowy skin
 Without a generous soul within?
 A disposition sweet—a mind
 With soft humanity combined?
 There is a love! 'tis not the wandering fire
 That must be fed on folly or expire.
 Gleam of polluted hearts, the meteor ray
 That fades as rise Reason's nobler day;
 But passions made essential, holy bright,
 Like the raised dead, our dust transformed to light,
 But the rich foretaste of a loftier clime,
 Friendship of soul, in heaven scarce more sublime,
 Earth has its pangs for all, its happiest boast
 Not his who meets them last but bears them best,
 Life must he toil! yet oh that toil how drear,
 But for the soother of its brief career.
 The charm that virtue, beauty, fondness bind,
 Till the mind mingles with the kindred mind!
 'Tis not the cold romancer's ecstasy,
 The flame now lit at every passing eye,
 But the high impulse that the stately soul
 Feels slow engross it, but engross it whole;
 Yet seeks it not, nay, turns in stern disdain
 On its own weakness that can wear a chain;
 Still wrestling with the angel, till its pride,
 Feels all the strength departed from its side,
 Then joined, and joined forever—loving, loved;
 Life's darkest hours are met—and met unmoved.
 Oh let me love her! she has past
 Into my inmost heart—
 A dwelling on the hallowed ground
 Of its last worldly part;
 Where feeling and where memory dwell
 Like hidden music in the shell.

[Original.]

TO MOSES THACHER,

MEMBER OF THE SENATE OF MASSACHUSETTS,
EX-MINISTER OF 'THE CHURCH IN THE NORTH
PARISH OF WRENTHAM,' PRESENT MINISTER OF 'THE CHURCH IN NORTH WRENTHAM,' MEMBER OF THE LATE 'ANTIMASONIC STATE CONVENTION OF MASSACHUSETTS,' MEMBER OF
THE LATE 'NATIONAL ANTIMASONIC CONVEN-TION,' SECEDING MASON, ANTIMASONIC LEC-Turer, AND EDITOR OF THE ANTIMASONIC
'BOSTON TELEGRAPH.'

LETTER I.

Sir

Perhaps, in conformity to the established usages observed in the commencement of written intercourse, and yielding to the expectations of political ambition, I ought to address you in the pompous and inflated language of mock respect, and arrest your thoughts and attention by signalizing you with the phraseology of Reverend and Honorable.
In settling this, as a point of expediency or propriety, it might have been proper to have inquired, whether the sanctity of your profession, I mean your ministerial profession, or the purity of your social conduct, required an expression either of reverence or honor. But by a reference to a reported 'Address to the people of this State,' published in 'An abstract of the proceedings of the Anti-masonic State Convention of Massachusetts,' I was relieved from the unpleasant uncertainty of the true and proper mode of addressing you, by reflecting how offensive and revolting to your mind must be the use of 'titles and dignities incompatible with a republican form of government,' as you was pleased to say, in your own proper Report, signed with your own proper name: Moses Thacher.

But, sir, your notions of titles that are 'incompatible with a republican form of government' may have undergone some change; and it may be, that you, who so familiarly use the name and authority of the great apostle of the Gentiles to justify your recent, ecclesiastical and social transmutations, have grown wiser since you have put on the toga virilis of a Senator, and may find yourself called upon to aver, 'When I was a child, I spake as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man I put away childish things.' Of all men you are the most fortunate! The infancy of your Masonry is hardly passed, when the proud honors of antimasonic manhood blush upon your head in all the exuberance and variety of mature life. Fortunate man indeed! And yet all your success and all your honors may bring your 'gray hairs with sorrow to the grave.' Understand me, sir; I mean no contempt for your ecclesiastical infirmity, or your want of judicious discrimination in managing your social affairs. But you have very recently assumed pretensions to very superior sagacity, in discovering the path and course of your religious duty; and have evinced promptness and decision highly becoming in one who lays claims so broad and so public to superior sanctity. If therefore my plain and unadorned salutation has no recognition of offensive 'titles and dignities,' your superior intelligence, not to say your vanity, may refer it to a conformation to your views of 'a republican form of government,' and a desire to measure even modes of address to your standard of Christian meekness and humility. Be assured, sir, that however great your anxiety may be lest the value of your pastoral services, or your legislative labors, or your antimasonic vocations and sacrifices, be not fully appreciated, or be forgotten, there is no person living more disposed than I am to see that your exertions and sacrifices for religion, for patriotism or newspaper literature, be duly estimated, and that you have all the credit and all the merit to which you may be thereby entitled.

I am desirous of addressing you plainly, fully and unequivocally on your political, theological and antimasonic professions and proceedings. I should have preferred that you had fallen into other hands than mine. It is no desirable station to stand over you with a rod of correction, or to answer the almost hopeless task of admonition. There are stages in the natural diseases of society, when medical aliment, or cauterization, or amputation, becomes, even to the practised hand of masters, matter of deep anxiety and care. And there are stages in the moral diseases of human affairs, when the deadly symptoms and obstinate features of a particular case require a full understanding of the proper mode of treatment, but bold and decisive practice when that mode of treatment is settled. Sir, dropping a figure, and assuming a case of practical illustration, I consider your condition embraced within the limits of extraordinary and unusual instances of moral disease; and, that extraordinary and unusual applications are not only justifiable, but proper. No man but yourself holds to the Masonic Fraternity the triple relation of Ministerial, Senatorial and Editorial Champion of Political Antimasonry; and no man could have justified more fully, the sanguine expectations of his party than you have, by the boldness of your designs, and the perseverance with which you have followed up your measures. From your pulpit, you have fulminated your spiritual denunciations, and have attempted to procure ecclesiastical disabilities against Masons. By your paper, you have disseminated dark surmises, unjustifiable charges and dangerous opinions. Even your place at the Senate Board has witnessed the unrelenting, persecuting spirit that impels you forward, in the unholy and unchristian cause of Antimasonry. This, Sir, is no mean praise. It assigns to you a station on the very pinnacle of Antimasonic fame. And although the details and particulars which go to make up your greatness may not be very flattering to your feelings nor honorable to your motives, as a man, a Christian, a Senator or an Editor, you will not refuse the acknowledgment, before I take final leave of you, that I admit you to be all that is required to constitute you a thorough, efficient and consistent Antimason.

I am, Sir, yours

FENELON.

The Rev. Lorenzo Dow, is well known as a distinguished itinerant preacher of the Gospel. He is, we believe, of the Methodist persuasion. For some cause, Mr. Gran-ger's antimasonic organ was induced, last week, to speak of him, in the following opprobrious terms: 'He ought to be shunned as the pestilence that walketh in darkness.'—[Ontario Messenger.]

[Communicated for the Mirror.]

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered at the Installation of the Officers of Montgomery Lodge, Medway, Mass. Dec. 29, A. D. 1830.

By JOHN G. METCALF,

Master of said Lodge.

RESPECTED BRETHREN,—By your suffrages you have elected me to the responsible office of Master of this Lodge. And while I return you my acknowledgments for this mark of your confidence, and pledge you the best exertion of my abilities for the proper and faithful discharge of its duties, it will not, I trust, be considered inopportune, that I ask your attention, for a few moments, to the consideration of the peculiar situation in which, as Masons, we are placed.

As Freemasons we find ourselves beset by enemies.—
Attempts have been made, and are making, to excite popular opinion against us. We are to be put under the ban of popular fury. The community are called upon to shut us out from the enjoyment of our legal rights—from the interchange of those friendly civilities which give zest to social enjoyment, and which brighten the chain of social affection. We are to be thrust away from a participation in any of the ordinary business of society—to be debarred the privileges and immunities guaranteed to us by the constitution—to be driven from the exercise of rights growing out of those privileges and immunities—to be held up to the world, as men dangerous to the well being and very existence of civil liberty. The Institution of Masonry has been defamed and slandered, by endeavors, unintermitted and untiring, to couple its principles with the infamous doctrines and practices of the French Revolution, and the still more abominable precepts of German Illuminism.—
We have been held up as a society got up expressly, and purposely continued, for the propagation of Infidelity and Atheism. The community has been called upon with all the seeming energy and confidence of truth to believe that Freemasons are men, dangerous to the permanency of our free Republican Institutions: and as men opposed to the written revelations of Almighty God, and the golden precepts of the Redeemer.

And by whom is the community asked to believe all this? Let it be understood that I hold that the antimasonry of 1830 has nothing to do with the antimasonry of 1826; that the champions of that party now, are as different from those, who, in 1826, took up the cause of Wm.
Morgan, as light is from darkness. The people of New-York, in 1826, actuated by purposes honest and honorable, took up the cause of justice and humanity in that gross and unprecedented violation of the laws, the abduction of Morgan. They saw that the majesty of the Com-stitution had been violated—that a cruel and atrocious crime had been perpetrated—that allowing such outrages to go unpunished would be sanctioning a precedent, which would go at the foundation of all personal liberty and personal right. Under the influence of these motives, public meetings of the people were called—resolutions condemnatory of the deed, passed, and measures proposed and adopted, to bring the perpetrators of the deed to condign punishment. These meetings were called without respect to party, and Masons came forward and acted in them as well as others. All this was well and proper; but when designing knaves and bankrupt politicians undertook to raise the whirlwind and direct the storm, antimasonry became quite a different thing. But a little while and we see its polluted stream directed, so as to carry a political engine, by which Masons were to be turned out of office and antimasons turned in. Within one short year in some districts, antimasonry was made the criterion of eligibility and the stepping stone to preferment. With such honest leaders the antimasonic party was soon transformed into a political party, and for the last three years has acted openly, and in some instances avowedly, as such. Who among the intelligent and informed yeomanry of New England, does not consider Antimasonry political. Has it not in every instance, where it has succeeded in raising the wind, come forward with its candidates and with the help of Anderton murder stories, succeeded, in our own state, in electing the Honorable Moses Thatcher to a seat in the Massachusetts Senate?

And it is by such a party that the community are asked to believe the thousand and one raw-head and bloody-bones stories that are circulated, with the intention of bringing down the Masonic Institution to the dead level of antimasonic purity, and principles. The public are asked to believe Freemasons guilty of all the crimes denounced in the decalogue, while they who urge this, notwithstanding their long and loud protestations of moral honesty—notwithstanding they are continually pronouncing that there is no honesty, no purity, no health, no life, without the pale of their political church, are the very men, who, by their own confession and irrefragable proofs multiplied an hundred fold, fabricate and publish to the world such documents as Anderton's Affidavit, and are ready to endorse with all the moral virtues, the character of any man, who will bring destruction to his own soul, by the crime of perjury, in their service. These are the men who abuse the public ear with their long, loud and interminable tirades against Masonic corruption and influence. The antimasonic party seemed to have adopted the old doctrine of the Pope, that 'the end justifies the means,' and consequently to attain their end, whether it be to mutilate the body of a Munroe, so as to make a Morgan good enough for election purposes, or procure the election of a senatorial candidate, they do not shrink from becoming accessory to the crime of subornation of perjury. With them there is no acknowledgment of moral restraint—no regard for any of the principles of civil liberty or religious freedom. They openly proclaim that the right of private opinion no longer exists—that he who will not think as they do, is an alien and an outcast from civil society.

Antimasonry has broached the question, whether the exercise of the right of private opinion, is compatible with the discharge of moral duty. It has proclaimed through her pensioned and poisoned presses, that no Freemason can discharge his duties to his God and his fellow-men. It hath called upon a whole people to rise and join in the anathema maramatha which has been rung in all its changes for the last three years. Assuming the robes of an angel of light, antimasonry hath stolen into the watchtower of Zion, and with her banner upon its outer wall, hath fulminated her bulls of excommunication against all those, who will not bow down and do obeisance at her feet.—Not satisfied with her wide sweeping denunciations and proscription of Masonry and Masons; she comes forward, and as 'one clothed with authority,' pronounces that there shall be no neutrals in this war. They who will not go all lengths with them, are put down as Masons. Any who will not become thorough-going, 'whole hog' antimasons, are no longer under the protection of the laws, or entitled to the privileges of freemen. With the most consummate impudence and the most horrid blasphemy, the community are told that antimasonry sprung from the throne of God. The temples dedicated to his worship are profaned by the heralds of these political gladiators; and from that desk, upon which should be inscribed, 'Holiness to the Lord,' and from which should issue the precept, 'peace on earth and good will to men,' nought is now heard, but the wily sophisms of some political priest, or the senseless fanaticism of some antimasonic Rabbi.

Antimasonry hath poured her pollution into the pure fountain of Christianity. With Arabian magic, she hath scathed 'The Ark, the Altar and the Priest.' She hath breathed upon the sacramental cup, and he, who drank of its poison, hath become the wild enthusiast and the persecuting bigot. She hath kindled 'strange fire' upon the altar, and they who knelt around that holy place, have risen from the burning of its incense, to execute the commands of the angel who ministered at its shrine. She hath stricken the priest; and the messenger of grace and the legate of the skies, hath forgotten the errand of his Lord and Master; and, with the confession of his own moral treason upon his lips, breathes out his Pharisee's prayer to the only true and living God.

Is not all this true? Is there here anything but what is seen and felt every day? I appeal to facts whether these things are not so? Have not Masons been voted from the jury-box? Have they not time after time, repeatedly and again, been voted unworthy the confidence and support of their fellow men? Have they not been charged with holding and inculcating infidel and atheistical sentiments? Have they not been held up to their brethren and kindred as traitors to their country and heretics to the Christian Faith? Have not endeavors been made to fasten upon their characters the stamp of infamy and disgrace? Have not Masons been driven from the communion-table of our common Lord and Master, Jesus Christ? Have not the time-honored relics of the dead been disinherited, and they who died 'with the world and God, at peace,' execrated as incarnate devils? Has not the sanctity of the domestic fireside been invaded, and the 'father set against the son and the son against the father'?

All this has been done and more too, to accomplish the ends of antimasonry. And after all this, after all the contumely and contempt that could be thrown upon Masonry, Masons are called upon to renounce and denounce the Institution. A very modest request is this, to be sure—to ask us to commit the crime of perjury, for the distinguished honor of becoming tools in the hands of the leaders of antimasonry. True some of our former number, like they, who, 'when persecution cometh, endure for a little time and then fall away,' have deserted our ranks; and are now among the loudest and most devout in our condemnation and punishment. These are the men who have filled the world with their pretended revelations of Masonry, and out of which, with the aid of Morgan's abduction, they are endeavoring to raise a political party, upon whose banner is already inscribed the motto, 'rule or ruin.' With the ambition of the Ephesian Demetrius; there can now be little doubt, but that the object of their wishes will soon be accomplished. A few more efforts—the long pull, the strong pull and the pull altogether, and politico-antimasonry will be immortalized; but whether for weal or woe history will determine.

But when the ebullition of the cauldron shall have ceased—when the secula shall have settled to the bottom, seceders will be viewed in their proper light. They will then be seen as they are. There will then be no clouds and darkness to obscure the mental horizon—prejudice and passion will no longer darken the mental vision. There will then be seen men, devoid of all principle—men whose moral perceptions are so dull and obtuse, as to believe it virtuous and meritorious to break through all obligations, no matter how solemnly imposed or how voluntarily assumed. The leaders of antimasonry may love the treason, but they must necessarily, in the very constitution of things, despise the traitor. He who is untrue to one party, can give no pledge that he will be true to another.—His character for truth and veracity can give him no recommendation to his new friends, for he comes to them, with the guilt of moral treason fastened upon his character. They may make him their pander in iniquity, and use him as the degraded tool of their unhallowed ambition; but he will always be looked upon with distrust, and, at any time, when it may best suit the convenience of the party, he will be sacrificed as unceremoniously, and turned adrift with as little compunction, as though he had not made shipwreck of his hopes of Heaven, for their purposes.

MODERN PERSECUTION.

We will put down Masonry by the sword, if we cannot put it down without.—JACOB HALL.

NO. IV.

It is to be feared that the members of the unprincipled faction, calling themselves antimasons, have taken encouragement from the patient, and almost silent course that Masons have pursued, while suffering under the grossest injuries. Some timid Masons have shielded themselves under the unobtrusive virtue of prudence; and have proceeded to the very verge of tameness, lest they should become accessory to a public excitement. Others have even attempted to keep terms with the detestable li-bellers of their Institution, and have rendered doubtful their own integrity, by a show of courtesies to the very scavengers of the antimasonic party. But there are some, who, combining the better part of prudence with some portion of honest dealing, have dared to say to antimasons, and of antimasons, what every member of our Institution knows to be just, but many have not the firmness to avow.

There are times and seasons, when things should be called by their right names; when the barriers of truth must be set up, against the mroads of falsehood; when purity can hold no interchange of ordinary civilities with foul and bloated corruption. Such a time and season have long since arrived; and the members of the unprincipled combination, which is the subject of these remarks, deserve, in an eminent degree, such prompt decision and confirmation on the part of every upright Mason, as shall show them that there are some who truly hold them in utter abhorrence: some who prefer open and undisguised hostility, to an unmeaning and equivocal show of decent civilities.

It is at all times a hazardous task, to stand in the fir rank of opposition to a desperate faction; and it is some times a thankless and ungrateful task, for which no recompense of reward is had, except the conscious satisfaction of having honestly discharged an imperative duty. He who tears off the mask of infamy, who strips off the disguises of hypocrisy, and exposes the hidden mysteries and designs of knavery, cannot long maintain his position, if left to contend single handed. And no one is more exposed to secret hatred and open hostility than he who counteracts the views of men who have no other motive than political ambition, and no other object than political distinction.

The fiercest passions that beset the human heart are enlisted in these matters. He therefore who raises a hand to resist the course of these antimasonic, political aspirants, calls down upon his head their deadliest enmity; and, as far as in them lies, they will make him feel the full weight of their antimasonic vengeance. The measures to which the members of that unholy alliance have resorted, afford conclusive proof, that if their power had been commensurate with their evil will, even the blood of Masons would have been poured out on the altars of their political idolatry. There can be no doubt that Masons owe the security of their civil rights, and even life itself, to the weakness of that horrid faction. At least, those who have openly resisted them and precisely in that relation to them; and, in settling the tenure of their rights, they will feel that they owe little thanks to the forbearing spirit of antimasonry.

Perhaps it is well that some should, in the spirit of Christian meekness, show how much unresisted abuse and injury they are willing to bear for their Institution. But knowing there is 'a time to keep silence and a time to speak,' while some exemplify their attachment by the passive virtues of silence and circumspection, others evince theirs, by demonstrating and exposing the hideousness of the political monster.

It is well known that a large proportion of the members of the antimasonic faction are, from the badness of their private characters, exposed to remark. And if common decency have no control over them, they may be made to learn wisdom from the castigations of sober truth, made in common language and common honesty.

VERITAS.

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

[From the Education Reporter.]

PNEUMATIC APPARATUS.

In my last, I described a set of Pneumatic Apparatus, and pointed out a variety of interesting experiments that may be performed with them, illustrating the mechanical properties of air, and aeriform fluids; such as their weight, pressure, elasticity, and compressibility. The air is also a resisting and conducting medium. The air in which we live surrounds the earth, and extends to a considerable height above it, which, together with the clouds and vapors that float in it, is called the atmosphere. The air is not visible, being very transparent. It is necessary to our existence, as neither life nor flame can be supported without it.

That the air has weight, is proved by weighing a portion of it in an oil flask. Figs. 13, 14. A cubic foot is found to weigh about one ounce and two tenths. It is something like eight hundred times lighter than water.—Any body that is lighter than air will float in it. In this way balloons are made to rise in air, and one of them will carry up several men.

The pressure of the atmosphere is shown in a variety of ways. Figs. 2, 3, 4, 10, 12, 19, 20, 21, and 22. This pressure is of great utility, as it prevents the heat of the sun from converting the water and other fluids into vapor. It is known that water requires more heat to boil in the open air, than what will make it boil in vacuo. Fig. 23.

The atmosphere gives a proper temperature to the rays of the sun, and renders the face of the heavens lucid and bright. If there was no atmosphere, only that part of the sky would appear light in which the sun is placed; for, in that case, there would be no substance to reflect his rays. But the atmosphere being strongly illumined by the sun, turns the light towards us, and makes the whole heavens shine with such splendor as to render the light of the stars invisible. It is this property of the air reflecting light, which produces the twilight. The atmosphere is also the cause of dews and rains which fertilize the earth. It sustains the clouds and is essential to the existence of whatever lives and moves on the face of the earth, or in the great deep.

By the pressure of the atmosphere we are able to raise water with the pump: and to draw liquor from a vessel by the syphon, without moving the vessel or making a hole through its side.

The pressure of the atmosphere is found to be about fifteen pounds on the square inch. This property in the air was not discovered until the time of Galileo and Toricella, although numerous instances of it were continually before men from time immemorial. Many of the animals raise the water which they drink, by the pressure of the atmosphere; such as the horse, the ox, and the elephant. Birds take a quantity of water into the mouth, and then elevate the head so that the water descends by its own gravity. A child extracts milk from the breast, by the force of the air and other fluids contained within, the action of its mouth having withdrawn the air from the end of the nipple.—This is proved by the application of the breast-pipe, and breast pump, used for the same purpose.

The elasticity of the air is shown by Figs. 5, 6, 7, and 8. A small portion of air contained in a bladder, will distend itself so as to fill the whole bladder when the external pressure is removed, but will resume its former bulk on re-admitting the air.

The air is compressible; Figs. 17, 18; on this account and in this form it is the most perfect spring with which we are acquainted. In the ball of an air gun, the air is usually condensed thirty or forty times as much as in the atmosphere around; and the power with which it tends to escape, is thirty or forty times fifteen pounds on the square inch. When the valve is opened for an instant, by the action of the lock, the air issues and propels the charge with this force. The effect of air thus confined is nearly equal to that of gunpowder, and one charge of the ball suffices for many shots. The air-vessel, or air chamber, is extensively applied in hydraulic machinery. In the fire engine, the air vessel serves to keep up a continual stream, and also the spring of the air takes off from the pipes the great stress which at times they would be subject to, in case of a stoppage while the pumps are at work. A pump throws its water by a distinct gush at each stroke, while the current through the pipe should be uniform.—In large water works, such as those in Philadelphia, this circumstance is particularly attended to. The remedy is to place a large air vessel in connexion with the pipes, near the pumps. Portable gas lamps have thirty times their own bulk of gas compressed into them. I have thought an air vessel might be used with a balloon; by which, instead of letting the gas escape when they wish to descend, they might condense it into a smaller compass, then it would be ready for use in case they wish to ascend again.

The air is a resisting medium, Fig. 15. This is a source of loss in the power of machines, when the motions are very quick. To obviate this as much as possible, the moving parts should be round and smooth. In many cases this resistance is of the greatest advantage. In the striking part of a clock, the flyer strikes against the air and is retarded, which prevents the wheels running too fast.—Artificial currents of air are produced in this way, which serve for ventilation, for cleaning grain, and for drying sized yarn, &c. in factories.

But I apprehend the greatest use made of the resistance of air, is in windmills; and in navigation, which depends in a great measure upon the force of the wind. By this means the people of distant countries become acquainted with each other, and enjoy the various productions of different climates. Intelligence is thus conveyed, and improvements made known, to the most distant inhabitants of the earth.

The air is a conducting medium, Fig. 6. Although the air is not the best conductor of sound with which we are acquainted, it is nevertheless that medium through which we enjoy conversation, and receive the sound of musical instruments.

We perceive by this short and rude sketch, how many important offices this small part of creation is destined to fulfil.

Natural Philosophy is certainly a delightful study; for the closer we imitate nature, the more perfect our works will be. The common pump is only an imitation of the manner, that the horse and ox drinks. The suction-hose is but an imitation of the elephant's trunk; and I have by me a description of a machine which gained the silver medal of the Society of Arts, London 1790, for draining ponds, on precisely the same principle that birds raise water to drink.

A FRIEND TO USEFUL KNOWLEDGE.

GRAVITATION.

It is scarcely necessary to remark that gravitation is manifested in this case by the falling of bodies, and by their weight. That there is no one downward direction, into which all bodies tend, is evident from the fact that upon different sides of the earth, bodies fall in different directions towards it. A stone in America, and another in Asia, falling to the ground, will move directly towards each other. All these motions are evidently the result of a tendency of all bodies to move towards the great mass of matter constituting the earth.

The air gravitates; that is, is attracted by the earth, and rests with weight upon it. That portion of the air which is near the surface is loaded with the burden of all that is above, and is compressed by it in a much smaller space than it would naturally occupy. This pressure produces a great many curious effects. If a vacancy is anywhere produced, the surrounding air is forced by this pressure violently into it. If the air is removed from a bladder, the sides are forced together, and no effort can separate them so as to leave within an empty space. When the piston or box of a pump rises, it brings up with it the air within the pump; the load of air upon water around it forces the liquid up into the space thus left. When the air is exhausted by a suitable apparatus from a thin glass vessel, its sides will often be crushed inwards by the pressure of the surrounding air.

It was well known that the atmosphere would rush with violence into any vacant space long before the facts were referred to the right cause, and there was a long and obstinate controversy among the philosophers, whether the phenomena in question were really owing to the weight and pressure of the air, or to what one party called Nature's abhorrence of a vacuum. This controversy was at last settled by experiments made upon a certain mountain in the south of France, by which it appeared that the tendency of the air to rush into the vacant space was decidedly less upon the elevation, than at the ordinary level of the ground. Now, as in ascending an eminence, we pass above a considerable portion of the atmosphere, it was natural that what remained above the summit, should press less heavily than the whole. The difference of the effects was therefore very easily accounted for, on the supposition that they were both owing to the pressure of the air; and as it was absurd to suppose that Nature's abhorrence of a vacuum would be less upon a mountain, than in a valley, the advocates of this latter theory gave up the point.

The gravitation of the air may also be proved, as it often has been, by a very simple experiment. A vessel, filled as usual with air, is weighed. The air is then removed by an air pump, and the vessel, now empty, is weighed again. The difference, which is very sensible, shows the weight of the air which had been removed.

It may be at first imagined that there are some exceptions to the remark that all bodies on or near the surface of the earth, tend to move towards it. Smoke ascends; vapors rise, clouds float gently in the sky; and balloons, filled with peculiar gases, soar into the air, bearing with them heavy burdens. These, however, far from being exceptions to the rule, are only instances of its perfect operation. A block of wood, though it has in itself a tendency to fall, will rise to the surface of the water, into which it is plunged. The water having a stronger tendency to move towards the earth presses down under it, and it rises by the very power of gravitation itself. The gravitating air, in the same manner, forces up the vapor, the smoke and the balloon, all of which would fall with the rapidity of a stone, if nothing resisted their motion.

For a fine, clear, and transparent kind of glue, which will unite glass so as to render the fracture almost imperceptible, nothing is equal to isinglass boiled in spirits of wine.

SERIOUS CHARGE.—In the Senate of this Commonwealth on Wednesday last, the Reverend and Honorable Moses Thacher, Senator from Norfolk, did on his own responsibility, state the following case:

In Providence, R. I. a Masonic Deputy Sheriff was required to arrest two persons, who were also Masons, on the charge of breaking open a store; and having done so, he put them in charge of two other Masons, who, of course, permitted them to escape!

This is indeed a serious charge. If it be true, the Deputy Sheriff should be made to suffer, as an accessory, the punishment due to the criminals. If it be not true, then let the Honorable Senator be branded as a public, malicious and slanderous libeller. There can be no great difficulty in ascertaining the truth or falsehood of this declaration; and we would request our respected contemporary of the Literary Subaltern to investigate the matter and make public the result. If he can find a Masonic Deputy Sheriff in Rhode Island, who has been guilty of such offence, let him be dragged from his concealment and branded with ineffable infamy.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

The following letter from TIMOTHY PITKIN, Esq. addressed to the editor of the Hartford Antimasonic Intelligencer, has been confidently expected by all who were in any degree acquainted with that gentleman. Mr. Pitkin is a high minded and honorable federalist, who could not so far descend from the character of an honest politician, as to allow his name to be used by a heartless faction, to promote the interests of disorganization and anarchy. He has shown himself to be above such a hobby, and by his refusal to be the candidate of a few reckless and discontented spirits, has openly declared, that if he ever enjoys office, it shall be unalloyed with dishonesty. The course which Mr. Pitkin has taken, is highly honorable, and furnishes a fair specimen of the opinions which all honest politicians hold, in regard to political antimasonry. It is a blow from which that party will hardly recover—the effects of which have penetrated to its vitals. It is to be hoped that the remainder of their candidates, but one of whom has ever hoisted the piratical flag of extermination, will follow the patriotic example set them by Mr. Pitkin—and thus silence the croakings of a disorderly set of office hunters, who care not for anything, but for the gratification of their own selfish purposes. The man who now identifies his fortune with those of political antimasonry, should remember, that in a few short months it will be said of him, as of the hobby which he rides—WHERE IS HE?—in the receptacle of things lost upon earth!—in disgrace and ruin!—[Tolland Advocate.]

FARMINGTON, Dec. 31st, 1830.

Noble D. Strong, Esq. Editor of the Antimasonic Intelligencer, Hartford.

SIR:—By one of your late papers, I learn, that the Antimasonic Convention of this State, which met at Hartford, on the 15th inst. placed my name on its list of candidates for office, at the ensuing spring election. It appears by the same paper, that previous to making this list, a resolution received the sanction of that body, declaring that no persons were to be put in nomination, but those who were 'known not to be Freemasons, nor advocates of Freemasonry.'

Presuming, that, after the adoption of this resolution; the members of this Convention, would place no one on their list of political candidates, whose principles were not supposed to be the same with those embraced in the resolution, and who if elected would not, in his political conduct be governed by them; I think it proper, through the medium of your paper, to state, that whatever may be my private opinions respecting Freemasonry itself, they have never led me to concur in the propriety or policy, of excluding from office, either in the State or general Government, every citizen, who is a Freemason or whose opinions of Freemasonry may be different from mine. And I cannot but think it necessary to add, that, entertaining sentiments upon this question, (certainly not an unimportant one,) so different from those held by the individuals composing this convention I deem it improper, and indeed unjust to them, as well as to myself, to acquiesce in having my name on their list of political candidates.

I am respectfully yours,

TIMO. PITKIN.

Beauty is worse than liquor; it intoxicates the holder and beholder.

Some time since we published a report of a Judicial Investigation of the Witherell affair, had before Slade D. Brown, esq. a justice of the peace of Washington county. Several of the antimasonic papers have been laboring to convince their readers that the report as published was not a true one. The following letter from the editor of the Sandy Hill Herald in reply to one from the editors of the Ithaca Journal, must put this matter to rest, and silence the cavellings on this subject.—[Oswego Palladium.]

Sandy Hill, Nov. 26, 1830.

Gentlemen—In answer to your inquiries relative to the examination into the pretended 'outrage' in Hartford in this county, or an attempt to assassinate Elder Witherell, before A. T. Bush I can only say that no such examination was ever had, neither was there any trial of the kind, excepting the one that I published in the Herald, which took place before S. D. Brown, justice in Hartford, and which must convince every man the outrage so spoken of was a mere farce.

In this county the affair had no effect, as no one unless some hot-headed, enthusiastic, ignorant antimasons, pretended to believe it—and in the village where Witherell resides, there is no person so credulous as to believe it to be anything more than a family, or antimasonic contrivance, and intended to create excitement in the western counties. After examining the trial of Alonzo Hyde, before justice Brown which I have above referred to, you will undoubtedly come to the same conclusion that we have in this county. The antimasons in this section of the state are ashamed of the affair, and on the trial of Hyde they attempted to prevent an examination, and wished it to be abandoned—the trial occupied several days an account of the young Witherell being kept out of the way.

The trial before Brown, as published is correct, the testimony being taken and furnished me by Brown himself, who assures me that it is there given word for word, which I hope will be given in all the western papers.

The pretended trial before Bush, I have no doubt was a forgery got up by antimasons. In haste,

Your obd't. servant,

JAMES WRIGHT.

MOSES THACHER'S VERACITY.—Mr. Ferguson, an antimasonic writer, speaking of Mr. Thacher's difficulties with his church and society, says 'if his (Thachers) description of a Lodge Room is no more correct than his account of the doings of the Ecclesiastical Council, recently called in his case, there is yet some hope for Masonry!'

And is it possible, Moses, that you are so soon down with all parties? Have the opponents of the Masonic Institution, so soon paid you the price of your treason, and left you to buffet public scorn and contempt alone? Would not those who purchased the base deed, 'watch with you one hour?' A minister of the Gospel too, condemned by another minister of the same persuasion, who says, at the very same time that he brands you as a teller of falsehoods, that he has walked with you for years, in the orthodox faith. We may be excused, when we give this article, for blushing for poor human nature.

LITERARY.

LIVING WRITERS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

NO. IV.

The Quakers, although they are remarkable for their plainness of manner, have not been entirely without their ornaments—we do not mean those of dress but of mind. If Voltaire was now living, he would be compelled by necessity to recal many of his aspersions upon the society. In chemical science they may boast of Dalton, in education, of Lancaster, Priscilla Wakefield, and Lindley Murray. Their philanthropists are numerous and celebrated, and in poetry they have a 'bright particular star' in Bernard Barton. This gentleman is now favorably known to the public as a writer of sweet and tender verses, 'addressed to no feelings but those that are in harmony with our duty to God and our neighbor. The fashion of the day has been to read without hesitation whatever poetical genius may have put forth, regardless of the faults of subject, or the licentiousness of an erratic imagination. The beauty of style, the vigor of thought, has too often been the weak defence of an immortal licence. Yet the public read on, and while the human mind is what it is, we must read on, or shut up the volumes of Prior and Pope, of Moore and Byron. The writings of such as Coleridge, Wordsworth, Montgomery, Milman and Barton, have not however been without appreciation. The chasteness of their productions is a source of gratification to all who wish that the best powers of man should not be exercised

'In mockery of truth and tenderness.'

Mr. Barton's poems have passed through several editions in England and one in America.

Among those of his lighter poems, is an imitation of Wolfe's Burial of Sir John Moore, and much happier than most of those attempted by our modern bards. It is called the 'solitary tomb,' It commences thus—

Not a leaf of the tree which stood near me was stirr'd,
Tho' a breath might have moved it so lightly,
Not a farewell note from a sweet singing bird,
Bade adieu to the sun setting brightly.
The sky was cloudless and calm except
In the west where the sun was descending,
And there the rich tints of the rainbow slept,
As his beams with their beauty were blending.
And the evening star with its ray so clear,
So tremulous, soft and tender,
Had lit up its lamp and shot down from its sphere,
Its dowy delightful splendor.

We have not space for the remaining verses, but they may be found in his works.

One of his best pieces is styled the Quaker Poet, which was occasioned by his seeing himself so designated.

His effusions are to be found in the most popular magazines and annuals.

We pass over the name of Thomas Haynes Bayley with but a few remarks. He is a writer of lyrical poetry, and has immortalized himself by some beautiful songs, which are in fashion all over the world. Since the native Princes of Hindostan have taken to reading Shakspeare, we cannot doubt that the songs of Bayley will soon be warbled by the singing women of eastern climes.

Mr. Beasley, the author of Roue, is more generally known. He is by profession an architect, and has the credit of being distinguished for skill. The English Opera House is a specimen of his talent. His first literary effort was the dramatic piece, 'Is he Jealous?' a great and deserved favorite with the lovers of the stage. His small pieces are numerous. He is best known as the author of the Roue and the Oxonians. These are popular novels, elegantly written, abounding in pathos and conveying strong moral lessons.

We understand the author has other works in hand, which cannot fail to interest the public.

In our next number we shall give a sketch of Mrs. Bray, late Mrs. Stotbard, one of the 'Widows of Ephesus.'—[Alb. Dai. Adv.]

MISCELLANY.

FALL OF THE SECOND TEMPLE.—It was on the 10th of August; the day already darkened in the Jewish calender, by the destruction of their former temple by the King of Babylon; it was almost passed. Titus withdrew again into the Antonia, intending the next morning to make a general assault. The quiet summer evening came on: the setting sun shone for the last time upon the snow-white walls and the glistening pinnacles of the temple roof. Titus had retired to rest, when suddenly a wild and terrible cry was heard, and a man came rushing in, to announce that the temple was on fire. Some of the besieged, notwithstanding their repulse in the morning, had sallied out to attack the men who were busily employed in extinguishing the fires about the cloisters. The Romans not merely drove them back, but entering the sacred space within them, forced their way to the door of the temple. A soldier, without orders, mounting on the shoulders of one of his comrades, threw a blazing brand into a gilded small door on the north side of the chambers, in the outer building or porch. The flames sprung up at once.—The Jews uttered one simultaneous shriek, and grasped their swords, with a furious determination of revenging and perishing in the ruins of the temple. Titus rushed down with the utmost speed; he shouted, he made signs to his soldiers to quench the fire, his voice was drowned, and his sign unnoticed, in the blind confusion. The legionaries either, could not, or would not hear: they rushed on, trampling each other down in their furious haste, or stumbling over the crumbling ruins, perished with the enemy. Each exhorting the other, and each hurled his blazing brand into the inner edifice, and then hurried on his work of carnage. The unarmed and defenceless people were slain in thousands, they lay heaped, like sacrifices, round the altar: the steps of the temple ran with streams of blood, which washed down the bodies that lay about.

Titus found it impossible to check the rage of the soldiery; he entered with his officers, and surveyed the interior of the sacred edifice. The splendour filled them with wonder; and as the flames had not yet penetrated the holy place, he made a last effort to save it; and springing forth, again exhorted the soldiers to stay the progress of the conflagration. The centurion, Liberalis, endeavored to force obedience with his staff of office; but even respect for the emperor gave way to the furious animosity against the Jews, to the fierce excitement of battle, and to the insatiable hope of plunder. The soldiers saw everything around them radiant with gold, which shone dazzlingly in the wild light of the flames; they supposed that incalculable treasures were laid up in the sanctuary. A soldier, unperceived, thrust a lighted torch between the hinges of the door; the whole building was in flames in an instant. The blinding smoke and fire forced the officers to retreat; and the noble edifice was left to its fate.

It was an appalling spectacle to the Roman; what was it to the Jew? The whole summit of the hill which commanded the city, blazed like a volcano. One after another the buildings fell in with a tremendous crash, and were swallowed up in the fiery abyss. The roofs of cedar were like sheets of flame; the gilded pinnacles shone like spires of red light; the gate towers sent up tall columns of flame and smoke. The neighboring hills were lighted up, and dark groups of people were seen watching in horrible anxiety the progress of the destruction. The wall and heights of the upper city were crowded with faces, some pale with the agony of despair, others scowling unavailing vengeance. The shouts of the Roman soldiery, as they ran to and fro, and the howling of the insurgents who were perishing in the flames, mingled with the roaring of the conflagration, and the thundering sound of the falling timbers. The echoes of the mountains replied, or brought back the shrieks of the people on the heights: all along the walls resounded screams and wailings; men who were expiring with famine, rallied their remaining strength to utter a cry of anguish and desolation.—[Milman.]

RULES

To be observed in vocal music in addition to those we published a few weeks since.

1st. The first and most necessary step is, to keep the voice steady, and in as pleasing a tone as possible.

2nd. Practice the crescendo, diminuendo and swell, frequently, but never force the voice beyond its natural power.

3d. Take that part to which the voice is best adapted, and avoid all affected gestures.

4th. Give an open and clear sound to the vowels, and attend strictly to the directory terms.

5th. Never make a word plural when it is written singular.

6th. Be careful not to acquire a habit of drawing words for it precludes all delicacy of taste and expression.

7th. Let your manner of pronunciation be sprightly and animated.

8th. Never take breath in the middle of a word or between syllables.

9th. Be not solicitous to introduce what you may call graces, till you have learnt to judge in some measure of their powers and beauties.

10th. Accustom yourself in practicing and hearing good harmony; for it will improve the taste, and help to distinguish the elegant from the insipid.

11th. Endeavor to understand the sentiment, the force of expression, and the design of the composer.

12th. When you sing, sit or stand upright, that the tones may not be injured by pressure upon the lungs.

Is there so much goodness, fidelity and equity among men, that we should place such confidence in them, as not to desire, at least, that there was a God, to whom we might appeal from their injustice, and who might protect us from their persecutions and treacheries?

A man named Mason, in Ohio lately christened his son Anti. He should be rewarded by a seat in the convention.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, JANUARY 29, 1881.

HARPER'S FAMILY LIBRARY—is a reprint of those works published in London, under the title of 'The Family Library,' to which is added those published under the titles of 'The National Library,' and the Edinburgh Cabinet Library; And, to add still further to the interest and value of the series, the enterprising American publishers propose embracing in it, such other works of intrinsic merit; as may appear in the various Libraries and Miscellanies now printing in Europe. In addition to these acquisitions, several eminent writers have been engaged to prepare for it works of an American character, on interesting and popular subjects. In short, the American Family Library is designed to comprise all that is valuable in those branches of knowledge which most happily combine amusement with instruction. We have just risen from the perusal of the 14th number. It furnishes a concise narrative of discovery and adventure in the Polar seas and regions, with illustrations of their climate, geology, and natural history; and an account of the whale-fishery. The narrative has been carefully drawn from the most authentic sources, by Mr. Hugh Murray; and the most distinguished men of science in Scotland have lent their aid to illustrate that wonderful order of nature which prevails within the Arctic Circle. Professor Leslie has commenced the volume with a full examination of the Climate and its Phenomena. A general survey of all that is known of the geological structure of those interesting regions, is given by Prof. Jameson. The chapter on natural history, treats the subject in a popular manner. The whale-fishery is not the least interesting branch; and has the merit of being the only description of the daring operations and perils of that hazardous business, hitherto attempted within a moderate compass. As this subject is beginning to excite a more general attention, and is becoming a matter of extended commercial interest, the narrative before us will be read with additional satisfaction, and may offer some suggestions of importance to gentlemen about to embark in the business to which it relates. We have made a few short extracts, which we doubt not will be interesting to our readers.

In reference to the dreariness and horrors of a Polar winter Professor Leslie observes:

After the continued action of the sun has at last melted away the great body of ice, a short and dubious interval of warmth occurs. In the space of a few weeks, only visited by slanting and enfeebled rays, frost again resumes its tremendous sway. It begins to snow as early as August, and the whole ground is covered to the depth of two or three feet, before the month of October. Along the shores and the bays, the fresh water, poured from rivulets, or drained from the thawing of former collections of snow, becomes quickly converted into solid ice. As the cold augments, the air deposits its moisture in the form of a fog, which freezes into a fine gossamer netting or spicular icicles dispersed through the atmosphere and extremely minute, that might pierce and excoriate the skin. The hoar frost settles profusely, in fantastic clusters, on every prominence. The whole surface of the sea steams like a lime-kiln—an appearance called the frost smoke, caused as in other instances of the production of vapor, by the water's being still relatively warmer than the incumbent air. At length the dispersion of the mist, and consequent clearness of the atmosphere, announce that the upper stratum of the sea itself has cooled to the same standard; and a sheet of ice spreads quickly over the smooth expanse, and often gains the thickness of an inch in a single night.—The darkness of a prolonged winter now broods impenetrably over the frozen continent, unless the moon chance at times to obtrude her faint rays, which only discover the horrors and wide desolation of the scene. The wretched settlers, covered with a load of bear skins, remain crowded and immured in their hut, every chink of which they carefully stop against the piercing external cold; and, cowering about the stove or the lamp, they seek to dose away the tedious night. Their slender stock of provisions, though kept in the same apartment, is often frozen so hard as to require to be cut by a hatchet. The whole of the inside of their hut becomes lined with a thick crust of ice; and, if they happen for an instant to open a window, the moisture of the confined air is immediately precipitated in the form of a shower of snow. As the frost continues to penetrate deeper, the rocks are heard at a distance to split with loud explosions. The sleep of death seems to wrap up the scene in utter and oblivious ruin.* 'At length the sun appears above the horizon; but his languid beams rather betrayed the wide waste than brightened the prospect. By degrees, however, the farther progress of the frost is checked. In the month of May, the famished inmates ventured to leave their huts, in quest of fish on the margin of the sea. As the sun acquires elevation his power is greatly increased. The snow gradually wastes away—the ice dissolves apace—and vast fragments of it, detached from the cliffs, and undermined beneath, precipitate themselves on the shores with the crash of thunder. The ocean is unbound, and its icy dome broken up with tremendous rupture. The enormous fields of ice, thus set afloat, are, by the violence of winds and currents, again dissevered and dispersed. Sometimes impelled in opposite directions they approach, and strike with a mutual shock, like the crush of worlds,—sufficient, if opposed, to reduce to atoms in a moment, the proudest monuments of human power. It is impossible to picture a situation more awful than that of the poor crew of a whaler, who see their frail bark thus totally enclosed, expecting immediate and inevitable destruction.'

On the erroneous hypothesis that the quantities of ice which encumber the Arctic seas, have been accumulating for a long succession of years, it has been, still more erroneously, assumed as a fact, that throughout Europe a milder and more genial climate had formerly prevailed.—On this subject the Professor has the following remarks:

On glancing over the incidental notices of the state of the weather, it is obvious that no material change has taken place for the last thousand years in the climate of Europe; but we may conjecture that it has gradually acquired rather a milder character; at least its excessive severity appears on the whole to be of rarer occurrence. The weather seems not to effect any precise course of succession, although two or more years of remarkable heat or cold often follow consecutively; yet there can be no doubt, that series of atmospheric changes, however complicated and perplexing, are as determinate in their nature as the revolutions of the celestial bodies. When the science of meteorology is more advanced, we shall, perhaps, by discovering a glimpse of those vast cycles, which result from the varied aspects of the sun combined with the feebler influence of the moon, be at length enabled to predict, with some degree of probability, the condition of future seasons. The intermediate period of nine years, or the semi-revolution nearly of the lunar nodes and apogee proposed by Toulou, seems not to be altogether destitute of foundation. Thus of the years remarkably cold, 1622 was succeeded after the interval of four periods, or 36 years, by 1658, whose severity lasted through the following year. The same interval brings us to 1695, and five periods more extend to 1740, a very famous cold year; three periods now come down to 1767, nine years more to 1776, and eighteen years more to 1794, the cold continuing through 1795. Of the hot years it may be observed, that four periods of nine years extend from 1616 to 1692, and three such again to 1679. From

* The sound of voices which, during the cold weather, could be heard at a much greater distance than usual, served now and then to break the silence that reigned around us, a silence far different from that peaceful composure which characterises the landscape of a cultivated country. It was the death-like stillness of the most dreary desolation and the total absence of animated existence. Parry.—During the winter at Melville's Island, people were heard conversing at the distance of a mile. This was no doubt owing partly to the density of the frigid atmosphere; but chiefly to the absence of all obstruction in a scene of universal calm and darkness.

1701 to 1718 there was an interval of seventeen years, or very nearly two periods, while three periods reach to 1745, another period to 1754, and one more falls on 1763; and from 1779 to 1788, there are just nine years. The year 1818 would therefore corresponded to 1701, 1719, and 1746, and consequently very nearly to 1718. Again, the years 1784, 1793, 1802, and 1811, at the intervals of successive periods, were all of them remarkably warm. A cycle of 54 years, including therefore six of these subordinate periods, has lately been proposed with much confidence, but apparently on slender grounds. If the climate had undergone any real change in the more temperate parts of Europe, continues the same learned writer, 'a corresponding alteration, with very distinct features, must inevitably have taken place in the Arctic regions. But a dispassionate inquiry discovers no circumstances which at all clearly point at such a conclusion.'

Many curious anecdotes are told of the Greenland or Polar bear—the most formidable of the Arctic quadrupeds. This fierce tyrant of the cliffs and snows of the north, inhabiting the caves of the rocks, or the hollows of icebergs, unites the strength of the lion with the untameable fierceness of the hyena. Our author remarks:

'The annals of the north are filled with accounts of the most perilous and fatal conflicts of the Polar bear. The first, and one of the most tragical, was sustained by Barentz and Heemskerke, in 1596, during their voyage for the discovery of the north-east passage. Having anchored at an island near the strait of Waygat, two of the sailors landed, and were walking on the shore, when one of them felt himself closely hugged from behind. Thinking this a frolic of one of his companions, he called out in a corresponding tone, 'Who's there? pray stand off.' His comrade looked, and screamed out, 'A bear! a bear!' then running to the ship alarmed the crew with loud cries. The sailors ran to the spot armed with pikes and muskets. On their approach the bear very coolly quitted the mangled corpse, sprang upon another sailor, carried him off, and, plunging his teeth into his body, began to drink his blood at long draughts. Hereupon the whole of that stout crew, struck with terror, turned their backs, and fled precipitately to the ship. On arriving there they began to look at each other, unable to feel much satisfaction in their own prowess. Three then stood forth, undertaking to avenge the fate of their countrymen, and to secure for them the rites of burial. They advanced, and fired at first from so respectful a distance that they all missed. The purser then courageously proceeded in front of his companions, and taking a close aim, pierced the monster's skull immediately below the eye. The bear, however, merely lifted his head, and advanced upon them, holding still in his mouth the victim whom he was devouring; but seeing him soon stagger, the three rushed on with sabre and bayonet, and soon despatched him. They collected and bestowed decent sepulture on the mangled limbs of their comrades, while the skin of the animal, thirteen feet long, became the prize of the sailor who had fired the successful shot.'

In 1788, Capt. Cook of the Archangel, when near the coast of Spitzbergen, found himself suddenly between the paws of a bear. He instantly called on the surgeon, who accompanied him, to fire, which the latter did with such admirable promptitude and precision, that he shot the bear through the head, and delivered the captain. Capt. Scoresby mentions a boat's crew which attacked a bear in the Spitzbergen sea; but the animal having succeeded in climbing the sides of the boat, all the sailors threw themselves for safety into the water, where they hung by the gunwale. His bearish majesty entered triumphantly, and took possession of the barge, where he sat quietly until shot by another party. Though the voracity of this animal is such that he has been known to feed on his own species, yet maternal tenderness is as conspicuous in the female as in other inhabitants of the frozen regions. There is no exception that she will not make for the supply of her progeny. A she-bear, with her two cubs, being pursued by some sailors across a field of ice, finding that, neither by example, nor by a peculiar voice and action, she could urge them to the necessary speed, applied her paws and pitched them alternately forward. The little creatures themselves, as she came up, threw themselves before her to receive the impulse, and thus both she and they effected their escape!

STUDY OF ANATOMY.—We have read with much interest the able and, to us, satisfactory 'Report of the select committee of the House of Representatives, on so much of the Governor's Speech, at the June session, 1880, as relates to legalizing the study of Anatomy.' Unlike most 'reports,' this will be found interesting and, possibly, valuable to every class of community. The committee have met the prejudices and superstitions relative to the practices of this important branch of science, with boldness and success. It is not assuming too much, to say that this 'report' alone, if extensively circulated and read, is amply sufficient to produce a radical change in public opinion.

We have not room, this week, for an analysis of the report, and must content ourselves by giving an abstract of the summary furnished by the committee. The report traces the progress of anatomical science from the first and rude attempts of the Greeks, through a slow process of near 2000 years, when it may be said to have assumed the character of a science, studied and taught upon philosophical principles. The committee have shown its importance to the physician, as well as to the surgeon; and they have fully demonstrated the important fact that, anatomy is to be learnt by dissection only. In this, they have done that which should forever allay the superstitious qualms and ridiculous prejudices by which the study of this valuable science has been so long impeded. Who is there among us that will say the science of anatomy is of no importance? None!—not one will make himself so ridiculous. Why then refuse the means whereby a perfect knowledge of the science is to be acquired. We should rather afford those who are engaged in this intricate, nauseous and unhealthy study, every reasonable facility that may be required; and in our humble opinion the committee ask for nothing that is unreasonable. The committee have shown that dissection is in every respect a laudable employment, except when so followed as to outrage the feelings of the surviving friends—that a change in the law, operating now indirectly on the practice of dissection, is the only mode of preventing the frequent recurrences of such outrages; that the 'working-men' in the community are especially interested in affording every facility for the acquisition of a knowledge of anatomy; that the laws now existing in this Commonwealth exhibit the manifest inconsistency of requiring of every medical practitioner a degree of knowledge, that other provisions of the law render it impossible for him to obtain at home, without a violation of the laws; that exhumations of dead bodies, a class of desperadoes, are in consequence growing up in our community; that independent of the impolicy of making dissection ignominious, by ordering those executed for capital crimes to be dissected, the supply so obtained is wholly inadequate to answer any useful purpose; and they have then shown that for almost fifty years a liberal and philosophical system has been pursued in France on the subject of anatomy and dissections, which has there effectually secured the sepulchres of the dead from violation—saved the feelings of the people from painful excitements and deplorable outrages, and besides making France the grand resort from Europe and America for the attainment of medical and surgical science, has made the amount of medical skill in France far to surpass that of any other nation in Europe or America. Paris has become the resort of medical students of all nations; and there the practice of exhumation is wholly unknown! The committee estimate the number of students annually licensed in this Commonwealth, at about fifty. What portion of these are obliged to resort to Paris to complete their education cannot be ascertained, but is known to be a very considerable portion.

The committee have also reported a bill providing for the greater security of the buried dead, and authorising the proper Municipal authorities, in the city of Boston, and in the several towns in this Commonwealth, to deliver to any physician, regularly licensed according to the laws of this Commonwealth, such dead bodies as may be required to be buried at the public expense and which shall not be claimed by any one person, whether kin or friend or acquaintance, within twenty-four hours from and after the death. The physician so receiving a subject, to give bonds that after having used it for scientific research, he shall have the remains properly interred.

EXTRAJUDICIAL OATHS.—The report of the committee on the Judiciary, to whom had been referred the petition of the Massachusetts Antimasonic State Convention, praying for a law prohibiting the administration of extrajudicial oaths, requesting to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, was taken up and discussed, in the Senate, on Wednesday. We took full notes of the debate, and have written out in full the remarks of the Honorable Mr. Thacher; for which however we have not room; and therefore avail ourselves of the very correct and concise analysis furnished by the Courier. Mr. Thacher spoke an hour and three quarters.

Mr. Webb of Norfolk said, before the question was taken, he hoped the committee on the judiciary would inform the Senate of the reasons which induced them to make the report that had been just read.

Mr. Stearns of Middlesex, (chairman of the committee) stated very briefly, that the committee had not been neglectful of their responsibility in relation to the subject; they had deliberated on it such time and in such manner as they thought their duty required; they had requested the attendance of the gentleman who submitted the order to their inquiry; he had stated to them his views; they had listened to him with attention and endeavored to compare impartially and candidly his ideas with what appeared to them to be the general state of public opinion; and they had deliberately come to the conclusion that it was inexpedient to legislate upon the subject.

Mr. Thacher of Norfolk (the gentleman who originally proposed the inquiry) said he was deeply and solemnly impressed with the belief that the subject was one which required the interposition of the Legislature, and he regretted that the committee had come to a different conclusion. The same reasons which induced him to offer the order for the inquiry, would induce him now to oppose the report of the committee. The administration of extra-judicial oaths tended to the destruction of morals, and to the encouragement of atheism and infidelity, and profane swearing. He read extracts from the works of Dr. Paley to show that a multiplication of civil oaths was not beneficial to the interests of society, and he thence inferred that extrajudicial oaths were much more to be feared and discouraged. They lay at the foundation of secret societies; and among several such societies which he mentioned (the names of all of which we do not recollect) were those of the United Irishmen, Orangemen, Odd Fellows, and lastly the Freemasons—a society, to which, he said, he was aware that some of the honorable members of the board belonged.—Oaths which appertained to the various degrees in this institution, he said, were not less than sixty, and each of these oaths contained several separate declarations, each of which was a distinct oath. One of these oaths contained sixteen such distinct declarations, each a distinct oath in itself.

Mr. Thacher then undertook an elaborate discussion of the tendency of Freemasonry—examined its pretensions to antiquity, and its claims to be considered a moral, scientific and charitable institution, as set forth in Webb's Masonic Monitor—all of which claims he denied and declared to be a great and wicked imposition. He read from some work, (the name of which we believe he did not mention) the oaths of the Entered Apprentice, the Master Mason, and the Royal Arch degrees, and undertook to show therefrom that Freemasons could not be admitted as witnesses, jurors, or judges in trials where either party was a Mason —that such oaths came in direct collision with the civil obligation of witnesses to tell the whole truth, and of jurors to do justice between man and man. He quoted a number of extracts from reports of trials in the State of New York to establish the truth of these assertions. These oaths, he contended, interfered with the duties of sheriffs, and among other incidents cited to prove the assertion, he stated the case of a Mr. Blakely, a Mason, who was pursued by a sheriff, not known to him (Blakely) as a Mason. After running for some time, and finding himself unable to effect his escape, Blakely turned and faced the sheriff, and threw up the grand hailing sign of distress of a Master Mason. The sheriff immediately stopped and said—'Get out of my sight and never let me see your face again.' To establish the charge of profanity and blasphemy, Mr. Thacher said that the ceremonies of initiation to the Royal Arch degree seemed to be contrived for no other purpose than to ridicule the miracles performed by Moses, the servant of God, and to destroy all veneration for the Deity. He stated that what he was about to describe he had witnessed himself. The candidate, or candidates, (for there must be three in this degree) were led blindfolded to an obscure corner of the lodge or room, where there was a bush made to represent the burning bush seen by Moses when he kept the flock of Jethro his father-in-law. That behind this bush were placed candles, or some combustible substance saturated with spirits of turpentine, which would rapidly take fire. When the candidates approached this bush, the bandage was removed from their eyes, and the bush, or the combustible matter, was set on fire by a man concealed behind it, so as to astonish them with a sudden illumination. The conductor of the candidates then recited the words of Moses—'I will turn aside and see this great sight; why the bush is not burnt.' The person behind the bush who represented the adorable Jehovah said, 'Moses, Moses!' to which the conductor answered 'here am I.' The person behind the bush, again representing Jehovah said, 'I am the God of thy fathers,' &c. &c. after which, the candidates were again blindfolded and led round the lodge. Many of the pass-words used in this degree, Mr. T. said, were also profane and blasphemous; one of them was the name of Jehovah, 'I am that I am;' where one was accosted by the question 'what is your name?' the reply was, 'I am that I am.' He also described what is called a mockery on the miracles performed before Pharaoh by Moses—the casting of a rod on the ground, which, by some trick or legerdemain, was made to appear like a serpent when it was taken up—the pouring of water on the ground which was made to appear like blood, &c.—From these ceremonies, Mr. Thacher drew the inference (as we understood) that Masonry was connected with the society of Illuminati, and had the same object and tendency. In conclusion, he expressed his thanks to the Senate for the attention with which they had listened to him, while he had imperfectly but honestly discharged his duty to his constituents, to his conscience, to his country, and to his God.

Mr. Webb, of Norfolk, moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed till to-morrow, 11 o'clock.

On Thursday, Gen. H. A. S. Dearborn rose in reply to the remarks delivered yesterday. He did not think the Institution incompatible with the laws of the country, or the morals of the community; an Institution which he said once received the sanction of many of the great and wise and good men of Europe, and America. He referred to Warren, to Lafayette and to Washington, as being members of this denounced society; could not believe that these eminent men would unite themselves to an impious and blasphemous association; referred the ceremonies of Masonry to Isis and Ceres; traced the rise and progress of Knighthood, portrayed the sufferings it had experienced and the good it had done; repelled the charges of atheism, &c. &c. which his honorable colleague had preferred against Masonry; was willing the institution should be given up, but hoped that it might be left to the discretion of its members; did not believe our liberties were in so much danger from that, as from another cause. He spoke about 40 minutes, and was listened to with great interest; but he spoke so rapidly that our notes are quite imperfect. We shall endeavor, however, to write them out for next week.

Mr. Thacher followed in reply; for which we have no room. Messrs. Webb and Hoyt also made a few remarks on the question, when the Senate adjourned until to-morrow (Friday) 10 o'clock—at which time our paper was put to press.

Friday—15 minutes before 12 o'clock—Report of Committee accepted.

Died at Newton, L. F. 26 inst. Mr. John Nichols, 41. Funeral to-morrow 1 o'clock—with Masonic honors.—Mem. of Encamp's. Chap's. & Lodges are invited.

THE WREATH.

ALLAN DHU.

A LOVE SONG.

[By the Ettrick Shepherd.]

I like to see you, Allan Dhu,
I like wi' you to meet,
But dinna say to me you lo'e,
For that would gar me greet.
I like to see you smile on me
Amang our maidens a';
But oh! ae vow o' love frae you
I cou'dna stand ava.

Ay, ye may smile, but dinna speak;
I ken what ye've to say:
Sae, either haud your tongue sae sleek,
Or look another way;
For, should it be of love to me,
In manner soft and bland,
I wadna ye my face should see,
For all Breadalbin's land.

Oh! Allan Dhu, 't is naught to you
Of love to gibe and jeer,
But little ken ye of the pang
A maiden's heart maun bear,
When 'a' on earth that she hauds dear,
The hope that makes her fain,
Comes plump at aince—Oh me! the thought
'Maist turns my heart to stane!

No, Allan, no—I wanna let
You speak a word the night!
Gang hame and write a long letter,
For weel ye can indite,
An' be it love, or be it slight,
I then can hae my will:
I'll steal away, far out o' sight,
An' greet, an' greet my fill.

MISCELLANY.

WEeping.

'Young women are full of tears. They will weep as bitterly for the loss of a new dress as for the loss of an old lover. They will weep for anything or for nothing. They will scold you to death for accidentally tearing a new gown and weep for spite that they cannot be revenged on you. They will play the coquette in your presence, and weep when you are absent. They will weep because they cannot go to a ball or tea party, or because their parents will not permit them to run away with a blackguard; and they will weep because they cannot have everything in their own way. Married women weep to conquer.—Tears are the most potent arm of matrimonial warfare. If a gruff husband has abused his wife, she weeps, and he relents and promises better behaviour. How many men have gone to bed in wrath, and risen in the morning quite subdued in tears and a curtain lecture?—Women weep to get at their husband's secrets, and weep because their own secrets have been revealed.—They weep through pride, through vanity, through folly, through cunning, and through weakness. They will weep for a husband's misfortunes, while they scold himself. A woman will weep over the dead body of her husband, while her vanity will ask her neighbors how she is fitted with her mournings. She weeps for one husband that she may get another. The widow of Ephesus bedewed the grave of her spouse with one eye, while she squinted love to a young soldier with the other.' Rather severe this!

CAMPBELLISM.

We perceive by the papers that Alexander Campbell the man who a year or two since, held a long discussion, on the subject of the Christian Religion with Mr. Owen at Cincinnati, has lately started a NEW religion, in the West, and has gained possession of a new Baptist Church in Cincinnati. He publishes his creed in a paper devoted to the sect! and among its articles are the following:—

1. 'There has been no preaching of the Gospel since the days of the Apostles.'
2. 'The people have been preached from texts of scripture until they have been literally preached out of their senses.'
3. 'All the public preaching now necessary, is to undo what has already been done.'
4. That John Calvin preached as pure Deism, as was ever taught by Voltaire or Thomas Paine; and that this Deism is taught in all the colleges in Christendom.'
5. 'That all the faith that men can have in Christ is historical.'
6. 'That the words 'little children' in the New Testament, are to be understood literally.'
7. 'That faith is only a historical belief of facts stated in the Bible.'
8. 'That Baptism, or immersion, actually washes away sin and is regeneration.'
9. 'That Baptism or immersion is made the first act of a Christian's life, or rather the regenerating act itself.'

And by some other articles this immersion is made the sole ground of the forgiveness of sins and the only thing required in the New Testament as necessary to salvation!

TO MOSES THACHER,

Member of the Senate of Massachusetts, Ex-Minister of 'the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham,' Present Minister of 'the Church in North Wrentham,' Member of the late 'Antimasonic State Convention of Massachusetts,' Member of the late 'National Antimasonic Convention,' Succeeding Mason, Antimasonic Lecturer, and Editor of the Antimasonic 'Boston Telegraph.'

LETTER II.

SIR:

When the first spring of political ambition had taught you the value of worldly honors, you said, or may be supposed to have said, 'Oh, that I were made judge in the land!' Well, sir, you have been made 'judge in the land.' The people of Norfolk, by a strange delusion, appointed you to a place at the Senate Board of the Commonwealth. You have taken your seat among gentlemen, who are not only nominally, but really and truly, for private virtues and personal merit, entitled, in the highest and most flattering sense of the word, to the appellation of honorable. Sir, is the high place of your honor, is your chair at the Senate, a bed of roses on which you repose with delight? In which you feel the high value of self complacency? In which your wearied and jaded thoughts rest from the 'compunctious visitings of conscience'? Do your recollections ever retrace the crooked and mystic path which led to this consummation of all that was magnificent in your imagination? Look back, for a moment; call to mind the first, enchanting visions of greatness that pressed upon your fancy, and overwhelmed your reason. Count up the rounds of that ladder by which you climbed to the dizzy height of greatness, from which you behold 'the kingdoms of the world' spread out to tempt your ambition. Sir, the first round of your political ladder should be kept, and it will be kept, constantly in your view.—Its name is written in letters of fire on your heart. And, although in your multifarious vocations—as a Minister, the servant of the Living God—as a Senator, the servant of the people—as an Editor, the servant of antimasons—you must of necessity find constant demand upon your time, that name will never cease to press upon your memory.—It is APOSTACY!! Mark it well. It was the first step you hazarded in your struggle for political honors: it will be the last forgotten, when these honors have departed.—When these honors have departed? Do you ever find you excited, overstrained feelings flagging and withering under the doubt implied in that question?

Do your thoughts ever, in your moments of retirement, when no eye is upon you but that One which searches the hidden recesses of the heart, return upon your bosom like a sea of fire? Do they never admonish you how terrible is the retributive justice of Heaven, even in the tribunal of conscience? Listen, I beseech you, to this admonition. It is the precursor of that final, solemn, irrevocable destiny to which your thoughts and motives and passions stand amenable; where hidden disguises and intrigue, political ambition and worldly honors, will stand confronted and exposed before simple integrity and undissembling truth. There the proud Pharisee, who exclaims 'God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men,' will shrink from the presence of the humblest Publican who invokes mercy in his meek ejaculation, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.'

Do your fears ever send the quickened current in your veins back upon your trembling heart, and admonish you of the uncertain tenure of life and its honors; how soon the grave may receive you, eternity open upon you, and judgment await you? Oh, listen to these pleadings for honest and sincere repentance.

Does your imagination never bring upon your ear the guilty, maddening cry of Apostacy, or whisper, in 'words that burn,' that the eyes of men read the naked thoughts of your bosom? Listen, I pray you, to this invitation to seek forgiveness.

Sir, these are topics on which you have preached—subjects familiar to your lips, for purposes of exhortation. Let them be borne to your heart, as indications to direct your practice in this life, and to form your rational hopes of a purer life, exempt from the allurements of worldly policy, the intrigues of political ambition, the passion and heat of party, and the bitter recollections of a guilty conscience.

Has it never occurred to you that you owe to Masonry all, yes, all your greatness? Had you not been a Mason, you could not have apostatized, nor made those confessions which have raised you so far above others less disposed to display their infirmities. To Masonry, murder and treason and all, you owe that very elevation from which you now look down on the steps, the gradations, the rounds by which you ascended. If apostacy is written on the first, if its burning letters have displaced the mild characters of gratitude, there are still reminiscences that never can be erased from your recollections: that you owe to Masons and Masonry, in more senses than one, a debt of gratitude as warm and unsophisticated as all your early hopes, as broad and as deep as all your recent success. But he who needs to be reminded of his causes for gratitude will never feel that warm emotion. It is of spontaneous and generous growth. Its first offerings are mingled with the incense of holiest devotion: it expires only with the last respiration of life. To Masons and to Masonry, I repeat, there is an unpaid debt—there will remain an unpaid debt—which, neither your antimasonic honors, nor your political distinction, nor your holy, ministerial labors, nor your secular editorial engagements, can ever wholly efface from your memory.

Sir, a relation of yours, a worthy, intelligent and highly respected citizen, once related to me one of the fables of Æsop, 'the husbandman and the viper.' Have you ever read the moral of that fable? Where, sir are the honors that are comparable to the proud reflections of an honest man? Where are the Christian graces that are not made brighter and more lovely, by the virtue of gratitude?

I am, Sir, yours

FENELON.

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered at the Installation of the Officers of Montgomery Lodge, Medway, Mass. Dec. 29, A. D. 1830.

By JOHN G. METCALF,

Master of said Lodge.

Antimasonry has preferred her complaint to the bar of public opinion, and demands a verdict in her favor. We say we are not guilty and demand the proof. Let us be fairly tried, and we do not fear the result. But we demand, and we have a right to demand, that something more shall be brought in proof, than the bare ipse dixit of those, who direct the antimasonic whirlwind; or something more incontrovertible than their subsidized presses, whether edited by Samuel D. Greene, Moses Thacher or Pliny Merrick. As one of the Masonic family, I feel willing that the subject of Masonry should be as strictly scrutinized, as any antimasonic madman could wish. I have no fears, that public opinion, with a fair chance for a decision, would condemn us. Let us have fair play, and I am willing to abide the verdict—to stand or fall by the decision.

But the public are asked for a verdict, upon the veracious evidence of such papers as the Boston Free Press, the Antimasonic Christian Herald, and the Massachusetts Yeoman. These are the affidavits, and the oral testimony comes from Pliny Merrick, Moses Thacher and Samuel D. Greene, together with the antimasonic crusaders from Michigan and New York, Judge Dexter and Henry D. Ward. We ask for more proof than these witnesses have yet brought to light. Let us have evidence from those who are not a party concerned in the verdict—and not from those, who, with half the inducement, have already published to the world the infamy of their own conduct, and demanded the 'thirty pieces of silver' as the price of their moral degradation.

I am willing that the public gaze should be fixed upon Masonry as strongly and as intensely as vision will permit. I am willing that the subject of Masonry should be fairly, dispassionately and openly discussed. But I am not willing that the public should only be permitted to look at the subject, through the clouds and darkness, that antimasonry has endeavored to throw around it. I am not willing that the public should make up their verdict upon such questionable testimony as has yet been brought before them. I am not willing that their opinion should be fixed by such witnesses, as have yet been produced in the arena; by such witnesses as have averred, that the illustrious CLINTON participated in the abduction of Morgan, and, at last, died the death of the suicide, from the pangs of remorse; by such men as fabricated and published such falsehoods as Anderton's affidavit; by such men as prostituted themselves to support the character of such men as Anderton. I am not willing that evidence should be thought sufficient when coming from such men as Moses Thacher or David Pease, although they may claim to belong to the only true church, and say they are the ministers of the Prince of Peace; or from such men as Pliny Merrick, although he confesses that, for years, he adhered to Masonry, after he had become convinced that it was an 'unclean thing.' Let the subject be calmly and fairly deliberated on, and I am willing to abide the issue. Let the writings of Masons be appealed to, and if there can be found one line that inculcates infidelity or atheism let them fall. But I ask our accusers to put their fingers upon one single line, yea, upon one solitary word of such a character.

But some of the more moderate antimasons, say they have nothing to do with Masons, it is only Masonry that they would war with. This sophism is too plain to be tolerated. What! do they think that Masonry can exist without Masons! Would they have the world believe that they curse Masonry and love those who adhere to its principles! And if Masonry is only the object of their hate, why have they declared a war of extermination against Masons? You cannot denounce the principles or practice of a man, unless you question his discernment or impeach his honesty. Then let us hear no more of this. If Masonry is denounced, so are those who uphold and support it.

But to particularize some of the charges that have been brought 'per order,' against the Masonic Institution, we have Charge 1st. 'The Masonic Fraternity have erected for themselves, a distinct and independent government, within the jurisdiction of the United States.'

And how is this proved? Why! by saying that Masonic law consists in the oaths or obligations to observe that law; that the penalty of Death is attached to the infringement thereof; that Masons must only deny what is said against them 'per order'; and that in Johnson's Dictionary, penalty means punishment! From this argument, it is said, 'we must have the irresistible conviction, that the Masonic Fraternity have erected an independent government within the jurisdiction of the United States.'—'This, to be sure, is a very easy and summary way of disposing of the question, but with all meekness, and all due deference to a person, who only decides after 'much fasting and prayer'; I ask the people, that people whom he would have us believe he has convinced, whether they are ready to take those lips for an oracle, which once told his congregation, the famous story about the Templar's Armory at Boston? which once said that the 'gospel ministry, required all the time and all the talents of the most talented man,' and yet spends no inconsiderable part of that time, and those talents, in propagating the most venomous sentiments among the community? which once said that he had come to the conclusion, after long and mature deliberation, and with much fasting and prayer, that it was his duty to request a dissolution of his pastoral connexion with his church and congregation, and, in just one week thereafter, withdrew that request? But will not the people require more proof than such men show them, before they come to their conclusions? Will they not, in the beginning, acknowledge, that the Masonic, as well as any other society, has the right of making such rules and regulations for the government of its members, as it sees fit, provided such laws are not opposed to, and do not contravene the laws of the United States and the several States? Have we not a right to demand of this public prosecutor, that he put his finger upon the instance, the one solitary instance, where Masonic bodies have acted in opposition to the laws of our common country? Have we not a right to demand, of this second Solomon come to judgment, that he prove his assertion, that Masonic bodies do not hold themselves amenable to any tribunal in the country? Let him adduce, in proof, something beside mutilated extracts from Masonic books. Let him point out the law of the United States that Masonic legislation has abrogated? Let him tell what Lodge of Masons has ever committed the crime of premeditated murder? This dealing so much in wholesale generalities, may, perhaps, be in accordance with the spirit of antimasonry, but the time will come when something more will be required; ay, the time will come when the people will demand proof, before they acknowledge conviction. Let the candid and considerate reflect but one moment, and this charge and the pretended proofs of its establishment, will fall to the ground. Will they not say it is incumbent upon the accuser, to show some stronger reasons, before they can admit, 'that all the talents, and all the learning, and all the moral worth of our common country, are the perquisite of antimasonry; or, that when it dies, wisdom and honesty will die with it?' Will the people 'exceedingly fear and quake' because of the wonderful exploits of antimasonry for four years past? Because William Morgan has been raised to the honors of politico-antimasonic apotheosis? Will they, the people, be awed into silence by loud denunciation, or made convert to antimasonry, because some of its headmen go up to the temple, and very devoutly thank God, that they are not as other men are?

Well, what then? suppose they are; but, then it is said, 'they may be created for purposes of charity, and they may be created and managed to the subversion of every civil government on earth.' Wondrous sagacity! how thankful must the people be, that antimasonry has, in its loving mercy and tender kindness, seen fit to enlighten the world, by proclaiming, that money is the root of all evil. It is also said, wealth is power. Granted; and will the question be answered, how much of this power was expended in procuring the affidavit of one Samuel G. Anderton? how much in circulating said affidavit in the County of Norfolk, just before a senatorial election that was holden there? and how much in paying the expences of a certain Honorable delegate who lately paid a visit to his friends in Philadelphia?

But, with regard to this charge, why is it thought best to be so cautious? why is the unanswerable argument finished by saying that Masonic funds may be perverted? I will ask if it is proper, or displays any part of the christian spirit, to throw out such insinuations as these, and adduce no manner of proof in their support? Or, is it thought, because some men call their author Reverend, that his bare assertion will be taken for truth? Let us have the proof that the funds of Masonry have ever been employed in treason or rebellion; or, that one single cent has ever been perverted, for the purpose of procuring a wretch to bear false witness against his neighbor.

MODERN PERSECUTION.

We will put down Masonry by the sword, if we cannot put it down without.—JACOB HALL.

NO. V.

The political parties of this country have heretofore generally observed some decent measures in their proceedings, feeling, probably, that the state of society here would not tolerate a course of measures revolting to the good sense of the community. But the odious combination, antimasonry, has tried a new experiment on the easy good nature of the people, and has put the public patience to the very last point of endurance.

To speculate successfully on popular credulity, or public curiosity, requires only the old course of political demagogues: a process as hacknied as low intrigue, falsehood and corruption could wish. A village or town is marked out as a favorable theatre for antimasonic operations.—Some weak or unprincipled individual there is selected as a tool fitted for the work. One of the leaders, interested in promoting the business, from expectation of reward, assumes the management of the enterprise. He announces that, at a given time and place, he shall undertake to enlighten the public mind as to Masonic enormities; shall give certain illustrations of its mysteries; and disclose certain points of its secrets, which shall be well worth the small sum of money he shall require for the entertainment. The wretched mountebank commences his pilgrimage of beggary. For his better convenience, he billets himself on his selected, perhaps unsuspecting, follower. The hour of assembling arrives. A few men, a number of women and numerous children, congregate to be cheated of their time, their money and their senses.—The wretched operator, with the deadliest passions and purposes burning in his heart, and with a full design of kindling in that assembly similar passions and purposes, profanely commences his operations by taking upon his unholy lips the accents and the words of sacred prayer!—

Next he details the particulars and the embellishments of gross, detected and exposed falsehoods; and, having awakened suspicion and curiosity, modestly asks of his auditors their political aid, or their contribution of money, or their subscription to an inflammatory paper, on whose miserable income he ekes out a wretched subsistence. And a compliance with this law beggary is the consummation of his wishes. In this way, the individual obtains the reward of his services, and the party an increase of its dupes. In this way, an Antimasonic Lecturer on Speculative Masonry earns his dirty bread, by becoming the caterer for the base appetites of a base faction. And, in this way also, the dastardly Editor of an Antimasonic paper, masked under the hypocritical disguises of religion, decoys the unwary into his insidious meshes.

The end of that man need not be predicted. There is a course of events in the natural world, and in the moral world too, which advances as certainly and steadily as the course of time itself. The earth contains materials which are thrown off in its fires and its volcanoes. The human body has its offensive humors that are ejected by its eruptions. And the body politic too throws off its impurities by its corrective laws and penitentiaries. And laws and penitentiaries will, in the last resort, correct the movements of the base wretch on whom neither moral honesty, nor the decencies of life, have any influence.

Men never persevere in strong, vigorous, high handed measures, unless they have some powerful motive that urges them constantly forward. The needy pretender, who resorts to Masonic exhibitions, and placards the particulars of his performances to attract customers, looks to his pecuniary reward to supply his necessities. He finds it easier to live on the honest credulity of the ignorant and uninformed, than to continue a laborious occupation, and to derive his support from honest industry. Another seizes on the moment of popular excitement to raise himself into brief notoriety or public station, to which his merits never could have given him a shadow of claim. To one it becomes the means of a miserable subsistence; to another, the gratification of dishonorable ambition. The motives, therefore, to hold these meetings, are quite sufficient. And so long as the easy credulity of the public will sustain them, and will reward their promoters with money or with office, so long there will be found unprincipled and abandoned wretches in abundance, ready to throw our villages and towns into disorder and confusion. The evils that ensue are wholly disregarded in the accomplishment of their own base purposes.

Neither the boldness of crime, nor the broadest extent of hypocrisy, can excite surprise, in a community where crime so often goes unpunished, and hypocrisy is so frequently rewarded. When the clerical robe is made a disguise to political ambition; when the sanctuary of God is converted into an arena for insidious and exciting discussions; when the kindnesses and ordinary charities of life are converted into the deadliest hatred; when the best feelings of the human heart are changed into the most inflammatory passions; when the father and promoter of such outrage receives a public reward for his public infamy—when we witness all these, then we should no longer wonder at crime in its boldest forms, nor at hypocrisy in its deepest disguises. Success emboldens the individual, and inspires with confidence his companions in wickedness.

So long, therefore, as unprincipled men can be hired to attack the Masonic Institution and traduce its members, just so long will corrupt and needy individuals be found, to engage in the work. But when neither offices nor emolument can be obtained, then we shall hear no more of antimasonic meetings.

ANTIMASONIC RELICS AND CURIOSITIES.

The subscriber would respectfully inform his antimasonic friends that he has arrived in Ithaca with a collection of relics and curiosities, animate and inanimate, the productions of nature and the achievements of art, well worthy their attention and that of the public in general. They have been scamped together with the most unwearied pains.

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

[From the Education Reporter.]

GAS AND GAS-LIGHTS.

This subject may be thought by some persons to be more fit for the Philosophic Chemist, than for the general reader, but after a little reflection, they will find that, it is as necessary we should be able to judge of the purity of the air we breathe, as of what we eat and drink.

Gas is the general name given to all æriform fluids, except the air of the atmosphere, and vapour or steam.—The following are among the most important of the gases.

Oxygen Gas, so called from its relation to acids, has been accounted for many reasons to be the most important substance in nature. It forms eight-ninths, by weight, of the ocean; one-fourth of the atmosphere; and, perhaps, one-fourth of the solid matter of the globe. It unites readily with most other substances, and assumes a singular variety of character in its different combinations. Thus with hydrogen, it forms water: with lead, it forms the substance called red lead; with nitrogen, in one proportion it forms atmospheric air, in another portion, the nitrous oxide, or what is called the laughing gas, in a third the acid called aquafortis; with sulphur, it forms the sulphuric acid or oil of vitriol; with iron, and all metals, it forms their ores called oxides; and so forth. But the most important character in which we know it, is as that ingredient of our atmosphere, without which animals and vegetables cannot live, and fire cannot burn. Oxygen, from this part of its history, was long named vital or pure air.—Oxygen gas is procured from various oxides, especially from the black oxide of manganese.

Nitrogen gas, so called from its relation to nitric acid, is what remains of the atmosphere when the oxygen is removed, it forms about three-fourths of the atmosphere, one-fourth of the animal flesh, and is found in small quantities in other combinations. It will not support life by itself, and therefore formerly was called azote; with a larger proportion of oxygen it forms nitric acid.

Hydrogen Gas, so called from its relation to water, hydrogen in combination with oxygen, forming that fluid, and being always procured from it, and may be obtained thus, a piece of a tobacco pipe stem, is put through a cork of a bottle, into which put a quantity of iron filings, with about twice its weight of sulphuric acid diluted with four times its bulk of water. As soon as the diluted acid reaches the iron filings, effervescence takes place and bubbles of gas escape. After allowing time for the common air to be displaced, a light may be applied to the pipe, the gas will burn with a faint light and produce much heat. This gas, is the lightest body with which we are acquainted, on this account it is used to fill balloons. It is about 14 times less dense than common air, and 16 times less dense than oxygen gas.

Nitrous gas, is procured by pouring diluted nitric acid, on some copper filings, its most important property is the greedy attraction that it has for oxygen gas in atmospheric air; on this principle eudiometers are formed.

Carbonic acid gas, this gas is diffused abundantly in nature, it is found in the state of gas, and also in combination of a great variety of bodies, such as marble, chalk, limestone, &c. By pounding either of these substances and pouring on them sulphuric acid, in a retort or bottle, the gas will be set free, and may be collected with a suitable apparatus. Carbonic acid gas, is what issues from soda-water, brisk ale, champagne, &c. while they sparkle. If drawn into the lungs in breathing, is fatal to life. A charcoal fire left in a close room with sleeping persons, has often been fatal to them, because carbonic acid gas is the product of the combustion. The famous Grotto del Cane, in Italy, is a cavern always full of carbonic acid which springs into it from below, as watersprings into a well, and runs over like water from a well. The grotto received its name from the circumstance of dogs dying instantly on being thrown into it. Carbonic acid has often proved fatal to persons leaning over fermenting vats, or descending into them soon after the fermented liquor is drawn off. It is common to see a rat die instantly, in the attempt to run along a plank lying across the mouth of a tub. In a bake-house where there is a considerable quantity of fermenting dough in the troughs, it would be dangerous to sleep on the floor, the gas rising from the dough fills the trough and runs over the edges, and descends to the floor; being heavier than the air, it always occupies the lowest place. In mines, carbonic acid gas occupies the lower part, and is called the Choke Damp, the common air occupies the middle part, and the upper part of the mine is often occupied by hydrogen gas, called the Fire Damp. Many lives are lost annually by the operation of these gasses, particularly the explosions of the fire damp. Safety lamps have been contrived by scientific men, but experience shows that humanity has not been much benefited by them as yet.

Carbonic acid gas often collects in wells that remain for some time covered. It has in many instances, proved fatal to those who attempted to descend for the purpose of cleaning the well, or performing some operation at the bottom. It is always dangerous to descend a well, or vault, or even a deep cellar, that has been long closed up, without the precaution of letting down a lighted candle. If the candle burn with its usual brightness, no danger need be apprehended; but if it burn feebly, or go out the danger is great. By leaving those cavities open for some time, the carbonic acid gradually mingles with the atmosphere, and safety is restored. A more expeditious way of cleansing them of the deleterious gas, is to let down a quantity of new slacked lime, in a tub or bucket. The lime rapidly absorbs the acid gas, the place of which is immediately supplied by the atmosphere.

If a suitable pump is at hand, the deleterious gas may be removed in a few minutes, the inhaling pipe should be extended to the bottom, or where the gas is most impure, the exhaling pipe should lead to some place where it is lower than the mouth of the well, otherwise the gas being heavier than common air, it may run back into the well again.

Carburetted hydrogen gas, this gas is used for the purposes of illumination, as an economical substitute for tallow, oil, &c. The materials of which this gas is made, are solid, as sea-coal; or liquid, as oil, or such as may be easily rendered liquid by heat, as pitch, rosin, &c. Of course the apparatus for making the gas varies in its construction according to the materials to be used in its production. The gas is in general generated in red hot iron reports, from which it passes through other vessels to be purified, and finally to the gas-holder, whence it is distributed by various pipes, to the places where it is to be burnt. This gas is invisible like air, it is driven from the gas holder, like air from a pair of bellows, it issues out at several small holes when it is to be burnt, each burner being furnished with a small stop-cock, to regulate the size of the blaze, or to shut it out entirely. The gas-lights when properly managed are both safe, cleanly and economical, for they require no time for trimming, there is no grease nor sparks coming from them, and you have as small a light or as large a one as you please, it being so easily regulated.

CONCISE DECIMAL TABLES,

For facilitating Arithmetical Calculations; by the use of which many Problems in Mensuration are made perfectly easy. Designed for Practical Men. By Timothy Claxton. The tables here spoken of are printed on a sheet, in large and neat typography, to be hung up in a counting room or workshop, or carried folded up in a pocket book. They are accompanied by a pamphlet of 28 pages, containing explanations, principles, and examples. The tables are on a peculiar construction; the excellence of which is, that while they are accurate and of extensive application, they consist of few figures and occupy but little space. Each of them, in large type, fills but little over a square inch, and contains but 117 figures; gives answers to all the round or simple numbers, from one millionth part of a unit to nine millions of units. By adding two or more of these together, the answer to all the numbers within that range may be obtained. It will save a great deal of time, to those who have occasion to make frequent calculations, and at the same time secure more accurate results than they can always obtain in the hurry of business. We recommend it to the notice of gentlemen of science as an excellent sample of ingenuity; and to business men for its utility in weighing metals and other bodies, and for reducing money, weights, and measures of most kinds required in common practice.—[Education Reporter.]

and at great expense, and are now arranged for exhibition and inspection at the office of the Chronicle, (otherwise called the Pestilence,) in Oswego-street. Among many others too tedious to mention, may be enumerated the following.

The Holy Family—a group in bronze, consisting of Elder Witherell, his wife Lucinda, and his son George.—Very much admired by amateurs, for the expressions they convey of piety and simplicity.

The Devil, in cassock and band, opening an antimasonic convention with prayer. This amiable character is perfected in pure brass, and confers considerable credit on the statuary. It is six feet high and well proportioned, and exhibits striking personifications of aspiring greatness.

Judas Iscariot—done in plaster. The traitor is represented as counting his pieces of silver; and bears a wonderful likeness to several seceding Masons.

A 'moral and religious' editor—cut out of bass-wood by a native of the forest. He is about taking his oath to the 'Belfast murder,' while his eyes are turned up in devotion. A tract, entitled 'Hard Shoves for heavy-bottomed Christians,' appears peeping out of one pocket, while a bundle of Giddins' Atheistical Almanack is displayed from the other.

Thirteen clusters of the splinters once belonging to the head-board of Mrs. Witherell. This sacred wood must be peculiarly dear to every antimason, when the circumstances attending it are considered. The sticks are warranted free from adulteration, as they were purchased from the Elder himself. A few bunches will be disposed of on reasonable terms.

A few hairs from the whiskers, and an eye tooth from the under jaw of the unfortunate Timothy Munro. These memorials may be relied on as perfectly genuine, as they were obtained from the hands of Thurlow Weed, esq. of Albany.

The Le Roy Antimasonic declaration of Independence, with the original signatures. Those of the signers who have been hung off, or are confined in the state prison, are marked with an asterisk.

The mad Masonic Lamb which bit the Elder's wife.—This beautiful but vindictive animal is under the control of a muzzle, so that any antimason may, without the least danger, examine his teeth and feel of his pelt.

The above are some of the many which the undersigned has collected for the gratification of the curious and scientific. He solicits the patronage of the public and subscribes himself, this 18th day of January, 1831, their humble servant.

GEOFFREY GIMCRACK.

ADMISSION—Masons and Jacks 25 cents. Antimasons half price. Antimasons' children, when accompanied by their parents gratis.

We have not heretofore noticed the fact that the Antimasonic State Convention, held at Hartford a few weeks since for political purposes, had nominated the Hon. Timothy Pitkin as their candidate for the office of Governor—nor have we noticed the further proceedings of that Convention, which are, in some respects, as antichristian as they are antimasonic. Their sweeping denunciations of Masonry and Masons are both uncharitable and unfounded, and with unprejudiced minds must have a tendency adverse to the object to which they aim—viz: the establishment of antimasonic intolerance and proscription upon the ruins of a social and benevolent institution, where political considerations are totally excluded and the fundamental principles of christianity sustained. We were pleased to find that Mr. Pitkin has viewed this subject in its true light, and refused his countenance to a scheme of political aggrandizement, disguised by the specious pretext of the better security of public immunities and private rights. He sees that the proscription of a large and respectable portion of the community cannot add to the security of the whole,—that the denunciation of one such body would be followed by that of another,—till the supremacy of the antimasonic oligarchy would leave more to deprecate than all its successful progress had undone. He has therefore declined to become the leader of these blind guides, and refused all fellowship in their communion. His letter to that effect is published below.—[Con. Herald.]

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

ANTIMASONIC MEMORIAL.

The very modest antimasonic memorial, which was signed by some twenty five or thirty gentlemen of Rhode Island—some of them very respectable—some of them rather so so,—some of them demagogues—and some of them more the political knave than the political flat—and handed to the Legislature of this State, requesting that body, to set up the nose pulling business and to cowhide the respectable men of the State before breakfast, and before they have taken a 'hail storm'—was referred to a committee, and that committee, after having pondered on the subject, very properly asked to be discharged from its further consideration. The Legislature said no, and so the 'gentlemen' of the committee, are required to ponder on the thing till the next session of the Legislature, to be holden next May. 'Mr. Speaker, I move; that Daniel Mowry, and Benjamin F. Hallett be added to that committee! As many as are content say Ay, non-contents. No The noncontents have it, so Daniel Mowry, and Benjamin F. Hallett are rejected! What a pity!

By the way, as we happen to be in a mood,—not in a 'John Moody' mood, for saying a thing or two, we will just pop down a paragraph relative to antimasonry and its aims and consequences.

The antimasonic party; if indeed a party of that name really exists,—has as good a right to memorialize the legislature, as any other body of people, and when their memorials, are couched in the language of decency, and breathe an air of truth, they should be listened to with attention, and should be disposed of with all the respect that their nature and intention can command. But when a body of men, some of whom are irresponsible for their acts, assemble, and memorialize the State Legislature, and ask that body to extend to them the right of nullifying especial contracts, which have been made between the state and individuals, and to give to them the entire rule of the State, they commit acts which are so decidedly preposterous, so offensive, so impudent and so disgusting, that men of decency and common worth turn from them with feelings of absolute contempt and disgust.

The memorial, from the antimasonic convention which was presented to the State Legislature, at its January Session, was nothing more or less, than a demand on that body, to violate its faith—to surrender the rights of the people, and to place the whole power of the State in the hands of a few individuals who wish to be senators, representatives, governors and dictators. It was got up, by a disappointed literary and political empiric from an obscure corner of Massachusetts, and by a man whom he had duped into the meshes of his folly; and this irresponsible, and misguided creature—who plays the saint to day and the profligate hypocrite to-morrow,—had the unblushing audacity, to ask the Legislature of Rhode Island, to denounce and proscribe, the best and the most eminent men of the State, and to give to him, and his profligate associates the rule of the community.

As for Masonry, we say nothing more, than what we have a thousand times said before, when we say, that we know nothing about the merits of the institution, and care less. It must stand or fall on the basis of its own claims to the protection of the virtuous and good; but so long as we know that the wisest and best men of all ages and of all nations have belonged to it—so long as we know that thus far, nothing bad or corrupting has grown out of it, we shall not be prepared to treat our friends, and neighbors, and daily associates, as abandoned knaves and cut throats, because they belong to the society of Masons, or to gratify the whim and the caprice of those, who signed the antimasonic memorial, and modestly asked the Legislature of Rhode Island, to pronounce them good men and immaculate patriots, and to denounce their neighbors as miserable vagabonds, worthless scoundrels, and the abettors of every species of crime and hardened villany.

There is something that is so offensive that signifies what is called antimasonry; that it is with reluctance that we ever speak on the subject.

The subject, when intrinsically considered, and weighed and measured, by all its bearings, is hardly worth any man's contemplation; but since the spirit of it has been insidiously infused through the minds of a small proportion of the public, we now and then find ourselves compelled to speak in its relation.

The whole history of the world—the annals of cabals and parties,—furnish no story of party madness, duplicity and infamy, like that which now is, and ever must be attached to antimasonry. It possesses not one solitary redeeming virtue; it was conceived in infamy and begat in lust; it has for its founder a man who was notoriously unprincipled—debauched in his habits—corrupted in his morals, and regardless of all consequences, if he but obtained money, and accomplished the base designs which he and his accomplices aimed at.

He was in a word, an abandoned worthless wretch, and in all human probability to accelerate the sale of the miserable catch penny book, that he cast upon the market, fled into some secluded section of the country where he still remains; and, aided by his associate conspirators in deeds of darkness got up a doleful story about his abduction and murder. And, to give still greater effect to his works of iniquity and infamy, he undertook, and too well succeeded, in making a few of the world believe, that he was actually murdered by men attached to the Masonic institution. Men of ambitious propensities, ardent in their hopes for political preferment, eagerly seized upon the excitement, which the address and artifice of Morgan and his associates to the sale of his book had produced, and harnessing to their car, a few mercenary and sycophantic printers, and desperate scribblers, at length succeeded, in enlisting the influence of a prostituted press; and thus assisted, they have gone onward, till they have made proselytes of the credulous and weak, and now have the impudence, to ask a Legislative body, to violate its faith and honor—to violate and trample on the constitution of the country, and enact ex-post-facto laws, for the benefit of a cabal, the leaders of which, are actuated by the most debasing and unprincipled purposes.

The antimasonic faction stops at nothing; it casts its corroding and corrupting influences into the sacred aisles and channels of the church—arrays the son against the father, and the daughter against the mother—violates the sanctity of the sepulchre—libels the memory of the dead—accuses a Washington and a Lafayette, a Clay and a Jackson, of the crimes of murder and treason, and in the fullness of its mad career, endeavors to trample on every principle of christianity, and every moral obligation of society. And men in this age of reason and light are found, who are ready to enlist in a crusade, which was got up for the purpose, of gratifying the avarice and the spleen of a man whose life was infamous—for the sake of gratifying a man, who, if he were now present, and roved around the boulevards of civilized life, could not find a man of any respectability, who would take him by the hand, or who would disgrace his family and his household by inviting him to his table. All this excitement has been produced, and all this mischief has been done, to satisfy a wretch, who himself bears the only testimony that can be produced to prove that he was ever abducted or murdered!

The times are sadly 'out of joint,' when cabals like those which attempt to sustain antimasonry, can lead the world astray, and beget and engender deeds of duplicity and of falsehood, at the contemplation of which the heart sickens and the soul revolts. When the offspring of future generations shall read the history of the present day, and ponder over the story of the antimasonic party, they will indignantly obliterate the page that contains it—treat it as a fable, and denounce the faithful historian, as the traducer of the fame of their ancestors.—[Subaltern.]

LIVING WRITERS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

NO. V.

Mr. Beckford, the projector of Fonthill Abbey, and lately its proprietor, is also an author of some celebrity. In this country we have been familiar with his name in consequence of the peculiarities of that fantastic pile. It was built at a great expense; much of it was constructed by torch light, while the proprietor retired at a distance to watch the picturesque effect produced by the moving lights of the workmen. Fonthill Abbey soon became the property of some indifferent personage, the centre tower crumbled into dust, and one of the wings after being transformed from the seat of luxury into the abode of industry, from a suite of splendid rooms into a cotton manufactory, has also been destroyed by fire. We believe that it is now only a grotesque ruin.

We are thus particular in alluding to Fonthill Abbey, in order to show that the most expensive eccentricities are but a pageant herald: they sound a trumpet, the notes linger on the ear for a moment, and straightway are forgotten. Happily for Mr. Beckford, he is the author of Caliph Vathek, an oriental tale, and his reputation will outlive the baseless fabric of his architectural dream. At sixteen years of age he published a humerous work called Biographical Memoirs of extraordinary painters. His next work was the Eastern Tale. The results of his observations in his extensive travels in Europe, have also found their way to the public in piecemeals, and are much admired. His literary talent is of the most pleasing character. He is an M. P. and is allied by marriage to some of the first families in England.

Of Captain Beechy, the author of some interesting voyages and travels; of Charles Bell, the able and distinguished writer on anatomy and anatomical expression; of Jeremy Bentham, the eccentric but powerful writer on legislation, usury, codification, and almost every subject connected with political economy, we shall say nothing. Bell is universally known among medical students as well as painters, while Bentham is the subject of a volume rather than a sketch. The work lately put forth by John Neal, contains the most accurate account of Bentham's theories and habits of thinking, and we refer our readers to this for a description of this remarkable man.

Mrs. Bray is a lady of considerable reputation. She is best known as the widow of that very clever architect, Stothard. Her first production was a series of letters from Brittany, embellished with some beautiful drawings by her husband. These were published in 1818. Her subsequent works are De Foix, Memoirs of the life of C. A. Stothard, the White Hoods, and the Protestant. These are principally historical romances, and owe much for incident to the elaborate chronicles of Froissart. This lady has been subjected to the severest criticisms, and compensated by the most liberal praise. To use the figure of an esteemed literary friend, who has written some very valuable philosophical treatises, and adds to sound logic a most forcible style, literary reputation is water in a well. The author in his first attempt to pump up a little for himself, finds it very difficult of attainment. The valve seems dry, the moving power stiff and impracticable, and after he has once succeeded in producing a flow, very little exertion is then required to keep the supply of reputation and of praise full and ample. Mrs. Stothard's works are now regularly in demand, and will undoubtedly continue to be so. She is the wife of a clergyman, in whose church her husband, Mr. Stothard, was unfortunately killed by falling off a ladder upon the marble pavement beneath him. The widow's weeds were laid aside almost as soon as those of the Ephesian Dame. A wag in the Monthly Magazine, alluding to her second marriage, observed that Mrs. Stothard undoubtedly, under the circumstances, married the Reverend Gentleman in whose church the fatal accident happened, out of respect to her deceased husband.

SCHOOL-MASTERS.

The following eloquent tribute to the worth of the school-master, is extracted from a report prepared on the behalf of the New York High School, by the Hon. Gulian C. Verplank, President of the Board.

It has been to me a source of pleasure, though a melancholy one, that in rendering this public tribute to the work of our departed friend, the lamentable member of two bodies, one of them the most devoted and efficient in its scientific inquiries, the other comprising so many names eminent for philanthropy and learning, we have met to do honor to the memory of a school-master.

There are prouder themes for the eulogist than this. The praise of the statesman, the warrior or the orator, furnish more splendid topics of ambitious eloquence; but no theme can be more rich in desert, or more fruitful in public advantage.

The enlightened liberality of many of our state governments (among which we claim a proud distinction for our own) has been extending the common school system over the whole of our population, and brought elementary education to the door of every family. In this state, it appears from the annual reports of the secretary of state, there are, besides fifty incorporated academies and numerous private schools, between eight and nine thousand school districts, in each of which instruction is regularly given. These contained last year 141,850, taught in the single state of New York, to which may be added, nine or ten thousand more in the higher seminaries of learning, exclusive, of the colleges.

Of what incalculable influence then for good or evil, upon the dearest interests of society, must be the estimate entertained for the character of this great body of teachers, and the consequent respectability of the individuals who composed it.

At the recent general election of this state the votes of 276,600 persons were taken. In 30 years the great majority of these will have passed away. Their rights will be exercised and the duties assumed by those very children whose minds are now opened to receive the earliest and most durable impressions for the ten thousand school-masters of this state. What else is there in the whole of our social system of such extensive and powerful operations on the nations character? There is one other influence more powerful, and but one. It is that of the mother. The forms of free government, the provisions of wise legislation, the schemes of the statesman, the sacrifices of the patriot, are as nothing compared with these. If the future citizens of our republic are to be worthy of their rich inheritance, they must be made so principally through the virtue and intelligence of their mothers. It is in that school of maternal tenderness that the kind affections must be first roused and made habitual—the early awakened and rightly directed—the sense of duty and moral responsibility unfolded and enlightened. But next in rank and efficacy to that pure and holy source of moral influence, is that of a school-master. It is powerful already. What would it be, if in every one of the school districts which we now count by annually increasing thousands, there were to be found one teacher, well informed without pedantry, religious without bigotry or fanaticism, proud and fond of his provision, and honored in the discharge of his duties? How wide would be the intellectual, the moral influence of such a body of men.

Many such we have amongst us. But to raise up a body of such men, they and their calling must be cherished and honored.

The school-master's occupation is laborious and ungrateful; its rewards are scanty and precarious. He may indeed be animated by the consciousness of doing good, that best of all consolations—that noblest of all motives. But that too must be often clouded by doubt and uncertainty. Obscure and inglorious as his daily occupation may appear to learned pride and worldly ambition, yet to be successful and happy, he must be animated by the same great principles which inspired the most illustrious benefactors of mankind. If he brings to his task high talents, and rich acquirements, he must be contented to look into distant years for the proof that his labor has not been wasted—that the good seed which he daily scattered abroad does not fall on the stony ground and wither away, or fall among thorns to be choked by the cares, the delusions, or the vices of the world. He must solace his toils with the same prophetic faith which enabled the greatest of modern philosophers*, amidst the neglect or contempt of his own time to regard himself as 'sowing the seeds of truth,' for posterity and the care of Heaven. He must arm himself against disappointment and mortifications, with a portion of the same noble confidence which soothed the greatest of modern poets, when weighed down by care and danger, by poverty, old age and blindness—

—In prophetic dreams he saw
The youth unborn by pious awe,
Imbibe each virtue from its sacred page.

How imperious, then, the obligation upon every enlightened citizen, who knows and feels the value of such men, to aid them, to cheer them, and to honor them. One object of the establishment of this society was designed we hope successfully to improve and extend female education.—Our other institutions for male education has had, besides its direct effect, the happy incidental one of elevating the station, enlarging the usefulness, and contributing to raise the character of the school-master amongst us.

Humble then as our labors in founding and fostering this institution may seem, and limited as they are in their sphere of action, we may look back to them with the purest satisfaction, since their certain fruit is the diffusion of light and truth and virtue, through the purest and most powerful of all agents—the MOTHER and the SCHOOL-MASTER.

THE REJECTED.

By THOMAS HAYNES BAYLEY.

Not have me! Not love me! Oh what have I said!
Sure never was lover so strangely misled;
Rejected! and just when I hoped to be blest!
You can't be in earnest! It must be in jest.

Remember—remember how often I've knelt,
Explicitly telling you all that I felt;
And talked about poison in accents so wild,
So very like torture—you started—and smiled.

Not have me! Not love me! Oh what have I done:
All natural nourishments did I not shun?
My figure is wasted—my spirits are lost,
And my eyes are deep sunk like the eyes of a ghost.

Remember—remember—ay, madam, you must—
I once was exceedingly stout and robust;
I rode by your palfrey, I came at your call,
And nightly went with you to banquet and ball.

Not have me! Not love me! Rejected! Refused!
Sure never was lover so strangely ill used!
Consider my presents, (I don't mean to boast)—
But, madam, consider the money they cost.

Remember you have worn them, and just can it be
To take all my trinkets, and not to take me?
Nay don't throw them at me!—You'll break—do not start—

I don't mean my gifts—but you will break my heart!

Not have me! Not love me! Not go to the Church!
Sure never was lover so left in the lurch!
My brain is distracted, my feelings are hurt;
Oh madam, don't tempt me to call you a flirt.

Remember my letter my passion they told,
Yes, all sorts of letters—save letters of gold!
The amount of my notes too—the notes that I penned;
Not bank notes—no, truly, I had none to send!

Not have me! Not love me! and is it then true
That opulent age is the lover for you!
Gainst Rivalry's bloom I would strive—'tis too much
To yield to the terrors of Rivalry's crutch.

Remember—remember I might call him out,
But madam, you are not worth fighting about;
My sword shall be stainless in blade and in hilt
I thought you a jewel! I find you a jilt.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 5, 1831.

EXTRA-JUDICIAL OATHS.

When the question on the acceptance of the report of the judiciary committee, asking to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject of extrajudicial oaths, was taken up, in the Senate on Thursday, as the order of the day,

Mr. DEARBORN, of Norfolk, advocated the acceptance of the report. He stated that he yesterday listened with deep interest to the lucid expositions of his worthy colleague, (Mr. Thacher.) The gentleman had presented the ceremonies of Masonry in a horrible and most revolting light; had attempted to show that the Institution of Freemasonry was incompatible with the morals of the people, the interests of community, and the cause of patriotism.

It had been thought, (said Mr. D.) that the influence of the Institution had been used to obstruct the wheels of government; to corrupt the streams of justice. But he was not thought to be dangerous, immoral, or treasonable; if it had been, we should not find enrolled among its members so many of the most eminent statesmen, pious divines and devoted patriots of those glorious days. It was then said to be an Institution engaged in charitable and scientific pursuits. Why was this said? Because (said Mr. D.) those individuals were known to be engaged in the encouragement of science and benevolence.

Mr. Dearborn then adverted to the antiquity of the Institution; said it was introduced into this country only a few years prior to the Revolution. At that period it was not thought to be dangerous, immoral, or treasonable; if it had been, we should not find enrolled among its members so many of the most eminent statesmen, pious divines and devoted patriots of those glorious days. It was then said to be an Institution engaged in charitable and scientific pursuits. Why was this said? Because (said Mr. D.) those individuals were known to be engaged in the encouragement of science and benevolence.

If a few individuals have done wrong, are we warranted in proscribing all the members of this Institution? Are we warranted in going so far? Was Warren, when fighting in the ranks on Bunker's Hill, plotting against the liberties and interests of his countrymen? Did he believe that the institution of Freemasonry was dangerous to our civil and religious rights? He was an associate of this denounced society; and so was Washington and Lafayette. And now look from Georgia to Maine—look into your Senate Chambers, your Representative Halls, and you will find that the most illustrious men; men eminent for their morals and patriotism, are members of this Institution. Can we believe they have no other object in view than to break down the liberties and morals of the people?

Who has given us the right to denounce any class of society? We are not sent here for this purpose; and if we were, he should doubt the expediency of doing so.—He should be glad if the members would abandon their Institution, if they would retire from it, and give up their titles and their regalia. But he would not raise the excitement, by attempting to drive them to do this; he would rather pour oil upon the troubled waters, and quiet their fury.

He asked if the untimeliness were not doing deeds precisely like those of which they complained? Do they not hold their secret meetings, and concert measures designed to produce the very effect which they say the Masonic Institution produces? He would not be censorious, but wished that these men might come back to their senses.

He said that as his colleague had represented the ceremonies of the Institution, they did appear ridiculous, impious, and even blasphemous; but he thought we must carry ourselves into the Institution, before we can properly understand them. He does not believe that its members think them ridiculous or impious. He does not believe that the great men whom he has named, would sanction either ridiculous or impious ceremonies.

Mr. Dearborn said that he was not a Freemason, and knew nothing of its mysteries, but what he heard from others; but he apprehended that they were not of so horrible and demoralizing a character as was represented by his colleague yesterday. He did not question the honesty of that gentleman, or the purity of his motives; he had no doubt but the gentleman believed all that he had asserted of Freemasonry. But different persons viewed these as well as almost everything else in different lights, and came to opposite conclusions from similar facts. He had no doubt that the several oaths, given in different degrees of Freemasonry, which the gentleman had read in the Senate, appeared to that gentleman and to those who acted with him, as he had represented them—ridiculous and even blasphemous; but to others they might appear solemnly religious.—He alluded to his colleague's description of the exhibition of the burning bush, as represented in royal arch Masonry, and said that he had, no doubt, that on many people's mind it would produce a very different effect. It was so with many religious ceremonies. To a Roman Catholic, he said, the presentation of the wine and wafer by the Priest, with the assurance that it was the very blood and flesh of a crucified Savior, was the dearest and the most sacred rite of his religion; while to a Protestant, the same ceremony and assurance would seem to be nothing less than impiety and blasphemy. In reference to the oaths which his colleague (Mr. Thacher) had commented on, Mr. Dearborn said he presumed they had been handed down, substantially, from the time of the crusades; and he spent some minutes in recapitulating historical notices of the origin of the societies of the Knights of Jerusalem, Knights of Malta, &c. He traced the origin of the ceremonies of Masonry to the mysteries of Isis and Ceres, which he said were very much like what Masonry is now represented to be. The great men and philosophers of antiquity were ambitious to be initiated into the mysteries of Ceres; and he does not believe they were influenced by improper motives.

In reply to what Mr. Thacher had said of the supposed connexion of the Masonic Institution, with the society of Illuminati, and the tendency of its ceremonies to promote infidelity, Mr. Dearborn spoke with great eloquence. He considered Atheism a harsh expression; he could not believe that any society of men, or even any individual, ever disbelieved the existence of a God. Such a being as an Atheist did not and could not exist. A man might discredit a particular and special revelation, but the proofs of an Almighty and Eternal Being were so bountifully and richly diffused through all the works of nature, that no man but an idiot was foolish enough to deny their soundness and validity. When told that men are associated to inculcate a disbelief in God, he might as well be told that they were associated to stop the earth in her revolutions. He does not believe that in this enlightened era, any association can grow up in community whose object it is to preach a doctrine so adverse to morals, to revelations, and to our happiness here and hereafter. He is acquainted with gentlemen who are and who are not Masons; and he sees no difference in them. Many Masons, prior to their initiation, had sworn to observe the laws and constitution of their country, and the idea that any oath could absolve them from their allegiance, was absurd and preposterous. Mr. Dearborn said that his worthy colleague had not adduced a single instance in the Commonwealth, where Masons had been guilty of a dereliction of duty, in consequence of any Masonic oaths they had taken, except in the single instance of one of our Deputy Sheriffs, in a neighboring county; who appeared to be so ignorant and stupid as to suppose that his Masonic oaths exonerated him from those which he had previously taken as an officer of government; and that he had no doubt if the High Sheriff was made acquainted with the fact, he would substitute some more competent individual to perform the duties of his station.

This institution may be considered ridiculous; he thought it was now useless; that public opinion was against it, and wished that Masons might think proper to abandon it; but as Christians, who ought to exercise some degree of charity, he thought they had no right to interfere with its concerns. If its members violate the laws of the country, punish the guilty, but not condemn it for an act committed by desperate men in another state. He could not consent to do an act that would disgrace him as a Senator, and as a man in the mind of every honest individual in the State. He believed that the passing of such an act as that contemplated; would be saying to Masons, your lodges are broken up; you can administer no more oaths. It would drive them to desperation.

Mr. Dearborn objected to the expediency of adopting any measure like that intended by his colleague, inasmuch as it was a direct infringement of personal liberty—not the freedom of the body and limbs, but the freedom of the mind, the understanding, the affections. Our government he said, was based on civil and religious freedom—it was for this that our Pilgrim fathers abandoned their homes and their dearest friends. The despotism of Turkey is not a greater infringement on private liberty than would be the act contemplated. In Constantinople a man was free to pursue what occupation he pleased; he could trade and bargain with whom he pleased; he might go and come when he pleased; but then he must be exceedingly careful as to what he should say of the Grand Seigneur; he must be extremely cautious as to what he should speak or even think of Mohammed or the Koran; it was the despotism that reigned over the mind and shackled the power of investigation and speech, in which the principal difference between that country and others comparatively free, consisted. Such a power of controlling the freedom of thought and speech, and of prohibiting men from associating together agreeably to their own views, predilections and affections, he did not wish to see exercised in this country, and for that reason, if for no other, he would vote for the report of the committee.

Mr. Thacher, in a speech of nearly an hour, undertook to reply, and went over in review many of the statements and arguments which he had presented on the preceding day. He was disappointed to perceive that his colleague, from whom he had expected support, had come out against him; and he thought if he (Mr. Dearborn) knew as much of the Masonic institution as he did, he would have adopted a different course. He repeated his conviction that the Masonic institution was irreligious, atheistical, immoral, subversive of civil liberty and opposed to the course of justice—acknowledged with mortification, that he had been a member of it, and said, if it were necessary or proper, he was willing then to suffer the penalty of breaking his obligations, if the Senate and the people thought he deserved such a punishment.

Mr. Webb, of Norfolk followed. He thought that as a Christian people, we should not be opposed to enacting laws against the administration of oaths tending to encourage immorality, which, no body doubting, he said a few words more of equal pertinence and force, and sat down.

Mr. Hoyt of Greenfield, then rose and said that he should like to stand there three hours, and thought if he had taken pains to prepare himself, he could edify and enlighten his audience, but as it was near dinner time he would not occupy the attention of the board.

Messrs. McKay and Burnell offered a few remarks.—They were prepared to sustain the report of the committee, but if any gentleman wished to be heard on the subject, they should be in favor of an adjournment. Accordingly the Senate adj. till Friday 10 o'clock.

On Friday, when the report of the committee came up in its order, Mr. Dearborn again addressed the Senate. In a rapid review of the leading points in the speech of his colleague, Mr. Thacher, he touched upon the gentleman's objection to the Masonic, on the ground that it was a secret society. He said that our Grand Juries were secret institutions; and asked if they were dangerous? If they have no tiler at the door, (said Mr. D.) they have the officer of the court, who, instead of the drawn sword, a mere phantom, is armed with the supreme power of the land to protect him. The governor of the Commonwealth is surrounded by a secret council, which he would willingly abolish, as foolish and useless. That Convention which was pronounced by a British statesman the most illustrious ever held, was a secret convention—plotting treason a-against tyranny. Is not the Senate of the United States, with closed doors, a secret body? Are not all officers appointed or approved by them, in secret? They have no tyler, but they have the sergeant at arms with his mace, to enforce obedience to their will. Is that a dangerous body? No one will have the hardihood to assert it.

He said that, not being a Freemason, and having no other connexion with the institution of Freemasonry, than such as resulted from his connexions and obligations as a citizen, he was induced by no other motive than a consciousness of duty to enter into this debate. He thought it his duty as a citizen of a free republic, as a Christian and a moral man, and standing as he did, the representative of free, enlightened and moral constituents, to interpose in behalf of those constituents, and the whole people of this commonwealth, and to exert himself to the extent of his faculties, to oppose an attempt which, if successful, would result in the disfranchisement of thousands of his fellow citizens—a numerous class of men, whose characters for honesty, integrity, patriotism, and every moral and Christian virtue, were spotless and unimpeached.

He said he could not, in justice to himself, as the descendant of one who assisted to achieve our independence, stand there and see the rights of his fellow citizens wrested from them. They were not the principles he was taught: more enlarged and liberal views were inculcated—such as he considered himself called to act upon at that time. He could not sit there and hear gentlemen, whom he had known and respected through life, pronounced unworthy of holding or being appointed to any office whatever.—Even Washington, if he were living, could not be elected a Representative to this Legislature, or appointed to the most subordinate office under government.

He was sorry that the excitement against Masons had found its way into this commonwealth. He regretted that, because a few, some six or seven, ignorant and deluded men, in a neighboring state had committed a crime, under the supposed sanction of an 'extra-judicial oath,' an attempt had been made to cast the odium of the crime upon thousands of virtuous men, for no other apparent reason, than that they had taken the same oaths, and were members of the same institution. As well, (he said) might the people of the commonwealth array themselves against the whole population of Salem, because three or four abandoned wretches belonging to that place, had conspired a murder, and actually murdered a citizen in his bed. Would it be proper, for such a reason, to say to all the respectable inhabitants of that town, You are a community of ruffians and murderers, and you are henceforth to be deprived of the rights and immunities of citizens, you cannot be trusted as witnesses or jurors, your hands are polluted with blood. Such a thing would be preposterous, and yet he thought it no more absurd than the excitement which had been raised against the whole community of Freemasons.

Mr. Dearborn said his worthy colleague was surprised at the stand he had taken; but he (Mr. D.) had greater reasons to be surprised at the course the gentleman had pursued. Having subscribed to many of their oaths, and advanced to a point, at which difficulties and dangers were discovered; then to cover was evidence of physical imbecility, and was excusable: but to become craven, turn traitor, and flee to the ranks of the enemy, when the whole line of Masonry, from Maine to Georgia, was attacked, was indeed something to be surprised and astonished at.

Mr. Dearborn repeated what he had said on Thursday, that he did not impugn the motives of the gentleman who introduced this subject before the Senate; he did not impeach his honesty; he did not blame that gentleman for withdrawing from an institution, which he did not like; but if that gentleman had taken upon himself all the obligations he said he had, he (Mr. D.) would supplicate him as a citizen, as a neighbor, as a Christian, as a messenger of Jesus Christ, and a minister of the gospel of peace, and love, and charity, and good-will, to pause and consider whether he was acting in accordance with all those duties, in thus keeping alive an excitement which could produce no good, but must produce unspeakable evil.

The gentleman is not aware of the evils that have been, and that may be brought upon the country, by the adoption of measures tending to increase the excitement. If an outrage has been committed in another state, by a few ignorant and stupid men, shall that be sufficient evidence to denounce the whole fraternity of Masons throughout the United States, and on a mere hypothesis; are we to consider all Masons capable of committing a like offence?

Mr. Dearborn said that in reply to some remarks of his, yesterday, in which he had spoken of some distinguished Masons—Washington, Franklin, Warren, and others—his colleague had quoted the case of David, to show that great and good men might be led away by temptation; but with deference, he thought the cases were not parallel, and he stated several points in which the character of David, had no resemblance to that of Washington. There were, no doubt, some Davids in our country, but, he asked, would it be consistent with honor, justice, or charity, that the heads of thousands of innocent men should be placed upon the shoulders of a David, and suffer the punishment due to such an individual? He repeated his appeal to his colleague, to use his efforts to allay and not to excite unjust prejudices, and expressed his entire belief that the fears which that gentleman professed to entertain, were groundless. He compared the delusion which frightened some people, to the mirage, which deluded travellers in certain parts of the world, and led them to suppose they beheld towers, and cities, and armies drawn up in battle array, but which were dispelled as the beams of the rising sun pierced through the fogs and mists that created the deception. He entreated those who were engaged in this crusade against an institution, which though it might be useless and ridiculous, he believed to be at least harmless, to pause and suffer the light of reason to shine upon their prejudices and dissipate their fears.

In reply to the remarks of his colleague, (Mr. Webb) Mr. D. said, he could not perceive the expediency of passing such a law as that gentleman proposed. He was not professionally a lawyer, but he believed he was right in saying that there were now laws in existence, which would prevent any person from testifying as a witness or serving as a juror, who should be trammelled with Masonic or any other oaths that should interfere with his civil or judicial oath. It was in the power of any party to an action, either civil or criminal, to challenge a witness or a juror, and if such witness or juror could not satisfy the court that he felt bound by the oath of the country, if he were a witness he would not be permitted to testify, and, if a juror, he would be replaced by another more honest and upright. He therefore thought that such a law as the gentleman wanted, if enacted, would be inoperative. In another view of the subject, also, such a law would be inoperative. It was not in the power of the legislature to undo that which is already done. Many thousands of our best and most worthy citizens it is admitted (said Mr. D.) have already taken these objectionable oaths; if we pass a law prohibiting their administration from this day forth, we must even then wait till the men of the present generation are in their graves before the law can have its intended operation.

After all, Mr. Dearborn said, it was not possible for any Masonic oath, however strong and by whatever penalties sanctioned, to supersede or impair the obligation which every citizen owed to the laws of the country. He has been informed by respectable, honorable, high-minded men, who said they were Freemasons, that in all lodges where they had ever been, it was always stated distinctly to the candidate for initiation, before his Masonic oath was administered that such an oath was not to be considered as interfering with the laws of the country, his allegiance to the state, or his religious faith; but whether such a qualification were given or not, it was of no consequence. Every sensible man knew that he could not, by any such obligations, absolve himself from the obligation to obey the laws and the constitution of the land. Here and there a weak and simple one might think his Masonic oath stronger than his moral and civil engagements; but the number of such must be small indeed, and the evil they could do, would be much less than that which would be produced by an act of hostility and extermination, against a numerous, respectable and patriotic class of society. Let these antimasonic gentlemen (said Mr D.) show as much magnanimity and forbearance as the Masons have exhibited towards them; let them exercise that same Christian charity which the Masons have so liberally exhibited towards them, and the excitement will be allayed, and agitated society will again appear

'Smooth and unruffled as a Summer sea,

When not a breath of air blows o'er its surface.'

When Mr. Dearborn had finished, no one rose to reply, and the question being put by the President, the report of the committee was accepted without a division. Had the vote been taken by yeas and nays, and it is much to be regretted that it was not, Messrs. Thacher of North Wrentham, Webb of Weymouth, and Hoyt of Greenfield, it is known would have voted in the negative, and it is probable that Mr. Holmes of Plymouth would also have so voted. Making four; this being the number of antimasons, in the Senate. A phalanx powerful enough to damn any cause.

It must not be presumed that we have done anything like justice to Mr. Dearborn in the abstract we have given of his speeches. He spoke with great eloquence, but so rapidly that we could not follow him so closely as was desirable; we have therefore only sketched some of the leading features of his argument.

SLEIGHING.—The Lynn Democrat states that a party of ninety arrived at the Hotel in that place on Tuesday, in three sleighs, one of which contained forty of the number, and was drawn by six beautiful horses. Another party of one hundred and seventy had a supper and ball at the same house on Friday evening.

We perceive by the same paper that our friend Barton gives notice that he shall continue open during the winter, for the accommodation of Parties, &c. that celebrated establishment known by the name of the 'Lynn Minerat Spring Hotel.' In the Summer season this is one of the most delightful retreats in the State, and we have no doubt but that in the hands of its present affable and gentlemanly occupant it will be found equally pleasant in winter.

BOLIVAR.—There is but little doubt but this great man and patriot is no more. The latest accounts from Santa Martha state that on the 13th Dec. he was there in a very low state of health, and was not expected to live forty-eight hours. His disease was the consumption. He had issued a Proclamation or Farewell to the Colombians, in which he says, he has endeavored to plant liberty, where before tyranny only reigned; that he has labored disinterestedly, abandoning his fortune and his repose: that his enemies have assailed that which is most precious to him, his reputation and his love of liberty. They have persecuted him, and conducted him to the verge of the grave.—He pardons them.

ESSEX DEMOCRAT.—We have received the first number of a paper just commenced in Lynn, under the editorial management of Mr. Benj. Mudge, late editor of the Lynn Mirror. Its typographical execution is neat, and its columns furnish evidence of industry, taste, and judgment, on the part of its worthy editor. In its politics it is friendly to the present national administration.

PREMIUMS.—The editor of the Southbridge, Mass. Mirror offers for the best original tale, $10; for the second do. $5; for the third, a vol. of his paper. For the best poem, $10; for the second best, Shakespeare's works; for the best essay on family government, $5.

A number of articles prepared for this day's paper—among them the notice of the funeral of our late Br. Nichols—are necessarily deferred till next week.

THE ACCEPTED.

By THOMAS HAYNES BAYLEY.

I thank you for that downcast look,
And for that blushing cheek:
I would not have you raise your eyes,
I would not have you speak:
Though mute, I deem you eloquent,
I ask no other sign,
While thus your little hand remains
Confidingly in mine.

I know you fain would hide from me
The tell-tale tears that steal
Unbidden forth, and half betray
The anxious fears you feel:
From friends long tried and dearly loved
The plighted bride must part;
Then freely weep—I could not love
A cold unfeeling heart.

I know you love your cottage home,
Where in the summer time,
Your hand has taught the clematis,
Around the porch to climb;
Yon casement with the wild rose screen,
Yon little garden too,
How many fond remembrances
Endear them all to you.

You sigh to leave your mother's roof,
Though, on my suit she smiled;
And spurning every selfish thought,
Gave up her darling child;
Sigh not for her, she now may claim,
Kind deeds from more than one;
She'll gaze upon her Daughter's smiles
Supported by her Son!

I thank you for that look—it speaks
Reliance on my truth;
And never shall unkindness wound
Your unsuspecting youth;
If fate should frown, and anxious thoughts
Oppress your husband's mind,
Oh! never fear to cling to me,—
I could not be unkind.

Come, look upon the golden ring—
You have no cause to shrink,
Though oft 'tis galling as the slave's
Indissoluble link!
And look upon yon Church, the place
Of blessing and of prayer;
Before the altar hear my vows—
Who could dissemble there!

Come to my home; your bird shall have Astranquil a retreat;
Your dog shall find a resting place,
And slumber at your feet;
And while you turn your spinning wheel,
Oh! let me hear you sing,
Or, I shall think you cease to love
Your little golden ring.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

MOORE & SEVEY.

NO. 22, CORNHILL, (LATE MARKET-STREET.)

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

[Original.]

TO MOSES THACHER,

Member of the Senate of Massachusetts, Ex-Minister of 'the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham,' Present Minister of 'the Church in North Wrentham,' Member of the late 'Antimasonic State Convention of Massachusetts,' Member of the late 'National Antimasonic Convention,' Seceding Mason, Antimasonic Lecturer, and Editor of the Antimasonic 'Boston Telegraph.'

LETTER III.

SIR:

Until within a few weeks I had no definite information as to the origin of your renunciation of Masonry. I had heard whispers of the humble origin of Moses Thacher, of unpretending expectations, of voluntary kindnesses, of gratuitous assistance, of unrequited favors, and ungrateful returns: a rapid succession of events that altogether formed one of the strongest instances of an unfeeling, indurated heart ever set forth within the limits of real life. I had also heard, amidst the jarring elements of the antimasonic excitement, the name of Moses Thacher, as a leading debater in sundry popular assemblies, and a conspicuous agent in the general operations of the party. But it was not until after the publication of Rev. Mr. Ferguson's Letters, that I was induced to seek for the information which has led me to trace your rapid career in the service of that faction.

I have examined your 'Address' before Montgomery and St. Alban's Lodges, and the preface and notes thereto appended; your 'Address' to your church and congregation renouncing Masonry; and your 'Reasons' for withdrawing from your Masonic brethren. Sir, I would not denounce on the head of my bitterest enemy a worse imprecation than that he should be compelled to write and publish three such extraordinary productions as these.—There is no man living whose reputation for candor and intelligence could survive the publication of three such tracts. There are few men living who would have the boldness and the temerity to send their name and their character down the stream of time, with such witnesses to testify of their unfairness. By your own confession you have been guilty of base APOSTACY; and by your own published pamphlets you prove yourself to be guilty of base DUPLICITY!! Shrink not at this plainness of speech. It may be long ere you will be again placed in a situation where the voice of honest indignation will reach you. It will be long ere you will cease to hear, ringing in your ears, like the death knell of all your hopes and honors, the charges of gross and unnatural perfidy and misrepresentation.

On the 13th of May, 1829, you pronounced an Address before St. Alban's Lodge, wherein you say:

'As I said before, so say I now again: although we are under obligation to maintain the institution as it has been,

and to hold its secret mysteries inviolable; yet we are not under obligation to support it as it may be, or even as it is, in some sections of the country.' p. 20.

When you uttered that sentence you spoke honestly, sincerely, without duplicity and without disguise, or you spoke dishonestly, falsely, equivocally and deceptively.—Choose your alternative. Well, sir, I will suppose you have made your election; for in your renouncing 'Address' to your church and congregation, page 14; you make a declaration, in attractive duties, that you are an 'honest man,' and label your own character with an indication of frankness. You also invoke your Masonic Brethren to protect your honest reputation: 'Men and brethren, I have been frank in this address, you will bear me witness!' p. 20. I will therefore assume that you was then an 'honest man.' And I am the more desirous to contemplate you in this light, foreseeing that as you and I advance in further acquaintance there may be developments which will force upon my mind the contemplation of the other alternative. Beside, sir, the members of St. Alban's Lodge thought you an 'honest man'; and, responding to the general sentiment of your Address, that it is better to examine and correct our vices than to detail and eulogize our virtues, they did, on the same evening, vote, 'that the thanks of the Lodge be presented to Rev. MOSES THACHER, for his address, delivered before them this evening.' On the evening then of the 13th May, 1829, by your own declaration you was an 'honest man,' and the members of the St. Alban's Lodge believed you to be an 'honest man.' They believed you to be honest and sincere when you declared yourself 'under obligation to maintain the institution as it has been, and to hold its secret mysteries inviolable.' How then, sir, I demand of you, and I put it to your conscience as an 'honest man,' a professed servant of God, and in his holy presence, I solemnly demand of you how, on the very succeeding day, May 14, 1829, you dared to avow, in a preface to that address, that one design in publishing it was, to answer the question, among others relating to Freemasonry, 'Are its objects such, as have been alleged by seceding Masons?' You also make it 'a serious question'—'Is it the duty of Christians and Christian ministers to continue acting in concert with the Masonic fraternity, as such?' If you was the 'honest man' you declared yourself to be, why did you not honestly ask these questions, the evening before, in St. Alban's Lodge? Sir, does this suppression and disguise of your opinions comport with your notions of moral honesty? Whatever justification you may find in antimasonic ethics, or whatever palliation you claim on the score of pious uses, the world, sir, the intelligent, moral, religious world, will stamp that transaction with gross Duplicity. An 'honest man' will call it treachery and dishonesty.

There is another transaction so immediately connected with this, that I cannot forbear naming it in this place.—On Sunday, May 24, 1829, you make a public renunciation of Freemasonry before your church and congregation. And this renunciation you justify after having been led to examine, coolly and deliberately, the history of the institution, the history and nature of its degrees, and the nature of its secret principles.' What, sir; all this examination, 'coolly and deliberately,' in eleven days? All this study and examination since you declared, in St. Alban's Lodge, that you was 'under obligation to maintain the institution as it has been and to hold its secret mysteries inviolable'? Why, sir, in the very Preface to your Address in St. Alban's Lodge, you intimated that the work of the ministry engrossed 'all the time, and all the talents, and all the labor' you could command! And this is the reason you then give for withdrawing from Masonry.—Yet, sir, in eleven days you prepare your first antimasonic offering for publication; examine, 'coolly and deliberately,' the history, degrees and principles of Masonry; arrange your Sabbath 'discourse' on the leading sentiment that 'Confession of sin affords relief to the penitent heart,' and write out your renouncing 'Address' to your church and congregation!! Sir, this story will not answer for the examination of the merest school-boy.

Conviction forces itself on the mind either that you was not an 'honest man' when you addressed St. Alban's Lodge, or that you was not an 'honest man' when you renounced Masonry before your church and congregation. Both cannot be true. Either you suppressed the truth before St. Alban's Lodge, or you declared what was not true before your church and congregation. Is this suppressio veri, or is it declaratio falsi? Suspend yourself, sir, on either horn of the dilemma as you choose. You sum up a mass of testimony against the Masonic Institution which you could not have obtained, not to say examined, in eleven days. In addition to all that you accomplished in the eleven days, as stated, you had not only prepared your 'Preface,' but had received testimonials approving it, from two clergymen; had made your 'Appendix'; had resolved to renounce Masonry, for reasons set forth as founded on the facts detailed in your notes to your renouncing 'Address'; and all this, when but eleven days before you had declared, in St. Alban's Lodge, your obligations to 'maintain the institution as it has been, and to hold its secret mysteries inviolable'!!

Thus, I use your own testimony against yourself. I adduce not a particle of testimony from others. Never was I more forcibly struck with the entire truth of the allegation, as applied to you:

'Quem Deus vult perdere, prius dementat.'

I perceive that, in making your renunciation, you ask forgiveness 'of the church'—of your 'Fathers and Brethren in the ministry'—of your 'whole congregation, and of the world'—and of 'FREEMASONS'!! Forgiveness of Freemasons! What, sir; thrust a dagger into the bosom of a friend, and then ask forgiveness? You justify the act. Then why ask forgiveness? Have you wronged them? * * * * *

There is yet one Being of whom you should truly ask forgiveness, and from whom it is of unspeakable consequence that you should receive forgiveness. Go, sir, in secret; and, with a penitent heart, ask forgiveness of God.

I am, Sir, yours

FENELON.

WORCESTER COUNTY ENCAMPMENT.—This Encampment has recently been removed from Holden to Worcester, and we are happy to learn is now among the most flourishing in the State. At the annual communication, held at the Hall of Samuel B. Thomas, Esq. in Worcester on the 18th ult. the officers for the ensuing year were elected, with great unanimity, a list of which we shall publish as soon as received. It was then 'voted to hold the next regular meeting at said Hall, on Wednesday the 19th of March next, at 2 o'clock, P. M.'

CONVERSION.—People that change their religion from reading books of controversy, are not so much converted as outwitted.

[Communicated for the Mirror.]

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered at the Installation of the Officers of Montgomery Lodge, Medway, Mass. Dec. 29, A. D. 1830.

By JOHN G. METCALF,

Master of said Lodge.

Charge 3d. 'Masonry practices gross fraud and extortion.'

To substantiate this charge, it is said, is a very easy thing, therefore, they who do not believe it, can prove it for themselves, if they do not see fit to be convinced without. Why deal so much in guess-work and generalities? Why not be a little more specific, and tell us how, and in what manner, Masonry practices this fraud and extortion? We say there is no such thing—that not one cent of Masonic funds was ever gained by fraud, or forced by extortion. To this charge we present an unqualified denial, and shall content ourselves for the present, with asking the author of it,* the simple question, how much the Institution of Masonry has ever extorted from him?

Charge 4th. 'Masonry is immoral.'

As proof of this charge, we are told that the author of it feels convinced that it is true, and therefore, no one must be allowed to disbelieve it. Here is a syllogism with a vengeance. Whatever I believe is true; I believe Masonry immoral, therefore it is true that it is immoral! But after repeating this idea in some half a dozen different shapes; with something of the supposed feeling of a man, who is afraid his own word will not be quite convincing enough, he refers 'unprejudiced minds,' to one Elder Bernard for confirmation. And who is this Elder Bernard? Why! he is one of the chiefest Apostles and transcendent Luminaries of Antimasonry. But notwithstanding all this, he stands before the public, by his own confession, as a wretch, who has blasphemed the living God! What credit should be attached to the veracity of such a man? Would you trust him with your purse? What guaranty can he give you, that he will not embezzle its contents? Is he to be trusted with your confidence? By his confession before hand, he tells you, he will publish it to the four winds of heaven. And yet the community are called upon to receive his sayings upon Masonry, as though he still held communion with Angels. They are called upon to believe his charges and denunciations, as earnestly, as though their temporal and eternal salvation depended upon the result. But is it not strange? passing strange? that such a man should be one of the acknowledged heads of a party, who arrogate to themselves all the moral worth of the country;—who, in the language of the self-righteous Pharisee, say to all those who will not descend with them into the polluted and polluting stream of antimasonry: 'Stand off: for I am holier than thou.' But as if this charge of immorality was not abusive enough, Masonry is said to lead to 'blank Atheism.' If this be true, by what metaphysical subtilty was it reserved to this age and generation, to discover it? But it is untrue, and he who made the charge knew it to be so, when the sentiment was written. He knew that no Atheist could be made a Mason. He knew that Masons, as well as the church over which he is still suffered to preside, are taught, that they must look for salvation in Heaven, through the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ. He knew that Masons are often reminded, that purity of heart and conduct, is essentially necessary for admission into the gates of the Celestial Paradise. He knew that Masonry teaches and often enforces the maxim upon its followers, that the name of God, is never to be mentioned, but with that reverential awe, which is due from a creature to his Creator. He knew that Masons are taught, never to engage in any important undertaking, without first invoking a blessing from Deity;—and yet, with the most unblushing impudence, he charges Masonry with being made up of Atheism. If this be true, how comes it, that we find Masons, who have joined themselves to the visible church of God, and who are often heard in the exercise of prayer and adoration to that Being, whom, our accuser says, they believe, has no existence. How comes it, that Masons are found, who believe the Bible to be the word of God, and who, notwithstanding the contemptible system of antimasonic espionage, are found to be obedient to its precepts, and walk in its ordinances blameless ly

* Rev. Moses Thacher.

If Masonry is but a synonym for Atheism, how comes it, that Masons are found, whose lives and conversations show, that they are governed with a reference to the existence of a God, and in obedience to his commandments? But, thank God! this accusation is untrue. What a fearful responsibility must then rest upon those, who are continually endeavoring to instil the slanderous imputation into the minds of the community? They virtually say to the son, despise thy father for he is an Atheist:—to the father cast off thy son, for he believes there is no God.—To the widowed mother, who has taught her infant children to raise their little hands in prayer to the God, of the widow and fatherless, they say, widow, mourn not for him, who was the partner of thy joys, and the companion of thy sorrows;—he was a Freemason—he scoffed at the very existence of that Being, to whom thou prayest, and is now, without doubt, suffering the unutterable torments of the damned in hell! And can it be, that a being bearing the impress of Divinity, and made alive with his spirit, thus sits in judgment and deals out damnation to his brother men? For the credit of humanity, I wish it was not so. But, alas! the confession must be made, it is solemn reality. Not all the wealth of the Indies, ten thousand times ten thousand told, vile as I am, and so little deserving the manifold mercies I am continually receiving from the hand of our Father in Heaven, would tempt me thus to usurp and sport with the attributes of Jehovah.—I would not assume the responsibility of that man for all that earth can give, though all her powers and all her dominions should yield up, to the utmost farthing. What must be the reflections, if any he have, of such a man?—Perchance, in the silent watches of the night, the still, small voice may yet be heard. But how dreadful must be the intonations, of its awful interrogatories? Would it not require at his hands the peace he had destroyed?—The friendships he had broken? The angry dissensions he had sown? The church he had hindered in her journey Zion-ward? And the souls that had perished for lack of living waters, and of the bread of life? Its dreadful questioning would sound in his ears, like the long, loud death-wail of a drowning world.—It would ask him of his plighted faith, broken—of his solemn vows, unperformed—of his friends, betrayed—of their characters destroyed.—And, think you, could such questions be answered? On one day, they must all, all be answered:—and may Heaven, in its mercies, grant long time of preparation for the important event.

Charge 5th. 'Masonry subverts the administration of justice.'

How is this charge proved? Why by asserting for fact that which our accusers are bound, and which they are now called upon to prove: or suffer themselves to stand before the public as convicted calumniators. From what are called Masonic obligations, antimasonic inferences are drawn and delivered as though the public were bound to swallow the responses of the oracle, 'nolens volens.' Here again, the abduction of Morgan, 'like the creation of a hero in a play, or the introduction of a demigod in an epic, to work wonders and impossibilities,' is brought upon the stage, and offered for our acceptance as proof positive, to this weighty charge. Allowing that circumstance to be received, what does it prove? Why, the simple fact, that Masonry has received into her bosom, some men beside the author of this charge, which it would have been much more to her credit and honor, had she rejected. It is but repeating the old truism, that there are bad men in all societies. And with what earnestness and infatuation is this circumstance urged and insisted on? Ask an antimason what his proofs are and he tells you Masons carried off Morgan. Ask him whether his Masonic neighbor is a bad man? 'O! I don't know', he says, 'but the Masons carried off Morgan, and therefore I am bound to defame and injure the whole brotherhood—our head men say, there is no other way to get along with the matter.' Admit for the sake of argument, that Morgan was taken and carried off, (abducted if you please) by Masons,—but that Masonry taught them it was right, and enforced it upon them as a duty, is untrue and libellous. Masonry can no more be said to inculcate such wickedness, than Religion, because some men, even with the robes of priesthood upon them, have been detected in the commission of crime.—And what kind of justice is that which makes no distinction between the guilty and the innocent? By this rule, there are men, who died in all the odour of sanctity, and whose praise was upon every tongue, that should now be dragged from the silence of the grave, and held up to one universal burst of execration. History has made us familiar with the unspeakable enormities that have been perpetrated in the name of the Christian Religion, yet we have faith; as well in its threatnings of wrath, as its promises of mercy. Crime, with the hands of sacrilege, hath opened the Volume of Inspiration, and pointed with her crimsoned finger to the text—and fanaticism hath said, 'here is my warrant:—yet we still take the Bible as the guide of our faith and the rule of our life. Reasoning from the perversion of an Institution, we should condemn every Society on earth; for what one does not receive into its communion some unworthy member? What society on earth, whose principles have not been perverted, by unworthy members, either into a cloak for hypocrisy or a warrant for crime?

Under this charge it is said that Lodges and Chapters in a neighboring state, have prostituted their funds to paralyze the efforts of civil power;—but where are the proofs of this? We are not told;—but the public are asked to believe it, upon the hypocritical cantings of an interested witness. Rest the proofs of it on other or better grounds, than did the Templar's Armory Story? The people will require more proof than that. But this is the way of antimasonry—it brings forward charges, and leaves the burden of proof on those who cannot believe them without.

MODERN PERSECUTION.

We will put down Masonry by the sword, if we cannot put it down without.—JACOB HALL.

NO. VI.

There never was a political party, in this or in any other country, which could claim over Antimasons the pre-eminence of infamy for the badness of its cause, the boldness of its intrigues, or the frequency of its falsehoods.—Men, who have been unwarily betrayed into a solitary instance of attendance on their meetings, have been deemed by them as the aiders and abettors of their detestable schemes; when, in truth, those very men had promptly and unequivocally disapproved their proceedings, either from inexperience, from want of principle, or from want of a legitimate object. This mode of enlarging, in the public view, the number of their adherents, or vaunting the respectability of names, has, in many instances, operated injuriously on the reputation of individuals. And these individuals have been obliged to suffer in silence under the imputation of being the adherents of a party to which they were really opposed, or have been compelled, by a public communication, to expose the perfidy of that party, and consequently drawn upon themselves its malignant ire and abuse. Few men are willing under such circumstances, to make a parade of their names before the public. They prefer suffering some imputation upon their discretion or their judgment, rather than expose their names to further remarks and sneers. The published list of the names of delegates to the Massachusetts Antimasonic State Convention, from the several counties, is the best illustration we have at hand. The most treacherous memory will recall some instances of gross impositions in that publication.—There have been honorable instances of disavowal; particularly in Worcester, Middlesex and Suffolk, which indicate most clearly the bold impositions of that dishonest party.

Another mode of perfidious management has been to impute to others false and unfounded opinions, and by artful

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

[From the London Mechanics' Magazine.]

THOUGHTS ON THE FORMATION OF THE EARTH.

Sir,—I submit a few thoughts on the subject of geology, wishing you to publish them in your valuable Magazine, if you think them worthy of a place in it. As many writers have given their ideas on the subject, no doubt you will find many of mine are not new; yet I think, taking this essay as a whole, it will be found different from any account hitherto published on the subject.

I believe the generally received opinion is, that all things were created out of nothing, about six thousand years ago, and that in the space of six days: I think such an opinion not only opposed to reason, but also to sacred writ. If I understand the divine writer aright, he first tells us that in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth, and then he describes that chaotic mass of matter that existed at the time. Now, if that was created on the first day, when the Spirit of God moved on the face of the water, that seems to imply that it existed a long time in that state. If we allow that to have been created on the first day, we must allow that the heavens were also; and yet there is a distinct account of their creation afterwards. If the matter of our globe was in existence at the time creation is said to have commenced, we may conclude that the matter of the sun, moon and planets, was likewise in existence. Allowing that to have been the case, that would remove an apparent inconsistency in the Mosaic account; that is, our earth, which contains but about a fourteen hundred thousandth part of the matter in our solar system, should be five days in creating, and the sun, moon and stars, only one day. For when the sun received his luminous property, the moon and planets would appear to be brought into existence at the same time. By their receiving light from the sun, they would be visible to our earth, which before they could not be. Now, in respect to the six days in which the creation is said to have been carried on: when we find the interpretation put on a text contrary to reason and common sense, we conclude we have mistaken the meaning of the writer, and seek some other. When we look into the bowels of the earth, and examine the different strata of earth, the beds of sea shells, fossil-bones, vegetables, &c. we find phenomena that cannot be satisfactorily accounted for any other way than by allowing the earth to have existed more than six thousand years. Some pretend to account for the whole by the universal deluge: but even allowing the sea to contain such a quantity of shells at the time, they could not have been carried there by the waters, and deposited in beds horizontally in the manner they are found; some would have been vertical, and in all positions, with their edges rounded and broken by friction; any as there must have been some thousands of the human race destroyed at the time, would not some of their remains have been found at different depths, as well as those of other animals?

But to return to the Mosaic account; we find the sun was not created till the fourth day. Now, if the day mentioned there is to be understood as a natural day, how, or by which cause, was the natural day produced, or by what was the length of it measured before the sun was created? May we not as well suppose the length of it to have been ten thousand years as twenty-four hours? For with God a day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.

In respect to matter, I believe it to be co-existent with the Divine Being. I have two reasons for such an idea: the first is, that if all matter be created, there must have been a time when the work of creation commenced; and whether that be six thousand or six millions of years ago, there must have been myriads of ages before that time. And without likening the Divine being to one of ourselves, is it reasonable to suppose that so much power, wisdom, might, and intelligence, should have existed in a dormant state without having some work to carry on? My second reason is, when we view the starry heavens by the best telescopes, we have reason to believe they are infinite in extent, and if so, what is infinite in extent must have been so in duration? I do not mean to say that the starry heavens have always existed as they are now, many changes may have taken place; some stars may have been destroyed, and new ones brought into existence. Probably the Mosaic creation extended to our solar system only; I believe that no part of space is a complete vacuum, but that the whole is filled with a thin elastic aerial fluid, and that comets are agents employed in the work of creation—that they range through the etherial regions in all directions, collecting particles from this aerial fluid, and depositing them in the sun, or any planet that needs a supply. Is it not probable that the forty days' rain at the deluge was supplied from a comet? When orbicular motion was first given to our earth, it might have been some meteor or small body of matter; and by continuing its revolution for myriads of ages, collecting from this aerial fluid, a confused mass of matter might be gathered, like that described by Moses at the creation. And allowing the same process in nature to have taken place, as takes place in our day, air would be converted into water, and a mixture of gases, &c. into solid matter. When in a fluid state it might not be a regular mixture; some parts might have a greater tendency to coagulate or become solid than others, and that would account for mountains and other irregularities. Probably animal creation was began about that time when the waters covered the earth; they might be habitable for shell-fish, polypi, &c. Then a new process in nature would begin—secondary formations would be produced: perhaps the first dry land that appeared might be the production of coralines. As larger portions of land became dry, it would produce vegetables, as moss, liverwort, &c. which by their destruction, would form a mould-pit to support others, even trees after a time; and as the earth becomes habitable for different animals, no doubt they would be created.

If we may take the order in which fossil remains of animals, are found, as described by Cuvier, and other writers, it would be, first, (next to the primitive formation) shell-fish, polypi, &c.; next, fishes, amphibious animals, reptiles, birds, and quadrupeds; and lastly, the earth being filled with animal and vegetable productions, it would be a fit habitation for man.

From phenomena we see in the earth, we have reason to believe that by the action of the sea, rivers, &c. sea and dry land have progressively changed places several times, and that which is now the continent has been the bottom of the sea different times. Such a creation would not only be progressive as to time, but also as to the perfection of animals—the most imperfect would be created first, and last of all man the prime and principal part.

Some may say why should creation have been progressive? Would it not have been as easy for that Being that created progressively, to have spoke the world into existence at once? Granted. But we see that would not be according to the laws of nature—all the works of God that we are acquainted with are progressive. If we saw a tree spring instantaneously out of the earth to its full size, we should call it a miracle; and to speak a world into existence, must be a greater miracle. But if we allow creation to have been carried on progressively (and that by a common process in nature), there is nothing more miraculous in it, than there is in the reproduction of animals or vegetables. One thing that I will advance by way of proof, is, that the same process of creation (as far as regards matter) is still going on; islands are forming in the sea by coraline substances, and soil is continually added to the earth by the destruction of animals and vegetables.—That vegetables receive the greatest part of their nutriment and substance from air and water, may be proved by different experiments. Take pots of mould, plant different vegetables in them, and let them remain through their whole process, and there will be found an increase of mould. It may be likewise seen by the decomposition of vegetables, that they take but very little from the earth; and as animals are supported by vegetables, they cannot take anything direct from the earth. If portions of the different strata of earth be submitted to chemical analysis, it will be found that they are chiefly composed of animal and vegetable productions. If our earth should be destroyed by fire, a certain degree of heat would convert the whole into a fluid; and a sufficient degree of heat continued, would dissipate the greatest part of it in fume or vapor. We should then have the earth converted into its original substance. As a proof that such a body of matter might be collected from a thin fluid, without its being much attenuated, let us suppose that all the solid matter in our solar system would form a globe of about nine hundred thousand miles in diameter; that reduced into cubic inches would produce about thirty-three places of figures (that is taking globes for cubes, which is near enough for our purpose) then allowing only a billion of miles for the diameter of space to our solar system, a billion involved to the third power would produce thirty-seven places of figures; so there would not be a thousandth part of a cubic inch of matter to a cubic mile of space.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant, additions and embellishments make them say what never was intended, and thus press into their service the weight of names which, in connexion with Antimasonry, stand in a relation as unnatural as truth with falsehood, or light with darkness. No better illustration of this imposition can be given, than the barefaced impudence with which hardened and hired libellers upon Masonry have attempted to pervert, for their purposes, the language of Washington: a man as much beyond mean disguises and doubtful meaning, as they are beyond the influence of the common decencies of life.

Another, and somewhat favorite and successful mode has been by flattering overtures to weak, vain or superannuated individuals, to engage them in a Correspondence on the principles and tendency of Masonry, and draw out a tissue of undigested thoughts and crude opinions, formed from the united materials of the poetry of youth and the dreams of age. Without particularizing a disappointed expectant in one State, a superannuated and feeble man in another, or a weak and vain man in a third, it is apparent that the characteristics of each case mark with prominence the features of all. It is a compact of gross, indecent flattery, with the last stages of mental imbecility. A tribute of mean adulation, for the patronage of an official name. The attempt has been successful. Sixpenny pamphlets have been graced, on their little pages, with titled names and conditions, so familiarized and identified with Antimasonry, that the reputation of those names and of that party will descend together to the grave of infamy.

These are some of the artful and shameless practices to which that party has resorted, to build up and sustain itself. Its origin, founded in low intrigue and falsehood; its objects to obtain temporary notoriety or influence or office; its end—cheu! jam satis!—its end, defeat and disgrace and infamy. The constant vexations and unhalloved persecution to which Masons have been subjected, merely because they are Masons, and from men too as far below them in moral and Christian virtues as in the decent manners that regulate the ordinary intercourse of men, might excite surprise, were it not generally understood that the elements of Antimasonry are fitted to operate precisely in the mode in which they have operated—and in no other. A generous and manly antagonist may command our respect, even in his attacks; but for that unprincipled fiction no other sentiments can be entertained than disgust and abhorrence.

VERITAS..

The 'Examiner,' an antimasonic paper printed in Pittsburgh has changed its name to that of the 'Times,' and a certain Doctor Rosebug has become a co-editor. In noticing this change, and speaking of the manner, matter and style of the paper, the editor of the 'Statesman' whose paragraphs are generally well written, says:

As to matter we have nothing to say—and never shall have to that part of it which is devoted to criticisms of Morgan's pamphlet and Giddin's Almanack. The manner is pretty good; and the style does credit to the mechanic who put it together. On the whole, in reference to the 'Times,' we would say (in the quaint language of the times) that the 'condition of the antimasonic press is improved!' The type is new, the paper is good; and our only regret is to see them worn and wasted in a cause which we neither oppose nor advocate;—a cause which is as heartless as it is hopeless, and as unprovoked and ungenerous as it is unprofitable—a cause which politically, we despise, and morally loathe and deprecate—whose object is revenge, not reformation; proscription, not persuasion—which gives us nothing but one eternal wrangle, without uttering one sentiment of reason—and which denounces and damns a whole community for the supposed offence of one individual! Such a cause, we trust in God we shall never espouse, and we pray Heaven that the people of this country may ever continue so enlightened that we shall not be subjected to the humility of even opposing it.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

—Bol.—Are we all met?

Tim.—Pat, pat, and here's a marvellous
Convenient place for our rehearsal!

On Wednesday last, this town was honored with a Grand Antimasonic County Convention.

This Convention was called by a self-created committee, who by dint of letters, handbills, and runners, run down eleven delegates, and reported that they had got upon the scent of the twelfth, and had put two hounds and three men upon the track. This last named delegate did not arrive, but the antimasonic party of the County, being fully represented without him, they concluded to proceed to business.

This Convention was called for the purpose of determining upon the expediency of establishing an 'Antimasonic Republican' press in this place, and consisted of the following members:

Tolland,	Dea. Elisha Stearns,
"	Joseph B. Pitkin,
"	Otis Dimmock,
"	Samuel Case.
Vernon,	Nath'l. O. Kellogg,
"	Ralph Talcott.
Willington,	Chester Carpenter,
"	Dea. Kingsbury,
"	Ariel Eldridge,
"	George Peck,
"	Marvin Peck.

Or in other words, consisting of SEVEN federal-ists, dyed in the wool—THREE seceding democrats, and ONE Deacon Stearns—total delegation ELEVEN, (ahem!) Thus much for their republicanism;
now for their proceedings.—These eleven delegates, formed themselves into a committee of the whole upon the state of Tolland County, and proceeded to the business before them. They resolved that the morality of the County would be benefitted by the establishment of an antimasonic newspaper at the seat of government, to be under the editorial supervision of a seceding Mason, of the same kidney with noble D. Strong, the shirtless editor of the Hartford Intelligencer. Committees were then appointed to scour the County, in quest of subscribers—this committee to report upon the state of the public mind in regard to anti-masonry, at a meeting, to be holden some ten days hence. The members of this Convention, as many of them as could conveniently congregate upon the public common, then refreshed their sympathies, and having appointed a delegation to attend a proposed convention to be held at Botany Bay next summer, unanimously adjourned, until another meeting of the choice spirits should be called, by the self-created committee aforesaid.

We give the above proceedings as we received them from 'our reporter.' If there be any 'error' in the bill he alone is responsible for the fault.

If such a paper is to be established here, in the name of Heaven, dont get a villanous seceding Mason to edit it—if possible, get some decent person to do the business; a man who professes some respect for moral obligations—and not a felon, who by his own confession, is entitled to a somewhat lengthy residence in Newgate. Keep your Whittleseys and your Strongs nearer Wethersfield —for it is rather a tedious ride from this to that place, over a rough road, in spring weather.—
Words are not adequate to a description of the odium which should attach itself to a seceding

Mason—a man, who breaks every sacred obligation, deserves not in any degree, the confidence of the people—he has overleaped the last barrier that separated him from infamy. To a reflecting man, nothing can appear plainer, than the reasons which lead to a renunciation of Masonry—it is to take advantage of an excitement, which promises notoriety. Ministers of the gospel, who for years have been in full communion with Masonry, come out, all at once, and declare that, for that length of time, they have been constantly engaged in practicing deceit and knavery. What a precious confession!—but does it look reasonable? Would a Washington, a Jefferson and a Clinton have gone down to the grave with such sins upon their heads? No! such things cannot be! it is unreasonable to suppose it! it is ridiculous to propogate it!

As we have before stated, we are neither Masons nor Antimasons—and we know nothing of Masonry but from the lives of its professors. If the institution is destitute of virtue, it cannot support itself—if it is a public benefit, let it alone!—
There is no evidence against it, but that of perjured men—but there is abundance of evidence in its favor, from its acts of public beneficence.

What is political antimasonry?—it is a baseborn speculation in perjury!—entered into by men, who,
by their own confessions, set at nought all promises and all oaths—and consider them binding only so long as their personal interests are enhanced by their observance. Look at its supporters—its ranks are conspicuous for hypocrites and knaves, who seduce the unwary into the support of principles, which their sober judgment would condemn as heretical and visionary. Its object is to proscribe and arrive from society, a host of its brightest ornaments—men whom we have always honored as the oracles of the times!—and for what?— because they refuse to break their oaths and solemn obligations—to perjure themselves, and forfeit all their claims to honor and honesty: and for this they are to be persecuted, hunted down, and deprived of the privileges of freemen—to be immolated upon the altar of personal ambition.—
Where did antimasonry originate? In Spain—the hot-bed of despotism; under the republican Ferdinand!—and it is now in the hands of his apostles. And is this spirit of the Spanish Inquisition confined to Masonry or to politics? No! this proscriptive policy is carried within the walls dedicated to the service of the living God! The sacrament has been denied to Masons! and that by the pretended servants of God! O! shameless blasphemy!—and are the people prepared 'for this march of malignity through our land—to see the sacramental bread stained with the bloody fingers that have just dropped the stiletto of moral murder!
to see the cup of heavenly consolation derive a crimson hue from the hand that holds it!—If not, let them beware of the smouldering hypocrite, who is so full of fictitious charity, that the tears of the crocodile trickle in his bosom, and wet the glittering dagger that lies secreted there!'

TRUE.

A few days since a farmer, on returning to his home, found an Antimasonic Almanac lying on his table, which his wife had just bought of a pedlar: 'I don't like this, (said he) for antimasonry and antichrist are so much alike that they are nearly the same thing.'

LITERARY.

LIVING WRITERS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

NO. VI.

As we proceed in discussing the merits of the living writers of Great Britain, we find the subject growing more interesting, but more difficult.—General information is certainly desirable to all classes of persons, but we think there are a few to whom these articles would be more acceptable if they entered into the particular beauties of the different writers, and contained dissertations upon the genius and spirit of their compositions. To such, the splendid though perhaps too gorgeous criticisms of Hazlitt furnish an example of what these ought to be. But the spirit of Hazlitt is not with his fellow men: it has joined 'The innumerable cavern that moves

To the pale realms of shade.'

And 'as to the mass of mankind who eat, drink and sleep; and perform their several tasks and do as they like without us, caring nothing for our scribbles,' we are revenged on them by caring as little about their opinions, as they do about ours. They are happy, and so let them remain—

—'Brothers to th' insensible rock,
And to the sluggish clod which the rude swain
Turns with his share and treads upon.'

Mr. Bird, whose name we now introduce to our readers, is a poet of considerable taste, and has been for a long time known to the public, through the recommendation of Dr. Drake, the elegant author of Shakspeare and his times, and Winter Nights. This commendation was called forth by Mr Bird's first poem, the Vale of Slaughter, published in 1819. To these have succeeded, Machin, or the discovery of Maderia, published 1821; Cosmo, a Tragedy, in 1822; Poetical Memoirs, and the Exile, all of which have had their second editions. Some critics think his style like Campbell's, others, like Goldsmith's. Some go so far as to say he is the only correct writer of the old English heroic verse, and all agree that he has taste, feeling, passion, harmonious diction and originality of thought. He has written some beautiful lines on Woman, which have been republished very extensively, but on which we cannot at this moment lay our hands. The following passages are selected from his other productions as specimens of his style.

'He caught the panting sufferer by the hand
And raised him gently from the sea beat sand;
Cold as the billows that he lately pressed;
Pale as the foam upon that billow's crest.'

'Her white arm fell
So cold upon his neck, that all aghast,
He marked the paleness on her features cast;
And o'er her splendid form in speechless woo
Bent like a cypress o'er a wreath of snow.'

Mr. Bird's recent works have not yet come within our observation, although we are informed that he has written some poems, referring to the local scenery of the beautiful coast of Suffolk.

Mr. Birbeck, a writer on Mechanics, is known to us by his treatises from time to time published in scientific magazines. Capt. Blaquiere is a writer of travels, and has given us an account of Greece. So many better works have however, appeared on this fruitful subject, that we shall not stop to inquire into the merits of the 'Narrative.'

W. T. Brande is a well known writer on Chemistry. The Journal of Science which he edits, and the Manual of Chemistry which he has prepared, are familiar to our readers. His lecture delivered in the theatre of the Royal institution, 1816, on the subject of geology, are quite celebrated. He is a distinguished member of the royal societies of London and Edinburgh, and his peculiar opinions on chemical and geological subjects, though uninteresting to the general reader, have received the warm approbation of scientific men all over the world.—[Alb. MISCELLANY.

REVERSE OF FORTUNE.—The son of Marmontel died, as it seems, at the hospital in this city last week. The Courier des Etats Unis, of Saturday morning thus notices this event:

When Marmontel, for thirty-five years the faithful friend of Voltaire, the favorite protegee of M. de Pompeur, the fortunate coadjutor of Gretry, was the object of attention to all the nobles of the court; when placed by his contemporaries in the first rank of literature, the author of the Incas of Zemire and Azor, and of the Moral Tales, was receiving rich presents from all the sovereigns of Europe, and saw his Belisarius, which the Sorbonne had condemned, printed by order of the empress queen Maria Theresa, and translated into Russian by the empress Catherine II, herself; he little thought that his son, the heir of a name so distinguished, would at some future day, go to die in a hospital a thousand leagues from his country. Although the literary reputation of the author of so many works which, in the middle of the 18th century, obtained such signal success, has lost something of its brilliancy, it is with a painful emotion, justified by the sad end of this unfortunate person, that we cast our eyes over some papers found in his small pocket book, and we recalled, in running over them, those striking verses of Gilbert, dying like him, in hopeless despair.

Au banquet de la vie, infortune convive,
J'apparus un jour, et je meurs;
Je meurs! et sur la tombe ou lentement j'arrive,
Nul ne viendra verser des pleurs.

Arrived about a month ago from Brazil, where, like so many others, he went to seek a fortune that so few find, the French benevolent society had provided for his immediate wants; and at his request, and with a view to the restoration of his health, impaired by privations and chagrin, had placed him comfortably in the New York hospital. He died three days ago, and his unpretending funeral was followed by several of his countrymen, who only knew him by name, and who were preparing means to send him back to France.

His certificate of baptism is in the name of Louis Joseph Marmontel, son of John Francis Marmontel, Historiographer of France, perpetual secretary of the French Academy,—born at Paris, 20th January, 1787. His godfather was the Duke of Orleans, his godmother the dutchess of Bourbon.

We insert the following law, believing that it will not be uninteresting to our readers:—

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 12, 1831.

MOSES THACHER.

It will be recollected that in the Mirror of the 29th ult. we called the attention of the editor of the Providence Literary Subaltern to the following case, stated by Mr. Thacher in the Senate of this Commonwealth, on Wednesday, the 26th ult.: 'In Providence, R. I. a Masonic Deputy Sheriff was required to arrest two persons, who were also Masons, on a charge of store-breaking; and having done so, he put them in charge of two other Masons, who, of course, permitted them to escape;' and we requested that the editor would investigate the matter and make public the result; remarking that, if there could be found in Rhode Island, a Masonic Deputy Sheriff, who had been guilty of such an offence, he ought to be dragged from his concealment and stamped with ineffable infamy; but that, if the charge were not true, then the Honorable Senator should be branded as a public, malicious slanderer. In compliance with this request, Mr. Southworth, with a promptness that demands our thanks, has made the necessary investigation, and publishes in his paper of the 4th inst. the following as the result, under the head of

'INFAMOUS LIBEL.'

'In compliance with the wishes of the gentlemen of the Mirror, we have made an examination of the subject referred to, and we do not hesitate to say, that the assertion of Mr. Moses Thacher, is foolishly and unqualifiedly false.

'The only Deputy Sheriff, attached to the Masonic order, who has officiated in this county for the last twenty-five years, is COMER MASON, Esq. and it is some years since he filled the office. At the time of his service, he was not attached to the Masonic order; but, if he had been, the well-known purity of his principles, and the acknowledged fidelity with which he discharged the trusts confided to him, would abundantly repel the accusation which has been preferred by Moses Thacher against a Rhode Island Deputy Sheriff. Moses Thacher has not only asserted, that the public officers of Rhode Island, attached to the Masonic order, have been guilty of treason to their trusts, but he has publicly avowed that murder has been perpetrated in St. John's Lodge in this town. The tales of this man should be investigated; and further reluctance on the part of the Masonic society among us to do so, will not only have a tendency to increase the impudence of their libellers, but will prejudice many a man against the members of the Masonic order, and create distrust. The Masons not only owe it to themselves, but to society at large—to the whole public, to commence a speedy investigation.

We presume that further evidence will not be required to establish the falsity of the allegation in question; nor can we perceive how the Honorable gentleman is to escape the charge of being a malicious slanderer. The case was stated by Mr. Thacher on Wednesday; and on Thursday, in reply to the remark of Mr. Dearborn, that he believed the gentleman's opposition to the Masonic Institution was founded on mere hypothesis, Mr. Thacher declared that in his remarks, the day before, he intended to confine himself to facts, well authenticated; that his observations were not hypothetical, but facts that had been, and could be, testified to by thousands. Whatever weight of character the gentleman possessed, he pledged to the honorable Senate for the truth of his declarations; and, though the nature of this pledge may have been considered equivocal, and of doubtful value; yet such as it was, he voluntarily gave it. And, is it not forfeited? But we undertake to say that, this is not the only hypothetical statement the gentleman gave to the Senate, in the shape of fact. Further; it is not the only equivocal fact that fell from the Honorable gentleman's lips; which er from ignorance, or a settled purpose to slander and traduce the Masonic Institution, and to calumniate its members, we are unable to say. But with a knowledge of the fact that, for a year or two past, he has studiously devoted himself to the investigation of the subject, we cannot very readily impute it to his ignorance.

From the tenor of the gentleman's language, all who heard him were given to understand that the circumstance referred to, was one that came within the scope of his own personal observation; within the purview of his own knowledge. He gave no authority for it; but unqualifiedly stated it as a fact, for which he alone was to be held responsible. This was the ground of his own choice; for it was not necessary that he should assume the responsibility of the base fabrication; unless he believed himself required, by some stipulated or implied obligation between himself and his antimasonic associates, to bear equally the odium which attaches to the party, when an exposition of the corrupt and dastardly measures, adopted to sustain its interests, takes place. If this be the case, he took but a very small proportion of the enormous load upon his own shoulders. He openly declared, in the Senate of this Commonwealth, in a tone of voice and firmness of sentent, which none but an honest man, reposing with confidence in his God, or the most depraved and iron hearted of the human species, whose secular existence hung upon the event, could assume; that which, under other circumstances, would consign another man to irretrievable disgrace and infamy. That a man of sane mind should rise in a deliberative assembly, composed of men of character, talents and virtue, and calmly and unmoved, there avow that he had knelt at the altar consecrated to virtue and religion, and, his hand supporting that Book which he professes to believe of divine origin, taken upon himself, in the presence of his God, whom he called to witness the purity and sincerity of his motives, a series of the most solemn obligations strictly to observe certain requirements; and that he had, designedly and deliberately, violated the obligations thus taken, and exulted in his treachery, supposes a degree of infatuation or moral torpidity, to our mind wholly inconceivable. In what light then shall we regard that man, who rises in such an assembly, and calmly reads the obligations he professes to have taken upon himself in this solemn manner, and boastingly avows that he has broken them? Moses Thacher, a professed expositor of God's holy word; a minister of the Gospel of Christ, whose vocation it is to teach erring man the way to salvation, is chargeable with this! Does Mr. Thacher believe that his legislative cloak is ample enough to screen him, not only from prosecution, but from the scorn and contempt of every honest man? The public must judge. An honest man desires no screen, and his cloak, before it was by him disgraced and defiled, would much better have become a better man.

We have said that Mr. Thacher is alone responsible for the fabrication, which forms the subject of this article. This we repeat; and it will avail nothing now to attempt to avoid this responsibility, by setting up the plea that he received his information from a source which he considered entitled to credit. After a proper examination, the charge is pronounced 'unqualifiedly false', and the honorable gentlemen alone must be looked to as its father, if not by consanguinity, at least by adoption. Had the gentleman been as wary in this, as he was in his Blakely story, he would have reserved an opening, through which he might, upon emergency, have made at least an infamous retreat; for even Moses Thacher should not be willing to assume the next ridiculous falsehood, he had the impudence to utter in the presence of the highest tribunal in the State.—He did not believe it himself: he declared he did not know that it was true; but thought it quite in character with Masonic oaths! And we thought at the time, that it would be quite in character with Moses Thacher, if he himself fabricated the story to strengthen his argument on the alleged tendency of those oaths. The gentleman stated some other cases of similar character; but was particularly cautious not to give to them a 'local hab- itation.' We think he must have been off his guard, when he located in Providence his Deputy Sheriff story.

From the preceding exposition, the gentlemen of the Senate will be enabled properly to estimate the character of the statements made to them by the Reverend 'gentleman from Norfolk,' and to attach to them the credit and importance they really merit. The gentleman's motive, in introducing the subject before that body, does not seem to us to be of the most honorable character. From his own declaration it appears that, his object was not so much to obtain a law prohibiting the administration of extrajudicial oaths, as to force the subject on the notice of the members of the Senate. In reply to Gen. Dearborn he remarked: 'Investigation is what we wish—for this object the subject was brought before this honorable board.' What kind of investigation is that, which consists in scandalizing and vilifying the Institution, and fomenting the most foul and indecent anathemas against its members? To show still further the infatuation of the man, we extract another sentence from his reply to Mr. Dearborn: 'Excitements are in their nature unpleasant; but they may produce important results; had there been no excitement our independence would not have been effected.' * * * * 'If civil war becomes necessary, let it come. I fear no civil war!' We know not that the gentleman would not prefer a 'civil war', if by such a horrible event he could obtain the object of his ambition. In a time of peace and quietness, he cannot expect long to enjoy the honors which circumstances, wholly fortuitous, have heaped upon him; much less can he hope for additional preferment. It may be proper, in order to a correct understanding of the gentleman's motives, to inquire if he believe that, because in a time of excitement, anarchy and 'civil war', the virtuous and the profligate, the honest and the dishonest, the patriot and the traitor, are upon a level, he stands a better chance with worthier men, in the division of civil and political honors? If this be his belief, then he spoke his sentiments truly when he declared that he 'feared no civil war.' At all events, he can have nothing to lose by such an occurrence, and, consequently, nothing to fear. The ambitious and unprincipled political demagogue regards not the means, but the end. He acts upon the principle that the one justifies the other.

Though we were acquainted with the fact that, Mr. Thacher had intimated that a body of Masons in Providence had perpetrated a murder, we were not aware that the man had publicly avowed that it had been perpetrated by a particular Lodge. Put this being the fact, the members of that Lodge owe it to themselves, to their brethren, to the community and to their God, to investigate the charge. Let it be done. Give the Reverend gentleman an opportunity to prove his allegation; and if he fail, let him receive, from his fellow-citizens, the execrations and maledictions, which rightly attach to the profligate and abandoned slanderer.

[P] Since the above was in type, we have received the following. We offer it to the consideration of our readers and the members of the Honorable Senate, without comment.

New-Haven, Feb. 7, 1831.

Mr. C. W. MOORE:

'Dear Sir—Your letter of the 3d inst. came safely to hand, informing me that, in the Senate of your Commonwealth on Wednesday, Jan. 26, 1831, the subject of Extrajudicial Oaths being under consideration, the Hon. Moses Thacher, Senator from Norfolk, stated to that Honorable Board that, he had authority for saying that JEREMY L. CROSS, Grand Lecturer of the General Grand Chapter of the U. S. A. authorizes the Oaths in Chapters so to be given that the initiated swear to conceal all crimes of a companion R. A. Mason, MURDER AND TREASON NOT EXCEPTED. You wish to be informed whether there be any grounds for this declaration? Whether I have ever authorized any oath so to be given? or if I have ever so given one myself? and whether I was ever Grand Lecturer of the General Grand Chapter of the U. S. A.?

In answer to the above inquiries, I would state, that during the period that the late Gov. De Witt Clinton was the first officer of the General Grand Chapter, I was sanctioned by him and the other officers of that body, as a Lecturer, who was correct in my mode of work and lecturing as adopted by that body; and under that sanction I visited several States, instructing the Lodges and Chapters in the mode of work and lecturing. In regard to my giving any oath whatever, requiring the initiated to swear to conceal all crimes of a Companion R. A. Mason, MURDER and TREASON NOT EXCEPTED, or authorized others so to give it, IS WITHOUT THE LEAST FOUNDATION IN TRUTH. I never gave such an oath, nor have I ever authorized others so to give one; and further more, I have never given myself, nor authorized any person to give, any oath in Masonry, whereby the person so taking it is required to conceal any crime whatever, which may be committed by any Mason against the laws of God and his country; and so far from that being the case, EVERY MASON IS REQUIRED to keep and obey the MORAL LAWS OF GOD; 'to be a quiet and peaceable subject; true to his government, and just to his country. He is forbid to countenance disloyalty or rebellion, but is patiently to submit to the legal authority of the country, in which he lives.' I can assure you there is nothing in any oath or regulation in Masonry, from the first degree to the twelfth, as I understand them, or have taught or authorized others to teach them, contrary to the above requirements. I do not impeach the motives or integrity of the Hon. Senator, but I do assure you that his information is incorrect and without any shadow of truth for its support.

Should you deem this statement of any value, you are at liberty to make such use of it as will best subserve the cause of TRUTH.

Yours respectfully,

JEREMY L. CROSS.

THE ECLIPSE.—At 49 minutes, and 26 seconds, after 11 o'clock this morning, the great Solar Eclipse will begin to be visible in this city. The Sun when most obscured, (1 o'clock, 21 m. 11 s.) will have about the half of 11-2th visible on its northern side. The end will be at 2h. 46m. 58 1-2s. It will probably be the greatest eclipse that has been witnessed here since that of 1788, exceeding that of June 1806, when the darkness was such that fowls went to roost;—this will particularly be the case, if the weather should be cloudy. If the weather should be fair, it will probably be sufficiently dark, for near half an hour, to render the stars visible. Jupiter will be seen to the west of the sun and Venus a little to the east. The eclipse will be first seen at sunrise, in the Pacific Ocean, lat. 14d. 9m. N.; lon. 125d. 18m. W. from London—and will end at sunset, in the North Atlantic Ocean, lat. 49 deg. 16m. N.; lon. 36d. 22m. W.—a position near the Western Islands. The whole interval of time between the beginning at the first place and the end at the last is a little more than 5 hours.

At Nantucket, the eclipse will be annular,—the edge of the Sun will appear round the moon. It has been thought by persons not quite so conversant in astronomical matters as in the intricate science of eating and drinking, that the loss of heat on our globe, occasioned by a total eclipse of the Sun, at this season of the year, would produce an extremity of cold, entirely insupportable. For the consolation of such, we would assure them that the greatest depression of air ever known to be produced by any solar eclipse, did not exceed two degrees. So that they may this day view the Sun in his 'mourning robes,' without danger of freezing to death. A smoked glass will be found convenient for this purpose.

William L. Marcy has been elected U. S. Senator, by the legislature of the State of New York, in the place of the Hon. Mr. Sanford. The voices were, for Judge Marcy 86—for Mr. Works, an antimasonic and western luminary, 27.

GEOGRAPHY FOR CHILDREN.—We have been politely favored with a copy of 'A Geography for children; with eight copperplate Maps and thirty woodcuts, By Rev. J. L. BLAKE, A. M.' Mr. Blake has for some years been engaged in the instruction of youth, in the higher branches of English education; and has successfully improved the advantages thus afforded, in producing several works happily adapted to the capacities of children. In the compilation of the little work before us, we are persuaded, from a cursory examination of its pages, that he has been eminently successful. In his 'direction to teachers,' he remarks: Every thing like baby-talk has been carefully avoided, as being entirely unnecessary; and the place which that would have occupied has been filled with important matter. 'Small children, talk, and think, and understand like grown persons, if learned so to do; and, they as readily learn to do it, as to learn in any other way.'—Compilers of books for children have generally thought and acted differently. We, however, have no doubt of the correctness of the position assumed by Mr. Blake, and recommend it to the attention of authors who are engaged in like employment. The language of the Geography is well chosen. It is such as children can understand, without disgusting, by its inflation or feebleness, the more sensitive and refined ear of the tutor. The work is adapted to the use of schools and families; and in the latter will be found of more practical utility than any similar treatise with which we are acquainted. The introduction of concise historical lessons, while they tend to relieve the mind of the pupil, almost imperceptibly create a desire for greater acquisition in that important branch of education.

THEATRICAL MEMORANDA.

[Communicated for last week's Mirror, but necessarily deferred.]

MONDAY.—Douglas and the Irish Tutor. MASTER BURKE, who has been the principal theme of conversation for a long time past, made his first appearance before a Boston audience, this evening. In every place he has visited, the highest encomiums have been conferred upon him, by those who have had an opportunity of witnessing his most wonderful precocious talents. The play-going community of this city have anticipated much. And if we may judge from the enthusiastic approbation bestowed upon his performance this evening, he has more than met their expectations. His style of acting is easy and unaffected,—his diction correct, and his countenance peculiarly expressive, and pleasing. Young Norval is the best character he could possibly select in tragedy for effect. It was played throughout on this occasion, much better than we have ever before seen it.

Mrs. Stone did not do ample justice to Lady Randolph. Her shrieks were the most unnatural we ever heard.

Mr. Pearson should correct his bad pronunciation of some particular words. Charity and Amity are not pronounced, Chari-t-e-e Ami-t-e-e.

Between the play and farce Master Burke came forward and gave a specimen of his extraordinary Musical genius by leading the Orchestra in the Overture to Guy Mannering, which was loudly encored.

He gave us the real Irish brogue in Terry O'Rourke, and kept the audience in good humor for the remainder of the evening. We did not see the propriety of Mr. Smith's taking him up as he would the leg of a chicken in the midst of his combat with Dr. Flail.

TUESDAY.—Heir at Law and Whirligig Hall. Master Burke sustained the eccentric Dr. Pangloss in fine style. It was in truth quite a novelty to see him seated in an arm chair by the side of Mrs. Barnes. He was (figuratively,) lost, like 'An atom in immensity of space.'

Mr. St. misrepesented Henry Moreland.

WEDNESDAY.—Merchant of Venice, and March of Intellect. The Merchant of Venice was performed to as brilliant an audience this evening, as we have ever witnessed in this Theatre. Master Burke's points were numerous and well selected.

The March of Intellect, in which he sustains 7 characters, is a new farce written expressly for him, for the purpose of showing his great versatility of talent. The piece went off with unbounded approbation.

FRIDAY, Feb. 4th.—All those who went this evening expecting to see a complete burlesque upon the character of Richard, were most agreeably disappointed. Master Burke entered into the spirit of the piece, and did not lose sight of it in a single instance, and the 'work went bravely on.' The courting scene with Lady Anne was an excellent hit: and his combat with Richmond was very scientifically performed. Many of his points would have done credit to Booth. The assertion that he (Master Burke,) 'so young, yet so wise that he may truly be called a veteran actor,' was, on this occasion, fully verified. Mr. Scott acquitted himself well as Buckingham. If this gentleman will always speak his lines 'trippingly on the tongue,' it would be a great improvement to his acting.

The Providence Journal, in reference to the late discussion in the Senate of this State on extrajudicial oaths, remarks: 'The Rev. Moses Thatcher disgorged himself of his usual antimasonic speech. We say usual, because we believe it has been before delivered by him on public occasions. Judging from the sketch given in the Courier of the speech, we think it was the same delivered by that reverend gentleman, in this town, last March, and reported in the Daily Advertiser of the 30th of that month—probably the same he delivered at all his antimasonic lectures, and the one intended to be delivered when his ambition is gratified, and his vanity flattered, by a seat in the House of Representatives of the United States, should that event ever happen.' When that event does happen; we think the reverend gentleman can well afford to favor the world with an original document. He will have time enough to prepare it, though he does not begin for thirty years to come.

OBITUARY.

The funeral of Mr. JOHN NICHOLS, whose death was noticed in the Mirror of the 29 ult. was attended on Sunday afternoon, 30th at Newton, Lower Falls, by a large concourse of citizens. He was interred with Masonic honors, under the direction of the Boston Encampment of Knights Templars, of which he was a beloved and valuable member. The number of Masons present was about two hundred. The procession formed at the Masonic Hall and moved to the late residence of the deceased, where the corse was received and conveyed to the Episcopal Church: two Master Masons; two Royal Arch Masons and two Templars, with their appropriate regalia, officiating as Pall Bearers. At the church, the usual funeral ceremonies were performed; and an appropriate and affecting discourse was delivered by Rev. Mr. Baur. 'The circumstances attending the death of this gentleman were of the most melancholy and appalling nature. Cut off in a moment by the irresistible power and uncontrollable operation of a water-wheel in his own mill, in the full vigor of life and in the midst of his usefulness, he has left a bereaved widow and young family to mourn the awful event of a sudden and inscrutable Providence. It is but justice to the memory of the deceased to say, that in the various relations which he sustained in society, his probity, benevolence, and active usefulness, had procured him the confidence and esteem of a numerous circle of acquaintance, to whom his noble philanthropy, ardent sincerity, and generous disinterestedness, had endeared him by the strongest ties of friendship and affection. In him without exaggeration may it be said, the poor and he that had none to help him, found a friend and benefactor. As a devoted, affectionate husband, an anxious and faithful parent, the loss to his family is irreparable. Over the different societies of which he was a member, his untimely death has diffused a deep gloom, while it has filled the hearts of his relations and numerous friends with mourning and melancholy regret.'

THE WREATH.

THE NEEDLE.

BY S. WORDSWORTH.

The gay belles of fashion may boast of excelling
In waltz or cotillion—at whist or quadrille;
And seek admiration by vauntingly telling
Of drawing, and painting, and musical skill;
But give me the fair one in country or city,
Whose home and its duties are dear to her heart,
Who cheerfully warbles some rustical ditty,
While plying the needle with exquisite art.
The bright little needle—the swift flying needle,
The needle directed by beauty and art.

If love have a potent, a magical token,
A talisman ever resistless and true—
A charm that is never evaded or broken,
A witchery certain the heart to subdue—
'Tis this—and his armory never has furnished
So keen and unerring, or polished a dart;
Let beauty direct it, so pointed and burnished,
And oh! it is certain of touching the heart.

Be wise then, ye maidens, nor seek admiration
By dressing for conquest, and flirting with all;
You never, whate'er be your fortune or station,
Appear half so lovely at rout or at ball,
As gaily convened at a work-covered table,
Each cheerfully active and playing her part,
Beguiling the task with a song or a fable,
And plying the needle with exquisite art.

MISCELLANY.

INGRATITUDE.

Look round the habitable world, how few,
Know their own good, or knowing it pursue.

Dryden.

No depravity of the mind has been more frequently or justly censured than Ingratitude; it is impious in the highest degree. Not to return one good office for another is inhuman; but to return evil for good, is diabolical. Against ingratitude there is no law! 'Tis mentioned by all men with the utmost abhorrence, and is said to be worse than the sin of witchcraft. By the sin of witchcraft is meant, I suppose, applying to, or having the assistance of, infernal agents or dealing with the devil: and surely, the man who bears an ungrateful mind—who is unthankful for services done—who has no sense of kindnesses conferred—may not so properly be said to deal with infernal agents, as to be himself of the diabolical order. Ingratitude may be said to be either of a public or a private nature. Public ingratitude very rarely happens; never, indeed, except the services done have been craftily and grossly misrepresented to the people; but nothing is more common, nothing more complained of, than ingratitude of individuals towards one another. It is gratitude that links all ranks of mankind together—that unites the highest with the lowest, and produces general harmony—that prompts men to do each other good offices, and creates all the comforts and happiness to society—for there can be no person of a community so independent, or so free from and guarded against all wants and accidents, as not to stand in need of another's assistance. To be grateful is not only a duty but a pleasure. Does not the very earth instruct us in it? And may we not learn it from the brute creation? How does the thankful dog not only guard his master's life and property, but skip and play and show a thousand little acts of gratitude to the hand that feeds him? And does not the ground, after being kindly watered, return its gratitude in fruits and flowers? and shall man, made of a superior mould, be the only blemish in it—the only monster of ingratitude?—shall he that boasts of reason and celestial affinity be less grateful than the ground we tread upon—be out done by a dog?

An ungrateful man is, without doubt, the rank-est weed in the commonwealth, for he will in every duty of life be deficient: he can neither make a good magistrate, master, father nor friend, for where no obligation can bind there can be no reliance—where there is no gratitude there can be no dependence. It is gratitude that comforts us in sickness, in age, in misery, in pains and in the worst of calamities! Take away this combination, and mankind is dissociated and falls to pieces.—If a man may judge of the conscience by the countenance, the ungrateful man is never without a canker at his heart.

Of all ingratitude, next to that against our heavenly father, is the heart-rending wounds which parents are too often the innocent cause of witnessing. Harken, says Solomon, unto thy father that begat thee, and despise not thy mother when she is old—and let such as neglect the practice of these and the like exhortations, dread the threatnings of the wise man, who also declares, that the eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it. We show love to our parents when we take such courses as will increase our mutual affection; and this love and affection will appear to be founded on the principles of common gratitude, because the parental love is hourly exerting itself in all the beneficial acts it can invent—supplies all the wants of helpless infancy—secures from all the hazards of heedless childhood and unthinking youth. Parents must be allowed to discern what is most proper for their children. Let, the, stubborn, headstrong children consider the ties they have to be obedient to their parents, and they will find both pleasure and security in doing so. Too often!—too often! does this evil arise from an intercourse with evil-disposed persons, who, anxious to raise themselves in the estimation of the young, at the risk of their ruin, artfully convey to, and impress on their inexperienced minds things that are base and erroneous.

Among the numerous vile characters with which the world abounds, where can we trace one of a more dangerous tendency, more despicable, or more pernicious to society, than one, who in scripture, is represented as a tattler and a busy body in other person's matters? How many a friendship has been broken!—the peace of many a family has been overthrown! and much bitter and lasting discord has been propagated through society. What ideas, then, can be sufficient, or expressions severe enough to characterise a being of this nefarious stamp! It is not in the power of imagination to paint, in its true colours, infamy like this! Religion—sublime name!

O blest Religion, heavenly fair!
Thy kind, thy healing power
Can sweeten pain, alleviate care,
And gild each gloomy hour.

When dismal thoughts and boding fears
My trembling heart invade,
And all the face of nature wears
An universal shade:

Thy sacred dictates can assuage
The tempest of my soul;
And every fear shall lose its rage
At thy divine control.

Then let my heart confess thy power
And find thy sweet relief,
To brighten every painful hour,
And soften every grief.

OBSERVATOR.

DAVID, KING OF ISRAEL.

David was the model of an Oriental Prince, handsome in his person, valiant, mild, just and generous, humble before his God, and zealous in his honour, a lover of music and poetry, himself a poet. Successful in war, he reduced beneath his sceptre all the countries from the borders of Egypt to the mountains from whence the Euphrates springs. The King of Tyre was his ally: he had ports on the Red Sea, and wealth and commerce flowed during his reign into Israel. He fortified and adorned Jerusalem, which he made the seat of government; glorious prospects of extended empire, and of the diffusion of the pure religion of Israel, and of happy time, floated before the mind of the Prophet King.

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

[Original.]

TO MOSES THACHER,

Member of the Senate of Massachusetts, Ex-Minister of 'the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham,' Present Minister of 'the Church in North Wrentham,' Member of the late 'Antimasonic State Convention of Massachusetts,' Member of the late 'National Antimasonic Convention,' Seceding Mason, Antimasonic Lecturer, and Editor of the Antimasonic 'Boston Telegraph.'

LETTER IV.

SIR:

In a former letter I stated that Apostacy 'was the first step you hazarded, in your struggle for political honors.' I was desirous to concede to you all the merit to which you had fairly entitled yourself; and as you had prefaced your act of humiliation with a degree of ostentatious parade that indicated the intensity of feeling with which you regarded the moment of your self degradation for pretended offences, I was inclined to commence an enumeration of your virtues by admitting your claim to all the honors of an Apostate. I then supposed Apostacy to be your first secular honor in the order of time. But for any injustice I may have done you, I am desirous to make amende honorable; and now most freely admit that Apostacy is not the first in your catalogue of antimasonic virtues. I find there is another antimasonic virtue that claims precedence. If you perceive nothing generous in this concession, still you must have some presentiment that I allude to your preparatory measures which led you onward and downward to that bold act of renunciation, which severed you forever from honorable reputation and your old friends; which sealed your new compact with disgrace and infamy and antimasonry. It will no longer cause surprise that you should have escaped out of your own town, county and state, and solicited to be made a Mason in another state. It will no longer cause remark that you should flee from the eyes of your parishioners, your friends and neighbors, and trust to eyes that would be less liable to detect treachery. The demon that urged you onward could not brace your resolution to the bold undertaking at home, but led you to commence your incantations abroad. Then bold, daring, presumptuous ambition became your familiar. Its false 'lights' discovered to you the uses of Freemasonry in the advancement of your interest. It led you to the threshold of the Lodge, with the accents of sincerity on your tongue, but the elements of fraud and falsehood in your heart. It caused you to write, on the very portal of Masonry, an inscription which shall be as enduring as the name and fame of Moses Thacher: PREMEDITATED MORAL PERJURY!!

I reminded you, sir, in my last letter, of the unskilful manner in which you managed your renunciation, and I then produced your own published tracts to testify against you. As in that instance no aid was required from Masons or Masonry to convict you of duplicity, so in this, no aid shall be asked from Masons or Masonry to portray another point in your antimasonic character.

At the time of the commencement of the antimasonic excitement in New-York, you was not a Mason. You was not only not a Mason, but you then was, and probably had been long before, an antimason. In proof of this I will select some very remarkable passages from Rev. Mr. Ferguson's 'Letters addressed to the Rev. Moses Thacher.' And I the more readily do this for several reasons. In the first place, Mr. Ferguson is not a friend to the Masonic Institution, and his testimony is therefore free from the imputation of any design to sustain or assist Masonry. In the second place, he had long been your friend, had conversed with you freely and repeatedly on the subject of Masonry and knew that you agreed with him on that subject. In the third place, he is a regular, settled clergyman, respected and esteemed wherever he is known, and therefore, the utmost confidence may be had in the truth and fairness of his declarations. In the first passage he sets forth your general, settled opinion.

'If I remember correctly, you and I were agreed on the subject of Masonry long before you were a Mason. I at least know that it was the subject of conversation between us, previous to that time. Indeed it was not then, by any means a new subject with us, or with the Association of which we then were, and now are, members. Our fathers in the ministry had long agitated the subject, before we came upon the stage. There were certain points, which respected Masonry, then settled in their minds; and those points were well known to you and me. And I always thought and believed, that they were fully settled in your mind.' p. 6.

He then enumerates 'certain points settled respecting Masonry,' referring to 'its obligations,' to its being 'a secret society,' and to its 'pretensions to religion.'

'I then thought, and I believed that you and that others thought with me, that such obligations were wrong in principle.' p. 6.

'The impression was strong upon my mind, and I thought it was upon yours, that all secret societies are in their very nature liable to perversion, and are therefore dangerous.' p. 7.

'I knew enough, I know that my fathers thought they knew enough, and I thought that you knew enough to make us all dread the pretensions of Freemasonry to religion.' p. 7.

The fact is therefore settled, that 'long before you were a Mason' you had expressed your bad opinion of the Institution, that its 'obligations were wrong in principle' that for its secrecy it was 'dangerous,' and that you had cause to 'dread the pretensions of Freemasonry to religion.' It is remarkable, sir, that Mr. Ferguson has not only stated the fact that you agreed with him on the general principle of dislike to the Institution, but has enumerated 'certain points' in a manner that shows frequent and free interchange of opinion on these leading topics affecting the Institution. Not a casual conversation, but expressions of permanent, fixed opinions. Thus you stood at the commencement of the excitement; and you doubtless availed yourself of all the 'Lights' and all the 'Illustrations' at hand, to confirm 'certain points settled respecting Masonry.'

That your opinions of Freemasonry continued the same up to the very moment of your becoming a Mason is properly inferred from several circumstances. And first, from the fact that you never suggested any alteration of your opinion to your friend, Mr. Ferguson, who was in your confidence on these matters. Second: that it is not known that you suggested any change of opinion to any other person. And third: you left your own town, the location of St. Alban's Lodge to which many of your parishioners belonged, and put yourself to the trouble and inconvenience to go to a distance to be made a Mason.—An inference, prejudicial to the respectability of St. Alban's Lodge, might have been inferred from this circumstance, had you not graciously admitted in the Preface to your Address before that Lodge, that, 'In the Lodge (St. Alban's) of which I have been a member for nearly two years, society cannot boast of more worthy, upright, and conscientious citizens, than many who regularly attend its communications.' The fact is therefore forced upon the mind that your hostility to Masonry continued up to the moment of your admission.

In your 'Address on Masonic Oaths and Penalties,' there is a remarkable passage that indicates the state of your mind when you was a 'candidate.' After having assumed that the candidate does not 'find an equivalent' you state:

'The conditions therefore on the part of the promisee (the Institution) are altogether false; and the candidate, of course, is justly released from his obligations.' p. 21.

Could you by any juggling on 'obligations' and 'equivalents' justify your treachery when you was a 'candidate,' then indeed you might screen yourself from the charge of moral perjury. How, sir, is it that your mind reverts with such earnestness to the moment when you was a 'candidate'? Does an accusing conscience raise up the harrowing vision? Convince yourself, if possible, that you was released from all 'obligation' while yet you was a 'candidate,' and the spectre may be appeased. But, sir, be assured that days and months, and years shall pass away, and still the terrors of a guilty conscience will pursue you, and will force upon your heart the recollections of the moment when you was a 'candidate.'

That transaction is so horrible, so revolting to the feelings of an honorable man, that no one can look upon you without feeling that there is a moral contagion about you that sinks you to the very lowest grade of infamy. Go now, sir, where you will. Talk of an 'honest man,' of 'moral purity,' and of 'conscience'; but make no more promises, enter into no new engagement, take upon yourself no new obligation, lest you should not 'find an equivalent,' but should find that 'the candidate, of course, is justly released from his obligation.'

I am, Sir, yours

FENELON.

The following card appeared in a New-Brunswick paper:—'We are authorised to state, that the name of James Parker was placed on the antimasonic ticket without his knowledge or consent. Mr. Parker, though not a Freemason, is not an antimason; and accords with the antimasonic party, neither in their opposition to Masons, nor in their political objects.—[Craftsman.]

Antimasons profess to war, not against Masons, but Masonry; yet they contend that no Mason should be allowed to act as jurymen or hold any office; thereby denying them the common privilege of American citizens.

Antimasons profess great regard for freedom of opinion and conduct, and yet they proscribe all who will not think and act as they do.

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered at the Installation of the Officers of Montgomery Lodge, Medway, Mass. Dec. 29, A. D. 1880.

Master of said Lodge.

Charge 6th.—'Masonic Influence upon the Press.'

This is a grievous complaint with the antimasons, and they deal out their denunciations in measure as they consider the subject important. With the utmost complacency they use these words, 'Masonic bribery had almost effectually poisoned all our streams of public information.' And if it had, pray tell us how much more light has been diffused from the Antimasonic Press? Pray tell us how much wiser the people are for the publication of such things as the Antimasonic Christian Herald or the Boston Free Press? How much of knowledge has been added to the wisdom of this age, by the arrant falsehoods and ribald pasquinades of the herd of antimasonic editors, from Solomon Southwick downwards? How many statues of brass shall be raised to the great antimasonic luminaries of the world, from Thurlow Weed down to the itinerant mountebank, Jacob Allen? When antimasonry dies will not wisdom die with it? Alas! what will become of us, when she shall have ceased from her labors of love, in enlightening this heathen world? Verily! shall we not all be dead men? But we are told that some antimasonic stars 'glitter on the mantle of night,' and so would a farthing candle—the darker the night the better. And but for these stars—what? why! our 'political horizon' would be as dark as Egypt. Political horizon! what does that mean? Antimasonry meddle with politics? no! it cannot be—here is some sad mistake, for have they not cried aloud, day and night, without ceasing, that their 'sacred cause,' had nothing to do with politics? Antimasonry too, 'sprung from the throne of God,' and we are pretty sure that politics had their origin at some distance from that place. No! it cannot be! this must have been some blunder of the devil, (printer's devil, we mean) for politics never entered the mind of an antimason! What! antimasonic newspapers illuminate the political horizon? How bright that horizon must be then! And if this illumination is to be continued, pray let us know, how long it will be, before the darkness will not only be visible, but tangible also?

But, to be serious, this charge of bribing the press, is a most atrocious calumny, not only upon the Masonic Fraternity, but upon the whole editorial corps of the country. With but one Masonic Press in New-England, the charge is brought forward that every newspaper was bribed into silence by Masonic influence. This charge is untrue and has no foundation in fact. They arrive at what they call the proof of it, by this rule; any paper, that refuses to admit into its columns the astonishing productions of every antimasonic wisecrack, who may make the demand, is put down, as under Masonic influence. If an editor does not promptly acknowledge that antimasonry has engrossed all the talents, all the wisdom and all the moral worth of the country, he is set down, in their black book, as having been bribed by Masonry. A most logical conclusion truly! that every man must be bribed, who does not think antimasonry the salt of the earth, and that they who stir up its mire and dirt, are the lineal descendants of the seven wise men of antiquity.

It is well, I think, that the author of this charge said nothing about lighting up the moral horizon:—and what could he? For what has antimasonry done in this respect? What of moral truth, have these self-created conservators of the public morals, elicited? What of moral light are we to expect or look for from such vehicles of truth and honesty, as have published the sayings of Edward Giddings for the truth; a man whose infamy and want of veracity, has long since, become the 'subject of judicial record'? How much of illumination could we hope for the moral horizon, from such newspapers, as have published Anderton's Murder Story; since it was proved to be a falsehood? If the antimasonic press is as free as its supporters say it is, and if they have not too great a disrelish for the truth, will they be so good as to publish the Affidavits from Belfast, in Ireland, proving beyond a doubt, that Anderton's Affidavit is false and himself a perjured miscreant?

Charge 7th.—'The artful and insidious measures with which Masons have been thrust into offices of power and trust.'

We are charged with holding seven-eighths of the offices of the country. How do antimasons know this?—Perhaps the people would like to see some proof of the fact, before they believe it—at any rate it might be as well to have something ready in case proof should be called for. And allowing that Masons do hold the offices, what does it prove? Certainly, not much for antimasonic capability. If Masons are found in office, the antimasons must go to the people and ask them the reason of it—they put them there, and no doubt, have some good reason for it. But if we are no better off in New-England, than our brethren are in Pennsylvania, we do not hold one twentieth part of the offices in the gift of the people. What has become of the boasted promise of the antimasons of this state, to ascertain the number of offices held by Masons? On inquiry do they find that the facts in the case, do not exactly tally with their round assertions before hand?—We should like to hear the report of their committee on the subject.

But we are not only charged with holding all the offices worth having; we are also charged, with getting into them in some clandestine manner. How is this? getting into office clandestinely! What new definition of terms have they got hold of now? Will they be so good as to tell us how an open town meeting can be called a clandestine one?

It is charged also, that artful and insidious measures are resorted to by Masons, to place their friends in office.—To prove this, nothing is offered but the surmises and insinuations of the accuser. We say it is a foul slander and claim to be innocent until proved guilty. Let it be proved if it can be, that Masons ever made use of such means as were resorted to, to procure the election of Moses Thatcher to the Senate, and I shall be willing to plead guilty.—When Masons publish and circulate such papers as Anderton's Affidavit, to procure the election of their candidates, then we are willing to be branded in set terms by the whole antimasonic herd. It has been said, that only two or three days before the election of Thatcher, some hundred copies of Anderton's affidavits were distributed in one single town in the county of Norfolk, and that too, before it was published in Boston. If this is not using insidious and artful measures to control the freedom of elections, we humbly ask what is? This noted paper, that has since been proved a whole-cloth falsehood, and sworn to, by a wretch, who was intoxicated at the time it was taken down, was circulated far and wide, upon the eve of an election, after it was too late to be disproved or contradicted. And now the very party, whose kennel agents did this, come forward, and through the mouth of their servant, and a minister of the gospel too, tell the public that Masonry interferes with the purity and freedom of the elective franchise.

But this charge hypocritically concedes to Masons, that as men, they may enjoy their rights and prerogatives like other citizens—and goes on, and says the 'commonwealth is in danger,' unless Masons are thrust out of its government, and their places filled by their own honorable selves. But why do they not come out plainly and openly—and say to the people, give us the reins of your government, for there is none like us in the whole world, for holding them. This would have one recommendation—it would be plain and honest, and there could be no mistake as to the meaning of the words. And if they do not soon come out with the acknowledgment, it will come too late for their credit; as a few more National Conventions will open the eyes of those, who are still blinded and deluded by their chicanery and cunning. Look at the elements of the National Convention, lately defunct at Philadelphia. Was it not made up of broken down politicians and inflammatory demagogues? Men who 'cry aloud and spare not,' and who will continue to 'cry aloud and spare not,' until their mouthing patriotism becomes hopeless, or their disinterested benevolence is satiated with the fat salaries of office.

[To be concluded.]

MODERN PERSECUTION.

We will put down Masonry by the sword, if we cannot put it down without.—JACOB HALL.

NO VII.

The perseverance with which the enemies of Masonry have followed up their determination of final success if possible, is worthy of a better cause. With different means to accomplish a good purpose, and with a better object in view, the wretched confederation of antimasons could, with the same industry, have accomplished that which might have entitled them to the gratitude of the community.

But neither science nor morals could have availed themselves of the aid which Antimasons could command, if the measures they have pursued give any indication of their disposition to engage in a laudable enterprise, or their power of accomplishing such enterprise. Constant duplicity, gross prevarication and bold falsehood have been, almost exclusively, the only measures and the only changes adopted in the prosecution of their designs. The only changes have been from hidden misrepresentation to daring perjury—from bold crime to skulking meanness. When detected in one glaring misstatement or wilful fabrication, they have fled for refuge to some new disguise of the same family, and have endeavored to divert public attention from an old offence, by attracting it to another of a bolder cast. The various shapes they have assumed have required the eyes of an Argus to watch them, and the arms of a Briareus to hold them up to public gaze and public contempt.—This modern Proteus is no longer a mythological fiction. The fable has become history. Now it is a tiger or a lion. Anon it is a flame of fire, a whirlwind or a rushing stream. Its streams of offensive and disgusting impurities have already caused public loathing. Its destroying whirlwind has marked its desolating track, and all who have witnessed its fury shudder at its ruinous course. Its fires of persecution have been kindled with a persevering zeal in which bigotry and fanaticism, the ambition of youth and weakness of age, the disguises of hypocrisy and the boldness of crime, have united to offer up the whole Masonic Fraternity on the unholy altars of Political Antimasonry. But praised be Heaven, already the flames that arose so frightfully for others, have become consuming fires to their unnatural and unfeeling authors.

Without adverting to the shameful outrages on decency and truth, that have characterized the doings of that party in other sections of the country, mark the bold catalogue of detected falsehoods and misrepresentations that have had their birth from that prolific mother, the antimasonic faction of Boston. The birth of these hideous bantlings has been honored by the professional aid of skilful accouchers; and if the short lives of this hopeful progeny have disappointed the expectations of these children of many fathers, no blame can attach for want of faithful services on the part of the medical attendants.

The indignant recollections of every Mason will easily recall the events and circumstances which the creative measures of that faction have impressed on their memories. It was announced in a pioneer of that party, a wretched and corrupt vehicle of impudent falsehoods, that a strange, dark, mysterious event had taken place in one of the Boston Lodges; and the shameless suggestion was so framed, as to lead suspicion and credulity to infer that a detestable crime had been there committed. The name was cunningly altered, to avoid the danger of a prosecution. That infamous suggestion involved, or it might have involved, the reputation of some of the worthiest men among us. But the facts in that case did not rest wholly on Masonic authority. It so happened that a medical man, well known for his active measures in behalf of antimasonry, had such knowledge of the transaction, that the Masonic Fraternity was rescued from any criminal imputation. He has honestly and generously answered to all interrogatories on the subject, that it was a very doubtful matter, and therefore no positive or sufficient proof of crime could be had. We regard the feelings of worthy members of a family, and the feelings of the members of a Lodge, otherwise we would hold up to public scorn as worthless a wretch as ever shielded himself under the garb of hypocrisy.

The case of Artemas Kennedy occurred under circumstances that gave strong hopes of stirring up a general and efficient excitement. The Investigating Committee, however, with all their anxiety and persevering effects, could not make the facts sufficiently strong to twist them into a rope for all the Masonic necks in the country.

But now comes the Belfast Tragedy: as well designed a piece of knavery and imposition as the antimasons of Boston could well have required. Its distance of time and location were well contrived to elude the searching eye of truth. But although justice may fail of its rights in bringing detestable perjury to answer at the bar of an offended country, still eternal infamy has marked with indelible characters the originators, the aiders and abettors of that nefarious transaction.

It is at length perceived, that fabrication, to pass undetected, must deal less in particulars; that by generalizing some mysterious transactions, the public might be grossly cheated and deceived, and the miscreants who framed the cheat and deception might escape detection and punishment. A plan is well devised. A new edition of infamous forgery appears in an adjoining county. But thanks to the principles of ever living and eternal truth, the A. B. C. of this new scene of corruption is detected, and exposed to an indignant public. The vile imposition of Anderton & Co. has at length found a full and ample counterpart, and will now extend a fraternal recognition to their worthy coadjutors, Phelps & Co. Noble firms these to conduct the antimasonic trade! But the imports from Ireland, and the exports to Essex, have proved for them bad speculations. That wretched libeller, whose hidden iniquities have so long escaped public detection, now stands in his own proper name and person as a monument to perpetuate the recollections of the base artifices and gross fabrications of the antimasonic faction of Boston.

Such have been the wicked and corrupt measures of antimasons here. But such has been their prompt and full exposure, that we may reasonably hope their future fabrications and misstatements, will gain but little credit; and that an intelligent community will place but little reliance on the representations of a party who stand publicly convicted of circulating repeated, made up falsehoods.

VERITAS.

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

We have been obligingly furnished by the Rev. Mr. Smith, with the following extract of a letter from his brother, resident in London, dated Nov. 20th, 1830. As it relates to a subject which is becoming one of interest to our citizens, we have no doubt it will be perused with pleasure. One fact is worthy of note—the high demand in which Rail Road stock is held by capitalists in England. The same success we have no doubt will attend it here.

[Batavia Times.]

'I travelled on the new Iron Rail Road by Steam from Manchester to Liverpool and back. This is a most magnificent concern, and a splendid triumph of the arts. The distance as the Rail Road runs, is thirty one miles and nearly upon a level. It cost nine hundred thousand pounds sterling, and will require considerable additional expenditure to complete it for the transit of goods. At present passengers only are conveyed, the mail and small parcels.

'The road is double so that a line of carriages runs in opposite directions at the same time.

'Four passages each way are made daily, and the average number of passengers each trip is 120—equal to 7620 weekly. The time occupied in a passage is from one and a half to two hours including stoppages—twenty miles an hour is the maximum speed authorised by the Directors of the Company. But it has been run in fifty five minutes.

'Gentlemen on business leave Manchester at 7 o'clock, transact their business in Liverpool, and return to dinner. The car conveying the Steam Engine precedes the line of carriages. If you figure to yourself a wagon with two large and two small wheels, running stern first you have it. The boiler occupies the body of the wagon—two steam cylinders about twelve inches in diameter are placed each side of the back part of the wagon over the smaller wheels. The connecting piston rods lay hold of two axle-trees upon the large wheel in front, and then like a man sitting in the hinder part of the wagon, with each arm extended to the front wheels, turning them round with a crank attached to the spoke of the wheel propels the carriage. The wheel and axletree revolve together, and not the wheel upon the axletree as is usual with an ordinary carriage.

'The steam is used at the pressure of fifty pounds to an inch. The position of the Engineer is upon the back part of the wagon; the point where the fuel is applied. Coke only is used. I have endeavored to explain this moving power to you in a familiar way, presuming that you are not acquainted with the technicalities of mechanics. Behind the Engineer is a separate car conveying a large butt of water for the supply of the boiler. Then comes the teams or carriages for the accommodation of passengers. Figure to yourself a common coach which carries four passengers, two with their faces, and two with their backs to the horses and place three of these upon four wheels and you have a clear idea of the best, though some are constructed after a different model. The last in the team are open, and resemble a large and roomy wagon. These are for the accommodation of the humbler class of his Majesty's subjects, who cannot afford to pay seven shillings, but can afford to pay four. For you know in England we always keep up our consequence in every thing, by the most marked distinctions. It would be quite too republican to allow an Irish laborer to sit by the side of a gentleman. And such are the habits of Europe that he would feel himself out of place. So upon this point there is no feeling of disrespect.

'The average amount of passage money is 5s. 6d. each equal to ninety-six thousand pounds sterling, annually for passengers only. The shares are £. 100 each, are now worth £. 210. So much for the draw of steam navigation by land. I returned to Manchester by the way of Birmingham; and accidentally met the surveyor of the newly projected Iron Rail Way from Birmingham to London—distance 110 miles. He informed me that the subscription to the amount of three millions was filled in three weeks, and that the shares are at a premium of £. 10 each, £5 paid on subscription. I expect a floating Bridge will be constructed from Liverpool to New York, and then I shall come out in my steam carriage and spend Sunday with you, and return Monday morning to my business. The sensation as you whirl along in these steam carriages, is inexpressibly delightful. And the more rapid the motion, the more pleasing the effect. The novelty of the thing, the grandeur of the equipage, and the rapidity of the flight threw me into perfect ecstasy, and I had only to regret that my passage was so short.'

THE AIRGUN.

The most wonderful effect of condensed air is exhibited by the airgun. This instrument differs from a common gun, it having a receptacle for air, which may either be a hollow ball screwed to the lower end of the barrel at its under part, or a cavity in the breech. These chambers, when opened, communicate with the barrel, and when the condensed air is suffered to escape, it rushes into the barrel and drives out the ball with surprising velocity.

It is a curious fact, that, although the airpump is comparatively a modern invention, the airgun, so nearly allied to it in the construction of its valves, should have existed long antecedent to it. For it is recorded that an airgun was made for Henry IV. by Martin of Lisieux, in Normandy in 1408; and another was preserved in the armory of Schmettau, bearing the date 1474. That in present use is, however, very different in effect from those originally made, which discharge but one bullet after a tedious process of condensation. While the present one may be made to discharge thirty or forty with effect, with the same charge of air.

The air chamber is charged by screwing it to the end of the condenser, and forcing it down suddenly upon the piston, which is securely held by the feet resting on its handle. The air resting on the piston, is thus forced into the chamber through the opening, which is covered by a valve opening inwards. At each depression of the chamber upon the piston, the air is driven upwards, whence it cannot return on account of the valve.

When sufficient air has been condensed, this chamber is to be removed and attached to this gun, which is then ready to receive the ball. This is placed in the mouth of the barrel, and is made to fit closely by first laying it on a small piece of linen, which, when forced down with the rod, perfectly fills the bore.

In discharging the gun, the force of the lock is directed by a small steel piston, moving through a collar, against the valve of the chamber. The air instantly escapes by its side, and rushing into the barrel, drives out the ball. It is necessary to observe, that the action of the lock being instantaneous, the power of the piston is lost after its projection, and it immediately recedes, while the elasticity of the air forces the valve to its place, thereby preventing the escape of more than was intended. The discharges may be continued until the resistance of the condensed air is reduced to its ordinary pressure.

There were two other applications of this principle, recently exhibited in this city, in the model of a cannon and in a common walking-cane, the workmanship of Mr. Adam Stewart, an accomplished mechanic. The improvements in his use of the principle, evince great skill and ingenuity of their projector.

The estimates of force possessed by the airgun, when fully charged, have been various. Even in its earliest days there existed wonderful stories of its power.

By many, the expansive force of the air in the chamber, has been compared with that of gunpowder. But the only opinions worthy of attention are those founded on experiment. The smallest result of the force of gunpowder that we have met with, is that given by Mr. Robbins. His calculation was, that the elastic force of the fluid produced by ignited gunpowder, it is a least one thousand times greater than the ordinary pressure of the air. And if we consider that pressure to be fifteen pounds to the square inch, we have a result of fifteen thousand pounds to every square inch of the surface which confines it.

The ordinary charges of airguns, has been equal to between forty and fifty atmospheres, or between six hundred and seven hundred and fifty pounds to the square inch. But in the instruments of Mr. Stewart, this pressure has been very much exceeded. And we believe he has produced greater condensation in the chamber than any who has preceded him.

The experiments of Bernoulli and Count Rumford, resulted in their belief that the force of ignited powder was at least ten thousand times greater than that of the ordinary pressure of the atmosphere.

According to the smallest calculation, we perceive before these forces can be equal, a pressure of at least fifteen thousand pounds to the square inch must be produced by compressed air.—[Scientific Tracts.]

If into the side of a reservoir of water, 30 feet below the surface, there be inserted a pipe, one inch diameter in the bore, at the point of insertion, but gradually become wider and wider as it proceeds; the axis of the pipe being perfectly horizontal throughout, it is required to be determined how much increase of diameter will be necessary for every English mile in length, so as at any distance, great or little, if the pipe be filled and shut up at the farther end, an orifice half an inch in diameter, made in the middle of the end, will always, at any distance from the reservoir, deliver precisely the same quantity of water as at any other distance.

MR. BURCHELL'S FIRST LETTER
TO MOSES THACHER.

Friend Moses,—I am an old fellow, having little else to do than to walk over my farm, tend my garden, and read the newspapers. When I was a boy, Moses, very little was expected from our common schools but reading, writing, and cyphering as far as the rule of three. Expect, therefore to meet with many grammatical blunders, for, though my old master used to give me some lessons and hear the recitations, yet, I could never analyse a sentence by parsing, and I very much doubt whether he could. But no matter for that, as a great many clever things may be said which do not very well accord with the rules of syntax.

I think you are a minister and it is common to add to the names of such the title of Rev.; but upon reflection I find that your principles are so purely republican, that all such titles, whether in a civil or ecclesiastical point of view, are offensive and ought to be done away with, so I have addressed you simply as Moses Thacher, just as I would any other man, and instead of sir, shall always say Moses.

Moses, I have lived many years, and have not been altogether an inattentive observer of the ways and manners of men, and I years ago came to the conclusion that they are most comical creatures to drive. The reason is very obvious. Mankind, in general, have reason, judgment, and common sense of which they are not a little vain, and the moment we begin to exercise a spirit of domination over these noble faculties, the man either turns upon us, or runs away. I have a pair of spectacles which suit my eyes to admiration, but they would not answer for every one, and all the opprobrious epithets, and all the whipping, will never make you see in my glasses. Something so with opinions—we can force them on no one and there is nothing of which mankind are so tenacious. There is, however, this difference, that in the one case, all means and measures are hopeless, in the other, much may be expected from mild entreaty and gentle persuasion. Supposing that a man believes that there is no harm in stealing; but, owing to some eccentricity of character, he is perfectly an honest man: would it be best to call him a thief and a robber in order to reclaim him? True, I would like to have a good belief as well as a good practice, but I would rather a man should believe ill and practice well, than to believe well and practice ill. Opinions are private property, and man has the same right to enjoy them that he has to enjoy his cows or his horses, so long as they do not influence him to evil actions.

What a pity it is, friend Moses, that the peace and harmony of society should be interrupted by disputes so frivolous, and grievances which have no real foundation. You doubtless remember the story of the camelion. Three men fell out about the color of this reptile, one affirmed that it was green, another blue, and the third black, and,

'So high at last the contest rose
From words they almost came to blows.'

There was a dreadful excitement, harsh names were applied, and they were on the point of a battle. Now while they gained nothing by the quarrel, they lost much, for they were very miserable; were the means of distracting the neighborhood by their clamor, and it is probable that this little contest soured the best feelings of some for life. If the above story is an allegory or fiction, the moral is perfectly easy, and may be drawn from agricultural life. Moral. It is an excellent point of economy not to have the expences exceed the income.

When I was a boy, appalling stories about ghosts apparitions and witches were much more current than they are at present. In the vicinity in which I have always resided, there is a place on the old Post road, between Boston and Providence, known by the name of Shear's Nose, which used to be famous as the residence of witches and hobgoblins, and to confess the fact nature designed it not for the habitation of man. Two great hollows situated on each side of the road, exactly parallel, form an immense pair of eyes, and on abrupt rising in the road answers to one of our old-fashioned roman noses, making a portrait of no mean dimensions. Most of my neighbors said that strange things had happened there. Often and often did they hear screams and groans proceed from this consecrated spot, and sometimes they saw a figure hovering over this gigantic form, clad in what?—white to be sure. Always did my heart go pit-a-pat when I got into the centre of this great pine-wood; and once—oh! what a fright did I get. Tripping along as though glass was under my feet, I heard a shrilly scream!!! Advance or retreat was impossible, and I was rivetted to the place as by some strong supernatural spell.

The fact is, an owl had chosen to send forth her nocturnal screeches in this solitary wild of nature, and had it not been for a foolish excitement which then prevailed, I should have instantly recognised the inharmonious tone of this songstress, and passed intrepidly along. So soon, Moses, as the topic of general conversation took a different turn in the vicinity, this place was no longer pestered with supernatural appearances. And what good occurred? Why, I got a terrible fright, and those who were the most forward in spreading the excitement eventually got laughed at. Moral.—Those who expect to eternize their fame by fomenting excitements which are productive of more mischief than good to a community, build their hopes on a very sandy foundation.

If I am rightly informed, you are not old enough to remember the 'Shay's insurrection.' The grievances which some of the New-England States suffered on account of the tardiness of Congress in redeeming their bills, formed some excuse for a reasonable complaint; but the insurgents carried things too far, quite too far. Nature had bestowed upon Shays all those qualities which go to constitute a successful leader of a band of rebels, save one. He talked too much. He framed and circulated stories so monstrously absurd that his most influential supporters began to smell a rat, and to think that the little finger of Shays would eventually prove thicker than the loins of Congress. As sober reflection returned and the people saw the mad ambition of the man, it is needless to state he ran away with his boots in his hand.

I conclude the reason why excitements are so very short lived is, they are not grounded on sound common sense. I have seen the rays of many a morning sun shut out by a thick, humid, and unwholesome vapor, and there would seem, for a time, a sharp conflict between the King of day and this pestilential death. But this gloom is always succeeded by a meridian ray, and then where are the agents of darkness? Scattered, and left to the mercy of the winds of heaven.

Ever thine,

MASONIC.

The Anniversary of St. John, the Evangelist, was observed by the Masonic Fraternity in this place on Monday last. An Oration was delivered by Companion Rev. James W. Allen, which was marked with much good sense, and exhibited the author's intimate acquaintance with the history, and his attachment to the genuine principles of the Order:—and we take this occasion to express a hope that the admonitions given by the Rev. Companion, may have their desired influence on the minds and conduct of the Brethren. If the threshold of Masonry had been properly guarded—if it had never been crossed by unhallowed feet—if the land marks of the Order had always been kept in view—such a thing as antimasonry would never have been heard of. Violated, though, as the genius of Masonry has been, by the initiation into its mysteries of those who have 'no heart to feel for, and no hand to relieve sufferings of humanity,' who are destitute of moral principle, and with whom honor is a mere bubble, we confidently hope the dawn of a better day is at hand. The fire of Persecution will separate the Gold from the dross. Masons begin to see that they must be Masons indeed, or bid adieu to their ancient and honorable Order.—[Ala. Athenian.]

LIVING WRITERS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

NO. VII.

The Rev. William Lisle Bowles is a man of great poetic talent. He was educated, says one account of him, at Christ's Hospital, but in a recent biography prefixed to his works, he is said to have received his early education elsewhere. He is the son of a clergyman, and was early intended for the church. At Trinity College, Oxford he distinguished himself by a prize poem in Latin, on the siege of Gibraltar. In 1792, Bowles graduated and took orders, receiving the cure of a parish in Wiltshire. After a most felicitous marriage with a daughter of the celebrated Dr. Wake, he was presented with a living in Dumbleton, Gloucestershire. In 1803 he became a Prebendary of Salisbury Cathedral, by which our readers will understand, an officiating priest with a salary derived from the revenues of the establishment. He is also Rector of Bremhill.

Bowles became principally known to the public by an edition of Pope, in which he made some remarks that amounted to a denial of Pope's poetic talent! The discussion seemed to wander to the consideration whether the bard of Tickenham should be judged by what Mr. Bowles styled the 'invariable principles of poetry?' Campbell began the attack, but soon became wearied of the trouble of a controversy where the parson was so full of pugnacity. Byron then took up the contest, and waged a hot war for his favorite. If our readers have had time to look into the second volume of Moore's Byron, they will find that this gifted poet considered Pope superior in all respects to any of the modern school of poetical writers.

Bowles maintained that natural sublimity and beauty are superior to those of art, and that the natural feelings of the heart are better sources of illustration of a high order of poetry than those resulting from incident and transiency. If he had stopped here, says his friends, his triumph would have been complete; but as it is usual with fierce debaters, he went too far and maintained that the talent of the poet was to be decided by the presence of the images themselves, rather than by the skill with which they were disposed. The result was a drawn battle. But the fame of the Rector of Bremhill was greatly increased by the resolution with which he maintained his opinions against a host of enemies. Among other incidents characteristic of Mr. Bowles, we may mention what is esteemed a wrong headed contest with Mr. Brougham, on the subject of the public schools of England, in which his attempt to sustain their obsolete and cumbrous instruction, was completely foiled by his powerful adversary.

As a magistrate of the county of Wilts, he on one occasion received the approbation of Lord Lansdown, when secretary of state for the home department, for his humane interference in behalf of an unfortunate female, when that interference drew on him the censure of his brother magistrates. He has also written warmly against sectarianism.

Bowles is no ordinary writer, yet cannot be placed in the first rank of literature. His virtuous principles, his pure taste, his easy style, all combine to make him delightful, but he has nothing of the impassioned eloquence or deep reflection, or glowing description of the Byron, the

Burns and the Coleridges of the day. Byron thought he was 'a good fellow for a parson,' but had an unlucky name, for no one could think of Bowles without foreseeing he must expect rubbers. Coleridge, however, thinks that his style is manly and yet tender, natural and real, dignified and harmonious. The Sorrows of Switzerland, the Spirit of Discovery, the Missionary, and Banwell Hill are his principal works.

From Banwell Hill we select at random the following lines:

Oh when I hear them sing of Jamie far away,
Of father and of mother, and Auld Robin Gray,
I listen till I think its Jeanie's self I hear,
And I look into thy face with a blessing and a tear.

I look in thy face for my heart is not cold,
Tho' winter's frost is stealing on, and I am growing old,
Those tones I shall remember as long as I live
And blessing and tear shall be the thanks I give.

The tear it is for summers that so blithsome have been,
For the flowers that are all faded and the days that I have seen,
The blessing, lassie, is for thee, whose song so sadly sweet,
Recalls the music of Lang Syne to which my heart has beat.

Of all his poems, however, perhaps the Missionary is the most elevated. It commences thus:

'Beneath the aërial cliffs and glittering snow,
The rush roof of an aged warrior rose
Chief of the mountain tribes; high overhead,
The Andes wild and desolate were spread,
Where cold Sierras shot their icy spires,
And Chillan trail'd its smoke and smouldering fires.'

But our limits compel us to stop. Our readers will find the poems of Bowles worthy their attention.—[Alb. Daily Advertiser.]

MISCELLANY.

SLEEP.

A question has been raised how much sleep is required, and how long it is necessary to be in bed for the purpose of rest and refreshment. Eight hours have been allotted to the labourer, and six to the scholar and gentleman. Very few gentlemen, however, are satisfied with this scale; and a capacity for sleeping makes the greater part of this class of the community inclined to double the period. The capacity for sleeping, like the capacity for eating and drinking, it is to be increased by indulgence. Much depends upon habit.—Some people can sleep when they will, and wake when they will; and are as much refreshed by a short nap as a long one. Seafaring people have this property from education. I have known persons who never indulged in a second sleep. One gentleman, who entertained a notion that a second nap was injurious invariably got up as soon as he awoke, no matter how early the hour—winter or summer. Others again will sleep for four and twenty hours. One gentleman in the Spectator, used to sleep by weight. 'I allow myself one night with another, a quarter of a pound of sleep, within a few grains more or less; and if upon rising, I find I have not consumed my whole quantity, I take out the rest in my chair.' A lazy old woman used to apologise for laying in bed by saying, that 'she lay in bed to contrive.' Strange as this old woman's excuse was, it was an example followed by one of the most extraordinary geniuses in this country, viz. Brindley, of whom it is recorded, that when any great difficulty occurred in the execution of his works, having little or no assistance from books, or the labors of other men, his resources lay within himself. In order therefore to be quiet and uninterrupted, whilst he was in search of the necessary expedients, he generally retired to his bed: and he has been known to lie one, two, or three days, till he obtained the object in view. He would then get up and execute his design without any drawing or model.—There are different kind of sleepers, as different kind of sleep, some cannot sleep from home—others cannot sleep at home; some can sleep on a board, and snore on a carpet; while others tumble and toss on a soft bed, as if the down disconcerted them. Some again cannot sleep in a noise: others cannot sleep out of it. A miller awakens the moment the mill stops; a tradesman from Cheapside cannot sleep in the country, because it is so plaguey quiet. Somnambulists, or sleep walkers, usually sleep with their eyes open; but without vision. Shakspeare, who may be considered a very good medical authority, makes Lady Macbeth a somnambulist with her eyes open 'but their senses shut.' This is not always the case, however, and there is a singular exception, in the instance of Johannes Oporinnes, a printer, who being employed one night in correcting a copy of a Greek book, fell asleep as he read, and yet ceased not to read, till he had finished not less than a whole page, of which, when he awoke, he retained no recollection. There are many curious histories of sleeping on record. The Philosophical Transactions have several; in one a man slept from August till January. There is a case, read before the society of Physicians in 1756, of Elizabeth Orvin, who began her sleeping fit in 1738, by a four day's nap, and for ten years afterwards never slept less than seventeen hours out of the twenty four. Dr. Brady relates that some strange methods were resorted to, to rouse her—such as rubbing her back with honey, and in a hot day exposing her to a hive of bees, till her back was full of bumps—making a pincushion of her, and performing acupuncture, with pins and needles—flagellation, and other odd experiments, which the Doctor informs us he thinks better to pass over in silence, all of which might as well have been spared, for she was very sulky and good for nothing when awake. This sulkiness, however, should be noticed as being connected with the complaint. Previous to this somnolent disease, many of the persons have become uneasy, sullen, and surly.—In all, the mind has evidently been affected, and in some where there has been extreme abstinence, their waking hours have been characterised by decided mental aberration.

MUSIC.

The province of music is rather to express the passions and feelings of the human heart than the actions of men, or the operations of nature.—When employed in the former capacity, it becomes an eloquent language; when in the latter a mere mimic—an imitator a very miserable one—or rather a buffoon, caricaturing what it cannot imitate. The idea of the different stages of a battle, or the progress of a tempest being represented to the eye or the ear, or even the imagination, by the quavering of a fiddler's elbow, or the squeaking of catgut, is preposterous.

SATURDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 19, 1831.

SECEDING MASONS.

'Of all base and complicated crimes,
That doth infect and stigmatize the times,
There's none that can with perjury compare.'

We have the most appalling idea of that man who would deliberately take and subscribe a false oath. No matter whether taken before one man or three; in a judicial court or a presbyterian assembly; no matter whether it be relative to things sacred or profane; no matter whether material or immaterial; whether tangible by common or statute laws, or by the laws of any other nation; it is still false swearing, basely false. It is a crime of the deepest dye; the most to be deprecated, and the most to be feared, of any in the whole calendar. The man who would advisedly and voluntarily call God to witness and to assist and prosper him, as he should speak the truth; and then basely and falsely speak what he knows to be false, or violate his engagements and vows when thus solemnly made; is, of all men, the most to be dreaded and avoided. He must be lost to all the attributes of virtue; an apostate from moral principles; a curse to society! a monster! and deserves not the name of man! Does then the hypocritical priest, who has immolated, upon the altar of his ambition, the principles of morality, violated the most solemn oaths and obligations, which he confesses himself to have voluntarily assumed; whose crocodile tears trickle down his vestments, and, in his bosom, meet: 'the glittering dagger that lies secreted there;' while his gory fingers, from which just 'dropped the stiletto of moral murder,' defile the sacramental elements of the supper of our Lord, stain and mingle the consecrated bread and wine with blood; deserve the name of man? or of monster?—Such impostors, breaking the bread of life at the table of the Lord, forcibly reminds us of Virgil's harpies, loathsome birds with virgin faces, pouncing upon, and defiling the rich banquets of the Trojans;

'Diripiuntque dapas, contactuque omnia fordant
Immundo; tum vox tetrum dira inter odorem.'

Men are allied by certain moral, civil and political ties; an honest and faithful observance of which seems to be necessary, in order to the peace, security and happiness of the community. They may be called the ligaments of society; the tendrils of the social compact; implanted in the breast of man, by the Almighty, for high and valuable purposes. Even the untaught savage, as he ranges uncontrolled through his uncultivated wilds, feels and acknowledges the binding force of these ties, or moral principles; nor does he ask for learned civilians to teach him their requirements. It is civilized and refined society that calls for a civil code to enforce the moral laws of God. The obligation to perform promises is deducible from the necessity of such conduct, to the well-being, or the existence, indeed, of human society. Hence the violation of an oath or obligation, is held to be a crime of the most atrocious character; and the violator is regarded as a wretch, too wicked and debased to mingle in the society of men. Indeed, it is contrary to the natural constitution of the human heart; to the principles implanted, by the Creator of all things, in the breast of man, that the traitor or the renegade should find favor, longer than interest demands, even with those at whose bidding, and on whose fair promises he has been induced to betray his country, party or friends; and for whose special profit he has, perhaps, bartered away his temporal and spiritual happiness!—Unfortunately for the honor of human nature, such degraded beings may be found among all nations, in all communities and all grades of society. But, fortunately for the cause of human nature, when they have answered the base purpose for which they seem to have been designed, if not by nature, by education and habits, they are universally execrated, abhorred, avoided. Mergous, an intelligent modern Greek, tells us the following short story, which we quote as illustrative of this remark, and as embracing the whole and entire history of a renegade—or oath-breaker. 'In 1819,' says he, 'a young Greek, who had been for some time in the service of a Turk in Smyrna, was persuaded by him to renounce his religion. On signifying his assent, he received circumcision, and was seen a few days afterwards in a handsome Turkish dress, with pistols in his belt. This was to attract attention; but the poor fellow was, as usual, soon afterwards deprived of his ornaments, became despised and cast off, as well by Mahomedans as by his countrymen. Greeks always regard their friends who have become RENEGADES, as dead!' There are those among us to whom this short story teaches an important lesson. It contains their present and future history. It matters not whether the renegade appear in a 'handsome Turkish dress,' or in the more gaudy robes of an Honorable Senator, his offence is of the same black, damning character—his fate is fixed and certain. We do not mean physical but moral death. Loss of character should be deemed worse than death. Cain was required to live that his punishment might be prolonged.

A Seceding Mason is a professed oath-breaker, and, as we shall attempt in few words to prove, as guilty of perjury, in the original sense of the term, as the veriest wretch, who may be now paying the penalty of his perfidy, in Charlestown Penitentiary. One Seceder has undertaken to show that oaths are not binding; or, in other words, that Masonic oaths are not binding, because the promiser does not receive an equivalent; or, in yet different language, because they are extra-judicial; that is, they are not administered by a Justice of the Peace and, therefore, the violation of them not punishable by law! Thus, setting aside all moral and religious ties, he regards oaths as binding, wholly on account of the legal penalty attached to them. By this method of reasoning, an oath taken and subscribed in the presence of God and on the Holy Evangelists, is of no more binding force, than a common promise, informally given! If we understand this, it is denying that the Almighty takes cognizance of such transactions; or, that he has not the power to punish for offences committed in his name; which, in effect, is denying the divinity of the Evangelists and the existence or omnipotence of a Supreme Being! To our mind, this conclusion is inevitable. And it was not until men, avowing such infidel and horrible principles, and evincing such total depravity of heart; men whom no moral ties or obligations could bind, were known to be prowling about and poisoning the streams of society, that legal penalties were attached to the violation of oaths. While good faith reigned upon the earth, a simple promise was sufficient to insure confidence. Oaths owe their origin to perfidy. Man was not required to call upon the God that heard him, to witness his veracity, till he deserved no longer to be believed. Nor were it necessary to affix civil penalties to the violation of his sacred promises, until he became so sinful and depraved, so lost to every virtuous sentiment, that he dared to confront his God with falsehood in his heart and perfidy on his lip.

We might here allude to the Honorable Moses Thatcher, who does not hold what he says as Masonic oaths, to be binding, because they are not administered by a legal agent; and he, therefore, though a Seceding Mason, and by his own declaration, a violation of those oaths, does not consider himself guilty of perjury! We contend that perjury, in the original and proper sense of the term, is as much committed, as though he had forsworn himself in a Court of Justice. Now, in order to settle this difference, it will be necessary that we previously ascertain the nature and character of an oath, as generally understood by learned and judicious men. An oath then, according to the most approved lexicographers, (and we have nothing to do with legal authorities in this case,) is a solemn affirmation or declaration, made with an appeal to God for the truth of what is affirmed. The appeal to God, in an oath, implies that the person imprecates his vengeance and renounces his favour, if the declaration be false, or, if the declaration be in form of a promise, or vow, the person invokes the vengeance of God upon on himself should he fail to fulfil it. How tremendous is the invocation, and how important that 'thy vow be performed!' Again, an oath is an affirmation, negation, or promise, corroborated by the attestation of the divine being. 'God is my witness,' says St. Paul to the Romans, 'that without ceasing I make mention of you in my prayers.' And to the Corinthians, 'I call God for a record upon my soul, that, to spare you, I came not as yet to Corinth.' Here we have the nature of an oath, fully and clearly set forth: 'It is a solemn affirmation, made with an appeal to God for the truth of what is affirmed;—A promise: and 'the person invokes the vengeance of God, if he should fail to fulfil it.' Further than this, there is nothing penal about it. There is no legal penalty; no indication of corporal punishment attached to it, though it be violated. But there is a more awful and terrible threatening suspended over the head of the perjured. No less than the vengeance of the Almighty God! Let the deliberate oath-breaker tremble! He cannot escape the retributive justice of offended Heaven!

The learned Dr. Payley tells us that, oaths are nugatory, that is, carry with them no proper force or obligation, unless we believe that God will punish false swearing, with more severity than a simple lie, or breach of promise; for which belief he gives the following reasons:—1st. Perjury is a sin of great deliberation. The juror has the thoughts of God and of religion upon his mind at the time: at least there are very few who can shake them off entirely. He offends, therefore, if he do offend, with a high hand: in the face, that is, in defiance of the sanctions of religion. His offence implies a DISBELIEF OR CONTEMPT OF GOD'S KNOWLEDGE, POWER AND JUSTICE; which cannot be said of a lie, where there is nothing to carry the mind into any reflection upon the Deity, or the divine attributes at all. 2d. Perjury violates a superior confidence. Mankind must trust to one another; and they have nothing better to trust to than one another's oath. Hence legal adjudications, which govern and affect every right and interest on this side of the grave, of necessity proceed and depend upon oaths. Perjury, therefore, in its general consequence, strikes at the security of reputation and property, and even life itself. A lie cannot do the same mischief, because the same credit is not given to it. 3d. God directed the Israelites to swear by his name; and was pleased, in order to show the immutability of his own counsel, to confirm his covenant with that people, by an oath: neither of which it is probable he would have done, had he not intended to represent oaths as having some meaning and effect, beyond the obligations of a bare promise; which effect must be owing to the severer punishment with which He will vindicate the authority of oaths. Again, 'As I LIVE: saith the Lord, as ye have spoken in mine ear, so will I do to you!'

It will be observed that Dr. Paley pays no regard to the legal penalty, which has been attached to oaths by modern lawgivers. He views them in their primitive character, and considers the violation of them as implying a 'disbelief or contempt of God's knowledge, power and justice.' God is invoked to witness the administration of oaths, and so long as men believed in his 'power and justice,' that was sufficient to restrain them from the impious crime of perjury. Indeed, it seems almost too incredible to believe that, at this day, there are men, acquainted with the Bible, depraved enough to violate oaths themselves, and to justify such baseness in others, unless they be at heart confirmed Atheists. Yet the Reverend Moses Thatcher openly avows that he has pledged himself by a solemn oath to keep the secrets of Masonry; exults that he has broken that oath; and justifies the offence in others! He is conversant with the scriptures, and he cannot be ignorant of the fact that, God himself instituted vows or oaths, and declared them binding: 'And Moses spake unto the heads of the tribes concerning the children of Israel, saying, this is the thing which the Lord hath commanded. If a man vow a vow unto the Lord, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond, he shall not break

HIS WORD, he shall do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth.' 'If a man deliver unto his neighbor an ass or an ox or a sheep, or any beast to keep, and it die, or be driven away, or hurt, no man seeing it, then shall an oath of the Lord be between them both, that he hath not put his hand unto his neighbor's goods, and the owner of it shall accept thereof, and he shall not make it good.' Is further evidence necessary that God did institute oaths and declare them binding? Would the Almighty have directed the children of Israel to settle their differences by an oath, if he did not intend it to be binding? The oath too was between themselves and their God. No magistrate was required to administer it. An oath between man and man did not then require the power of a magistrate to make it valid; nor can man make void what God has made binding. Did Abraham call upon a magistrate to swear his servants? or Israel, when he caused Joseph to swear not to bury him in Egypt? No! They knew that the oath was between them and their God; they knew that they had bound their souls, and if they violated their word, that the curse of God was upon them; that they would be guilty of perjury. Has man the power to make void what God has made binding? If he have not, then is not the violation of an oath, PERJURY; whether the oath be administered by a magistrate or by any other individual; or taken voluntarily by the juror himself, without the intervention of any one? In this way, and the reader will judge of its logical correctness, we prove that seceders from Masonry, if they have taken upon themselves the oaths they avow they have, (and it is not our business here to investigate that matter,) are as guilty of perjury, as the veriest wretch who is now paying the penalty of his perfidy, in the State's prison.—There are numerous other passages in the Scripture that might be adduced in evidence of the legality of what civilians term extra-judicial oaths. Esau swore to Jacob, and Joseph took an oath to the children of Israel. David swore to Bathsheba, and Daniel to the servant of an Amalekite. There is no evidence that a magistrate was required to administer any of these oaths. The God of heaven made them binding: man cannot make them void. Is the Lord's ear heavy, that he cannot hear? Is his arm shortened, that he cannot avenge himself on the proud violators of his Law? We are assured that he is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, and changeth not. Moses Thacher; think of these things!—lest at the great day, when thou shalt be called upon to render an account of thy stewardship on earth, the curse of an offended God be upon thee! 'Vengeance is mine; I will repay sin to the Lord!'

One honorable seceder has attempted to justify the violation of what are termed Masonic oaths, on the ground that, the promiser does not receive an equivalent for the money he pays into the treasury of the Institution. But this argument is of no service to him: if it have any force, it is lost when applied to his case. Whatever honor or dishonor the gentleman may have received at the hands of Masonry; all was gratuitously and charitably bestowed. As a clergyman, he availed himself of a clergyman's privilege. Of his own free-will, he petitioned for the degrees of Masonry: they were freely given to him: he has basely betrayed the confidence reposed in him. If this argument prove anything, therefore, it proves that the gentleman has added to his other crimes, that of base ingratitude.

This gentleman has quoted Dr. Paley to prove that, 'promissory oaths are not binding, where the promise itself would not be so.' This is admitted; for, if the promise be unlawful, the promiser cannot perform it, because he is under a prior obligation to the contrary. And 'an obligation from which a man can discharge himself by his own act and deed, is no obligation at all.' But as we understood the gentleman's reading of an oath, which he said he had taken, we could discover nothing in it contrary to the laws of God or man. It is surely not unlawful to conceal that, the revelation of which can be productive of no good; and the concealment, of no harm. There are certain penalties attached to the oath read by the gentleman, before the Senate of this Commonwealth; but it did not appear that he had been sworn to suffer them himself, in case he should become recreant and turn traitor, or to carry them into execution, in regard to others. And if he had, it is evident, and admitted, that this part of his promise could not be considered binding, because it would be unlawful. But this remark applies to a single clause only. The gentleman declared that the obligation he read, contained sixteen distinct oaths; fifteen of which contain nothing, (as we infer from his silence in relation to them,) unlawful or objectionable. If, therefore, we allow the gentleman's argument its full force, he has no apology to offer for the violation of more than one of the sixteen oaths which he professes to have broken! And this one is declared unlawful and, therefore void, on the evidence of his own distempered imagination, and the ravings of designing political knaves, profligate priests and fanatical intolerants; and in contradistinction to the known views and opinions of many of the wisest, most learned and best men of many ages! We hope the Reverend gentleman may be able to satisfy his God that he has acted honestly in this business.

ANOTHER CONVENTION.—The Ohio Monitor contains the doings of the great 'Antimasonic State Convention' recently held at Columbus. It appears that fourteen of the sixty-six organized counties of the State, were represented. The number of delegates present, including every thing, from the Representatives, who left their legislative seats to attend, down to that strolling juggler, Henry Dana Ward, of New York, was twenty-six!—The Ashtabula Journal places the number at twelve or fifteen,—we take the antimasonic estimate; and the Convention appears ridiculous enough at that.

Death of Bolivar.—This distinguished patriot died at Santa Martha, on the 17th Dec. Gen. San Pedro thus announces this melancholy event:—'At half past one o'clock this morning, the most excellent senior Simon Bolivar, paid to nature the precious tribute of his important life, and Colombia has lost forever, her Liberator, her Father, her best and most illustrious Citizen.' Gen. San Martin, in an address to Colombians, declares, 'he died a victim to the ingratitude of his Country.' Unfortunately, there appears to be too much truth in this remark.

IMPORTANT TO STAGE OWNERS.—An interesting case was on Monday decided in the Supreme Court of this State, sitting in this City. It was a prosecution against the proprietors of the Boston and Providence Citizen's line. The plaintiff took passage in one of their coaches, and on Boston neck, was overturned, thrown under the carriage, had his leg severely fractured and was otherwise injured.—An action for damages resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff of Fifteen Hundred dollars.

SLAVES.—On the 13th Dec. in the House of Commons, a very important debate took place on a petition from the West India Planters, Merchants and others, praying the House not to destroy their property (in slaves) until the government had afforded them compensation. The Marquis of Chandos, who presented the petition, said that the West India proprietors had no chance of having their cause heard, so great was the clamor on the subject of Abolition throughout the country. It seemed to be conceded on all hands that gradual emancipation would be soon attempted. Sir George Murray, late head of the Colonial department, avowed that he never contemplated the possibility of stopping short of the total abolition of slavery in the West Indies. Mr. Macaulay declared he thought, in common with those who petitioned the House, that slavery ought to be extinguished: but he and they all contemplated, on its extinction, giving a reasonable compensation to the masters of slaves.

There are 14,000 more females than males in Massachusetts by the census! The softer sex make up in number what they want in might.

THEATRICAL.

The principal characters which Master Burke has sustained, since our last, are Richard, Dennis Brulgrudery, and Dr. Ollapod. His Richard on Monday evening, was, if possible, an improvement on its first representation.—The 'bustling scenes' were admirably carried through, with one exception, which was considerably marred on account of the stupidity of an underling. The following was made an excellent point—when he hears that Buckingham has landed:

Why, ah, this looks rebellion!—Ho!—my horse! By heaven, the news alarms my stirring soul; Come forth my honest sword, which here I vow, By my soul's hope, shall ne'er again be sheathed; Ne'er shall these watching eyes have needful rest Till death has closed 'em in a glorious grave, Or fortune give me measure of revenge.

His vindictive look on learning that Buckingham is taken, and his bitter sarcasm when he says—

'Off with his head—so much for Buckingham,' was an other happy effort.

The part of the Duchess of York is by no means calculated for Mrs. Campbell:—her voice is too monotonous.—For example—she says—

'Art thou so hasty?—I have staid for thee— God knows—in torment and in ago-nee.'

Also—

'A grievous burden was thy birth to me Touchy and wayward was thy infan-ccc.'

We are sorry to see the aid of the prompter so often necessary to some of our favorite actors.

Thousands who have anxiously waited a long time to see Master Burke, and have only been prevented on account of the exorbitant price which tickets have been selling at—have availed themselves of the opportunity which his re-engagement has offered.

During Master Burke's engagement, he has played on successive nights,—and the average receipts have amounted to upwards of $1000 each. The receipts on Monday evening last were $1200. The premium given on half the boxes for choice, for the whole seven nights ending Thursday, has amounted to about $1500. E.

FORT DELAWARE.—All the combustible of this Fort has recently been consumed by fire, said to have been caused by a stovepipe, passing through the roof of Lt. Tuttle's quarters. It is added that the quarters of the soldiers and officers, except those of the commander and the engineers, with much cloathing, provision, and furniture, have been destroyed; and that the work is now but the skeleton of a fortification. The public loss is estimated at one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Some kegs of powder exploded, and the report was heard at Chester.

The Masonic Lodge at Wilmington has recently given 500 loaves of bread to the poor of that town.

The Banks of this city have determined to receive nine-penny pieces at 11 cents, and four pence half penny pieces at 5 cents.

J. B. Francis, Esq. and Willet Carpenter, Esq. nominated for Gov. and Lt. Gov.; and Joseph Smith, Jr. Peleg Wilbour Jr. and Gideon Spencer, nominated by the antimasons for Senators of Rhode Island, have declined standing as candidates.

To Correspondents.—We like the spirit of P. but do not think the publication of his remarks would aid at all in the accomplishment of the end proposed.

Q. raps us over the knuckles, to some purpose; and were his remarks more general, we would publish them. It was an almost unpardonable act of carelessness on our part, we admit; but receiving the article referred to in print, and trusting to the editor by whom it was originally published, in the hurry of other business, we put it into the hands of the compositor, without giving it a reading. It was truly a foolish and ridiculous thing.

THE WEATHER.

[From the New-York Amulet.]

THE VARIETIES OF OBEDIENCE,

OR

'You Must,' 'You May,' and 'You Must Not.'

'George, you must fly your kite to-day;
The wind is fair, the weather fine!
Your's Edward, if you please, you may,'
'And may not I,' said Charles, 'fly mine?'
'No, sir, your top there you have got,
So be contented, you must not.'

They were obedient, one and all,
George laid aside his bat and ball,
And fetch'd his kite; yet in his eye
A tear stood trembling and a sigh
Proclaim'd, that though obedient, still
He did it all against his will.
Not that the flying of a kite
Gave him an atom less delight
Than bat or ball; he felt alone,
The choice—the will—was not his own.
He could not feel it kind or just,
Those cruel iron words, 'you must.'

This was Obedience! Yes, indeed;
But say, from whence did it proceed?
It surely needs few words to prove,
It sprang from Duty, not from Love.
A needy soil, by warmth unblest,
Its products dwarfish at the best.

Far different Edward; left to choose,
His choice became his Master's views:
'Perhaps he wishes me to go
With him and George! Can I say No?
How sadly that were to repay
The kindness of his words, you may!' This was Obedience, Love its source,
Joy, fulness, pleasure, mark'd its course.

But, what of Charles? The boy has got His top, and yet he spins it not!
In sullen silence fix'd he stands,
His top-string dangling in his hands?
The scowling brow, the peevish start,
Bespeak rebellion in his heart.
Rebellion! yes! for it is there,
And he would show it if he dare,
Pleased with his spinning top before,
It gratifies him now no more;
With eye in which the tear is seen,
He views the heavens, so bright, serene,
And as the gentle breeze blows by,
Thinks, 'Now, how well their kites must fly!' And then he thinks upon his lot,
His master, and his 'You must not.'
What feelings now predominate
Within his bosom? Fear and hate!
Yet, Charles was found obedient too;
Obedient, ay 'tis very true;
And still would be so, while pale Fear,
With awful whispers in his ear,
Could conquer Hatred, growing stronger
From its suppression,—but no longer

Trust to Obedience of this kind?
Walk on the ground that's undermin'd;
Aim well your foe, and bid him keep Watch o'er your slumbers while you sleep.
Act thus!—nor think more danger near,
Than in Obedience born of Fear.

The lesson's drift, Sir, need I say,—
Give every preference to 'may'!

Perhaps you'll say, 'It is the plan
Which you unvaryingly pursue;
At least you do so when you can!' If so, my friend, I mean not you;
But I have seen Obedience driven

By feelings of Revenge begot,
And not a single reason given—
Obedience that from Duty springs
A poor and scanty offering brings,
Then prize above this, far above,
Obedience that proceeds from Love!

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

MOORE & SEVEY.

NO. 22, CORNHILL, (LATE MARKET-STREET.)

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

[Original.]

TO MOSES THACHER,

Member of the Senate of Massachusetts, Ex-Minister of 'the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham,' Present Minister of 'the Church in North Wrentham,' Member of the late 'Antimasonic State Convention of Massachusetts,' Member of the late 'National Antimasonic Convention,' Seceding Mason, Antimasonic Lecturer, and Editor of the Antimasonic 'Boston Telegraph.'

LETTER V.

SIR:

From the nature of your preliminary measures, the rapidity of your progress in partizan accomplishments, and the boldness which marked your advances to the goal of political honors, it might have been safely predicted that, even should temporary success attend you, you had not moral power to sustain yourself. Already the towering edifice of your clerical pride is shaken to its foundation.—Already the loud plaudits of antimasonry yield to the murmurs of popular indignation. The decree that went forth against the proud Babylonian is the immutable decree of Eternal Justice. The hand writing on the palace walls of Belshazzar is traced with the finger of unchanging truth on the proud walls of dishonorable ambition. MENE TEKEL UPHARSIN, is denounced on presumptuous pride, whether dressed in the magnificent robes of a Prince, or in the humble habiliments of a village minister.

It is always an unpleasant business to consider human nature in its frail and humbling forms; but to describe individual error and ruin, in that moral deterioration which is accomplished by false ambition, doubtful principles and unworthy practices, is a task never desirable: still it is sometimes a duty. There are men whose moral cunning, or, if you please, whose immoral cunning, is strangely connected with a perversion or obtuseness of intellect, that seems to exclude the ordinary comprehension of the signs of the times: men who on other occasions judge wisely and discreetly, but who appear to suffer under some mental delusion or infatuation, where purposes of ambition are to be accomplished. You have probably learned by experience that it is one of the most difficult things in life to measure one's own strength and capacity to the magnitude of a contemplated enterprize. Self love magnifies the capacity; and a sanguine temperament diminishes obstacles. But there is, sir, a moral standard of weight and measure, by which every wise observer of human society may, without violence to his modesty, learn the relative station that God and nature have assigned him.

You have already had some experience, by indications that even you cannot mistake, that your sanctity has not screened you wholly from suspicion, nor your cunning shielded you wholly from detection. You have had a difficult part to perform. You have conducted it bravely. But you have at length ventured altogether beyond your depth.

The conflicts of political parties awake the dormant fires of ambition. They elicit that consuming passion in every variety of form. The demonstration you have made, sir, since you launched your barque on the ocean of political ambition, shows you to be neither deficient in boldness of enterprize, nor sensible of danger. These are truly desirable qualities in partizan politics, but to insure success, they require a previous training altogether incompatible with your retired, obscure life. Your pulpit was yours exclusively. There no one contended with you; and you was the great man of your parochial circle. You then ventured on the projects of political antimasonry, and becoming conspicuous for your bitter maledictions, in your outpourings at various antimasonic caucusses, you became a still greater man among the ordinary men about you.—Even those whose base private characters were matter of notoriety, supposed some show of external decency to be necessary, and, in selecting certain individuals to mask their designs, designated you as notoriously fitted to that degree of eminence. Then literary honors awaited you in your various editorial labors to write up the cause of antimasonry; and if public literary honors were not decreed to you, fancy still presented a literary chaplet not unworthy the increasing greatness of him who had staked his piety, his learning, his time and his influence on the absorbing and engrossing work of antimasonry. Afterward came the last in your succession of honors: you was made a Senator. And then, sir, came to your bosom the consciousness that the circumscribed influence of a pulpit, the boisterous applause of a caucus, and the doubtful merit of a party writer, afforded no promise of the estimation in which you would be held in that honorable station. But even there you assumed the attitude of a partizan champion. You threw down the gauntlet of defiance. Your colleague accepted the challenge. And although he be not an ancient Knight, he showed you right good courtesy in the contest, and manfully made you 'bite the dust.'

The course you took, sir, a few days since on the question of 'the Georgia Indians' did not fail to excite some speculation on the versatility of your genius, to say nothing of your principles. It obtained for you some reputation for bold inconsistency, when you declaimed so loudly against 'the plighted faith of the government' and of 'the violation of plighted faith.' You, sir, was 'surprised' and 'astonished' at that 'violation,' who, but a few days before, in the same place, in the presence and hearing of the same persons, uttered your bold philippic against the Masonic Institution, and talked of 'the violation of plighted faith' with as much indifference, as if there was merit in the act. By what rule of morals do you now make that act justifiable, in the individual, which is so reprehensible in 'the government'? If you are 'surprised' and 'astonished' at 'the government,' cannot you imagine that others may be 'surprised and 'astonished' at Moses Thacher? Unless you have come to the conclusion that no one will be 'surprised' or 'astonished' at any course or at any change you may adopt, there is some arrogance in your confidence that, after having justified 'the violation of plighted faith' so boldly and so publicly, you should so soon stand up as a public accuser, and denounce 'the government' for 'a violation of plighted faith.' Which of the two positions do you mean to defend? Do you mean still to remain defendant to the accusation of Masons; or do you mean to stand as accuser of 'the government'?—It will not be convenient to stand in both relations; although your hostility to the Masonic Institution, and your hostility to 'the government' may find an apology in the same reasons.

Sir, although the measure of your political ambition be not filled, remember that the days of your political distinction are numbered. You have reached the ultima Thule of your political honors. You may now gather your robes about you; but you cannot, like Cæsar, fall nobly. It is one of the consolations of an honorable man, that although he descends from a station of dignity, he does not fall into contempt. Still you may hide the tarnished toga of an ambitious Senator, under the cosiac of the ambitious Priest. For your political disgraces, you will receive but little sympathy. You may however, lay to your heart the unction of the remnant of clerical worth which rises from your ministerial relation to "the Church in North Wrentham."

Be advised, sir, in your next trial for secular distinction and worldly honors, not to attempt the guidance of the Chariot of the Sun; a fall from its elevated course may be too hazardous. Keep to the Chariot of Antimasonry; for there is less danger to you in assuming the direction: there is no danger of honorable competition.

In the Roman Senate no one went armed. It was not permitted to carry a hostile weapon there, to overawe the Senate. But you, sir, "in our own little Senate," talk of "civil war" as if you had girded on other weapons than "the sword of the spirit." You hold forth in a topical discourse somewhat novel, under Senatorial privilege. Do you mean to overawe the Senate? Or did you intend to bully the Masonic Fraternity from your privileged, protecting seat in the Senate? Sir, they have neither regard for your clerical pride, nor respect for you in your official place, when you reader yourself unworthy of the place. What, sir, in a "civil war," would your antimasonic hands first seize upon as an appropriate antimasonic weapon? The blazing brand of discord, to throw our population into worse confusion?

You introduce an inquiry into the Senate of Massachusetts on the subject of extra-judicial oaths, and then talk of 'civil war' with as much nonchalance as though your expectations reached forward to the event. And what station would you occupy in a "civil war"? Would you relinquish the humble teachings of the Cross, that proclaim 'on earth peace and good will towards man,' for the desolating progress of the sword, that pierces the hearts of kindred, friends and neighbors? Would you exchange the mild accents of christian charity for the startling note of the war-trumpet? Are you, sir, a servant and disciple of Christ, ready to assume the livery of murderous strife in the progress of "civil war"? Do you believe the free electors of Norfolk sent you to sound the tocsin of terror and alarm from your honorable station in the Capitol? If such are your feelings, you are yet to learn that the mild influences of the gospel do not so teach. If such are your contemplations, without shuddering at this desolating prospect, you have still to learn that your heart is as little influenced by kind affections, as your party is by honest intentions.

I am, Sir, yours

FENELON.

Antimasons talk of the wickedness of the Masonic Institution and profess to desire to reclaim those who belong to it by reason and argument only: yet they form a political party to punish those they cannot convince.

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered at the Installation of the Officers of Montgomery Lodge, Medway, Mass. Dec. 29, A. D. 1830.

By JOHN G. METCALF,

Master of said Lodge.

[Concluded.]

Charge 8th.—'The Imprecations of Freemasonry.'

The wickedness of these are established by a quotation from elder Bernard; upon which, by the gracious permission of our accuser, every citizen is granted the liberty of making his own comments. To this we say, amen, having no doubt but that the public will grant elder Bernard all the credit, to which his weight of testimony in the case, justly entitles him.

Charge 9th and last.—'Masonry inculcates a malignant and persecuting spirit.'

This charge, it is averred, is brought forward with 'great reluctance.' Great reluctance! what does this mean? Is there some misgivings of conscience, or is it sheer, hypocritical cant? What! after Masonry and Masons are denounced, the one as inculcating and the other as executing the most horrid precepts, need there be any great reluctance in calling them by any other name? What! does it stick in the throat, to say that Masons are persecutors, after (and without any reluctance too) they are denounced as Atheists? After the whole vocabulary of Billingsgate and blackguard, had been exhausted, we should think it would be altogether gratuitous and uncalled for, to express any sort of unwillingness to charge Masons with any other crime, either to suit the fancy—add another item to the sum of disapprobation, or eke out the slender pages of an Address. But, without being supposed to possess any very great degree of malignity, one might draw the inference, that this charge was introduced, for the purpose of exciting public sympathy in favor of its author; as it is said, 'by this we account for the scandal and reproach that has been heaped upon Seceding Masons.' Now, why was not short work made of this? Why was it not said plainly:—Masons persecute us, because they will not trust us with their confidence—because they will not acknowledge our claim upon their gratitude, for our labors of love, in denouncing them as heretics and traitors? We are persecuted! because some men esteem them little else than apocryphal, our long and unceasing protestations, that we are the salt of the earth, and that there is none good beside us. We are persecuted! because we cannot persuade people that we shall be heard for our much speaking, or esteemed for our long prayers. We are persecuted! because the charge is laid at our door, and we cannot remove it, that we do not care so much about the wickedness of Freemasonry, as we do about the salaries of office. We are persecuted! and let us once make the people believe it, and we shall soon get what we want,—the political control of the country.

But when did Masonry or Masons ever evince the persecuting spirit that has marked the ferocity of antimasonry? When did Masons ever make the attempt to drive antimasons from the jury-box or the communion-table? Have not antimasons done this? Has it not been proved true, time and again? It has, and it cannot be denied. The spirit of persecution is the same in all ages and upon all subjects. This spirit of persecution and intolerance, now exercised with such unrelenting severity, and urged with so much zeal, against the Institution of masonry, is the same spirit, that has filled the earth with lamentation and mourning, in every retrograde age and generation. It is the same spirit that cried out, in vengeance, against the Saviour of the world, 'crucify him, crucify him.' It is the same spirit that drove the primitive Christians to death in its most horrid forms.—The same spirit that has murdered her thousands, in the ungenial of the Inquisition, for doubting the omnipotence of the Pope. The same that brought about the unspeakable horrors of a Saint Bartholomew massacre. The same that kindled the fires of Smithfield, and hunted the Scotch Covenanters from the face of the earth, like the wild beasts of the forests. And I ask, in candor and sober earnestness, where would be the security of liberty or life now, if this modern spirit had but the power of the ancient? Who would give us guaranty, had this spirit her band of Jewish Centurions, that we should not, in our day, hear the cry, 'crucify him, crucify him'? Who would assure us, had she her hosts of familiars, that we should not now hear of her 'auto de fe,' and behold her victims, led out, in savage triumph, to all the horrors of the stake? Had she the swords, of the bloody Charles the IXth who would dare to promise us immunity from their fury, when wielded by such merciless hands?

And what shall be our course, considering the present, novel situation in which we are placed? What shall be the course of our conduct, persecuted, as we are for opinion's sake, by a party, who acknowledge no moral restraint themselves, and make the demand that no one else shall? The answer is short. In the language of a man and a Mason too, against whom antimasonic persecution dare not lift her voice, I say, 'Live down the calumny and reproach that is heaped upon us.' Show to the world, by our lives and conversations, that the principles of Freemasonry are good. Let us live as becomes those, who are practical believers in the precepts and commands of the great Architect of the Universe, as made known to us, by the written revelations of his will. Let our whole lives be ordered with a reference to a day of resurrection, the final judgment and a punishment for crime in another world.—Let us so live, and we shall survive the day and generation of antimasonry. Live as Freemasonry teaches us, and our efforts will always be found on the side of virtue and religion. Walk in accordance with the precepts, we have so often heard inculcated, and we shall have nothing to fear. Although we are not operative Masons, as were our ancient brethren, let us never forget, that we should be practical, Freemasons. Let Masonic principles operate upon us, and we shall live in the constant practice of morality and virtue. In view of these considerations, I would recommend, a firm, temperate and constant support of our principles upon all proper occasions. That on all proper occasions, by word and deed, we should use our endeavours to disabuse the public ear, of the malicious falsehoods, that are so industriously circulated against us. I would recommend a punctual and frequent attendance upon our stated meetings; remembering however, the Masonic injunction, that they are not to be attended, to the neglect of our necessary and useful avocations. I would recommend that we should be watchful of our rights and immunities, as freemen, and resist, in all lawful ways, the least infringement of them. Finally, Brethren, living so far as we ought, with reference to this world, let us never forget, that we should also live, with reference to another. Let us so live, that it may be seen, we have it in remembrance, that time is rapidly passing away, and that we are as rapidly passing away with it,—that in a few days, we must bid farewell to earth and all its vanities, and enter upon the untried scenes of a life to come, where weal or woe will attach to us, as we have lived virtuous or vicious here.

[If in the preceding discourse, the author has exhibited an unusual degree of severity, an apology for so doing may readily be found in the fact, that it was delivered to the same Lodge, before which the Rev. Moses Thacher pronounced his Masonic address, rather more than a year ago; for which he received a vote of thanks! That portion, however, which appeared in the Mirror of the 12th, contained a sentence which was not spoken in the Lodge, and which, though appended to the manuscript, was not designed for publication. It is this: 'But notwithstanding all this, stands before the public, by his own confession, as a wretch, who has blasphemed the living God.' Now this is all true enough; yet, as it was not spoken with the other portions of the address, it ought not to have been so printed. Such a course would be too much after the antimasonic way of doing things.] Editor.

Not one in fifty of the the members of the republican party is a Mason; yet according to antimasonic lingo, the republican party is a Masonic party! [N. Y. paper.]

MODERN PERSECUTION.

We will put down Masonry by the sword, if we cannot put it down without.—JACOB HALL.

NO VIII.

The measures to which antimasons have resorted subject them rightfully not only to the imputation of criminal conduct, but fasten upon them a character for low, vulgar abuse, seldom equalled, but never surpassed. It has been a favorite measure with them, pursued with steady perseverance, to eject from their dens of filth and infamy, sheets of coarse and illiterate productions, which, although eminently fitted to excite the abhorrence of every decent man, have proved a vexation and annoyance to some of our most respectable and aged citizens. It would exceed the limits of credibility, were any one to detail the particulars of these insulting transactions. That they were intended as insults, is clearly indicated by the offensive quality of their matter, and the points of their distribution.

That cause must be in very bad hands, and in very bad condition, when brutality and vulgarity are made the efficient agents to accomplish its purposes. And that cause gives but a very bad indication of the character of its managers, when the observances of a gentleman are sunk in the indecencies of a clown.

The Antimasonic Suffolk Committee, in the management of their abuse and persecution, evince a degree of hardened depravity of unusual character, by countenancing such measures; measures to which no honest or decent man could be expected to consent. And if it was reserved to that committee to try the experiment of forcing a bad cause by dint of low ribaldry, they have not forfeited, in the trial, their claim to the most consummate impudence.

It is a singular fact, that one of these low, vulgar effusions, which had been scattered about the city with a profusion that attracted remark, found its way to the editorial chair of a respectable daily paper; and that one stanza, copied into that paper, should have excited some degree of feeling in a quarter altogether unexpected. That stanza we give from memory, but believe it to be correct:

'Now our Police is quite too weak,
With Otis at their head, Sir,
To still a secret, lawless mob,
As Sheriff Sumner said, Sir.'

Whatever Sheriff Sumner was pleased to say on his own account, he was unwilling to see his name celebrated in the 'doggerel rhymes' of antimasons. He had long before given publicity to his opinions in stately prose, and had obtained all the notoriety, in connexion with Antimasonry, that his ambition desired. So little pride had the Sheriff in the expression attributed to him by his antimasonic contemporary and fellow laborer, that he felt himself bound to disavow to the Mayor of the city, the injurious reflection attributed to him. We believe that even Sheriff Sumner himself could not so easily forfeit his claim to the manners of a gentleman, as to approve the getting up of illiterate 'doggerel stanzas,' intended to outrage the decencies of society, vilify the motives of worthy, upright citizens, and aid a little knot of unprincipled men in this mean and despicable mode of persecution. It was an instructive lesson to the Sheriff. He must have perceived that the Suffolk Committee are no literary epicures. That they are more fastidious of the personal respectability of those who contribute to their antimasonic banquets, than of those who are associated with them in their very select coterie.

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

THE BAROMETER

The first instrument that we shall describe illustrative of the pressure of the air, is the Barometer. This name is derived from the Greek, and signifies a measurer of weight. With this instrument, the famous experiment of Torricelli was made, which he communicated to his friend Viviani, who repeated it in 1643.

The barometer consists of a glass tube, about thirty-four inches long, sealed at one end, which, being filled with quicksilver, is inverted in a vessel or cup of the same material. The tube being now held perpendicularly, the fluid will subside from the top, and stand at that height by which it is balanced by a column of atmosphere extending from the surface of the earth to its utmost height. The average height of the quicksilver is about thirty inches at the level of the sea. It is maintained at a certain elevation by the pressure of the air of the surrounding fluid, while that portion over which the tube stands has been relieved from the weight. If water were substituted for quicksilver, it would be supported at the height of thirty-two feet, because the quicksilver is about fourteen times heavier.

The barometer is commonly used as a weather glass, and as such, it gives evidence of the changes that are about to take place. The plate connected with the upper part of the tube, is divided into inches and tenths. A moveable point, called a vernier, subdividing this division into tenths and hundredths, moves through the centre of this plate perpendicularly. By placing the vernier at the exact height of the quicksilver, we have the height in inches, tenths, and hundredths. The words marked on the plate are not so much to be regarded as the motion of the fluid; for a deviation from the highest point may be followed by rain, although the quicksilver may not have sunk below the point marked Fair; and the same may be noticed with regard to its rise.

By this instrument we detect an error very common among mankind, respecting the weight of the air. It is generally supposed that air is heaviest when the atmosphere is cloudy and filled with moisture, and that the languor we then experience is produced by the increased weight upon our bodies. But the reverse is the fact.—When the atmosphere is heavy, clouds do not linger near the earth, smoke rises almost perpendicularly, and we experience a peculiar elasticity and energy. When it is light, on the contrary, clouds come very near the earth, smoke falls immediately to the ground, and the animal system feels languid and oppressed. The barometer proves that the weight has been diminished; for the quicksilver, not being counterbalanced by so heavy a column of air, necessarily sinks. Therefore, we find that when the atmosphere is heaviest, our sensations are more agreeable, and when it is lightest, the internal pressure, not being fully resisted, produces the feelings of languor and oppression.

There are four forms of the barometer in use, each of which present certain advantages.

1st. The portable, or parlor barometer.

2d. The wheel barometer.

3d. The marine barometer.

4th. The mountain barometer.

All these are modifications of the same barometer. The first is the simplest, and was described in explaining the peculiarities of the instrument. It acquires the name of portable from the screw which is connected with the cup at the bottom, whereby the fluid can be pressed up the whole length of the tube, to prevent accidents in its transportation.

The second differs very much in appearance; the tube being concealed, and a face somewhat resembling that of a clock, exhibiting the changes by the motion of the hand.

The third differs from the first in having the bore of the tube of unequal diameters, to guard against the accidents by motion of the vessel.

The fourth is so accurately divided as to exhibit the minutest difference in elevation: and is used in measuring the heights of mountains.

Among these the marine barometer presents the most interesting beauties. Its use, however, is not so common as its merits deserve. To those who wander over trackless seas, and along unknown coasts, the ability to discover a threatened change would be invaluable.

Several romantic stories are connected with the history of this instrument; and all who have experienced its benefits, have some incident to relate illustrating its value.—Arnott states that he was one of a numerous crew, who probably owed their preservation to its almost miraculous warning. It was in a southern latitude. The sun had just set with placid appearance, closing a beautiful afternoon, and the usual mirth of the evening watch was proceeding, when the captain's order came to prepare in all haste for a storm. As yet, the oldest sailors had not perceived even a threatening in the sky, and were surprised at the extent and hurry of the preparations. But the required measures were not complete, when a more awful hurricane burst upon them than the most experienced had ever braved. Nothing could withstand it: the sails, already furlled, and closely bound to the yard, were riven away in tatters: even the bare yards and masts were in great parts disabled; and at one time the whole rigging had nearly fallen by the board. Such, for a few hours, was the mingled roar of the hurricane above, of the waves around, and of the incessant peals of thunder, that no human voice could be heard: and, amidst the general consternation, even the trumpet sounded in vain.

In that awful night, but for the little tube of mercury which had given the warning, by falling with rapidity, neither the strength of the noble ship, nor the skill and energies of the commander, could have saved one man to tell the tale.

The barometer is also used to determine the height of mountains. It was the experiment of Pascal with this instrument that satisfactorily proved the difference in the weight of the air at various heights, and which established its pressure.

If the atmosphere support a column of quicksilver at thirty inches at the level of the sea, we must infer that the height of the fluid will diminish as we ascend. We accordingly find, by a rough calculation, that an ascent of a thousand feet causes the quicksilver to sink one inch. On Mont Blanc it falls to about fifteen inches, showing an elevation of fifteen thousand feet. And in De Luc's famous balloon ascent, it sunk to 21 inches, proving an altitude of twenty one thousand feet, the greatest height to which man has ever risen.—[Scientific Tracts.]

FITCH AND FULTON.

I know John Fitch and Robert Fulton. The latter was about the year 1780 and for several years my schoolmate, in the town of L—r, Pennsylvania. We were then very small boys. His mother was a widow, and in straitened circumstances. I had a brother that was fond of painting. The war of the revolution, which prevailed at that period, made it difficult to obtain materials from abroad, and the arts were at a low ebb in the country.—My brother, consequently, prepared and mixt the colors for himself; and those he usually displayed on muske shells fell to my lot; some of which I occasionally carried in my pocket to school. Fulton saw and craved a part.—He pressed his suit with so much earnestness, that I could not refuse to divide my treasure with him; and in fact he soon, from this beginning, so shamed my performance, by the superiority of his own, that it ended in my voluntarily surrendering to him the entire heirship to all that came into my possession. Henceforth his book was neglected, and he was often severely chastised by the school-master, for his inattention and disobedience. His friends removed to Philadelphia, where he was apprenticed to a silversmith, but his mind was not in his trade. He found his way to London, and placed himself under the patronage of his celebrated countryman West.

While Robert Fulton was thus engaged in London,

John Fitch, clock-maker, was contriving schemes in Philadelphia for the propulsion of boats by steam. He conducted his mysterious operations at a projection on the shore of the Delaware, at Kensington; which among the wise and prudent of the neighborhood, the scorn of magicians and dark works, soon acquired the ominous and fearful title of Conjuror's Point. I often witnessed the performances of his boat in 1788, '89, and 90. It was propelled by paddles in the stern, and constantly getting out of order. I saw it when it was returning from a trip to Burlington; from whence it was said to have arrived in little more than two hours. When coming too, off Kensington, some part of the machinery broke, and I never saw it in motion afterwards. I believe it was the last effort. He had up to that period, been patronized by a few stout hearted individuals, who had subscribed a small capital, in shares of, I think, 6l. Pennsylvania currency, or $16 each; but this last disaster so staggered their faith, and unstrung their nerves, that they never again had the hardihood to make other contributions. Indeed, they had already rendered themselves the subject of ridicule and derision, for their temerity and presumption, in giving countenance to this wild projector, and infatuated madman. The company, thereupon, gave up the ghost—the boat went to pieces—Fitch became bankrupt and broken hearted. Often have I seen him stalking about like a troubled spectre, with downcast eye, and lowering countenance; his coarse soiled linen peeping through the elbow of a tattered garment. During the days of his aspiring hopes, two mechanics were of sufficient daring to work for him. Aye, and they suffered in purse for their confidence and folly. These were Peter Brown, shipsmith, and John Wilson, boat builder, both of Kensington. They were worthy benevolent men, well known to the writer and much esteemed in the city. Towards Fitch, in particular, they ever extended the kindest sympathy. While he lived therefore, he was in the habit of calling almost daily at their workshops, to while away time; to talk over his misfortunes, and rail at the ingratitude and cold neglect of an unfeeling spiritless world. From Wilson I derived the following anecdote: Fitch called to see him as usual—Brown happened to be present. Fitch mounted his hobby, and became unusually eloquent in the praise of steam, and the benefits to which mankind were destined to derive from its use in propelling boats. They listened of course, without faith, but not without interest, to this animated appeal, but it failed to rouse them to give any future support to schemes, by which they had suffered. After indulging himself for some time, in this never failing topic of deep excitement, he concluded with these memorable words—'Well, gentlemen, although I shall not live to see the time, you will, when steam boats will be preferred to all other means of conveyance, and especially for passengers; and they will be particularly useful in the navigation of the river Mississippi.' He then retired; on which Brown turning to Wilson, exclaimed, in a tone of deep sympathy, 'Poor fellow! what a pity he is crazy.'

Fitch died in 1793. Brown and Wilson were more prosperous. They both lived to retire from business, in easy circumstances. The former, indeed became rich, and set up his carriage. He was too noble a spirit to indulge either in luxurious pride or ostentation. The coat of arms, on the pannels of his carriage doors, was of his own contriving, and consisted of a muscular hand, grasping a sledge hammer, suspended over an anvil. Motto—'By this I got you.'

LENGTHS OF NIGHTS IN VARIOUS PARTS.

The longest night at Cayenne and Pondicherry is 12 hours, at Hayti, 13; at Ispahan, 14; at Paris, Dijon and Carosonne, 15; at Arras and Dublin, 16; at Copenhagen and Rige, 17; at Stockholm, 18; at Dronthiem, in Norway, Archangel, &c. 20; at Ulon, Bothnia, 21; and at Tornes, 22. At Euouteke, the absence of the sun endures 45 days consecutively; at Wardans, 56; at Cape North, 74; and lastly, Melville Island is totally destitute of light for 102 days:

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

[From the Plebeian, Kingston, N. Y.]

'We hope in Mr. Tappan's next paper, he will have the goodness to explain to us, in what way the Masons are persecuted by the refusal of the antimasons to bestow on them the suffrages, for which we shall consider ourselves under obligation to him.'—[Ulster Palladium of the 2d inst.]

The President of the United States recommends for appointment an individual well qualified for the station, as it regards integrity, ability and devotion to the public welfare—yet the Senate rejected him, and assigned no reason, except that the individual was a printer. Is this not persecution?

An industrious shoemaker (a Freemason) has, for twenty years, labored in that capacity for his neighbor, done his work well, is approved by him as a man of strict integrity, and, in the various relations of life, is considered by him as an estimable man: since the antimasonic excitement, he refuses to employ his neighbor, others in community, infected by his example, do the same; and an honest and industrious man has not the means of supporting his family. Is this not persecution?

A traveller, by the way side, finds a man perishing for want of food—he approaches him for the purpose of furnishing relief—discovers he is a Jew and turns away and leaves him to perish. Is this not persecution?

An antimason finds a Mason in the hands of determined assassins; he flies to rescue him, discovers he is a Mason, and leaves him to his fate. Is this not persecution?

Examples might be multiplied, to shew that persecution does not alone consist in acts of commission against the injured party; but in acts of omission, as when an individual of influence refuses to countenance and support an honest and industrious individual, because he happens to belong to a certain sect, or believe in a certain creed, and others, influenced by his example, also withhold from him the means of support—the miserable man, unable to furnish relief to his suffering family, in an agony of despair, commits suicide, and his wretched family find an asylum in a poor house! Yet the editor of the Palladium will gravely tell them, 'there is no persecution in all this!'

The definition of the word 'persecute,' according to Walker, is 'to pursue with malignity.'—Now, we would ask, whether it be not persecution, when men combine together, and positively aver that they will support no man for any office who is a Mason, let him be ever so respectable, capable or upright? Is it not malignant to debar a great portion of our fellow citizens from the privilege of holding office, whose only crime consists in belonging to a society, of which they know no evil, and which they conscientiously joined and have continued in from the most pure motives?

If our definition of the term 'persecution' be not correct, we will have to resort to other lexicographers than those whose works are extant. The moral views of the editor of the Palladium, however, may be more comprehensive than ours.

Minds accustomed to activity are more impatient under inertia than fatigue.

ANTIMASONIC FAIRNESS!!!

The Rev. and Hon. Mr. Thacher, editor of the Boston Telegraph, publishes in his paper, at full length, his own able speech, in the Senate of this Commonwealth, on extra-judicial oaths, and does not even inform his readers that Mr. Dearbon attempted a reply. Why is this? Does the Rev. Gentleman think his cause too weak to bear examination? Does he fear the effect of truth on his deluded followers? Is he ashamed to read in his paper, his own discomfiture and overthrow? Is he conscious that the argument and evidence is conclusively and palpably against him? Is he aware, that the presentment of the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, would instantly allay the raging fever of excitement, and the delirious phrenzy of proscription, and give him leave to retire to private life? Whether sinister motives may have induced this disingenuous conduct, is not for us to inquire. The fact in its naked deformity, is enough for us to know. The conclusive and ingenious arguments of Mr. Dearbon, and the unceremonious rejection of the Rev. Mr. Seceder's proposition by the Hon. Senate, are suppressed, and not given to the readers of this professed vehicle of truth. By what casuistry the Rev. Gentleman can satisfy his conscience for this deliberate suppression, and misrepresentation of facts, we know not, but apprehend that it must be by the aid of the same system of ethics by which he arrived at the conclusion, that promises contain no moral obligation, and that it is a man's duty to lie, if the Rev. Senator's views be right, and his arguments well founded, opposition to them would show more clearly the correctness of his opinions, and the soundness of his reasoning. We must conclude, therefore that he felt the weakness of his cause, and suppressed the able argument against him, because he foresaw that it would expose his weakness and defeat his objects. Let 'light' burst upon the vision of his benighted proselytes, and 'truth' irradiate their darkened understandings, and their voice would be as united in the rejection of all factious and proscriptive measures, as was the unprejudiced Senate.

We hoped better things of this paper, and that it would pursue a dignified and manly course of opposition. But we surrender our hopes, and despair of ever seeing an antipaper in love with truth. We should as soon think of drawing sweet waters from bitter fountains, or gathering figs from thistles. 'Ephraim is joined to his idols, let him alone.'

The Buffalo Journal, speaking of The Wither-ill affair, says—

This 'deed of sin' we believe now stands fully revealed, in all its enormity, and a more desperately depraved plot was never exposed to public gaze. In vain shall the leaders of antimasonry labor to prove that this foul scheme was not the act of the party. The proof is wholly irresistible. It is not the work of one or two misguided individuals, but a deliberate party scheme, to which many were privy. And for what? To commit crime, and by concealing the authors, cast suspicion upon the innocent, and thus subject them to disgrace, infamy and ruin! Nor did the evil stop here. When the indignant populace proceeded to investigate the foul deed, the aid of antimasonry was called in, to screen the guilty from discovery, and so powerfully did its principles coerce its disciples, that even professors of religion were found actively obeying the call. The Elder's son was dispatched to Dr. Deacon Brayton's, to avoid being called as a witness in the case, and when he left here, 'he was told by Dr. Corbin, and Elder Colver at Kinsbury, of a certain house he could go to, and stay, for the purpose of keeping out of the way!'

EXPERIENCE.

What is hope, Sire? A distant gleam
Quivering through the frantic dream,—
The straw that floats on time's fast stream—

What is love, Sire? A burning ache—
A spark of fire—a snowy flake—
A bubble jealousy will break.

What is joy, Sire? E'en scrow's spring—
The butterfly of gayest wing—
The wild rose with its latest sting.

What think you death? That frightful ghost—
That busy archer at his post—
Whose kinsmen are the human host.

Thus perilous, gray wisdom saith,
The hope and love, and joy, and death,
That end in sighs and gasps for breath.

FLOS.

MISCELLANY.

SPORTING WITH FEMALE AFFECTION.

Man cannot act a more perfidious part,
Than use his utmost effort to obtain
A confidence in order to deceive.

Honor and integrity ought to be the leading principles of every transaction in life. These are virtues highly requisite, notwithstanding they are too frequently disregarded. Whatever pursuits individuals are in quest of, sincerity in profession, steadfastness in pursuit, and punctuality in discharging engagements, are indispensably incumbent. A man of honest integrity, and uprightness in his dealings with his fellow-creatures, is sure to gain the confidence and applause of all good men; whilst he who acts from dishonest or designing principles, obtains deserved contempt. Dishonest proceedings in word or deed, are very offensive to, and unjustifiable in, the sight of God and man, even in trivial, but much more so in consequential, affairs. The most perfect uprightness is highly requisite between man and man, though it is too often disregarded, and is much more so between the sexes. Every profession of regard should be without dissembling, every promise preserved inviolate, and every engagement faithfully discharged. No one ought to have any pretensions to a lady before he is, in a great measure, certain her person, her temper, and qualifications, suit his circumstances, and agree perfectly with his own temper and way of thinking. For a similarity of mind and manners is very necessary to render the bonds of love permanent, and those of marriage happy.

'Marriage the happiest state of life would be,
If hands were only joined where hearts agree.'

The man of uprightness and integrity of heart, will not only observe the beauties of the mind, the goodness of the heart, the dignity of sentiment and the delicacy of wit, but will strive to fix his affections on such permanent endowments, before he pledges his faith to any lady.

He looks upon marriage as a business of the greatest importance in life, and a change of condition that cannot be undertaken with too much reverence and deliberation. Therefore he will not undertake it at random, lest he should precipitately involve himself in the greatest difficulties. He wishes to act a conscientious part, and consequently cannot think (notwithstanding it is too much countenanced by custom) of sporting with the affections of the fair sex, nor even of paying his addresses to any one, till he is perfectly convinced his own are fixed on just principles.

All imaginable caution is certainly necessary beforehand; but after a man's professions of regard, and kind services and solicitations have made an impression on a female heart, it is no longer a matter of indifference whether he perseveres in, or breaks off his engagement. For he is then particularly dear to her, and reason, honor, justice all unite to oblige him to make good his engagement. When the matter is brought to such a crisis, there is no retreating, without manifestly disturbing her quiet and tranquility of mind; nor can anything but her loss of virtue justify his desertion. Whether marriage has been promised or not, it is of little signification. For if he has solicited and obtained her affections, on supposition that he intended to marry her, the contract is, in the sight of heaven, sufficiently binding. In short, the man who basely imposes upon the honest heart of an unsuspecting girl, and after winning her affections by the prevailing rhetoric of courtship, ungenerously leaves her to bitter sorrow and complaining, acts a very dishonorable part, and is more to be detested than a common robber. For private treachery is much more heinous than open force; and money must not be put in competition with happiness.

ANCIENT MAIDENS.

Mr. Hayley, in his Essay on old maids, gives the argument of one of the debaters upon the following question, 'Which is the more eligible for a wife, a widow or an old maid?' who had gallantly taken the side of her neglected sisterhood. The orator insisted that a man who married an old maid had a greater chance of being beloved by his wife than he who wedded a widow. The affection of the remarried widow maintained was a pocket telescope, which she directed towards her good man in the grave, and it enlarged to a marvellous degree all the mental and personal endowments of the dear departed. She then turned the inverted glass to its diminishing successor, and, whatever his proportion of excellence might be, the poor, luckless, living mortal soon dwindled in her sight to a comparative pigmy. But this was not the case with the old maid. No, her affection was a portable microscope, which magnified in a stupendous manner all the attractive merits of her spouse; he filled her mind, occupied her eye, engrossed her heart. The widow (the orator admitted) was generally preferred to the old maid, but the reason, he said, was, that the former was an experienced angler, who had acquired patience to wait for the favourable minute, and struck in the instant the fish had fairly risen to the hook; while the old maid was an angler whom fruitless expectations had rendered impatient—she was thrown into trepidation by the appearance of a nibble, and by making a too hasty movement she afterwards rendered her bait an object of alarm. He compared a weeping widow to a moaning hyæna—that artful, destructive, and insatiable creature, which lured into its den by a treacherous cry of distress the unwary traveller whom it intended to devour. The haucer, he said, made his wife of Bath glory in having already buried four husbands, and express a perfect readiness whenever heaven might give her opportunity, to engage the sixth!—and Chaucer, he insisted, copied nature most faithfully. Now, the old maid, good soul! remembering how long she had waited for her first husband, instead of faithfully looking forward to a second, directed all her attention to cherish and preserve the dear creature whom she had at last acquired. He had no rival to fear either among the living or among the dead. It was of infinite importance he maintained, to matrimonial felicity, that the husband should receive into his arms a partner for life, whose dispositions and habits, instead of being fixed by a former lord, were to be moulded according to the will and abilities of her first and only director. In this point, the widow was a piece of warped wood, which the most skilful workman might find himself unable to shape as he wished—but the old maid was the pliant virgin wax, which follows with the most happy ductility every serious design, every ingenious devise, every sportive whim of the modeller. In conclusion, the speaker conjured every gentleman, who might happen to hesitate between a widow and an old maid, to remember that reason and experience, that equity and the general interests of mankind, all loudly pleaded for his preferring the latter. He entreats him to recollect, that the man who married a widow had great cause to apprehend unreasonable expectations, unpleasant comparisons and variable affection while he who married an old maid might with confidence prepare to meet unexacting tenderness increasing gratitude and perpetual endearments.

HARPOONING A WHALE.

Having approached as near as is consistent with safety, the harpooner darts his instrument into the back of the monster. This is a critical moment; for when this mighty animal feels himself struck, he often throws himself in violent convulsive movements vibrating in the air his tremendous tail, one dash of which is sufficient to dash a boat in pieces. More commonly, however, he plunges with rapid flight into the depths of the sea, or beneath the thickest fields and mountains of ice. While he is thus moving at the rate usually of eight or ten miles an hour, the utmost diligence must be used that the line to which the harpoon is attached may run off smoothly and readily along with him. Should it be entangled for a moment, the strength of the whale is such that he would draw the boat and crew after him under the waves. The first boat ought to be quickly followed up by a second, to supply more line when the first is run out, which often takes place in eight or ten minutes. When the crew of the boat see the line in danger of being all run off they hold up one, two, or three oars, to intimate their pressing need of supply. At the same time they turn the rope once or twice round a kind of post called the bollard, by which the motion of the line and the career of the animal are somewhat retarded. This, however, is a delicate operation, which brings the side of the boat down to the very edge of the water, and if the rope is drawn at all too tight, may sink it altogether. While the line is whirling round the bollard, the friction is so violent, that the harpooner is enveloped in smoke, and water must be constantly poured on to prevent it from catching fire. When after all, no aid arrives, and the crew find that the line must be run out, they have only one recourse—they cut it, loosing thereby not only the whale, but the harpoon and all the rope of the boat. When the whale is first struck and plunges into the waves, the boat's crew elevate a flag as a signal to the watch, on deck, who gives the alarm to those asleep below, by stamping violently on deck, and crying aloud—"a fall! a fall!"—On this notice, they do not allow themselves time to dress, but rush out in their sleeping shirts or drawers into an atmosphere, the temperature of which is often below zero, carrying along with them their clothing in a bundle, and trusting to make their toilette in the interval of manning and pushing off the boats. Such is the tumult at this moment, that the young mariners have been known to raise cries of fear thinking that the ship was going down. The period during which a wounded whale remains under water is various, but it is averaged by Mr. Scoresby at about half an hour. Then pressed by the necessity of respiration, he appears above, often considerably distant from the spot where he was harpooned, and in a state of great exhaustion, which the same ingenious writer ascribes to the severe pressure which he has endured when placed beneath a column of water 700 or 800 fathoms deep. All the boats have, in the meantime, been spreading themselves in various directions, that one, at least may be within a start, as it is called, or about two hundred yards of the point of his rising, at which distance they can easily reach and pierce him with one or two more harpoons before he again descends, as he usually does for a few minutes. On his re-appearance, a general attack is made with lances, which are struck as deep as possible, to reach and penetrate the vital parts. Blood mixed with oil, streams copiously from his wounds and from the blow holes, dyeing the sea at a great distance, and sprinkling and sometimes drenching the boats and crews. The animal now becomes more and more exhausted; and at the approach of his dissolution, he also makes a convulsive energetic struggle, rearing his tail high in the air, and whirling it with a noise which is heard at a distance of several miles. At length quite overpowered and exhausted, he lays himself on his side or back and expires. The flag is then taken down and three loud huzzas raised from the surrounding boats.

DECEITFULNESS OF THE WORLD.

The following extract from the oration delivered by Mr. Berrin, Attorney General of the United States, before the Literary Society of Princeton College, furnishes appropriate reflections for the young generally.

'My young Brothers! The world on which you are entering in all the ardor of hope, in all the purity of uncorrupted feeling, is arrayed in charms which it borrowed from fancy, and which will vanish at our approach. The pleasures with which it lures the unwary are brief and evanescent as the breath of the morning. It floats gaily on the advancing tide, but vanisheth with the flood—and sadness mingles with its ebbing waters.

For life is but the flood-tide of the heart,
Content the emblem of its gentle flow;
It swells in bliss, and then its waters part,
To seek the ocean home—all else is woe.

You will be too surely called to exert the courage which can encounter danger and calmness, and the fortitude which endures and triumphs over calamity. But on this side of the grave, the beautiful vision which now dazzles your inexperienced eyes will forever elude your grasp. Human life is but a step in the series of human existence; a point at which man pauses to look around him before he launches on eternity's ocean? Would you enjoy happiness here? Seek it in the fulfilment of your various duties—in the cultivation of intellect—in cherishing the better affections.—Seek and find whatever of real happiness is allotted to us here below, in the consciousness of having endeavored to live as becomes an intelligent being destined to immortality.'

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 26, 1831.

GEN. DEARBORN.

The hirelings of antimasonry are emptying their vials of wrath on the head of this gentleman, for the honorable and dignified stand he recently took in the Senate of this Commonwealth, on the subject of antimasonic proscription. This was to have been expected: it was desirable, inasmuch as the calumny of the infamously notorious is more desirable than their commendation. If a man receive the praise of knaves, the chance is that men will mistrust him; but if knaves fasten upon him with their malignant fangs, denounce and threaten him with their vengeance, it is fair to presume—indeed, it is good evidence—that he is an honest man. So with Mr. Dearborn.—When the antimasonic faction gave him their support at the Senatorial election, those unacquainted with the gentleman's views on the subject, and with the disgraceful and dastardly measures resorted to by the debased managers of that faction, to give a degree of respectability to their cause, believed him to be of the same genus. It was thought that he had so far forgotten the respect due to himself, as to afford some degree of countenance to that combination of political corruption. But the fact was the reverse. He gave them no encouragement that he then was, or that he was disposed to become one of their party, and unite in the proscription of any class of the community. They supported him, because the election of Thacher depended on his success. Knowing that Thacher could not be elected, if the merits of the man and the strength of the party were alone trusted to, they juggled him into the company of Mr. Dearborn, and so united their interests, that the success of the latter secured that of the other. This was the extent of Mr. Dearborn's antimasonry!

Mr. Thacher, in reply to Mr. Dearborn, said he 'was disappointed to perceive that his colleague, from whom he had expected support, had come out against him;' but 'he would not impeach the gentleman's motives.' Now, in our view of the matter, the design of this inuendo was to leave the impression on the minds of the members of the Senate, that Mr. Dearborn had, on a prior occasion, declared himself to be an antimason; and that having gained the end he had in view, and finding the subject unpopular, he now deserted the cause. If the Reverend gentleman intended this, it was worthy of his known character for candor and fairness. But whatever his intentions may have been, it has had the effect to encourage the blood-hounds of antimasonry to set up their wild and incoherent yelpings, and to fasten on the character and motives of Mr. Dearborn, with a malignant desperation peculiar to their inhuman passions. Accordingly, we find it said of him, that he was elected 'from a full conviction of his being a determined antimason,' that he practised 'deception,' and thereby obtained many votes which otherwise he would not have received; that he 'has not been only considered' as an antimason, but known to be such; if any reliance can be placed on his words; that he was supported at the late election for member of Congress, because they considered him an antimason, &c. &c. We know not how deeply Mr. Thacher may be versed in the secret mysteries of antiism; but he must be more ignorant of the transactions of his brethren, than we are ready to admit. That he is, if at the time he expressed his surprise at the stand Mr. Dearborn assumed in the Senate, he was not aware of the existence of the Circular from which the following is extracted. It was circulated throughout the County of Norfolk a few days prior to the recent 'election for member of Congress.' We publish it to show what 'lying valets' these fellows are. Are they not a disgrace to human nature?

'TO THE ELECTORS OF NORFOLK.

ANTIMASONS!

You are called upon to exercise a high privilege and perform a sacred duty, in choosing a public servant to represent your interests, defend your rights, and maintain your principles in the Councils of the nation.

The only question is, Will you confide this trust to the Hon. MOSES THACHER, or to the Hon. H. A. S. Dearborn?

They are both men of talents; both men of character; both citizens of your district; both Senators of the Senate; both elected by your suffrages.

Here the parallel ceases. These gentlemen are nominated by different Conventions; they will be supported by different parties, whose interests are distinct, and whose principles are adverse. Both of these gentlemen are too honorable to betray their trust; but they cannot both accept it. As a servant of your County, Gen. Dearborn has doubtless done his duty; let him continue to perform it. Will you commit to him the high trust of the Antimasonic party in the Councils of the nation? If he is an honorable man he cannot accept the trust. He is a Solicitor General of the Bunker Hill Monument, that disgrace to the nation, erected by MASONS for the benefit of MASONRY; whose patriotic 'Associations' have sent their mendicants throughout New-England to pick the pockets of women and children to enable them to build a Masonic Monument! Will not Gen. Dearborn therefore support Masonic interests? His friends are Masons; will he not support them? His associates, with few exceptions, (as is very generally understood and admitted) reside out of your district, and in the County of Suffolk! Will he neglect their interests? Will he not as an honorable man, support the interest of those who now rally round him as their champion? If he would not be true to them, how can you expect he would be true to you, when he cannot consistent with honor accept your trust? A man is known by his associates. General Dearborn's associates are our enemies, though they are all honorable men. They are Masons; and he is bound in honor to support them and not you.

* * * * *
'What are the Hon. MOSES THACHER'S claims for your support? He has accepted every trust you have confided to him, and fulfilled them. Gen. Dearborn has repeatedly declined your trusts, though he wanted your suffrages. Mr. Thacher is an associate of the yeomanry of your district—his friends are within it—his interests are within it; his supporters should be found there too. He belongs to no high sounding associations whose sneers would make him shrink from his duty, yet covet its honors. The choice is left to your judgment. Exercise it without fear or favor.

To your own selves be true;
And it will follow as the night the day,
You cannot then be false to any man.'

Here Mr. Dearborn is declared to be an enemy to antimasonry, and a friend to Masons; yet the Rev. Moses Thacher is disappointed that he should oppose him! He expected his support! There is not an honest man in the Commonwealth, after having examined the subject, that can believe the Reverend gentleman expected any such thing.

MOSES THACHER.

Personal abuse from this man, (if he merit a distinction so honorable,) can affect neither our interest nor our reputation for veracity. They are beyond the reach of his 'falsehood, calumny, and billingsgate.' Did he speak well of us, we might indeed feel that our character was in danger; we might tremble, lest some with whom we are unacquainted should infer, from his praise, that we had sunk to the same degraded level with himself; that we had become his fellow, and were engaged with him in carrying on the work of moral depravity. The greatest favor, therefore, that he can confer upon us, is to abuse us. So long as he continues to do this, we will not complain.

He accuses us of 'palpable misrepresentation,' in asserting that he stated as a fact, 'that a Masonic Deputy Sheriff, in the town of Providence, had, in conformity with his Masonic Oath, suffered offenders to escape from his custody, on learning that they were Masons.' Our statement, or rather Mr. Thacher's original statement was that, in Providence, R.I. a Masonic Deputy Sheriff was required to arrest two persons for store breaking, and having arrested them, put them in charge of two other Masons who, of course, permitted them to escape. He now says, he has 'neither publicly or privately, located that transaction either in Providence, or in any other part of Rhode Island.' And in the very next sentence declares, 'it is true, that the offence committed, for which the villains were apprehended, was located in Providence, R. I.' Such gross inconsistencies indicate very clearly where the 'palpable misrepresentation' lies. Again, 'but I never stated that the Deputy Sheriff who apprehended the villains, belonged to the town of Providence.' But he did state that, 'In Providence R. I. a Masonic Deputy Sheriff was required,' &c. And we have no hesitation in saying that every man who heard him, understood him as intending to say, that, the Deputy did belong to Providence. We can bring abundance of evidence to this effect. He next remarks, 'But I have stated publicly, and I now state again, that the villains were pursued and apprehended, in the State of Massachusetts, and that the Deputy Sheriff, who apprehended and suffered them to escape from custody was understood to be a citizen of Massachusetts.' He made no such statement in the Senate; and if he means to say that he did, he has our denial in the strongest terms. He says, had not the statement been construed into an intention with him to criminate the citizens of Rhode Island, he should have passed it over in silence. And how, by his notice, is the matter mended? Why, by criminating the citizens of Massachusetts! So it appears that an act, the commission of which is dishonorable in Rhode Island, is not so in Massachusetts! But he has charged certain citizens of Rhode Island, with the commission of murder! This, we suppose, does not criminate them 'for negligence in the administration of justice!' But by whom has it been construed into an intention to criminate the citizens of Rhode Island? We construed it into an intention to slander and belie the Masonic Institution, and we are very much mistaken, if this were not the only intention there was about it. The rest is all fudge.

We reported the misstyled honorable gentleman correctly; and we published the allegation, if not verbatim, in substance as it fell from his mouth. We know not nor do we care what he intended to say. It is enough that we know what he did say. We have no doubt he was off his guard when he located the story in Providence. Had he not been, he would not have laid himself open to detection. We have very much more confidence in the accuracy of our minutes, than we have in the word of Moses Thacher. If the fellow had taken the trouble to inquire of the members of the Senate what he did say, (if indeed he have intercourse with any of the gentlemen of that honorable board, which, if report and appearances be true, is at least problematical,) we have no doubt that all who had not entirely forgotten that the subject had been before them, would have confirmed the correctness of our report. Had he said that in giving a location to the base falsehood, he was guilty of a lapsus linguae; that he did not intend to render himself liable to detection and exposure; he had come nearer the truth, and would probably have been believed. Men of his own principles, standing and character may now believe him; but it is arrogant presumption in him to expect that the intelligent and honorable portions of the community will attach credit to his own declarations, unsustained by more credible testimony. It would, therefore, be a work of supererogation in us to adduce evidence, before the correctness of our report is called in question, other than by those whose 'frequent falsehood, calumnies, and billingsgate, render' them 'too contemptible to deserve a name.'

If such an offence of a Deputy Sheriff, as pretended by Moses Thacher, was not committed in R. I.; we challenge him to state where it was committed, and we engage to follow him through his protean, shifting locations, and to prove, so far as a negative can be proved, that the whole story is a fabrication of his own malicious brain.—Let him only locate his falsehoods, that we may track and pursue him in his shiftings and turnings; and if we do not "scotch his recreant hide," to his full satisfaction, he shall be at liberty to abuse us to his heart's content.—But when he once locates his falsehood, and is detected, he must not attempt to lie us out of it, by saying the offence took place somewhere else. He can no more make us believe that the moon is made of green cheese, than he can that he is an honest man; which, to say the least, would be a very difficult matter.

Moses!—go back to North Wrentham; ask forgiveness of the God whom you have offended; and of the little flock of Christians whom you have broken up and deserted. Throw off your Senatorial robes. You cannot wear them with benefit to the State, nor without discredit to yourself. You can not play the politician with any degree of success; and must, therefore, if the good people of Norfolk do not put their veto upon you, soon become a burden to the State—a leech on the public treasury. Take this advice, Moses, for it is given to thee in right good soberness, and may save thee from much trouble!

THE ECLIPSE.—The following extract of a letter from Robert Treat Paine, Esq. the author of the astronomical calculations in the American Almanac, 'describes the appearance of the eclipse at Monomoy Point, the southern extremity of the point of land which projects from the South eastern part of the County of Barnstable. This point of land has been within a few years past forcibly separated from the continent, by the formation of a navigable channel, and it is now an island. It was the nearest land in New England to the central track of the eclipse, except Nantucket, which island Mr. Paine was not able to reach, the passage having been obstructed by ice ever since the 15th of January.'

Sandwich, Feb. 15, 1831.

Being prevented by ice, from reaching Nantucket, I concluded to observe the Eclipse from the light house on Monomoy Point, and accordingly went there; the travelling was generally bad, but the passage from Chatham to the Point (11 miles) in an open boat, was far more inconvenient and disagreeable.

The sky was very clear from Friday evening until about two hours after the eclipse ended, and during the continuance of the eclipse not a cloud was visible. I had the good fortune to determine with great precision the time of the beginning and end of the eclipse, and of the formation and rupture of the ring; indeed I consider my observations on this eclipse the most satisfactory I have ever made.—The duration of the ring was 1m. 27sec.; the formation and rupture of it, presented a most splendid spectacle,—and it is impossible to conceive any thing more beautiful and sublime. The eclipse was also annular (but only for a few seconds) at Chatham, Harwich, Dennis, Yarmouth, and part of Barnstable. In this town the crescent extended about four fifths around the moon.

The obscuration was greater than I anticipated; in the eclipse of Sept. 1820, which was annular in Europe, it was generally observed that the darkness was much less than was expected, and that Venus (then farther from the sun than on Saturday) was the only visible planet; it was therefore stated in the American Almanac, 'that should the sky be clear, much diminution of the light was not to be expected, probably not sufficient to render the planet Venus visible, then about thirteen degrees east of the sun;' but Venus was visible for upwards of an hour, and Jupiter also, but for a less time; a person standing near, strenuously insisted that he could distinguish the twinkling of a star, but as he was unsuccessful in his attempts to point it out to me, it is not improbable he was mistaken. Fowls were observed returning to their roosts, and cattle to their stalls. The color of the sky became of an indigo blue, and some gentlemen in Chatham informed me they observed each other's countenances to appear of a sickly olive.

The thermometer on the N. W. side of the house (the wind was quite strong from W. N. W. during the whole of the eclipse) stood at the beginning at 27, and fell to 23 1-2 during the greatest obscuration, but the effect of the eclipse on a thermometer hanging in the sun on the S. E. side of the house was surprisingly great; at the beginning it stood at 71, and at 27 minutes after 1, (during the existence of the ring,) at only 29, being a difference of 42 degrees. For the space of twenty minutes, a burning glass, which at the beginning of the eclipse, seemed to burn black cloth almost instantaneously, failed to produce the least effect thereon.

In the prismatic spectrum, it was noticed that the space occupied by the red rays was much less, and that by the violet much greater than usual.

In this place, the thermometer in the shade descended more than at Monomoy Point, viz. from 32 to 26.

The lunar tables gave the place of the moon in this eclipse with a wonderful degree of precision.

During the remainder of the present century, the moon's shade will pass but three times over any part of the Atlantic States, viz. on Nov. 30th, 1834, which eclipse will be total in South Carolina and Georgia; and on the 7th. August, 1869, total in Virginia and North Carolina—and on 28th, May, 1900, total in Virginia. It is therefore evident that at no time within the next seventy years will the sun be as much obscured in any part of New England and of many of the middle states, as in Boston on Saturday last.

The occultation of Venus on the 13th, I was prevented from observing by clouds. I distinctly saw the planet on the meridian, at 1h. 7m. through my telescope, and had the sky been clear should certainly have seen the Immersion; but a few minutes before it took place, the sky became overcast, and continued so the remainder of the afternoon.

I have determined with precision the latitude and longitude of Monomoy Point Light and of Chatham Lights, (hitherto not ascertained with the accuracy to be desired) which will be communicated hereafter.

☞ The Albany Argus says the antimasonic meeting recently called in that city, was attended by three persons only! This being considered as rather a limited representation of public sentiment, an adjournment took place!—There has been a great falling off in the antimasonic party in that city, since the vote of thirteen or fourteen hundred given to Mr. Granger. The Argus says, at this time the antimasons could not probably muster two hundred votes in the city.

The Antimasonic Elucidator urges upon antimasons the support of Mr. Clay for President; and adds, 'the election of Mr. Clay will be a glorious triumph for antimasons!' The Ontario Phoenix, another antimasonic paper, instead of falling in with the views of the Elucidator, alleges that some of the abductors of Morgan are the most active in getting up the Clay meetings, and that nearly half of the convention of the 14th in Ontario, were Masons; and that 'the man in whose desperate interest they meet is a Mason.'

THE KING AND THE CRAFT.—His Majesty has signified in answer to an application for that purpose, from the Grand Lodge of England, that it is his pleasure to accept the situation of Patron of the fraternity of free and accepted Masons of the United Kingdom in place of his brother the late King. On the annual election of officers to the Grand Lodge of Scotland on the 30th ult. his Majesty was accordingly formally elected Patron for the year ensuing; and at the commencement of the Masonic year, with the English and Irish brethren on the 26th inst. a similar election will take place, when the toast of 'the King and the Craft' will be resumed.—[London paper.]

☞ J. B. Francis, Esq. and Willet Carpenter, Esq. nominated for Gov. and Lt. Gov.; and Joseph Smith, jr. Peleg Wilbour jr. and Gideon Spencer, nominated by the antimasons for Senators of Rhode Island, and have declined standing as candidates.

THEATRICAL.

[Communicated for the Mirror.]

The Burke excitement has been raging like a pestilence for three weeks past, and every day it grows more furious. Not a Ball, Route, or in fact any fashionable party whatever, can be got up without him. He must be the principal guest,—the very spice to give them all their flavor.—No conversation can now be modish without the introduction of Master Burke's name,—and all other topics are mere chaff. Stars past have been totally eclipsed by the resplendent rays of the present and all their good qualities have been obliterated from memory.

Many have been so struck with his style of acting, that they are even endeavoring to imitate—fancying no doubt they might some day sail in the same grand 'March of Intellect.'

While accidentally passing through Fanueil Hall Market, we saw a crowd of people collected round a Butcher, who was flourishing his cleaver and giving specimens of Master Burke as Young Norval. The Drama which has for a long time laid dormant has taken a fresh start, and our Theatre has once more become a place of fashionable resort. Master Burke has performed Romeo two successive nights since our last, to delighted audiences. So true was the Mirror 'held up to nature,' and so intense was the interest carried with it, that the ladies could not refrain mingling their tears of sympathy with those of 'Poor Romeo.' Mrs. Barrett's Juliet cannot be too highly spoken of. Paris was poorly done by Mr. Still. This gentleman's buffoonery is indeed sickening. The only character we think he could play to advantage is Fusos in Bombastes Furioso where he can have the full liberty of his legs and arms.

In the comic line Master Burke has sustained the characters of Barney Brallaghan and Lingo. The former is a most admirable Burletta full of Irish wakes and Barney is the life of them all. Lingo was portrayed to the life—it never was placed in more able hands. Master Burke commenced his Theatrical career in this character at Dublin in 1824.

We were sorry Miss Eberle did not see the gross impropriety of the following line.

'Always makes me angry sometimes.' E.

Erratum.—In our last, 9th line from top, for Buckingham, read Richmond.

FOREIGN.—By the last arrival from Europe it appears that the boundary question, referred to the King of the Netherlands, is settled. We have no particulars. In England the agricultural districts are in the greatest state of alarm and disquietude. Some execution of rioters have taken place. The disturbed state of Ireland on the subject of the repeal of the Union, and the distress among the poor of that country, seem to engross a large share of public attention.

O'Connel is proceeding to the utmost extremities without overstepping the line of demarcation between law and rebellion. The Lord Lieutenant has issued proclamations, and O'Connel has done the like.

FORT DELAWARE.—All the combustible of this Fort has recently been consumed by fire, said to have been caused by a stovepipe, passing through the roof of Lt. Tuttle's quarters. It is added that the quarters of the soldiers and officers, except those of the commander and the engineers, with much cloathing, provision, and furniture, have been destroyed; and that the work is now but the skeleton of a fortification. The public loss is estimated at one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Some kegs of powder exploded, and the report was heard at Chester.

GRAND LODGE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

NOTICE is hereby given that a Quarterly Communication of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts will be held at the Masonic Hall, Boston, on WEDNESDAY the 9th, day of March, next, at 7 o'clock, P. M. for the transaction of such business as may regularly come before it.

The Officers and members of the Grand Lodge, Masters, Wardens and Proxies of Lodges, with all others concerned, will take due notice and govern themselves accordingly.

THE WREATH.

TO THE AMERICAN SNOW BIRD.

The snow bird of America is remarked among ornithologists for the obscurity which hangs round its history. On the first approach of winter, it suddenly makes its appearance at the farm houses apparently driven by the inclemency of the weather, to court the society of man. Whence it comes no one can tell, and whither it goes, (for its exit is as sudden as its entrance,) no one has yet been able to discover. It is supposed by some, to be, in reality, another bird, only that its plumage, by some mysterious and irresistible power had been suddenly and entirely changed. It delights to hover near hay ricks, feeding on the wheat which they contain; while, in very bleak weather, when the ground is clad in universal snow, and the air is piercing cold, it may be easily attracted to the parlour window, by throwing forth a few crumbs—the desolation of its lot causing it to forget its natural fear of man. There is a feeling of melancholy passes across the mind, when the bleak and dreary landscape, deserted by all other tenants of the air, is only enlivened by the presence of the mournful Snow-Bird. Yet even in the bitterest weather, he is always gay and lively and the desolation of the scenery around him has no saddening effect upon his cheerful heart.

From distant climes which none can tell,
In dress of bright and changeful hue,
I greet the bird below'd so well,
When childhood's hours around me flew.

Sure though the northern storms may spend
Their fury over field and tree,
Their blasts are welcome, if they send
So gay a visitant as thee.

I care not that the laughing spring
Its blue bird messenger may own,
If winter be but sure to bring
The Snow Bird I have always known.

How oft, in childhood's rainbow hours,
I've watch'd thee at the parlour pane,
Hiding thee from the ruthless showers,
Till vernal airs shall breathe again!

Oh! how my youthful eyes would strain:
Pursuing in thy wayward track!
How oft I've spread the attractive grain,
To bring thy wandering pinions back!

Yes, gentle bird! I mind the time
Thou'st sported round my window seat,
(Thoughtless of evil, as of crime,)
Pleased, it would seem, my face to greet.

And feeding with confiding stay,
On the crumbs I threw to thee;—
'Twas base, 'twere cruel, to betray
A bird that ne'er had injured me.

There breathes an everlasting Power,
Unknown, but felt—unseen but heard,
He clothes each tree, he tints each flower;
His arm protects my darling bird.

Let winter come with stormy voice;
Let snow wreaths crown the highest hill;
He bids thee in the storm rejoice,
He sees, protects, and feeds thee still.

MISCELLANEOUS.

[From the New Haven Herald.]

Time hath, my lord, a wallet at his back,
Wherein he puts alms for oblivion. Shak.

The other day, I was sitting all alone in my chamber,—no matter where,—gazing with a most meaning intensity upon my brisk, blazing fire, and occasionally replenishing it with a hickory stick, whenever the chills of old Zero began to remind me how respectable a portion of space was occupied by the entity of my ears;—the snow was beating furiously upon my windows, and the winds were moaning so piteously, that, had they been anything else but winds, I verily believe I should in mercy have bid them come in;—when suddenly the idea popped into my head, that it was folly to live in a snow storm, when I might just as well be living over the halcyon days of boyhood: so, catching old time by the forelock, I forthwith commenced ruminating over the contents of his wallet: and what do you think I found?

The old rascal had recorded upon his minutes the history of my whole life! Not a single event had escaped his notice; and as I took up the separate files, which contained the incidents of each year, I found them severally numbered, sealed and labelled 'For Oblivion.' Good! thought I, as I run over the naughty shines and tricks I had played off in my early days. 'Not quite so good, sir,' said time—'eternity keeps another record.'—Aha! well, says I, then we will just renew one of these events, at least, to a temporary restoration; and you must beg alms somewhere else for your old friend oblivion.

It appears from Time's musty record, that I was ten years ago standing tip toe in a country school house, with both thumbs tied to a nail as high as I could reach, and atoning as fast as possible for the crime of having been an accessory in the act of inserting pins into the master's chair bottom, by way of quickening his understanding. We had a Colleger for a master that winter, whom I have learnt to call pedagogue, since I have been to college myself. We used to think him a prodigy. How his thundering dictionary words made us stare! One would have thought us young statues whenever he deigned to address us.

There was a tall, brawny fellow at the same school, whom we called 'Tommy.' He was not lacking in common sense, by any means, but was, without exception, the dullest scholar and greenest fellow I ever saw.

The severest efforts of all his masters had not been able to push him through his A. B. C. Our pedagogue had commenced the Herculean task fully confident of success. He had coaxed, and flattered, and fretted, and scolded to no purpose, till the morning on which I was found pulling hemp, standing tip-toe; and on which the following dialogue took place, which I give verbatim et literatim.

Ped. Come here Tommy. Have you learnt your letters yet?

Tom. I guess I have, you.

Ped. Let's see—what's that?

Tom. Well, I don't know.

Ped. A.

Tom. A

Ped. Do you know the next?

Tom. Well, I guess I do.

Ped. Well, what is it?

Tom. Less me think.

Ped. B.

Tom. By gorry—that B?

Ped. The next?

Tom. Gosh, gum—is that next?

Ped. C.

Tom. I want to know, tho'—that an't C?

Ped. Get under the table, you idle dog, I'll learn you to be impudent.

Here Tommy running under the table, plants himself in the attitude of a dog, and looking about very complacently upon the school, waiting for further orders. The next class is ordered down upon the floor to spell. While they are coming down, a stranger raps at the door; whereupon Tommy, running out on all fours to the door, lets fly, like a good fellow, 'bow, wow, wow, bow, wow!'—very much to the annoyance of the pedagogue.

Tommy, seeing him in pursuit of him, with his ruler in his hand, skulks about so successfully among the scholars,—who were convulsed with laughter, and very ready to shield him in his bow, wow-ing,—that it was some time before he could catch him. However, he caught him at last, and began to ply his rule to Tommy's judgment seat so smartly, that he forthwith changed his tune to 'Cui-i, chi-i, ki-i, ki-i,' to the increased sport of the school and still greater indignation of the master.

If the hemp cord about my thumbs had been tied about my neck, and I had been standing upon a gibbet, I verily believe I should not have laughed less. Suffice it to say, the stranger was at last let in, and I cut down from my punishment. But poor Tommy, after school, paid dear for his wag-gery. That Tommy is now a thriving farmer;—that pedagogue, a dissipated lawyer; and I am your humble servant. 'By gorry,' and who are you? V.

TO MOSES THACHER,

Member of the Senate of Massachusetts, Ex-Minister of the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham, Present Minister of the Church in North Wrentham, Member of the late Antimasonic State Convention of Massachusetts, Member of the late National Antimasonic Convention, Seceding Mission, Antimasonic Lecturer, and Editor of the Antimasonic Boston Telegraph.

LETTER VI.

SIR:

Whether it betrays want of taste or want of judgment, to have addressed you somewhat elaborately, I pretend not to determine; but I confess that I have some misgivings, lest I expend myself on an object too worthless for grave rebuke, especially as others of better taste and more mature judgment might entertain a doubt on this subject. Understand me, sir; the doubt is whether the subject be not unworthy of such particular notice, and not as to the manner in which it should be noticed.—There is little credit gained in attacking a degraded, falling man: there is no merit in using harsh, vituperative language while making the attack. I will now, sir, disclose to you one secret, without exacting any promise or engagement from you; a secret which, while it explains my motives, is a full justification of the course I have taken. I have a strong inclination, a particular fondness, to adduce from your own lips and writings the authorities by which I justify myself. If there is any supposed severity or rudeness in my manner or phraseology, I would name, for my justification, your 'Address on Masonic oaths and penalties,' without giving, as a reference, M. THACHER opera ecclesiastica, politica et literata, omnia. I have, sir, I admit, some reluctance to acknowledge that you have ever given any example that I might be disposed to follow. But if it be ever proper to 'suit the action to the word,' or language to the man, some degree of latitude may be admissible, in the use of harsh phraseology, to foil an assailant with his own weapons. And, now, sir, you have my secret, why I have approximated to the level of your own rude, vituperative language. In order to show that you have used rude, vituperative language, sufficient for my justification, I will here select two sentences from that 'Address on Masonic oaths and penalties.'

'Let a gang of freebooters be disposed to combine for the purpose of rapine, forgery, arson, or any other purpose, which comes within the jurisdiction of knaves and rogues; and what can be better fitted for the constitution of their club, than the oath of the Masters, or Royal Arch degree?' p. 27

'Common sense must teach, that honest men have no need of such obligations, but that they are exactly fitted for a covert of rogues and villains.' Ib.

Here, sir, is your own language. And if any language can justify the use of a severe, unvarnished, undisguised return, I consider the author of such bitter, wholesale abuse justly entitled to all the return that truth and honest indignation can award him. 'Freebooter,' 'rapine,' 'forgery,' 'arson,' 'knaves,' 'rogues,' 'villains'!!! Are these, sir, your chosen figures of speech? Did your morbid imagination present to you this array of foul and unnatural offences? Did your gentlemanly predilections lead to this enumeration of abusive, ignominious epithets? Or were they the poetic embellishments of your 'Address' to stir up the excited passions of your audience? You, sir, a minister of the Prince of Peace? You a follower of the Savior, who declared 'Blessed are the peace-makers: for they shall be called the children of God'? Whatever severity of language has been used toward you, even I have not called you freebooter, knave, rogue or villain.—That severity which consists in rudeness, and in abusive epithets, is suited neither to my taste nor my inclination; and for whatever of that character you may discover in my letters, it is a departure from my private wishes, in order to accommodate my language to your apprehension and choice.

First of all, I am desirous of satisfying my own sense of propriety; next I would satisfy the requirements of a moral and intelligent community; and, keeping within these bounds, I would measure out to you full and ample justice. Although disposed to deal in laconic and significant language, I will call you neither freebooter, knave, rogue nor villain; but I will give such characteristic 'illustrations' of distinguishing qualities, and point out such characteristic 'lights,' and such shadows too, as may be at my poor command, to aid the spectators of the antimasonic drama to appreciate your versatility in the disguises and changes of your antimasonic characters. Keep in mind, sir, the recollection that you are the assailing party. You waged the war; you gave the battle; and if the contest is carried into your own territories, remember that self-defence sometimes requires that an enemy be crippled within his own borders. After stating these preliminaries, and making these explanations, I trust that even you will not accuse me of taking unwarrantable liberties with your very public name.

And now, sir, I imagine that enough has been stated to remove any doubt as to the fitness of addressing you; and of performing the duty in language of plain and unadorned simplicity. I mean not only that simplicity of diction unaided by polished periods or academic graces; but that simplicity which a plain man uses when he would reprove a practiced offender against the most valuable duties of social life. Besides, there is a peculiar fitness in addressing you without much circumlocution, from the consideration that you owe to antimasonry a triple relation, excelling all others in the boldness of your schemes, the magnitude of your services, and the extent of your success.—There is no other man living who boasts the preeminence of antimasonic Senator, antimasonic editor, and antimasonic minister. Either relation might satisfy the ambition of an ordinary man; and either relation, from the devotedness you have evinced to meet the high expectations of the masters of your political destiny, has been sustained to the full requirements of your political employers.

I have little to say to you, as an antimasonic Senator, having in all proper humility, paid my passing tribute of respect to your official honors. But in rendering you all possible justice, by enumerating your causes for self-congratulation, I would gather up each circumstantial and particular reason you have to connect the past and the present: the recollections of what you might have been, and what you now are. Your own consciousness presents these recollections; but you should know that others fully understand what you so keenly feel. That the unqualified and unbounded praises of your antimasonic followers and satellites should prove too much for your unpractised hopes and humble expectations, that they should intoxicate your vanity and lead your delighted fancy to revel in dreams of political honors, is no matter of surprise. You was a man; and the frailties of man beset you. You was a vain man; and your weakness was flattered by the temptation. Put the rude voices that saluted your ears, in the assemblies of your antimasonic partisans, no longer reach you in your elevated station. What grateful substitute now comes soothingly upon your senses?—Does popular gratitude repay your services? Do the approving countenances of the Patres Conscripti redeem you from the withering consciousness of contempt? Sir, no one would envy you your honors, if he were compelled to take with them your conscience. Your elevation cannot be to you a very honorable distinction, when you are compelled to feel that it is but a mark for 'scorn to point his slow unmoving finger at.' Your reflections cannot, in public nor in private, be exceedingly flattering, when you experience so sensibly, in your own person, that 'the post of honor is a private station.'

Of your qualities as an antimasonic editor I confess myself less qualified to speak. The circle of your operations falls not within the circumference of my movements. There is as wide a difference between the road you tread and the path I would travel, as between that 'broad way that leadeth to destruction,' and the 'narrow way which leadeth unto life.' The demonstration you make of your desire to mingle political antimasonry and religious controversy, and to draw from the bitterness and intolerance of both, a system of persecution against all who entertain an honest difference of opinion, gives you a claim to an illiberal and malignant temper quite as uncommon as your official distinction. And yet, I have not learned that the National or State councils have been greatly aided by your political disquisitions, that morals have received much accession from your profound speculations, or that letters have become indebted to you for your literary researches. Sir, the waters of the purest stream may be discolored and defiled by the veriest dabbler, who, with his utmost efforts never could analyze its clear and limpid properties.—It is one thing to produce effect; it is quite another thing to do good. It is easy to gain the approbation of heated partisans; but it is not so easy to satisfy the demands of an honest conscience, to commend one's self to the gratitude of men and the blessing of God.

With pain and reluctance I speak of you as an Antimasonic minister. No man, sir, can contemplate the objects and duties of the Christian ministry, without feeling how pure should be the life, how disinterestedly kind the affection, how humble the hopes, and how gentle the manners of him who assumes to be 'the messenger of God!'

'I venerate the man whose heart is warm,
Whose hands are pure, whose doctrines and whose life,
Coincident, exhibit lucid proof
That he is honest in the sacred cause.'

The fiery zeal you have evinced, to carry the spirit of unhallowed persecution into 'the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham,' the unbending obstinacy you have discovered, in refusing to submit to the advice of your 'Brethren in the ministry,' and your unusual assumption, in forming 'the Church in North Wrentham'—are sufficient evidences to prove how little you are fitted, in spirit and disposition, to fulfil the duties of a Christian minister. That your inclinations lead you to employments of a less humble and less obscure life, is made palpable by the boldness with which you engage in your political and editorial labors. Either surrender your pretensions to Pastoral avocations, and then surrender yourself to political ambition, or resign the direction of party operations for the work of the ministry. This you may well do for the same reason you give in your 'Preface,' where you say:

'I must believe, that the interests of religion, which are paramount to all other, and the work of the ministry, a work more than sufficient to employ all the time, and all the talents, and all the labor, of men vastly more able than myself, furnish me with a sufficient excuse for considering myself no longer a member of the Masonic Institution.'

Sir, a very slight modification of language may convince you, that the very same reasons will furnish you with 'a sufficient excuse' for withdrawing from the service of antimasonry. But however great might have been your devotion to 'the work of the ministry' formerly, your opinions or your interests must have undergone no inconsiderable change. You now appear to be devoted, with quite as much zeal, to another 'work,' of a character so different, that it is not easy to reconcile the equal claims of the ministry and of antimasonry 'to employ all the time, and all the talents, and all the labor' of one who knows so well how to make 'a sufficient excuse' for withdrawing from either, and who feels so little compunction at his rapid changes. Even the novelty of Senatorial honors no longer charm you from Editorial engagements; nor do the severe duties of Editorial labors prevent their becoming subsidiary to Editorial purposes. But there is novelty to the eye of a spectator, when he perceives that the grave deliberations of the Senate of Massachusetts do not interrupt the glowing contemplations of antimasonry. There is novelty to the observer, who sees the Senate Chamber transformed into an Editorial garret; who witnesses the public benefit of Editorial lucubrations inspired under the patronage of the public purse. How vastly 'paramount to all others' must be that antimasonic 'work' which is 'sufficient to employ all the time, and all the talents, and all the labor' of a Christian minister!

I have touched lightly on your variety of public services; but I call you no opprobrious names. I have awarded to you the merit of following up, with all suitable zeal, the requirements of your several honorable offices, as antimasonic Senator, antimasonic Editor, and antimasonic Minister. But I now claim in return some merit of forbearance, inasmuch as I have called you neither freebooter, knave, rogue nor villain.

I am, Sir, yours

FENELON.

MODERN PERSECUTION.

We will put down Masonry by the sword, if we cannot put it down without.—JACOB HALL.

NO. IX.

CONCLUSION.

It is said, and we probably ought to concede, that the prudence and moderation of Masons have elicited the commendation of intelligent and liberal men who are not Masons. But it has also caused weak and ignorant antimasons, who are governed by passions and sudden impulses, to suppose that Masons have no defence. And it has also caused unprincipled disorganizers, the leaders of the faction, to take encouragement in prosecuting the measures of antimasons, and in persecuting Masons. It is capable of proof that worthy and respectable members of the Masonic Institution, gray headed men too, have had their feelings grossly outraged, and their rights invaded, by scandalous and taunting reproaches in streets and highways merely because they were Masons.

There is one individual, particularly, whose bold insolence, in this respect, has led to the supposition that he is the hired blusterer of the party. His time, it would seem, has been almost exclusively devoted to the low, unmannerly and indecent business of insulting those he supposed to be Masons. His description—but I forbear to describe the creature. This man and two others, one the gentlemen who figured so prominently in the infamous 'A. B. C.' affair, and the other the gentleman who figured so prominently in the infamous 'Anderton' affair, are the same who were sometime since observed to be lurking about the Masonic Hall, in the Old State House, at a late hour, three successive nights. The first of these three appointed pimps stationed himself in the entry, thrusting his cadaverous face under the hats of those that passed. The two assistants were at hand to render medical aid. These wise evesdroppers never could tell how the Freemasons left the Hall; whether walking or flying. They were compelled to inquire of the watchmen, whether the Masons had 'broke up'!

It is believed that there is no association of men, except antimasons, who would resort to such low, ungentlemanly acts. But impudence and evesdropping are very little matters in their catalogue of indecencies. It is only the Freemasons! Nothing more! It is settled that they are not entitled to the immunities and privileges of other men. No, no. Grant that, and antimasons would be obliged to conduct as gentlemen. They would be obliged to regard truth and decency. When the Ethiopian changes his skin and the Leopard his spots, then, and not till then, will they be able to assume the qualities of gentlemen.

It was sometime a mystery why a little knot of obscure and unprincipled men should follow up their base persecution with such pertinacity. But the secret was fully developed at Faneuil Hall on the 26th May, 1830, when that little faction had the impudence to invite a public discussion of the question: 'Can any man under the influence of Masonic oaths, discharge with fidelity the duties of any important office in the gift of the people, according to the true nature of our Free Institutions?' In other words, the people were gravely called upon in Faneuil Hall to determine that every Mason ought to be turned out of office, and that the patriotic antimasons ought to supply their places. This bold attempt to disfranchise a portion of the community was not altogether agreeable to the inhabitants of Boston; and the question was settled to the very great dissatisfaction of the plotters and contrivers of the plan.—From what has been done, no one should be surprised at any impudent, disgraceful measures which those gentry should put in operation. When they shall perpetrate a decent and manly act, the novelty of the thing may then afford a sufficient reason for surprise. VERITAS.

ANTIMASONRY, AND ITS PRESS.

Mr. Southwick, in the National Observer, thus exposes the conduct of the leading antimasons in this state, and the means resorted to for the establishment of their organ in this city:—[Albany Argus.]

'Towards the close of the year, the cloven foot of intrigue and corruption began to show itself, on the part of some of the leaders of the party, and the banner of private, secret and malignant hostility, towards us was unfurled. The canting cry of carping hypocrites, was raised, and individuals, who are as destitute of private worth, private honesty and political independence, patriotism and sincerity, as they are of moral and intellectual qualifications, meanly spread in secret, their dastardly and cowardly insinuations. Chancy Webster, and Benjamin F. Hoffman, kind, charitable, and religious souls, became the saviours of antimasonry. 'Another paper must be established at the seat of government. Mr. Southwick was too independent for an editor. Mr. S. has influence.' 'Somebody else must be obtained' who would serve their turn, and conform in all respects to their dictation. But how was Mr. Southwick to be got rid of? Where and on what conditions, was he to be disposed of. Why, Somebody is written to in the western part of the state, by Mr. Chauncey Webster, honest charitable creature, and the answer comes back, that if Mr. Southwick will remove from the shade of the tree of honesty, and independence, to make room for the rank foul and profligate Weed of intrigue and corruption to be planted in its kindred soil of Clay, he should receive for his base, and unmanly desertion, the enormous sum of fifteen hundred dollars!!

'In the annals of political profligacy, intrigue and machination, was there ever so base and foul a piece of bare faced impudence and outrageous villany as this? Here singly and alone, we had planted our standard and raised the war cry of opposition, against an institution, preserved by blood and perjury. Here, where for more than thirty years we had fought the battles of Democracy and Republicanism, (those much abused and insulted names,) was an offer made to bribe us to leave the place, where we have grown up, and which is hallowed to us by the tenderest and dearest feelings and emotions. We were to turn our backs upon the friends of our youth, upon the companions of our age, upon the grave of our relatives—and forsaking every tie that binds man to the earth and to society, pocket our Fifteen Hundred Dollars and decamp to some obscure village in Pennsylvania, there we suppose to lead a recreant life, and to leave a degraded name behind us. And this too, at the beck of Mr. Chauncey Webster and other individuals, who would pervert the pure and holy flame of genuine antimasonry from its pristine purposes, and convert it into a light, black and smoky as that of the infernal regions.

'It is needless to say, that this heartless, heedless, callous, offer and darkly, desperate, designing and intriguing men, was indignantly and contemptuously refused.

'The National Observer came from the hands of B. D. Packard, & Co. without a stain upon its name; and we are determined to continue our course, guided alone by a firm and sincere attachment to the principles of pure antimasonry, uninfluenced either directly or indirectly by National Republicanism, Clayism or any other of the numerous name under which Masonry might seek, (for it is capable of anything.)

'Owing to the assistance of two friends, whose names are as bright, in the annals of republicanism, purity and honesty, as they are distinguished for inflexibility of purpose, for an ardent and disinterested attachment to antimasonry, and to whom the cause owes everything, but have received nothing, save proscription, persecution and abuse, we are unable to start this establishment under its present proprietor.

'In the mean time, Weed had made a journey to Washington, and returned, as we suppose, as the accredited and authorized agents of National Republicans, and the Alb. Evening Journal was started with a capital of $4000 or 5000, by the same who so generously offered 1500 to sacrifice ourselves and antimasonry, and to retire to Pennsylvania, or to go into some country village in this state; where we should be prevented from watching with an eagle eye, the intrigues that were to be carried on in the Capital of the state.

'The moment that paper started, its proprietors spared neither means nor efforts to stop the circulation of this paper, to destroy what little influence it might possess, and to blast the prospects of its editor, by making every exertion in their power. Agents were sent out to procure subscription for the Evening Journal, charged with instructions to spare no pains to inflict injury and outrage where kindness and friendship ought to have been shown! the editor of this paper was represented by those agents, or by one of them, as a 'crazy fanatic,' 'as a man so taken up with religion, that he was rendered incompetent to act as editor of a newspaper.' 'That his paper had stopped, and if it had not, it would stop shortly.' 'And that people who had paid their money for it in advance would lose it.'

'Against these private and flagitious injuries, this rascally base and infamous conduct, which no being laying the smallest claim to the name of a man, or pretending to be even the shadow of a gentleman, or a man of honor, we have borne up and struggled, and so far we believe done our duty to antimasonry faithfully, and manfully.

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SIGHT.

Cheselden, the celebrated surgeon and oculist, gives some very curious particulars respecting a boy, who was couched by him in his thirteenth year, his narrative is the more interesting, as it seems to determine the question so long and so hotly contested by philosophers, whether a person blind from his birth, upon being made to see, could, by sight alone, distinguish a cube from a globe? Most persons would probably, answer in the affirmative, notwithstanding the many theoretical arguments which might be brought against it; at least until they have such facts as the operation of couching discloses, which are of too stubborn a nature to be easily evaded.

It is previously remarked by Cheselden, that though we speak of persons afflicted with cataracts, as blind, yet they are never so blind from that cause, but they can distinguish day from night; and for the most part, in a strong light, distinguish black, white, scarlet and other glaring colours; but they cannot distinguish the shape of any thing. And he gives the following reason for his remarks. The light being let in through the matter of cataract, which disposes and refracts the rays; these do not, as they ought, converge to a focus on the retina or black part of the eye, so as to form a picture of the objects there; the person affected is, consequently, in the same state as a man of sound sight looking through a thin jelly. Hence, the shape of an object cannot at all be discerned, though the color may. And this was the case with the boy couched by the operator. Before couching, he could distinguish colors in a strong light, but afterwards, the faint ideas he had previously acquired of them, were not sufficient for him to recollect them by, and he did not know them to be the same that he had seen dimly, when he was enabled to see them perfectly. Scarlet, he now thought to be the most beautiful, and of others, the gayest were the most pleasing. Black, the first time he saw it, perfectly, gave him great uneasiness, but after a little time, he became more reconciled to it; he, however, always associated some unpleasant idea with it, being struck with great horror at the sight of a negro woman, whom he met some months afterwards.

When he first saw, he was so far from making any right judgment about distance, that all thought all objects whatever touched his eyes, (so he expressed it) as what he felt did his skin. He thought no objects so agreeable as those which were smooth and regular, though he could form no judgment of their shape, nor guess what it was in any object that pleased him. He did not know any one thing from another, however different in shape or size; but on being told what things those where whose form he knew before from feeling, he would carefully observe, that he might know them again. Having often forgot which was the cat and which was the dog, he was ashamed to ask, but catching the cat, (which he knew by feeling) he looked at her steadfastly, and then putting her down, 'So pass,' said he, 'I shall know you another time.' He was very much surprised that those things that he had liked best when blind, did not appear most agreeable to his eyes, expecting those persons whom he loved most would appear most beautiful, and such things most agreeable to sight, were so to his taste. His friends at first thought he even knew what pictures represented, but found afterwards they were mistaken; for about two months after he was couched, he discovered that they represented solid bodies, at first taking them for party-coloured planes or surfaces diversified with a variety of paint; but even then, he was surprised that the pictures did not feel like the things they represented, and was amazed when he found that those parts of pictures which, by their light and shade appeared prominent, and uneven to his sight, felt equally flat with the rest. On this latter occasion he pertinently inquired, which was the lying sense, feeling or seeing.

er's watch, he acknowledged the likeness, but was very much astonished; asked how it could be that a large face could be compressed in so little room, and saying it should have seemed as impossible to him as to put a bushel of any thing into a pint.

At first he could bear but very little light, and the things he saw he thought extremely large: but upon seeing things larger, those first seen he conceived to be less than they had appeared before, never being able to imagine any figures or lines beyond the bounds he saw; the room he was in he said he knew to be part of the house, yet he could not conceive that the whole house could look bigger. Before he was couched he expected but little advantage from seeing worth undergoing an operation for, except reading and writing; for he said he thought that he could have no more pleasure in walking abroad than he had in the garden at present, which he could do safely and readily. And even blindness, he said, had this advantage, that he could go any where in the dark much better than those who could see. After he was enabled to see he did not lose this faculty, nor desire a light to go about the house in darkness. He said that every new thing was a new delight, and the pleasure was so great, that he wanted words to express it; but his gratitude to the operator was extreme, never seeing him for some time without shedding tears; and if he did not happen to come at the time he was expected, the boy would not forbear crying at his disappointment. A year after his first seeing, being carried to Epsom Downs, he was exceedingly delighted with the largeness of the prospect, and called it a new kind of seeing. He was afterwards couched of the other eye, and found that the objects appeared large to this eye, but not so large as they did at first to the other, looking upon the same object with both eyes, he thought it appeared about twice as large as to the first couched eye only; but it did not appear double.

Mr. Cheselden performed the operation of couching on several persons, who gave nearly the same account of their learning to see as the preceding. They all had this curious defect after couching, in common, that never having had occasion to move their eyes, they knew not how to do it, and at first could not direct themselves to any particular object but had to move the whole head, till by slow degrees they acquired the faculty of shifting the eyeballs in their sockets.

Several philosophical inferences may be deduced from the above cited experiment. First it is evident that the eye is not a judge of direct, though it may be of transverse distance, i. e. that it cannot estimate the distance of two trees, for example, nearly in a line with itself, though it may, if they are at equal length from it, but not in the same line with it. Hence, when we look at a chair standing against the wall of our chamber, we really do not see that the fore legs stand out upon the carpet; we see both them and all parts of the chair painted as it were, (projected is the philosophical word,) on the wall. It is only by having felt that they do stand out from the wall, that we judge them so to do, when we merely see them exhibiting the same appearances that they had when we felt them before.

Secondly, as it appears that the boy could not tell a cat from a dog until he had felt them, it is plain that neither could he tell a cube from a globe. It is to be observed, however, that although at first, all distinctions of shape were unperceived, yet experience would shortly have taught him to distinguish by sight alone a cat from a dog, a cube from a globe.

Thirdly, the above mentioned experiment appears to suggest a doubt of the truth of that philosophical distinction which has usually been put between reason and instinct. If it is by an exertion of judgment, that a man coming into a room where there is a real chair, and one ill painted on the wall, sit down, will upon the former and neglect the latter, it is certainly by an exertion of a similar faculty, that a cat coming into a room where there is a real mouse and an ill painted one, will spring upon the former and neglect the latter. And from the same principle it is, that the man will attempt sitting down upon a well painted chair, and a cat will attempt catching a well painted mouse; neither discovering their error till they see the defects of the painting, or feel the delusive objects, and thus correcting the mistake of their judgment acting upon the information of sight alone. For it is to be remembered that, in this case, it is not their sight that deceives them, but their judgment; sight informs them that certain colors, lights, and shades appear before them, and its information is truth—whilst judgment tells them that these colors, lights and shades indicate a massy substance, (viz. a chair or mouse) which is false. From this it would appear, that instinct has no more to do with a cat mouse-catching, than with a man hare-hunting; and similar considerations may perhaps teach us, that brute animals approach much nearer to us in faculties, than philosophers are willing to allow.

Lastly it may be inferred, that the staring and vacant expressions of the countenance which is to be seen in children and idiots, proceeds rather from an inability to move their own eyes, than from a want of thought at the time. For the motion of his eyes is consequent upon an act of his will so to move them, and he can have no will to move them from the object at which he first looks, because he knows as yet of no other object existing, and could therefore have no motive to excite his will to action.

There are many other inferences which might be drawn from this curious experiment, but I will leave them to the reader's own sagacity and fancy.

MECHANICAL POWER OF COALS.

It is well known to modern engineers, that there is virtue in a bushel of coals, properly consumed, to raise seventy millions of pound weights a foot high. This is actually the average effect of an engine at this moment working in Cornwall. The ascent of Mount Blanc from the valley of Chamouni is considered, and with justice, as the most toilsome feat that a strong man can execute in two days.—The combustion of two pounds of coal would place him on the summit. Merai Bridge, one of the most stupendous works of art that has been raised by a man in modern ages, consists in a mass of iron, not less than four millions of pounds in weight, suspended from a medium height of about 120 feet above the sea. The consumption of seven bushels of coal would suffice to raise it to the place where it hangs. The great pyramid of Egypt is composed of granite. It is 700 feet in the side of its base, and 500 in perpendicular height, and stands on eleven acres of ground. Its weight is, therefore, 12,760 millions of pounds, at the medium height of 125 feet, consequently it would be raised by the effort of about 630 chaldrons of coal, a quantity consumed in some of the foundries in a week. The annual consumption of coal in London is estimated 1,500,000 chaldrons. The effort of this quantity would suffice to raise a cubical block of Marble, 2200 feet in the side, through a space equal to its own height, or to pile one such mountain upon another. The Monte Nuovo, near Pozzuoli, (which was erupted in a single night by a volcanic fire, might have been raised by such an effort from a depth of 40,000 feet, or about eight miles.

It has been proposed by a French author, Mr. Violet, to increase the durability of roof-slates, by baking them in a kiln until they acquire a pale red colour. He affirms, that by this means they acquire such strength as to last twice the time that they otherwise would, while the expense is so trifling as not to be worthy consideration.

They do not become by this baking so brittle as to be any more liable to break than before; but their hardness is increased; and as they can no longer be cut, or have holes made in them by the point of the hammer, it is necessary that they should be properly sized and pierced before they are subjected to the kiln.

[From the Tolland Advocate.]

ANTIMASONIC CONSISTENCY!

The Antimasonic Convention which met at Hartford on the 15th of December last, passed a resolution to the following effect—

Resolved, That we will support no man for office who is a Mason or friendly to Masonry!

The above resolution breathes a spirit which cannot find its equal in the annals of any political assembly that ever congregated in the U. S. If it is not the very proscription against which that party pretends to war, we are not capable of understanding the language of our country.

They complain of Masonry, because, as they say, Masons are bound by their oaths, to support each other for public office, in preference to those who are not members of the fraternity. Admitting this to be true (of which we have no proof worthy of credit) this antimasonic convention openly declared their adherence to the very principles which they so earnestly condemn in their opponents. This is upon a par with their consistency in other matters—for their is not a single point for which they condemn Masonry of which they are not themselves guilty in a superlative degree. They profess that they are opposed to secret societies—and yet their meetings are often appointed and held with the utmost secrecy—the cabalistic congregations of humiliated demagogues. They prefer against the institution the most groundless charges, which are not supported by a particle of evidence which would be received in the most partial court of justice in our country.

The origin of antimasonry is sufficient to condemn it in the unprejudiced mind of every republican. The haughty Ferdinand of Spain, the greatest despot of the age, has the credit of first raising this unholy and wicked excitement. He proscribed and disfranchised Masons—confiscated their property, and forced many of them to fly to this country, so renowned for freedom, for that liberty of conscience which was denied them under the despotic government of their native land.

It cannot but be known that the pretended abduction and murder of William Morgan first started the contention which now agitates this country. It is not our purpose to discuss the truth or falsity of the statement. Admit that Morgan was murdered—and that by Masons—because a few were guilty of sacrificing him for supposed crime, it argues not that the whole fraternity should suffer for their guilt. The supposition that it was by the order or at the instigation of the society of Masons, is as false as the Koran and as improbable as the grossest fiction of the times. Are the members of a church severally responsible for each others conduct? Calvin murdered Servetus—must the whole sect of Calvinists answer for the crime? Dr. Dodd was convicted of perjury—was his fault justly chargeable upon the whole body of the English clergy? Arnold was a traitor to the cause of his country—was Washington a party to the measure, and a participator in his guilt? The two Grays were hung for murder—they were antimasons—but who ever thought of charging the whole antimasonic party with their guilt? Away with such doctrine! The mind of man must be depraved indeed, if such principles are to be fostered, and such tenets supported. What society is there upon earth, into which some insidious villain has not crept, who uses the uprightness of his associates, as a garb to cover his own deformity? We need not go far for such instances, for every day's observation demonstrates the truth of the statement.

The time has been when moral and literary institutions were themes of praise—when integrity, virtue and the love of truth, were passports to public favor; but if we live up to the doctrines of antimasonry, this period has passed away—and the perjured recreant and arch apostate, are to be regarded as the true servants of God.

To prove that the testimony of a seceding Mason, is but evidence against himself, it is only necessary to view him in his true light. Does the excommunicated reviler of religion, and the foul-mouthed slanderer of the holy church he has denounced, receive the confidence of Community. Is he entitled to credit? Would an impartial man be willing to judge his former associates by such testimony? No! The slanderer but hates the excellence he cannot equal! Thus it is with seceding Masons—they entered the lodges at their own request—they pledged themselves to preserve its secrets, inviolable—they saw nothing to condemn in the forms or principles of the institution—they sought advancement into its mysteries, and obtained promotion, with increased obligations—no duty was imposed, which was contrary to the laws of God or man—they frequented the lodge, communed with its members, and many of them were the objects of its benevolence. Without any change in the principles of the institution, they now declare themselves the 'perjured violators of their most solemn vows,' and furnish to the world the damning evidence of their own infamy. If corruption was visible in the proceedings of the Lodge, why did not the pure spirits abandon it at once, and not go on step by step, in the broad road to destruction.

If Masonry was the corrupt institution they represent it to be, how could these patriotic souls, just and holy as they claim themselves to be, continue, month after month, and year after year, worshippers at its shrine, and participators in its guilt.

Is it not a disgraceful, ay, a humiliating fact, that, in this very state, famed for its piety, the base doctrines of apostacy and perjury are weekly disseminated, under the guidance of an apostate priest—who tells the world that an oath is not to be regarded, nor a promise kept, any longer than suits the convenience of the maker.

No matter how vile a man is—if 'murder be in his right hand, and the blood of female innocence in his left,' still he is welcome to fight under the blank flag of antiism—the disappointed office-seeker—the fanatic—the bigot—the hypocrite—the infidel and the political priest, alike congregate around it, and unite their destinies in one common effort to introduce anarchy and rebellion in the place of public peace and tranquility. The man who can destroy the fellowship of a church—array brother against brother, and engender revenge, malice and slander, is, according to their doctrines, the benefactor of mankind; and the crime of perjury which, among the more moral part of the community, would subject a man to banishment from society, is a cardinal virtue and constitutes a high claim to the honors of antimasonry.

No matter how exemplary may have been a man's life—if he has been ever so charitable—ever so zealous in the support of moral and religious principles—ever so meek, or ever so forgiving, according to the doctrines of antiism, he merits the execrations of his fellow citizens, if he refuses to commit perjury, and brand his character with infamy. The people of this community are too enlightened, and too generous to sanction such usurpation—their liberty and political institutions cost too much blood and treasure, to be thus relinquished to the first grasp of a vindictive foe. The leaders of that party will soon find themselves buried in infamy, and their misguided followers will discover, that they have lent their aid, not to promote the cause of justice, but to advance the interests of designing and dishonest men, whose only object has been power, and whose only principle, dishonesty.

CHURCH AND STATE.

The leaders of the antimasonic party, to justify themselves in the proscriptive measures which they adopt, say, that those who are Masons, now monopolize all the important offices in the State. Let us see how the fact is. The most important offices in the State are, Governor, Lt. Governor, Treasurer, Secretary, the two Senators, and the six Representatives in Congress. Among these twelve there are only two who are Masons! and ten of them belong to one denomination of Christians, to wit, the CONGREGATIONAL!!

The antimasonic Convention in this State, held at Hartford, in December last, which was got up by the Rev. N. D. Strong, of the Congregational order, made a nomination of Governor, Lt. Governor, Secretary, Treasurer, and six members of Congress, every one of whom belong to the same denomination of Christians, to wit, the Congregational. Among the Anti candidates for these important offices, there is not one Episcopalian! not one Baptist!! not one Methodist!!! They are all monopolized by one sect. This looks like an attempt at least to establish a STANDING ORDER; and as Patrick Henry used to say, has an 'arcful equating, towards a matrimonial union of CHURCH AND STATE.'—[New-Haven Register.]

'Wasp's Letter to a certain Anti-Doctor,' has been received and is under consideration. An interview with the author would be agreeable; it might determine us instantly to publish it; but perhaps, after all, it had better be omitted. The Doctor is too small a pattern, in every sense of the word, to be noticed in this paper—such notice would make him of some consequence. He had therefore better be left undisturbed.

'To wield the pestle, or pound the mortar,
But hunt for fame in another quarter.'

And besides, if left to himself, even in the pursuit of his follies, and in the practice of his vices, he may possibly do him some good in some way or other—

'For nought so vile that on the earth doth live,
But to the earth some special good doth give.'

THE ECQUET.

THE FADED ONE.

Gone to the slumber which may know no waking,
Till the loud requiem of the world shall swell:
Gone! where no sound thy still repose is breaking,
In a lone mansion, through long years to dwell!
Where the sweet gales, that herald bud and blossom
Pour not their music or their fragrant breath,
A seal is set upon thy mouldering bosom—
A bond of loneliness—a spell of death!

Yet, 'twas but yesterday, that all before thee
Shone in the freshness of life's morning hours;
Joy's radiant smile was playing briefly o'er thee,
And thy light feet impressed'd but vernal flowers;
The restless spirit charmed thy sweet existence,
Making all beauteous youth's pleasant maze:
While gladsome hope illum'd the onward distance,
And lit with sunbeams thy expected day.

How have the garlands of thy childhood withered,
And hope's false anthem died upon the air,
Death's cloudy tempests o'er thy way have gather'd,
And his stern bolts have burst in fury there!
On thy pale forehead sleep the shades of even:
Youth's braided wreath lies sprinkled in the dust,
Yet looking upwards in her grief to heaven,
Love should not mourn thee, save in hope and trust

LITERARY.

LIVING WRITERS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

NO. VIII.

James Boaden, Esq. is a modern Boswell, a man who writes admirable reminiscences of his departed lions. Although he has connected himself rather closely with the stage and devoted his time to dramatic literature, he first made his pen subservient to his support in the counting room of a London Banker. He is a native of Whitehaven and came up to town to seek his fortune. In the solitary gloom of the office of Prescott, Grotte & Prescott, he devised other schemes than those of pounds, shillings and pence, and as fortune favored his wishes, he 'sailed as valiantly before the wind,' as his exemplar, Dick the apothecary.—He also contributed to the newspapers, and for a while was a student of the Inner Temple. This habit of writing for the newspapers is a very different thing in England from what we are accustomed to suppose. There, a writer is well paid for his productions, if his circumstances require it, while the greatest and best men of the age, knowing the mighty power of the press, have sought to control its effects within the bounds of virtuous decorum, or sound principle. It would be easy to name a host of British worthies who have been closely connected with the press, and in our own country we are not unacquainted with names equally brilliant, distinguished by some laudable zeal. From the press, Mr. Boaden turned almost exclusively to dramatic composition. In 1792, he wrote a musical piece called the Prisoner, and since that time he has published seven or eight others. All have succeeded in the representation, but not a single one is rated as a stock piece. He took some part in the famous controversy as to the forgery of the Shakspeare MSS. His reputation as a biographer has surpassed that which he gained as a play-writer.

His memoirs of John Kenble and of Mrs. Siddons, are admired works. He has in the press a life of Mrs. Jordan. How popular such a work will prove when the royal lover of that beautiful but unfortunate woman is now a King, and when the numerous offspring of that connection are already allied to the most noble families in England, we cannot say. But we are much mistaken in Mr. Boaden's character, if his work does not teem with complacency, and if his conclusions are not as courtly and as considerate as the most apologetical of his majesty's friends could wish.

John Bowring, the translator of Russian poetry, is next on our list. He is a well educated merchant, and was, for a long time, engaged in business with his father, a woollen manufacturer. In one of his journeys to France, he had the misfortune to be arrested by the French government and thrown into prison on suspicion of being engaged in transactions hostile to the government, but he was released after having behaved with becoming spirit.

He afterwards published a commentary on Jeremy Bentham, and in 1821 his translation from the Russian poets, with the title of 'The Russian Anthology.' He has been made an L. L. D. for his literary merit, an honor which is not conferred in England upon every quack in literature, and is too common in this country of D.D.'s and of L. L. D's. His last effort has been to translate the poetry of the Magyars, which translation appeared after some delay during the last year. He is also a frequent contributor to that admirable periodical, the London Monthly Magazine.

MISCELLANY.

MOTHER OF GENERAL GREENE.

Among the many ladies who distinguished themselves for their patriotism, charity, and other good qualities, in our Revolution, there is one whose name ought not to be forgotten, and who in my opinion, is equal in merit to any that flourished in our country, and they were many at that time. About the commencement of our Revolution, and as soon as it was ascertained that Nathaniel Greene, afterwards Genl. Greene, intended to join our army, in defence of his country, a deputation of Friends, (commonly called Quakers, and to whose society he belonged,) by order of their Meeting, waited on him to endeavor to dissuade him from it, and after listening to all their arguments on the subject, he informed them that he felt an irresistible propensity, not to be got over, for joining his brethren in arms. He thanked them for the interest they had taken in his welfare; but he could not comply with their request. When the deputation took an affectionate leave, and left him, his mother, who had been listening, with all the anxiety of a fond parent, used her best endeavors to prevail on him to stay at home, 'when he told her it was impossible. After a pause, she burst into tears, with this remarkable observation—'Well, Nathaniel, if thee must go, it is possible that I may hear of thy death: and if it is God's will that it shall so happen, I hope I shall not have the mortification to hear of thee being wounded in the back.' Comment is needless—a Spartan mother could not have said more: but Mrs. Greene stands preeminently superior to the mothers of antiquity, as her education was so different—she was bred a Christian.

PRACTICAL MEN. The most important improvements in the arts and sciences have been made, not by the 'regularly educated practical men,' but by persons trained up to other pursuits. The greatest improvements in agriculture have been made by persons bred up in cities. The best laws are made by persons who are not practical lawyers. The same causes will, perhaps, account for the circumstance so frequently observed, that whenever a man of superior mind arises, the last thing benefitted by the exercise of his powers of invention will be the pursuit to which he was 'regularly educated.' Ramage, the optician, who has rendered so important a service to science by the improvement of reflecting telescopes, in which he has obtained equal power in half the size used by Herchell, made no improvements in tanning leather his original occupation. It may be laid down as a general rule, that unless the mind of a practical man has been trained to habits of generalizing beyond the details of his profession, his conclusion as to the effects of any change in his practice is less to be relied upon than that of another man of equal general intelligence, to whose mind the same facts are presented, and who gives them an equal degree of consideration.

Somewho never read the Fathers, are frightened at their very names. How dull, how rough, how insipid, how pedantic do they fancy 'em in their discourses, in their expressions and arguments!—But how would these men wonder at the strangeness of such a notion, if they perused their writings, and found in them a more exact eloquence, a smoother style, a more ingenious, more expressive, and more convincing way of arguing, adorned with greater vigor of expression, and more natural graces, than most of those modern books which are read with applause, and give the greatest reputation to their authors! With what satisfaction, if they had any love for religion, would they see it explained, and its truth believed and asserted, by men who were masters of so much wit and judgment? Especially since any one who will but observe the vastness of their knowledge, the depth of their penetration, the solid principles of their philosophy, their unwearied diligence, their capacity in unfolding holy mysteries, the reasonableness of their inferences, the nobleness of their expressions, the beauty of their sentiments and morals, cannot compare, for example, any author to St. Austin, but Plato or Cicero.

NEWSPAPERS.

There is no book or print so cheap as a newspaper—none so interesting, because it consists of a variety, measured out in suitable proportions, as to time and quantity. Being new every week, or day, it invites to a habit of reading, and affords an easy and agreeable mode of acquiring knowledge so essential to the welfare of the individual, and the community. It causes many an hour to pass away pleasantly and profitably, which would otherwise have been spent in idleness or mischief.—Every public house, especially, should be furnished with a number of these little social friends, which, beside making the house perceptible pleasant, save the cook from being teased with impatient and petulant remarks, and many times cause the traveller to dine or tarry over night, to the profit and pleasure of himself and landlord, when they would otherwise have parted with no very friendly feelings.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, MARCH 5, 1831.

MOSES THACHER.

In the recent exhibition of his antimasonic powers, in the Senate of this State, the honorable gentleman, whose name stands at the head of this paragraph, made, in addition to those we have already noticed, several allegations, general in their character, and false in point of fact. But as they are of themselves of minor consideration, and do not derive any degree of extraneous importance from the character and influence of their author, we shall pass them over with a few cursory and general remarks.

1st. Not one half per cent. of the income of the Masonic Institution, is expended by way of Charity.

There is not a word of truth in this declaration. We have before shown its entire falsity; and do not now consider it of sufficient importance to warrant a recapitulation of the evidence. It is enough for the present purpose to state briefly that, the Masonic Board of Relief in this city, alone, distributed in charity, from the year 1819 to the year 1829, the sum of six thousand, five hundred and sixty dollars. This sum was distributed mostly among widows and orphans, and is exclusive of the charities bestowed by the different Masonic bodies in this city when in session. This board meets every Monday for the purpose of receiving applications, and relieving the distresses of all who may need its assistance. The amount annually distributed by the different Masonic bodies in the city, amount to about fifteen hundred dollars. This statement is susceptible of proof. Those who feel an interest in the subject, are referred to the first volume of this paper, (new series,) page 126.

2d. The institution is sanctioned only by two of the European nations.

Masonic Lodges exist in every nation in Europe: in England, Ireland, Scotland, Russia, Germany, Holland, France, Portugal, Spain, Italy, Africa, India;—in fine, in every part of the civilized world. The tyrannical and jealous Autocrat of Russia, the petticoat bigot of Spain, and the profligate usurper of Portugal, are legitimate antimasons. They persecute Masons on the ground of their republicanism! Moses Thacher and his associates persecute them, because they are dangerous to a republican government! We pity the weakness of Ferdinand, while we condemn the wickedness of his counsellors. We hold in utter contempt the principles of Moses Thacher, while we scorn and laugh at the imbecility of his followers.

3d. The origin of the Institution cannot be traced farther back than the 24th June, 1717.

This allegation proves one of two things, viz. either that Moses Thacher is unpardonably ignorant in matters of general history, at all events in Masonic history—or, that he is guilty of wilful and malicious misrepresentation.—We give preference to the latter. It is a subject on which antimasons themselves are not agreed. Some are willing to accede to it an antiquity of five hundred years; some three hundred, and some less. But it matters not whether the Institution be three hundred or three thousand years old. It has existed long enough to test its principles, and to prove that they are consonant with the laws of God and man. We will mention only one fact here, that being sufficient to establish the fallacy of Mr. Thacher's position; and that is all we have a desire to do, at present. Elias Ashmole, a celebrated English philosopher and antiquarian, and founder of the Ashmolean museum at Oxford, (of whom Mr. Thacher may have heard,) has preserved in his collection of antiquities, a Masonic record, written in the time of Edward IV. This record commences:—'that though the ancient records of the brotherhood in England, were many of them destroyed or lost in the wars of the Saxons and Danes,' &c.

4th. The order of Knights Templars originated at Lyons, in France, in an Illuminated Lodge of Masons, about 60 years ago.

In making this allegation, the gentleman further remarked that, there were Knights Templars prior to this period; but that they had no more to do with Masonry than America has with Great Britain! Barruel, a learned and zealous French antimason, has entered into an elaborate argument to prove that the order of Knights Templars was a branch of Freemasonry! We leave the reader to determine which is most likely to be correct, the Abbey Barruel, one of the most learned and eloquent writers of his time, or the Honorable Moses Thacher, Senator from Norfolk. As the subject, however, may not be without interest to many of our readers, we will pursue it a little further. The order of Knights Templars was instituted during the Crusades, in the year 1118, by Hugo de Paganis and Geoffrey of St. Omers. It received this appellation, because its members originally resided near the church in Jerusalem, which was dedicated to our Saviour. Though the professed object of this order was to protect those Christian Pilgrims, whose mistaken piety had led them to the Holy City; yet, says an eminent Scottish historian, it is beyond a doubt that, connected with this, was the intention to practice and preserve the rites and ceremonies of Masonry. We know, at least, that the Knights Templars not only possessed the mysteries, but performed the ceremonies and inculcated the duties of Freemasonry. Their origin has also been attributed to Pope Quellas, and to Baldwin II. Hume says, the order of the Knights Templars arose during the first fervor of the Crusades, and uniting the two qualities, the most popular in that age, devotion and valor, and exercising both in the most popular of all enterprises, the defence of the Holy Land, they made rapid advancement in credit and authority, and acquired from the piety of the faithful, ample possessions in every country in Europe, especially in France. Masheim asserts that the Crusades gave rise to the three orders of Knights Templars, Knights of Malta, and the Teutonic Order, or Knights of St. Mary of Jerusalem.

5th. The gentleman is acquainted with many good men, who are unfortunate enough to be members of the Masonic Institution; men, to whom on almost every other subject, he would look for advice and counsel. He did not denounce the members, but the Institution!

This is a most ridiculous argument. The members are good enough; but the Institution is horrible! What constitutes the Institution? Its members; and if they be 'good,' that must be good also. They are inseparable.—No man can serve two masters. Not even Moses Thacher, with the great versatility of talent that he possesses, can serve the 'Father of Lies' and the 'God of Truth' at one and the same time. He is acquainted with Masons of whom he would take counsel on all subjects but that of Masonry! Are there not Masons who are as well acquainted with that subject as Moses Thacher, who says he was never in a Chapter but once? And cannot they, if they be good men, speak the truth on that subject, as well as on any other?

6th. The gentleman thought the subject (Masonic) had been bandied about in the public papers enough; and his reason for introducing it before that grave and deliberative assembly, was that it might be investigated and permitted to subside.

We have no faith in the sincerity of this declaration.—The gentleman's political existence rests on the continuance of the excitement. He is indebted to that alone for his political honors; for the designation of an 'honorable gentleman.' If he were sincere, why has he not permitted the subject to subside? He has had the investigation he asked for; he and his associates have been heard, and ought to be satisfied. Why has he, by means of Vermont funds, established a paper in this city, for the express purpose of bandying the subject about, and continuing the excitement? There was no sincerity in the man's professions, nor truth in his allegations.

At a regular communication of St. John's Lodge, No. 31, holden at Springfield, Vt. on Tuesday, 22d ult. Horatio G. Hawkins, and Samuel W. Porter, were expelled for unmasonic conduct.

PETITION OF THE GRAND LODGE.

On Wednesday week, Mr. Russell, of Boston, presented the petition of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, praying for an alteration of their act of incorporation, (which now empowers them to hold $60,000 in personal and $20,000 in real estate,) to enable them to hold $40,000 in real and $40,000 in personal estate. Not asking for power to hold an additional amount of property, but merely for a new apportionment, so that they might, as a corporate body, be enabled to hold their new Masonic Hall, without being subjected to any unnecessary inconvenience. The subject was assigned to the judiciary Committee, who reported that the 'petitioners have leave to bring in a bill.' In the afternoon of Saturday, Mr. John D. Williams of Boston, a very learned and eloquent antimasonic counsellor, presented a remonstrance, purporting to be signed by George Odiome, and 174 others, against the petition, which was also committed to the committee on the judiciary. This remonstrance we have no doubt, contains names surreptitiously obtained, or it contains the names of the sons and, perhaps, wives of antimasons; for we are convinced that there are not 174 antimasons in the city of Boston, capable of writing their own names. We shall endeavor to see it,—it must be quite a curiosity, having many striking marks and characters about it;—such a one as would probably be acceptable to Mr. Greenwood of the Museum, as a 'great natural curiosity,' or amphibious monster!

A Mr. French then moved that the report and remonstrance should be printed. He said the country would be heard from in a few days on the subject.

Mr. Newton of Worcester, Mr. Jarvis of Woburn, Mr. Sibley of Sutton, Mr. Sullivan of Boston, and Mr. Shaw of Lanesboro, opposed the motion to print the Remonstrance. It was urged by them generally that the question was whether a corporation, which had power to hold 80,000 dollars in personal and real estate, shall hold 40,000 or 60,000 dollars in personal and the remainder in real estate; that the speculative questions concerning Masonry, of which they knew nothing, had no connexion with that question, and that the Legislature should take warning by a neighboring state, and not rake open the cankers of discord which it was hoped had been covered forever.

It was said that the question involved a principle of importance, and a comparison was drawn between this case and that of a religious society, which might petition for leave to employ funds in one way or another, which it had been empowered to hold. And the question was put, whether it would be the duty of the legislature to print all Essays, in the shape of Remonstrances, which opposing individuals of other sects might choose to send to the House, and whether it would be proper for a Legislative assembly to enter into a discussion of their peculiar tenets upon such an application. The subject of Masonry was said to be purely speculative, and though antimasons and Masons might both be conscientious, it was said to be highly improper to introduce their disputes into the Halls of Legislation. It was hoped that if the contention must be continued it would prevail somewhere else, and that the House would raise their hands at once and forever against any attempt to make it a subject of legislation. The petitioners, it was said, had been found worthy, on a former occasion, to be incorporated with the power to hold a certain amount of funds, and the question was a simple one, whether they should hold them in one form or another.

Mr. French said the subject was important, and he should be prepared at a proper time to present his views.—So that we may soon expect a new edition of Mr. Thacher's philippic.

On motion of Mr. Shaw the question was divided. The report was ordered to be printed, but not the remonstrance; FIVE persons only voting in favor of printing the remonstrance! The legislature however granted the remonstrants leave to print it themselves, if they saw fit, which they will probably do.

MONDAY.

On Monday, a man by the name of French, an obscure individual, whom nobody knows, but who is said by some of the papers to come from Berkshire, and by others from Berkley, presented the following foolishly scandalous, and ridiculously insulting rigmarole, in the shape of an order:

'Ordered, that—be a committee, who are not Freemasons, to examine the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, to ascertain its members—the number of Lodges—the number of persons in those Lodges over whom it claims jurisdiction—the amount of its funds and how collected—the yearly expenses of the Institution, and what sums have been yearly paid for the purposes of charity and benevolence—to examine its by-laws—the nature of obligations, oaths, and penalties, whether the same accord with the constitution and laws of the land—with power to send for persons and papers, examine witnesses, and report thereon!!!—We defy the whole Antimasonic Suffolk Committee, and they are extremely ingenious in such matters, to produce a greater piece of folly than the above; or to furnish anything better calculated to bring their party into contempt with sensible men, or to render them more completely the butt of ridicule with the rabble. Were we an antimason we would have the blockhead who wrote it, placed in a strait-jacket, lest in his folly he might do the party greater harm.

After a few words of discussion, Mr. Rantoul of Beverly, moved the indefinite postponement of the consideration of the order, which motion was sustained, TWO persons, only, voting in the negative! Remonstrances were presented this day, against the petition, by Wm. B. Breed of Lynn, French, of nobody knows where, Rugles of Milton, and Francis Brinley, Esq. of Roxbury; and were laid on the table.

TUESDAY.

Several remonstrances were presented this day, which were ordered to lie on the table. One of them was headed by the notorious Jonathan Buffum of Lynn; the man who figured so conspicuously, with Doctor Abner Phelps of this city, in the A. B. C. plot! than which a more disgraceful or infamous transaction has never occurred in this Commonwealth.

WEDNESDAY.

Several remonstrances were presented this day. The one from Weston we had an opportunity to examine, and found that it contained seventeen names which are also borne on the remonstrance from East Sudbury. It contains likewise, the names of persons who, we are told, are town paupers, and others who are under guardianship! It also bears the name of John B. Dudley—a man who has been in our State Prison for committing forgery! Had we opportunity to examine the remonstrances from other towns, and the means of ascertaining the characters of the remonstrants, we doubt not that they would exhibit equal weight of moral worth. Such are the men who are brought forward by renegade christians and bankrupt politicians, to oppose, by the weight of their moral character and influence, the petition of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts! These are the men who tell us that Masons are too depraved and dishonest to be permitted to enjoy, equally with themselves, the rights and privileges of freemen! Proh superi! quantum mortalia pectora cæca noctis habent! It would not be to us a matter of much astonishment, were a remonstrance presented to-morrow from the convicts in Charlestown Penitentiary: a majority of them are undoubtedly antimasons, i. e. opposed to secret societies; and none will question that they are quite as respectable men as many whose names have already been presented to the legislature.

We are credibly informed that the representation made by persons employed in the business of procuring subscribers to the printed remonstrances of the 'Suffolk Committee,' (for it is a business belonging exclusively to them) is that, the Grand Lodge have petitioned the Legislature for a donation to enable them to complete their new Hall! This infamous and foolish story has been currently circulated by the hiring panders of unprincipled political jugglers of this city, among persons ignorant of the true state of the case. We mention it that the members of the legislature may perceive the dishonorable and vile measures that are resorted to by the enemies of Masonry, to bring the Institution into disrepute, and to cover its members with reproach and ignominy; and not that we regard their effort to defeat the object of the Grand Lodge, as a matter of any consequence. That may excite our contempt, but not our fears nor our apprehensions in regard to the impression it may leave on the minds of the members of the legislature, or in relation to the final result of the measure.

THURSDAY.

A remonstrance from Stoughton was presented this day. It was expected that the petition of the Grand Lodge would have been called up; but the House have been engaged the whole day in the discussion of the valuation bill. It will probably be called up to-morrow, but too late for us to notice in this paper the debate which is expected to ensue.

ANATOMY.—We make the following extract from 'Thoughts on Anatomical Science,' by the late Dr. Godman:—'The penitentiaries and lazar-houses of our country, daily send forth multitudes of dead, who, having seldom or never contributed to the well-being of society during life, should all be made tributary to their fellow creatures after death. Far from storing away these bodies during winter, and heaping them up to taint the freshness of ensuing summer air, they should be devoted to the improvement of medicine, the extension of knowledge, and the general good of the human race. Wherever this proper and judicious use of such subjects is permitted, encroachment on private places of interment is utterly unknown. The anatomist has it always in his power to prevent it, by warning his servants that if they transgress in that way, he will immediately deliver them up to deserved punishment. But the direct operation of all clamor or restrictive regulations on this point, however severe, is to produce the very evils that they are intended to prevent. If the risk be great, and the peril of life and property highest in degree, the anatomist seeks the material for his studies wherever suspicion is least liable to fall. It is in vain to think that laws can be made that will put an end to the study of anatomy. Medicine cannot exist without it; the people themselves demand that their physicians shall possess a knowledge of it, but laws may be made that will drive students from our borders to situations free from such besotted prejudices. Laws can be made which will turn the perennial streams of wealth from our own citizens, and bestow not only the money, but the high scientific character which our sons may obtain, upon the institutions of other places. We repeat it to be unnecessary that such an occurrence as breaking into private grounds should ever take place where the proper policy of the public one is pursued. The feelings of friends need never be subjected to the agonized emotions that are produced by the clandestine removal of bodies of those they have loved.

☞ We have received from a correspondent in South Reading, a communication, animadverting pretty severely, and we presume with much justice, on the conduct of a certain 'bigotted fanatic and messenger of evil,' who has been instrumental in spreading the contagion of antimasonry in that place. The writer remarks:—'In consequence of his labors here, discord and ill-will have prevailed in the church and society to which he belongs, and the peace of the town has been disturbed. Two popular ministers, whose only crime was that of belonging to the Masonic Institution, have been compelled to leave their respective flocks, not being able to remain in peace, nor without being continually goaded by antimasonic miscreants.—These societies still remain without pastors, and probably will remain so for some time.'

To Correspondents. W. is inadmissible.—M. is under consideration.

THEATRICAL.

[Communicated for the Mirror.]

Master Burke closed his engagement last evening after a run of twenty six successive nights to crowded houses—unprecedented in the annals of Theatricals. The characters he has sustained since our last, which deserve a particular notice, are Sir Abel Handy and Hamelet.

Sir Abel is decidedly, his masterpiece in comedy. Let those who are afflicted with the Blues, and even the greatest pretenders to gravity, but witness Master Burke in this character, and if it does not loosen their risibilities,—they 'must be immortal.' He has an excellent conception of Hamlet,—the advice to players comes with a good grace from his mouth, for we know no one who more faithfully follows its excellent precepts. The March of Intellect has become quite popular in this city. Signor Sardini's eloquent strains have worked wonders among the lovers of harmony. We almost fancied him the Euterpe—so potent was the enchantment.

Master Burke commences a short engagement at Salem on Monday evening in the character of Young Norval, and will no doubt meet with a handsome reception.

The friends of the drama have spoken volumes for the 'Irish Roscius,' and the critics have lauded him to the very skies, and yet, so far as we have seen, they have said nothing in exaggeration. E.

Persia is at this moment a prey to a horrible civil war. The eldest son of the Shah has raised the standard of rebellion and marched against his father.—Prince Abbas Mirza hastened to the succor of his father, and is fighting against his brother. A great part of his army is trained upon the European principle. The inhabitants of the Caucasus, habitually impatient at the yoke of Russia, have also risen in some parts near the Black and Caspian Seas. A detachment of the Russian army has been attacked on the road to Tiflis, where it lost two pieces of cannon.—Marshat Paschewitz d'Erived has orders to employ considerable force, in order to subdue and punish the rebels.

[Journal des Debats.]

☞ One of the most important cases of appeal had before the last session of Herkimer, (N. Y.) Common Pleas, was in the case of the Overseers of the Poor of Little Falls vs. the notorious H. C. Witherell & Co., who by the judgment of William Brooks, Esq. were fined $25 for enacting antimasonic exhibitions last summer at this village, under the statute prohibiting idle shows—which judgment was affirmed, to the honor of the county, and the sore discomfiture of the excitement party of this region.

BORROWERS.—The most incorrigible grumblers, the most difficult class of readers to please, are those who among newspaper publishers, are known as Borrowers;—men who commit their piratical depredations on the interests of printers, and then condemn them for not furnishing to their thieving hands a more acceptable plunder.

LIVERPOOL, Jan. 26.—Of the passengers and crews of 28 vessels that foundered between Plymouth and the Land's End, during the late dreadful storm, only two men and one boy have been saved.

LIBERTAS.

Italia! Italia! su! su!

The day star of Liberty shines!
The tyrants of earth in their palaces quake,
The pillars of priestcraft and policy shake,
The despot his sceptre resigns!
Italia! Italia! awake!

Hispania! Hispania! allo!

The Gaul his oppressor has crushed!
The slaves of the Bourbon presented the chain—
With one mighty struggle he snapped it in twain
And forth to his freedom he rushed!
Hispania! Hispania! arise!

Germania! Germania! auf! auf!

The blood of the Frank has been shed!
The nations of earth are aroused from their sleep;
The slave must rejoice—the enslaver must weep—
The living must follow the dead!
Germania! Germania! up! up!

Britannia! Britannia! beware!

Nor trust in thy nobles or gold!
Thou art proud in thy wealth and mighty in war,
But the voice of mankind shall be mightier far,
When the banner of Freedom's unrolled!
Britannia! Britannia! beware!

Earth! Earth! cry aloud and rejoice!

Truth, freedom, religion are thine!
In one mighty bond let the nations unite,
To defend and to guard their freedom and right,
The holiest 'right divine.'
Earth! Earth! cry aloud and rejoice!

The alliance of kings is destroyed!

The union of people remains!
The Briton unites with the Spaniard and Gaul,
The Italian and German are brothers, and all
Fling back to the tyrants their chains!
The alliance of Kings is destroyed!

But Gaul! keep thy hand on thy sword!

Be fixed in the right to the death!
The voice and the heart of mankind are with thee,
And if tyrants assail thee, our hand too shall be Thine, thine, to thy last dying breath!
But Gaul! keep thy hand on thy sword!

EARLY AFFECTIONS.

I had been talking with my little boy—
My second one, just past his second year—
And talking seriously: for even a child
So young oft loves and wears the serious mood,
Adopting it most naturally and sweetly.
I had been telling him, that if he proved
A good, obedient boy, loving and mild
And innocent he would be loved of God,
And God would take him up at last to heaven;
He knows that heaven 's a glorious happy place.
What more indeed do any of us know?
And his eye brightened as it answered mine;
But soon an anxious shade passed o'er its light,
And looking steadfastly at me, he said,
'And brother too?'

My child, my precious child!
Let it be ever thus; still crave to share
All happiness, reward and holiness
With me, and we your parents will be blest.

Married—In Sangerfield, (Me.) Mr. Issachar Thissel, to Miss Lydia Daisy.

Let's sing, O be aizy,
The Thistle and Daisy,
Unite in Hymenial tether;
And long may they flourish,
And each other nourish,
The Thistle and Daisy together.

In Alabama, Mr. J. Reader, to the beautiful Miss E. Lee.

One volume of the 'rights of man,'
From maiden errors freed her;
She saw the title, liked the plan,
And so became a Reader.

At Killingly, (N. Y.) Mr. E. D. Tarbox, to Miss Louisa Ann Hyde.

O may the bride
Through life abide
All matrimonial war-knocks,
And may his 'Hyde'
Stick to the side
Of this sweet loving 'Tar-Box.'

At Gardner, (Ky.) Mr. Timothy Dwight, aged 81 years, to Miss Arietta Lincoln, aged 75. Both of them have lost a leg, and he is so deaf he has to use an ear trumpet, and the bride is so blind that she cannot see an inch before her nose.

'Sir Jerry-go-Nimble was lame of a leg,
And Mrs. Go-Nimble she had but one peg,' &c.
In England, Mr. J. Gould, aged 80, to Miss Erskine, aged 18. After the wedding the juvenile bridegroom addressed to his friend Dr. G—the following couplet to inform him of the happy event:

So you see, my dear sir, tho' eighty years old,
A girl of eighteen falls in love with old Gould.
To which the Doctor replied:

A girl of eighteen may love Gould, it is true;
But, believe me, dear sir, it is Gold without u.

In Montgomery, Alabama, on the 6th Jan. last, by his honor Judge Lane, Mr. W. Martin, to the amiable Miss Rebecca Gordon.

Tho' wintry storms the South's assailing,
The gales of Spring are starting;
For fair Rebecca Gordon caught,
Last night, a lovely Martin.

At Brighton Charles Headach, Esq. to Miss Mary Workman.

Nay, smick not, simper not, ye fair,
For mocking's catching—so beware,—
In time take warning.
Not the first Workman's she—sweet sylph!—
Who went, well pleas'd, to bed, poor elf,
And with a headach found herself
In bed, next morning.

In New York, William Weaver, Esq. of Va. to Miss Eliza Woodman.

To a Woodman's hut, a Weaver stray'd,
Looking around for work to do;
She loved his face and liked his trade,
And soon became a Weaver too.

In Pittsfield, Mass. Mr. Samuel Patridge, to Miss Sophia Chase.

How, now! the Patridge runs a race,
Secures the prize, and wins the Chase;
And in return, the Chase, 't is guess'd,
Has caught the Patridge in its nest!

TO MOSES THACHER,

Member of the Senate of Massachusetts, Ex-Minister of 'the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham,' Present Minister of 'the Church in North Wrentham,' Member of the late 'Antimasonic State Convention of Massachusetts,' Member of the late 'National Antimasonic Convention,' Seceding Mason; Antimasonic Lecturer, and Editor of the Antimasonic 'Boston Telegraph.'

LETTER VII.

SIR:

In my last I took occasion to show, from the abusive language of your 'Address on Masonic oaths and penalties,' that you are not entitled to respect. I now proceed to show, from the same authority, that you are not entitled to credit.

You have taxed your invention, in that Address, to prove that the promises of Masons are not binding. Sir, what are the obligations which you consider binding? Do you consider truth to be a binding obligation? I ask you this, because, in getting up your 'Address on Masonic oaths and penalties,' there is a bold, artificial manner that shows you to be more desirous to subserve the purposes of your party than to advance the cause of truth. There is an over anxiety to obtain a guaranty of marketable credit, that is quite unusual; and the certificate of good character, from 'the inhabitants of the South Parish in Weymouth,' for your 'very able and pertinent discourse, this day delivered,' from 'citizens from different parts of the County of Worcester,' for your 'very interesting, able and patriotic address, this day delivered,' from 'the Antimasonic Committee of Reading for your 'able and appropriate discourse this day delivered,' indicate that the 'Rev. Moses Thacher,' knew well how to write complimentary notes to himself, and then append them to his Address as endorsements of his ability, his intelligence, and his truth.

I have charged you with some high handed measures; but I now charge you with an offence which must either brand you with infamy, or fasten on the writer of these letters the name of slanderer. I now charge you, Moses Thacher, to use your own language, with 'PALPABLE MISREPRESENTATION.'

If I make good this charge, you ought to be held in public detestation. If I misrepresent you, let me be exposed to public scorn. Sir, I stake all reputation for fair and honest dealing, in making good this charge. I have no reference here to your misstatement in relation to the 'testimonials' of Messrs. Cummings and Warren, connected with your 'Preface and Notes.' That may have been a lapsus penna. I do not allude to your misstatement respecting the two thousand stand of arms.—That may have been a lapsus memoria. I do not name your misrepresentation of Cross, nor your accusation of a Providence Deputy. They may have been only lapsi lingua. Neither do I make any reference to your 'representation of the private deliberation of the Council.' For any lapsus in that connexion, I leave you in the hands of Rev. Mr. Ferguson. The circumstance on which I rest this high charge can have none of these excuses. It is a case in which you undertake to make a statement from your own knowledge, in which you cannot resort to the apology of a mistake.

You pretend to have made your 'Address' a perfect synopsis of 'Masonic oaths and penalties,' and have set it out in most admirable array for show and effect. It is unfortunate for you that it is not true. And that it is not true shall be shown from your own seceding lips. You offer yourself a witness, to testify against the Masonic Institution. You shall be put upon your credit. It is said to be a rule in legal proceedings, that he who testifies falsely, in one material fact, is not to be credited for any part of his statement. Sir, you have stated one fact which, I aver to be a 'palpable misrepresentation': a matter of general notoriety which needs only to be named, to be acknowledged false. You say, in your 'Address on Masonic oaths and penalties,' that 'the Fellow Craft Mason' promises to 'support the Constitution of the Grand Lodge of the United States, and of the Grand Lodge of this State.' p. 16. It requires the aid of neither Masons nor Masonry to expose this 'misrepresentation'; and I am therefore the more desirous to detect it. Who ever before heard of 'the Grand Lodge of the U. States'? It is well known, that there is not, and there never was, such an Institution. And yet you undertake to assure your deluded followers that you are disclosing 'Masonic oaths and penalties,' and that Masons obligate themselves to 'support the Constitution of the Grand Lodge of the United States'!—Senator, Minister, Editor! How fullen and degraded!—Man! No, I will not say man. God created you in the image of himself. How grossly have you disfigured that free charter of human dignity, by the wasting and destroying influence of bold and daring 'misrepresentation'! Sir, when the first blush of 'misrepresentation' passed across your cheek, did the warning power of conscience at once abandon you to hardness of heart? Did not Eternal Justice awaken in your bosom one throb of compunction at the departure of immortal Truth? Forsaken of God!—Scorned of men! Does your seared conscience never whisper that Justice, though slow, is sure?

Your object in creating a 'Grand Lodge of the United States' cannot be mistaken. Such an institution would afford, and has afforded, a color for much wise reasoning and many wise inferences, to show its danger in weakening the duty of citizens; especially as you have made the wonderful discovery that 'Every free born citizen of our country is under either tacit or explicit engagement to support the Constitution of the United States.' Your motives cannot be misunderstood. One of your inferences is exposed where you say:

'When, therefore, we consider the spread of Freemasonry, in our own country, for a few years past, we need no longer be astonished at the hitherto unaccountable and unparalleled increase of crime.' p. 28.

Sir, 'the spread of Freemasonry, in our own country, for a few years past,' is said to have included even you. So far then as your innuendo is applicable to yourself, you are welcome to the inference. And if you embrace 'palpable misrepresentation' in the 'unaccountable and unparalleled increase of crime,' even Freemasons will agree with you in the illustration. 'When therefore we consider [you and such as you under] the spread of Freemasonry,' the honor of the application will not be withheld from you.

I was somewhat surprised to find, in your introduction to your Address, a most precious confession, so very unfortunate for you, but so opportune for me, that I cannot well hesitate to transcribe it.

'The science of Moral and Political Philosophy, is of incalculable importance to Mankind.' 'I advert, therefore, to the science of Moral and Political Philosophy, because it involves those first principles of civil and religious right, without a knowledge of which, we can be neither useful citizens, nor devoted Christians.' p. 3.

Indeed, Mr. Thacher; and so without a knowledge of Political Philosophy no man can be a devoted Christian! And for this declaration, sundry antimasonic committees, in Weymouth, Worcester and Reading, render you their thanks! That you have made industrious use of your speculations, is very apparent; as the inhabitants of Norfolk have shown their belief, that if your Political Philosophy had not made you a more devoted Christian, it had transformed you first into a thorough antimason, and next into an Honorable Senator. Sir, your practical research into Political Philosophy must have made you most eminently a devoted Christian; and I should be glad to learn whether your Moral Philosophy still sustains you in your avowed character of 'an honest man'?

Go, sir, with 'palpable misrepresentation,' stamped upon your declarations, and patch up a new tissue of 'Masonic oaths and penalties' for your wretched dopes. Go, sir, to the people to whom you preach; tell them you are convicted of 'palpable misrepresentation,' and warn them that 'all liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone.' Go, sir, and get up another 'Address on Masonic oaths and penalties.' Prove that they are wholly inconsistent with 'Moral and Political Philosophy;' then prove that 'palpable misrepresentation' is not.

I am, Sir, yours

FENELON.

REVIEW

Of the Rev. Mr. Ferguson's Letters to the Rev. Moses Thacher, Pastor of the North Church of Wrentham.

We have read these letters with considerable attention and much satisfaction. We perceive their object respecting Masonry and antimasonry; how far early prejudices govern his opinions against the first, disapproving, at the same time, that persecuting spirit of exclusiveness, exhibited by measures of the last. Throughout the whole of the letters, there appears a spirit of Christianity, forbearance and brotherly love. They, more especially, point out, in decided language, that puritanical principle, which influenced our progenitors to abandon places of their nativity, their patrimonial habitations and seek an asylum from oppression, in a wilderness, for the sake of 'freedom of opinions.' This principle is the basis of our constitutions; this is the safe-guard of all our civil and religious privileges, which cannot be separated without marring the fabric of our constitutional rights. Adverse opinions on civil and religious subjects do not break one divine law, nor abrogate any civil compact, binding individuals under the same government. An attempt to deprive one of privileges, for opinion, which all have a right to enjoy, is an infraction of the Divine law of Charity, and a breach of civil compact. In an imperfect state of society, men will think differently upon various subjects. It is right it should be so—while imperfection exists it will be so. Where is to be found the man, who is able to dictate a perfect standard of right? He may refer us to the Holy Scriptures; but it is, at once perceived, there are as various commentations upon that Divine Word, as there are chapters of which that Word is composed.

In civil affairs, the majority for the time, must and will govern—but upon constitutional principles; still the minority are not precluded from giving an opposing voice. An exclusion is tyranny. Religious opinions are not subject to human control; for these, no man is accountable to any tribunal, except his God.

Within the jurisdiction of the great body politic, are beheld the beneficent fruits of 'freedom of opinions;' small societies associated for benevolent uses; some of these are circumscribed by prescribed limits; while others are more extensive in their operations. These small associations, it is observed, are often composed of members of different religious denominations, or of adverse opinions on religious faith. It is not said there is a compromise of religious opinions in these associations; but, the appearance is, that notwithstanding a difference on religious subjects, they can be united, without the interference of faith, by the bonds of charity, in promoting deeds of benevolence.

It is pleasant to behold an orthodox minister exercising forbearance, and extending charity to those of a society, whose principles, in consequence of a want of knowledge and early prejudices, he is not backward to reprobate.—As the human mind has its views enlarged and can realise that the whole race of mankind, as the children of one common parent, are equally his favorites, men will become more and more inclined to doubt their own pretensions to orthodoxy, and disposed to be liberal to those who differ from them in opinion.

Mr. Fergusson is willing to allow to every man 'freedom of opinion.' Herein is found pure, unsullied, puritanical principles. Although he may not subscribe to all the preceding remarks in their full extent, yet, let us repeat his own opinions, in his own language, upon this subject. 'But, while I admit that our churches have a right to exclude Masonry [Masons] from their pale, I must be allowed to dread the operation of the principle, which setting aside all professions of innocence and the testimony of an upright walk and conversation, shall proceed to strip men of their dearest rights for their opinions. Where will this principle of exclusion stop?' Did Mr. Thacher ask himself the preceding important question, at the time he proclaimed in the Senate Chamber his philippic against Masons? and, bravado like, to show his military prowess, exclaimed, 'if civil war be necessary, let it come, I fear no civil war?' 'Is there no other body of men,' continues Mr. Fergusson, 'who may thus be condemned for opinions they do not hold, and for practices they detest and abhor? Into what dram-shop, theatre, or brothel can you look—where can you meet a man, who has thrown off moral obligations, who does not profess to believe that all our churches are leagued together for purposes which they also abhor? And what evidence can you [Moses Thacher] adduce in testimony of your innocence, which has not been refused to Masons? Will you offer your patriotism, your piety, your benevolence as evidence of your sincerity? Then see you refuse not to others that testimony, on which you rely for the maintenance of your integrity. I confess I tremble for my country, I tremble in the view of that rising spirit of exclusiveness, which can set aside all which men call sacred; and then triumph in view of what they have done, on the mere ground, that they are sure they must be right, because such are their opinions.' In the above extract Mr. Fergusson has correctly delineated the antimasonic spirit and disposition—a spirit of political fanaticism combined with religious exclusiveness; of which Moses Thacher, in this district of the country, is justly considered the father, promoter and propagator.

In his first letter, the Rev. Mr. Fergusson proceeds to remind Mr. Thacher of states of joy and sorrow they had together experienced, and sincerely laments, they cannot now so walk. In most friendly language, he points to troubles, Mr. Thacher has brought upon himself and church, by measures deeply affecting their peace and happiness. Mr. Fergusson brings to view the decision of the first ecclesiastical council convened to settle difficulties between Mr. Thacher and church, and his consequent public appeal against that decision, in which appeal he 'called in question the motives of some of the brethren of that council,' implicating some by name, others by personal allusion, proclaiming to the world that all his difficulties among his people, grew out of Masonic influence. Mr. Fergusson says, 'It may be so, brother. Influence is a secret working thing, which sometimes draws unconscious captives into its chains. But, is it not possible you are mistaken? Might not something wrong in yourself, whether in matter or manner, aside from Masonry, have rent the church, over which you were set as a watchman, have influenced the Council to bring in a result, which you regard as unjust and unfavorable? I mean not to assert these as facts; but, may it not be possible?' In his tender remarks, Mr. Fergusson appears before the considerate world, as a modest, unassuming Christian. His queries, injustice and truth, might have been pronounced facts; such, without doubt, was Mr. Fergusson's belief, when he adds, 'you have sent abroad the impression that Masonry alone is implicated in the course you are pursuing, that antimasonry and the church have nothing to fear from the result of your measures.' 'If you are right,' adds Mr. Fergusson, 'I would, that I also were with you in opinion. We have been together, and I would that I could see nothing but the overthrow of Masonry to anticipate from the success of your measures. My pen would not now be employed for the first time against you. But, strange as it may seem, I see, I seem to myself to see another cause, a cause dearer than Masonry ever was, endangered by your procedure.' This cause is freedom of opinions, and with it, the subversion of civil and religious liberty. Mr. Fergusson, in his last clause, was almost prophetic. It involves a friendly admonition to restrain a brother in his mad career, and bring him back from the precipice, over which he was about to plunge.—To a reflecting man it was a seasonable rebuke. Time was given to pause. How was it improved? Thacher's threatening senatorial denunciation against the Masons fully demonstrate. He exclaimed, like the Roman Senator in a better cause, 'My voice is still for war,' 'if civil war is necessary let it come, I fear no civil war.' It is true, Thacher has failed in his attempt of disfranchisement. The failure does not mitigate the vile intention to deprive citizens of their dearest privileges,—of freedom of opinions.

Mr. Fergusson proceeds: 'you seem to think, that all your difficulties in North Wrentham have grown out of your recession from Masonry. I confess I am of a different opinion. Were I to trace the rise of your difficulties to their source, I should look further back to the time when you first became a Mason.' Mr. Fergusson, with much propriety might have gone back to a period of earlier date—to the time he was first inducted into the ministerial office. Moses Thacher's conduct evinces, he was no better prepared for the ministry than he was for Masonry, inasmuch as he has violated his obligations to both. He professes to believe a breach of his Masonic, a virtue. Infraction of his ecclesiastical obligations, he superciliously attempts to justify by arrogance and self-sufficiency.

'There were certain points,' observes Mr. Fergusson, 'settled respecting Masonry among our fathers in the ministry.' 'That I may not misrepresent them, permit me to offer what they were, and what now are, some of my objections to Masonry.'

'Its obligations. We did not know what its obligations were; but we knew or supposed we knew, that Masons bound themselves by some solemn obligation to keep secret that which should be revealed to those, who took upon themselves the obligation. I then thought and believed that you and others thought with me, that such obligations were wrong in principle. I thought no man had a right to bind himself to keep he knew not what. For aught he knew or could know, he might be under higher obligations to God to reveal, than he could be under to man, to keep that which was committed to him.'

This objection of the Rev. Mr. Fergusson, in the abstract, appears to have weight. As he is disposed to treat the subject with freedom and candor, so we shall reply to the objection in sincerity. It is, however, to be first observed, that Masons, as Masons, do and have always considered their moral obligations to their God, their country and their neighbor superior to all other obligations, oaths or bonds, whatever their form may be, or for whatever purpose they may be administered or taken. There is one fact, not generally known, and which has been artfully concealed from the public eye by those, who have pretended to divulge the secrets of Masonry, which may rectify an error and disabuse the public mind. Previous to initiation, candidates are distinctly informed, that any obligation which may be taken does not and will not interfere or supersede the moral obligation they may feel themselves under to their God, their country, and their neighbor. After this solemn declaration, if the initiated found he had been imposed upon, and had repeated an obligation repugnant to the prior declaration, he would of course be absolved from his Masonic obligation. The obligation is made a sign of affiliation only. All societies have prescribed forms, by which members are admitted to their benefits. The obligations of some religious denominations are solemn and impressive. There are especial reasons, why Masonry, at its early institution, should bind its members by something more formal, than by a mere major vote of the society. The most important will hereafter be explained. Suffice it here to observe, the Masonic institution was not originally intended to be circumscribed by the limits of a district, or kingdom. The primary object was the promulgation of freedom of opinions. It is demonstrable by its emblems, that it existed previous to the Christian era,—even prior to those monuments of antiquity seen in the eastern world, the remains of which, with the hieroglyphic engravings found thereon, deservedly excite the investigating spirit of the present day, both in France and England. It is highly probable, that when a full development of these hieroglyphics is made, it will be learnt that their signification, and Masonic emblems will be illustrated by one common rule.

TO THE CANDID AND IMPARTIAL OF THE COUNTY OF WASHINGTON, N. Y.

FELLOW CITIZENS,

It is almost unnecessary to state, at this time, that an extensive excitement, has, for a considerable period, existed against the fraternity of Freemasons. This excitement, in its progress, has infused itself into our county, and we, as Masons, have been made to feel the effects, by being placed upon the same general proscription list, with our brethren in other parts of the country. Freemasons are held up before the world, as murderers, as defenders of crime, as plotters against government, as impious revilers of religion, and profane disciples of blasphemy.

Fellow Citizens,—We, who now address you, are Masons. We have hitherto refrained from interposing any plea whatever, to these charges, in the hope, that with those of our fellow citizens who knew us, who had associated with us, from our youth, who had mingled with us at the same social board, and united with us at the same religious altar, such charges would pass unregarded, and that we should escape unhurt from the attack.

And when we discover some of those with whom we have heretofore been connected by the most tender ties of friendship, with whom are associated some of the most pleasing and endearing recollections of our lives! when we behold such men, breaking asunder all Christian, social and political obligations, coming out before the world, and branding us with epithets, which, if true, would consign us to lasting infamy and disgrace! and when we hear the question so often repeated, 'Why do not Mason come out and deny the charges against them?' we are constrained to believe that silence is no longer a virtue, that imperative duty demands our answer to the question and that a due regard for our characters, as men, as Masons and as Christians, requires us to come forward and deny the accusations which are preferred against us.—We therefore most solemnly aver to our fellow citizens, that we are innocent of the crimes with which we are charged, and we fearlessly call upon that God, who is the searcher of all hearts, for the truth of our allegations.

We are accused of participating in the abduction of Morgan, and assisting to shield his abductors from the punishment due their crimes. We positively disclaim all knowledge of participation or connivance in, that deed of darkness. We pronounce it a gross outrage upon the laws of our country and the liberties of a citizen, and we sincerely declare, that no exertion of ours ever have been, or ever shall be wanting to bring the offenders to justice. Nay more! our very characters as Masons, demand such a course from us, for the first principles taught us by our institution, are 'to conform cheerfully to the laws of our country, not to be concerned in any plots or conspiracies against government, but patiently to submit to the legislative will, to work diligently, live in credit, and act honorably with all men.'

That Masons were concerned in Morgan's abduction, we are free to admit, but we cannot believe, that any institution is to be prostrated and demolished because a few of its members act unworthy of their professions.

But we are farther charged with binding ourselves by the most blasphemous oaths! to sacrifice the man who shall divulge the secrets of our institution! We repeat the same unqualified denial to this charge, that we have offered to the last. It is totally and wholly untrue! We have no punishments among us, but those which are in common with other institutions. We claim the right to suspend or expel our members, from communion with us, and these are the highest penalties known among us.—We have taken no such obligations, nor are we bound in any manner whatever, to inflict any personal injury upon any of our brethren under any circumstances.

Again, it is alleged against us, that we are bound to support each other right or wrong, that we are sworn to keep each other's secrets, and that if a Mason should be guilty even of murder and treason, we are obligated to conceal it! Nay more! that if a Mason is on trial for crime, his brother Mason, whether judge, juror or witness is under the most horrid obligations to screen him from conviction and punishment! We had hoped that to the minds of a sensible community, these charges carried their own refutations upon their face; that men who had been observers of, and attendants upon, our courts of justice for years past, would correct such an accusation from their own experience; and we now appeal to such, particularly those, who have been associated with Masons, on juries, whether they have ever discovered the least foundation for such a charge. We point out a single case of conviction for manslaughter a few years since and before this excitement commenced, and ask certain antimasons who were on that jury, what was the conduct of Masons, then, when sitting on a case of life and death, where a Mason was the subject of trial?—These charges however are made, and repeatedly made against us; they are industriously circulated by men who have heretofore held and enjoyed responsible and honorable stations among us; they are loudly vociferated at every public assembly, and bellowed forth at every town meeting! It becomes necessary for us to meet them, and we therefore again most solemnly declare, that they are one and all, wholly and unqualifiedly untrue.—On the contrary, it is our duty, and we feel ourselves bound to bring a Mason to condigned punishment when guilty of crime.

We are also accused of using the influence of our institution for political ascendancy, and it is alleged against us, that Royal Arch Masons are bound to support a brother for office in preference to any other. Fellow citizens,

Some of us are Royal Arch Masons, and we do sincerely declare to you, that we know of no such obligation in Masonry. The introduction of politics is contrary to the very nature and principles of our institution. We however again appeal with confidence to your experience. Is there an individual, that has been an observer of the political events of this country for the last ten years, who will not declare, that he has frequently known Masons to be arrayed against Masons for the same office, that he has seen Masons vigorously supporting candidates who were not Masons, for the same office, when the latter did not belong to the same political party? And can it be pretended, under these circumstances, that Masons are bound to prefer each other for office? Fellow citizens, the charge is an insult to your understandings, and we will not detain you, by adducing arguments to refute it.

We will notice one more charge, and we have done.—It is asserted that Masonry is opposed to religion; that its rites are blasphemous, and that no Mason can be a good man. Need we ask you, fellow citizens, if you believe such an accusation? We are most of us known to you, our lives and characters are before you, and we ask again with confidence 'Can you believe the charge?'

We are all of us believers in the God that made us, and have a profound and reverential respect for all his ordinances. We are fully satisfied of our dependence upon him, for every blessing we enjoy, and are convinced that all our present hopes and future prospects, rest entirely upon him. Can it be possible, therefore, that we could, for a moment, trifle with such a Being, or engage in ceremonies calculated to bring ridicule or blasphemy on his holy name? No, fellow citizens, our institution has a more moral and benevolent foundation, and no impious or infidel professor is ever allowed to pollute its walls. Understand us; we do not pretend that Masonry is religion, nor do we found our hopes of salvation upon it; but we do aver, that it is a benevolent and moral institution, and that none of its rites are inconsistent with the principles of Christianity, the laws of our country, or our duties to our fellow men.

Is it true that Masonry is unfriendly to republican governments, and the Christian religion? How can we account then for the patriotic and sacred devotion of the officers of our revolution, to the cause of their country and their God? It is an acknowledged fact, fellow citizens, and we assert it without the fear of contradiction, that every general officer in the revolutionary army belonged to the Masonic Institution, with the exception of Benedict Arnold! Benedict Arnold was a traitor, he was willing to throw discord into domestic life, to tear asunder all those ties which bind man to his fellow man, to sacrifice the liberties of his country, to blast the high hopes of freedom in this fair land, and for what? to gratify an unchastened, an unholy ambition, and we fear, fellow citizens, that his spirit has infused itself, into the kindred feelings of some of his brethren of the present day!

Fellow citizens, our appeal is before you, and we ask you in conclusion, can you consent to cast us off from among you, because we are Masons? Shall we be hunted down, proscribed and disfranchised, because a few misguided and ambitious individuals wish to rise upon our ruins to political eminence and distinction? Shall our families be deprived of that support, which they have hitherto received through our exertions? Shall our reputations be blasted, social intercourse destroyed, and the sacred altar of religion be made the arena of antimasonic persecution?

Stay, fellow citizens, we beseech you stay the destroying hand; by your love to your families, your country and your God, check the fell blast, which is aimed at the peace of society! Let not the tree of slander which is planted by these defamers of private character, deepen its growth among us! lay the axe at its root, before it shall extend its withering branches throughout our country, and destroy, like the Bohon Upas, all that comes within its baneful influence!

[The above appeal is signed by Asa Fitch, Esq. and 115 others, citizens of Washington County.] Ed.

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

ON DEAD LIME.

It has long been observed by lime burners, that if lime is imperfectly burnt in the first instance, no farther exposure of it to fire will produce quick lime;* but the philosophical chemists have doubted the truth of the observation.

Mr. Vicat, however, in a work that he has lately published upon mortar and stucco, has confirmed the observations of the lime burners.

He found, that in making quick lime in a small furnace, if the small pieces of lime stone, which fell through the grate into the ash-pit before they were thoroughly burnt were collected and put again into the fire, even for several successive times, quick lime, was not obtained; but a kind of lime, technically called dead lime, which will not slack with water, but which on being ground and made into paste with water, differs from common mortar by setting under water.

When chalk (limestone or marble) is burnt, and the lime left to fall into powder by long exposure to the air, and then made into stiff paste with water, it sets very sensibly under water, so that the action of the air seems to produce a dead lime similar to the incomplete burning of limestone; being neither pure quick lime, nor a complete carbonate of lime, but a kind of sub carbonate, which possesses 'the new and useful property of setting under water.'

Mr. Raucourt de Charleville observed the same effects to be produced as were observed by Mr. Vicat. He also made another observation respecting the production of a cement which sets under water.

He had prepared a mixture of quick lime and clay, and left it to dry; some of this was then broken into small pieces, and burnt on a heated cast iron plate, and another parcel in a small furnace, mixed with the charcoal used as a fuel. In these experiments, it was observed, that the pieces of this mixture of quick lime and clay, which were burnt on the heated plate, produced mortar that set under water;† but those burnt with charcoal produced mortar which did not set under water.

Mr. Clement when he gave an account of a mineral found by Mr. Minard, in France, and which was fit for the making of of hydraulic mortar or Roman cement, stated it to be Mr. Minard's opinion, that the cause of the Roman cement setting under water, was owing to a sub-carbonate of lime, produced by the action of fire on the natural carbonate, as the chemist, speaks; or, in other words, to imperfect lime.

[London Journal]

* Quick lime, a term used to distinguish burnt or caustic lime from that which is unburnt.

† In Philadelphia it is the practice amongst some of the plasterers, to add a small portion of clay (about 1-10) to the lime intended for washing walls. Fluing is also added, so as to give, when first laid on, quite a perceptible shade. As it dries, the color diminishes, and the clay combining with the lime, forms a hard surface which does not rub off as lime does when used by itself.

MATHEMATICAL HABITS.

Joseph Suaveur, the eminent French mathematician, was twice married: the first time he took a very singular precaution; he would not meet the lady till he had been with a notary to have the conditions, which he intended to insist on, reduced into writing, for fear the sight of her should not leave himself sufficient master of himself.—This, says Dr. Hutton, was acting very wisely, and like a true mathematician, who always proceeds by rule and line, and makes his calculations when his head is cool.

Friends are pillows on which we repose, or cordials that inspirit the system without injuring it.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

We regret that our limits will not permit our giving, at length, the proceedings, of the Antimasonic State Convention of twenty-six members.—

[From the Ohio Monitor.]

PROCEEDINGS OF
THE ANTIMASONIC STATE CONVENTION.

At an Antimasonic State Convention, held at Columbus, Ohio, January 11th, 1831, in pursuance of a resolution of the Antimasonic State Convention, held at Canton, in July last, Delegates from the following counties appeared, and took their seats, to wit:

Ashtabula—Eliphalet Austin, Amos Fisk, James A. Dunn.

Harrison—Thomas Lee.

Franklin—William Shaw, John D. Rose, Col.

Andrew M'Elvain.

Huron—Charles Bush, Warren Jenkins.

Seneca—Jacob Plane.

Holmes—Seth Hunt, George Hites.

Portage—Darius Lyman, Gregory Powers, Jr.

Thomas Earl, J. C. Fairchild.

Stark—M. Sheplar.

Athens—Elmer Rowell.

Adams—John Patterson.

Tuscarawas—George Richardson.

Highland—Rev. Dyer Burgess.

Geauga—Isaac Gillet, Chester Treat.

Richland—J. H. Purdy, Jacob Lindley.

Sandusky—Jacob Bowlas.

On motion of Hon. Eliphalet Austin, it was resolved, that this Convention organize by electing a President, and two Secretaries—whereupon, DARIUS LYMAN was elected Chairman, and CHARLES BUSH and ELMER ROWELL were appointed Secretaries.

On motion of Mr. Powers, it was resolved, that Henry Dana Ward, Esq. of the city of New-York, having been invited to attend this State Convention by the State Central Committee, be invited to take a seat, and participate in the deliberations of this Convention.

On motion, it was resolved, that a Committee of three members be appointed to report what are suitable and proper subjects to engage the attention of the Convention: Whereupon the Chairman appointed Messrs. Powers, Jenkins, and Purdy, said committee.

The committee having retired, Mr. Burgess submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, it is often said, 'Freemasonry is a good institution, but it has bad members:'—resolved, as the sense of this Convention, that the members of the Masonic Institution, are as honest as other men, but the system of Freemasonry is opposed to TRUTH, JUSTICE, RELIGION and EQUAL RIGHTS.

The above resolution was supported by Messrs. Burgess and Ward. In support of this resolution, Mr. W. observed that of his own consciousness he knew it to be true. He was himself a Mason, and before he became alarmed with the deep hypocrisy of the institution he was as honest a man as he is now, but he had less information. In renouncing the order, he left men in it, as upright in heart as himself. Standing on this or that side of the question does not determine the integrity of a man. The members of the fraternity undoubtedly believe Freemasonry to be a good institution in its principles, and if they were persuaded, as he was, that it is wholly an imposition upon its members, they would promptly abandon it.

Our aim should be to bring them to conviction.—This can never be done by making a question of the purity of their motives, and the honesty of their purposes. He knows, and every one who hears him must know Masons of their familiar acquaintance, who adorn every relation in life. It is better to regard the men as they are, independent of the system. So the resolution regards them. It attributes to them the character which we individually acknowledge them to possess, that is the honesty of other men; but the system it denounces in unequivocal terms.

It seems difficult to admit that men acquainted with the system, as Masons must of necessity be, can be honest, and yet look upon it as good. It is difficult; but many things which even seem impossible, we find nevertheless true. So this is true, that Masons are honest men, while Masonry is a base counterfeit; so badly executed that we easily discover the forgery, and yet so plastered over with hallowed principles, that the men who have honestly taken it, are slow to believe there is no truth in it. The resolution treats them as we should like to be treated in their circumstances, and it marks the system with terms of just reprobation. He hoped it would prevail, and prove to the world what we know to be true, that our objections lie not against men, but against the false institution.

The resolution was adopted unanimously.

If the sentiments of the Convention were candidly expressed in the foregoing resolution and remarks, they must entertain a most contemptible opinion of the talents and information of the members of the Masonic institution. They say, in effect, that Washington, Franklin, Warren, Green, Montgomery, and Clinton, were honest men, but were too ignorant to understand the principles of the Masonic Institution—that Jackson, Clay, Baldwin, Barry, Livingston, Van Rensselaer, Cass, Gov. M'Arthur, Senators Ruggles and Burnet, and indeed, the Masons generally, are an upright, clever set of fellows, to be sure, but are mere ignoramuses, and not as capable of judging of the principles of the institution, and its good or evil tendency as Henry Dana Ward, Esq., John Patterson, Esq., J. C. Fairchild, and other apostates. If Masons, who 'are as honest as other men,' possessed the intelligence, information and talents that are concentrated in our august body, they would unquestionably renounce the institution, and declare it 'opposed to TRUTH, JUSTICE, RELIGION and EQUAL RIGHTS.' What a display of arrogance and pomposity this!

To test the candor of this notable squad of TWENTY SIX, we need only compare the Resolution above and the accompanying declarations of the mouth piece, Henry Dana Ward, Esq. with the sentence below, which we extract from a report adopted by the Convention 'on the nature and tendency of Masonic oaths:'

'From the lowest degree in Masonry to the highest, and from the most trifling Masonic secret, to concealment of crimes of the deepest dye; the affirmament binds himself under the dread penalty of death to be inflicted in all the horrid forms that human ingenuity can devise; and Masons with a savage vindictiveness, visit upon the heads of their delinquent brethren the full measure of the penalty.'

Here, now, we are informed by this enlightened, intelligent, patriotic and consistent band, that notwithstanding 'the members of the Masonic Institution, are as honest as other men,' and 'believe Freemasonry to be a good institution in principles,' they 'with savage vindictiveness, visit upon the heads of their delinquent brethren, the dread penalty of death!' How candid, and how consistent! Surely the doings of these 'leaders' are admirably painted by our correspondent, 'RICHARD,' in his picture of the 'disunionist.'

Among the proceedings of the Convention, we find an Address to the people of Ohio, which is the same, not only in sentiment, but almost word for word, that was adopted at the Canton Convention.

A report 'on the influence of Freemasonry on the public press,' concluding with a resolution providing for, and appointing a committee of five consisting of J. Sloane of Portage, John Patterson of Adams, Geo. Richardson of Tuscarawas, Warren Jenkins of Huron, and Thos. Johnson of Columbus, 'for the purpose of making such arrangements as they may deem expedient for the establishment of an Antimasonic Press at Columbus,' was adopted.

The business of appointing delegates to the National Convention, to be held at Baltimore in September next, if we understand their doings correctly in that particular, is imposed on the State Central Committee, which consists of nine persons (to wit:)

Jonathan Sloane, Frederick Wadsworth, Cyrus Prentiss, George B. Depeyster and Gregory Powers, of Portage county, John Patterson, of Adams, Jacob Dowell, of Holmes, Rev. John Heildt, of Tuscarawas, and Jer. Armstrong, of Columbus.—[Ravenna Courier.]

IMMORTALITY.

Rich was that vernal night. Nor young leaf stirred,
Nor faintest sound from insect nature heard.
They come! With hymn and harp—a sinless band—
From the soul's happy home-appointed land—
To wake to good, returns,—from evil warn—
Heaven's praise transmit, or point its thrilling scorn,
From long oblivion's dark unstoried days,
Or memory's mine, unnumber'd virtues raise,
Thought flies from earth—the brilliant mission greets—
The eager pilgrim with the life-born meets!

Life's precious sands leave few and fewer grains:
What has been done? What little good remains?
One piles a tower—one scoops a fellow's grave;
This ploughs the earth—and this the peril wave;
His aims fame takes—self-interest labors long,
And fashion's rainbow lures the gossip throng.
Lost soon the meek and holy phrase of prayer,
(Like some kind breeze that filters thro' the air.)
The solemn dirge and sanctuary 'note'—
The tear and eulogies of days remote,— Alas! how true the words we've heard before,
'The place that knew shall know us soon no more.'
And still immortal, happy, unconfined,
The aspirations of each human mind!

What periods are these?

LITERARY.

LIVING WRITERS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

NO. IX.

Charles Babbage, a writer on mathematical subjects, has for some years been known by his essay towards the calculus of functions, and his observations on the analogy subsisting between that and other branches of analysis. The work which induces us to notice this gentleman in particular, is of recent date, and relates to the 'Decline of Science in England.' It has been ably reviewed in the London Quarterly, and another journal more particularly devoted to the arts. It states with great force some of the principle causes which have led to this decline. They are chiefly two, the bad management and intrigues prevailing in the literary societies of England, and the total disregard of scientific men by the government. It appears that the honors of literature are no longer the exclusive reward of merit, and a scale of prices are given at which they may be purchased. The title of F. R. S. to which we have attached so much respect, can be obtained for the sum of two hundred dollars. Titles of less respectability are to be had for a proportionate reduction in the expense.

It also appears that the government in filling those places which should belong exclusively to men of science, bestow them upon mere retainers of party, without reference to anything else than the interests of those who for the time being wield the power of the state. In other words, appointments of these kinds of office have nothing whatever to do with the loftier considerations of public good; they are the spoils which successful partisans divide among their followers. In the Board of Longitude, it is said there was not a single mathematician. In the Board of Lighthouses, there is not talent enough to understand a single principle of optics, nor a philosophical theory in relation to the distribution of light.

In the board for improvement on the coast, not an engineer has a place, and the trustees perform their duties in a manner that would bear the broadest ridicule. One striking result has followed this system of the government. It has been ascertained that they have lost between two and three millions of pounds sterling, through the inaccurate calculations on which they granted annuities, while the correction of the mistake is solely the work of unpatronised and unpaid science.—It is in this way that the positions of Mr. Babbage are supported by facts, and he is entitled to great credit, for the honest expression of his opinions, although this is not the way in which he can expect a 'Prince's favor.'

This subject naturally leads to some important reflections. Political men are indifferent to scientific men. And the reason is obvious. They are not the materials with which political edifices are constructed. The powers that be, sustained by heavy majorities, generally soar above considerations that are not connected with party arrangements, and often administer the government they have obtained by fraud and accident, in the full attitude of self approving ignorance. History is full of instructive examples, but the mass of mankind submit to be hoodwinked, and led by daring adventurers. Let us confine ourselves closely to the subject, and we will find that it is from the want of science that so many mistakes occur in the different departments of all governments. Useless fortifications, clumsy and bad-sailing vessels, inconvenient dock yards, deficient marine embarkments unavailing efforts to improve river navigation, idle multiplication of light houses, imperfect attempts at codification, enactments of unprofitable laws, inutility of public buildings, and a thousand other things of similar character result from the want of knowledge in those who direct the public expenditures.

Men of science are almost entirely excluded from their proper stations. Others reap the rewards of their self devotion to the real interests of mankind, and the brawler and the demagogue, the man who can turn and turn and yet go on, seize the direction of public affairs. When the statesman is at the same time a man of science, a beneficial result inevitably ensues. The administration of Jefferson was of this character, and it must ever be held up as a pure and disinterested one. The great discoveries of Franklin gave a lustre to his political career, and his philosophic spirit impressed itself on his age and country. Here under our own observation have we seen a brilliant illustration of the positions of Mr. Babbage. There was a man who some years since left the seclusion of a college life, to enter upon the busy scene of public business. He came from the University loaded with its honors,

'A ripe scholar and a good one.'

From every side his stores of learning were resorted to by the inquiring minds of the critical and philosophic. To each and to all he gave away as he gathered and the richest products of an untiring industry, and a refined intellect. He was familiar with the varieties of nature and the laws that govern them, with the myriads that exist on its surface, or those that lie embedded in its bosom, with the causes that bring substances into affinity or scatter them in to space. History was his familiar friend, and of all things taught by philosophy he had taken counsel.

He was the originator of the statistical surveys of the State, the promoter of agriculture, the encouragers of commerce and manufactures, the great patron of the Lancasterian schools, the ardent friend of the medical profession, the reformer of the penitentiary system. It was he who proposed to abolish the law for imprisonment for debt, to modify the militia system, to grant appropriations for the deaf and dumb, to make roads, to amend the poor laws, and finally crowned his arduous career by the splendid support of our canal policy. In all these subjects he displayed the depth of his attainments, and he has left in the pages of our state history the immortal records of his originality and his wisdom, his philanthropy and his learning. In the language of the ablest philosophical writer of the age, he exhibited 'in his system not merely the force of a single mind, but the intellectual power of the age in which he lived.' Such examples as these cannot be too highly praised.

'For such deserts speak loud, and we should wrong it,
To lock it in the wards of covert bosoms,
When it deserves with characters of brass
A fortified residence 'gainst the tooth of time
And razure of oblivion.'

MISCELLANY.

ORANG OUTANG.

Orang Outang, or oran olan, in the Malay language, is said to signify wild man or being of intelligence. The specimens of this animal which have been brought into Europe were mostly young individuals, seldom exceeding three feet in height; but it is alleged, that when they attain a maturity, they equal or even surpass man, both in stature and in strength. The body is thickly sprinkled with hairs of a rusty brown, and scarcely an inch long; the ears, hands, and feet, nearly resemble those of man; and, indeed, the whole external appearance approaches more than that of any of the ape tribe to the human form. There are several points of difference, however, in respect both of external and internal structure, such as the marked disproportion between the length of the arms and thighs; the greater flatness of the nose; and the smaller interval between the eyes, and the greater between the nose and mouth, than in the human countenance. The form of the feet, too, is very dissimilar, the toes of the orang being much longer, and the great toe farther separated from the others; the thumb likewise is much smaller, and the palm of the hand longer and narrower.

The orang outang inhabits the deserts of interior Africa, Madagascar, some parts of the East Indies, and particularly the island of Borneo.—In its wild state, it subsists principally on fruits, haunting the forests of lonely regions, and making its resting place on trees, where it is secure from all its enemies except serpents. A full-grown individual is seldom taken alive, especially as they usually roam in companies, and armed with thick clubs, with which they hesitate not to attack the fiercest opponent. In the woody regions, on the Gambia, they move in very extensive bands, headed by the larger ones, and betray much petulance and malignity. Their habitations composed of plants and branches of trees so thickly matted as to exclude the vertical rays of the sun, have been found in some of the woods; and the ground was observed to be beaten smooth about the paths and dwellings. Gemelli Carreri informs us, that when the mountain fruits are exhausted, those apes frequently descend to the sea coast, to feed on shell-fish, particularly on a large species of oyster, which commonly lies on the strand with its shell open. Fearful, however, of its closing on their paws, they introduce a pretty large stone, and then drag out their contents, and devour them at leisure. Their characteristic proneness to imitation, and their susceptibility of learning lessons, render it sometimes difficult to discriminate between those traits of their conduct which result from original, and those which are the consequences of acquired habits.

M. Grandpre, a French naval officer, relates many surprising anecdotes of a female orang which he saw on board a slave ship. It was bred to heat the oven, remove fallen embers, and assist in navigating the vessel, mounting aloft, and descending on deck, with more alertness than any of the ship's company. Notwithstanding its acquirements and social disposition, which rendered it a general favorite, the mate treated it with such marked cruelty, that it at length obstinately refused all manner of food, and died of hunger and a broken heart.

PETITION OF THE GRAND LODGE.

FRIDAY.

Some remonstrances were presented this day. In the afternoon, Mr. Sullivan moved that the petition of the Grand Lodge be stricken from the orders of the day, and to-morrow 11 o'clock assigned for its consideration.—The motion was not sustained. In the course of the short discussion to which this motion gave rise, Mr. French, of Berkley, took occasion to say that, if gentlemen expected to carry a bill in favor of the Grand Lodge through the House, without a discussion upon the merits of Freemasonry, they would find themselves under a great mistake! This insulting menace will probably have no other effect, when the question does come up, than would a severe cold on the lungs of the gentlemen of the House; who at times are strangely given to coughing!—and such coughing! It resembles nothing human!—This Mr. French is getting himself into difficulty as fast as possible. He is not the proper man to assail the motives or the characters of the members of the Grand Lodge. He treads on unsafe ground, when he attempts to do either.—He might have remained in obscurity, unnoticed and unhonored, at least by us. He has voluntarily taken up the gauntlet and thrown himself as a leader into the ranks of antimasonry. If his retreat be cut off, he will attribute it to his own folly and rashness.

SATURDAY.

Remonstrances were presented this day from Stoneham and Lynn, and ordered to lie on the table. Antimasons complain that these remonstrances are thrown under the table! We admit the fact; and did the members of the House understand the character of the remonstrants as well as we do, they would order the Messenger to put on his gloves and throw them into the fire. The Parker-Hill Aurora of this day, has the following just and candid remarks in relation to this subject:

‘Our readers will perceive the severe rebuke which a small fraction of a political party called antimasons, has met with in the House of Representatives.

‘The case is this: The Grand Lodge of Massachusetts is now an incorporated body, with a real estate capital of $20,000, and allowed to hold personal estate to the amount of $60,000. The Lodge has recently commenced the erection of an edifice at Boston, and for the purpose of completing and holding this building, they petition the Legislature to reduce the amount of their personal estate to $40,000, and raise the amount of real estate to the same sum. And this is the real proposition: to change $20,000 of their present capital from personal to real estate. Simple and trifling as this proposition is, the persecutors of this society, (whether it be good, bad or indifferent, in this case is not the question) have remonstrated in form, and to the extent of their numbers, against granting the convenience prayed for.

‘We are not a Mason, and (with reverence we say it) thank Heaven, we are not an antimason. But we know something of both. We are willing both should stand on their own intrinsic merits. We are willing an enlightened and free community should judge of them—and for this purpose we have recorded the simple fact above. Our wish is that there may be a wide and eternal separation between Masonry and antimasonry, and the political interests of the country—that men shall not ride into office, undeservedly, astride of either. We go further—the man who shall attempt to reach the goal of his political ambition on the shoulders of Masonry or antimasonry, is totally undeserving the confidence and suffrages of the people. We trust there is intelligence enough in this country to put down all such, be they County Committee-men or stereotyped office-seekers

‘The rebuke of which we spoke is found in the fact, that a proposition to examine into the concerns of the Grand Lodge, made in the House of R. by an antimason, was sustained by two votes against the whole House!—This is the first lesson—the second lesson will be given by the people themselves.’

MONDAY.

No remonstrances were presented this day; and for the first time since the report of the Judiciary Committee on the petition of the Grand Lodge, the subject of that petition has been permitted to rest.

TUESDAY.

We this day had an opportunity to examine and copy what purports to be the ‘remonstrance of Geo. Odiorne and 174 others, against the petition of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts.’ We give the names of the remonstrants, for the benefit of our readers. We had some difficulty in decyphering the unknown and hideous characters with which most of the names were written; there may, therefore, be some errors in the orthography, but it is presumed they are generally correct. There are names of persons on the list unknown to our assessors and who, if residents of the city, are not recognised as voters. There are also the names of men who, if they have never been in our State Prison, nor our house of correction, it is only because they have not received the meed of justice to which they have a lawful claim. There are the names too, of men who occupy respectable stations in society; who if not out of regard to their own reputations, at least out of the respect due to their friends, should have refrained from lending the weight of their names to so base and dishonorable a measure. But these men are few. It will be seen likewise that the names of several of the remonstrants appear twice on the list. But notwithstanding this imposition; this base attempt to increase the number, there are but 168 signatures! Thus the leaders in this matter were not satisfied by imposing upon the Legislature, by presenting a duplicate of names, but must add to the insult by imposing upon that body a misrepresentation, which it was thought no member would feel interest enough to detect. The names follow:

Between forty and fifty of the above names are not to be found in the Boston Directory. Many of them we understand are foreigners; some of them are of the lowest grades of society, and others we are told are not residents of the city! How long will such base impositions be tolerated by an intelligent community! We are prepared to prove that several of the persons named on the remonstrance, were induced to sign it in consequence of the misrepresentations made by persons who solicited them to do so! One individual in particular, when asked by a friend of ours what objection he had to the petition of the Grand Lodge, frankly acknowledged that he had none, and as frankly avowed that he signed the remonstrance merely to oblige a certain apothecary of this city, whose name is in our possession. This gentleman and many others of whom we have heard, declare that they were deceived and cheated, and that they signed the remonstrance under the impression and on the misrepresentation that the G. Lodge had petitioned for an extension of power to hold more property! In this manner the names have been obtained? But after all, who are they? Where are the merchants?—where the lawyers?—where the physicians?—where the clergymen?—where the respectability of this community? Not on the ‘remonstrance of the city of Boston, against the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts.’ No!—Out of three or four hundred professional gentlemen in the city, but two individuals, of minor consideration, have been found hardy enough, (to use a mild term,) to lend their names to a measure so palpably ridiculous and unjust. These individuals we are happy to see there—they belong there—the business is suited to their taste and talents; and we don't know that they can be in more suitable company, or more suitable employment, than in propping up the character of Samuel G. Anderton. We allude to Doctor Abner Phelps and to his co-patriot and fellow laborer, Doctor Isaac Porter!—par nobile! As for the merchant, so far as the remonstrance is concerned—non est inentus!

WEDNESDAY.

We believe nothing was done in the Legislature this day, in regard to the petition. Not even a remonstrance presented! We hope these precious documents are not all run out. If names cannot be had voluntarily, nor procured by lies, there are knaves, paupers and discharged convicts enough about the country, that may be hired. We hope the gentlemen will not cease from their labors, until all their forces are brought to the contest. We should be mightily pleased to review them all together!

THURSDAY.

Mr. Stetson of Braintree, presented a remonstrance of Nathaniel Emmons and others, of Franklin, against the petition of the Grand Lodge.

Mr. Ingalls of Lynn, presented a petition of Winthrop Newhall and 78 others of Lynn, suggesting the propriety of instituting an inquiry into the proceedings of Mount Carmel Lodge! There would have been as much propriety in petitioning the Legislature to appoint a committee to inquire into the domestic concerns of a private individual, as into the proceedings of this Lodge. The Legislature have nothing to do with either. The object of the petitioners is obvious enough. Excitement!—anything for excitement!—on the eve of an election! It will avail them nothing.

FRIDAY.

The petition came up in order last evening, and after a short immethodical discussion, the further consideration thereof was assigned to this morning. In our next, therefore, we shall be able to give the final result of this tremendous 'tempest in a teapot.'

HARPER'S FAMILY LIBRARY.—The fifteenth number of this popular work is just from the press. The subject is the 'Life and Times of his late Majesty, Geo. IV., with Anecdotes of Distinguished Persons of the last fifty years. By Rev. George Croly, A. M., with a portrait, beautifully executed by Hoogland. We esteem the present as one of the most interesting and valuable volumes of the series. The style of the author is bold, energetic, perspicuous; and often eloquent to an eminent degree. His subject embraces the most interesting events of English History, during the last century. The readers and admirers of 'Junius' will find in the volume before us, a key to many of those celebrated letters. The most eminent writers, wits, and statesmen of that day, are introduced and portrayed in a masterly manner. The sketches of Swift, Fox, Sheridan, Curran, Erskine, Burke, Pitt, and their illustrious contemporaries, are singularly apt and beautiful. To the lover of chaste and pointed anecdote, we know of no work in the range of modern literature, which we can with more propriety recommend to his notice. We have not room to day for lengthy extracts, nor to speak of the work as its merits would justify. We cannot however lay it aside without extracting a few short paragraphs. The first is the political character of Fox:

'To Fox the prince's connexion was a tower of strength. For it partially discountenanced the rumors, that in his fall he had abandoned more than place, and was imbittered not only against his successful antagonists, but against the laws and the throne. As Pope said to prince Frederic, on being asked "how he contrived to feel so much regard for princes, and so little for kings?" that "he was afraid of the full-grown lion, but could play with it before its teeth and claws were come;" Fox might have liked or loved the heir to the monarchy, however indignant at the grasp of the monarch himself; but his association with the prince may have done even more than assisted his public name. In the proverbial madness of ambition, the contumacious temper of the time, and the angry workings of utter defeat upon a powerful and impassioned mind, there was formidable temptation to the great demagogue.

Too lofty in his habits to stoop to vulgar conspiracy; perhaps, alike too abhorrent of blood, and too fond of his ease, to have exhibited the reckless vigor, or endured the long anxieties, or wrapped up his mystery in the profound concealment of a Cataline; he had all the qualities that might have made a Cains Gracchus,—the eloquence, the ingenuosness of manner, the republican simplicity of life, and the showy and specious zeal of popularity in all its forms. Fox would have made the first of tribunes. He unquestionably possessed the means, at that period, to have become the most dangerous subject of England.

Fox's life is a memorable lesson to the pride of talents. With every kind of public ability, every kind of public opportunity, and an unceasing and indefatigable determination to be at the summit in all things, his whole life was a succession of disappointments. It has been said, that, on commencing his parliamentary course, he declared that there were three objects of his ambition, and that he would attain them all:—that he should be the most popular man in England, the husband of the handsomest woman, and prime minister. He did attain them all; but in what diminished and illusory degree, how the "juggling fiend kept the promise to the ear, and broke it to the hope," is long since known. He was the most popular man in England, if the Westminster electors were the nation; his marriage secured him beauty, if it secured him nothing else; and his premiership lasted scarcely long enough for him to appear at the levee. In a life of fifty-eight years, Fox's whole existence as a cabinet minister was but nineteen months; while Pitt, ten years his junior, and dying at forty-seven, passed almost his whole life, from his entrance into parliament, at the head of the country.

The following remarks on Junius at least possess the traits of severity, in an eminent degree.

'The public and parliamentary language of the time was contemptuous of all government. Junius had set the example, by insulting, not only the throne, but the private habits and personal feelings of the sitter on the throne.—Going beyond the audacity of Cromwell, who declared that "if he saw the king opposite to him in the field, he would fire his carbine into his bosom as soon as into any other man's;" Junius adopted the joint fierceness of Horne Tooke, who declared that "he would fire into the king's bosom sooner than into any other man's." English libel had, till then, assailed only the public life of royalty;—Junius was the subtle traitor who dropped poison into the cup at its table. The ability of the writer is undoubted; but its uses deprive it of all the higher admiration due to the exercise of ability in an honest cause. The remorseless and malignant venom of this political serpent destroys all our praise of its force and beauty. While the school of Junius continued to be the model of English poetical writing, a ceaseless perversion was festering and enfeebling the public sense of truth, justice, and honor.'

Erskine's well-known habit of talking of himself, often brought the jest of the table against him. The following sally of Curran was worthy of that great man:

'Curran and Erskine had frequent opportunities of meeting, and must have looked on each other's power, with respect. But this foible of the English barrister sometimes shook the Irishman's philosophy. Grattan's name was mentioned; and Erskine casually asked what "he said of himself." "Said of himself!" was Curran's astonished interjection;—"nothing. Grattan speak of himself! Why, sir, Henry Grattan is a great man; sir, the torture could not wring a syllable of self-praise from Grattan,—a team of six horses could not drag an opinion of himself out of him. Like all great men, he knows the strength of his reputation, and will never condescend to proclaim its march like the trumpeter of a puppet-show. Sir, he stands on a national altar, and it is the business of us inferior men to keep up the fire and the incense. You will never see Grattan stooping to do either the one or the other."

His sally may have been stimulated in some degree by one of those fits of irritability to which Curran was liable; but no man could be more entitled to the praise than the speaker himself. Of course every man of vigorous faculties knows his own powers, and knows them better than the world can. But no popular applause, and he was its idol,—no homage of his profession, and he was the acknowledged meteor of the Irish bar,—and no admiration of private society, and he was the delight of the table,—could ever betray Curran into self-praise.'

We shall take occasion to advert to this work at some more convenient opportunity, when we shall be more liberal in our quotations. It is for sale at the Bookstore of Carter & Hendee, Washington-street.

MECHANIC'S LYCEUM.

A society has recently been organized in this city, under the above title. The object is mutual improvement in useful knowledge, and, in its plan, differs, we believe, from the numerous associations among us, instituted for literary and scientific purposes. Popular lecturers are not to be employed. The members themselves propose to exchange ideas for ideas, experience for experience, and not money for those. They act upon the principle that, those who attempt to instruct others, must first instruct themselves. If all are instructors in turn, they must from necessity, acquire more real knowledge than they could acquire by listening to the well turned periods of a professional lecturer.

The meetings are to be held at 'Columbian Hall,' on Saturday evenings from the first of September to the first of June, 'for discussions, lectures and such other exercises as may be thought best to accomplish the object of its members.' Last Saturday evening being the first regular meeting, seven members engaged in the following exercises, each occupying about 15 minutes:—1. Property of Matter; 2. Attraction; 3. Repulsion; 4. Simple Forces; 5. Compound Forces; 6. Centre of Gravity; 7. Essay addressed to Mechanics. This evening the following question is proposed for discussion:

'Which has been the greatest benefit to mankind, the discovery of the magnetic needle or the invention of the Art of Printing?'

The 6th article of the Constitution says, 'each member shall have the privilege of introducing ladies to witness the exercises, and to hand in compositions on the subjects under consideration, or such others as they may choose!'

☞ We have had laying on our table for some days past, a pamphlet entitled 'Remarks upon the Banks of the United States, being an examination of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means made to Congress, April, 1830. By a Merchant. Boston, printed by Truc & Greene, Feb. 1831;' but we have not had leisure to give it a reading. We shall however endeavor to do so, and if not inconsistent with the political neutrality of our paper, shall notice it more at length. From the reputation of its author as an elegant writer and an able debater, we have no doubt that it is worthy of the high consideration of gentlemen who are directly or indirectly interested in the subject matter of which it treats.

THE ELECTIONS.—We understand that the anti-masonics have been successfully opposed and defeated in every town in this vicinity, where they have attempted to elect their immutable leaders. In South Reading and Dorchester they have been completely routed. These places have been considered the strong holds of antiism. Thacher's time is at hand!

DIED.

In Eastport, (Maine.) on Sunday, Feb. 27, Major Joseph Very, aged 38 years, formerly of Salem, son of the late Capt. Ephraim Very. His funeral was attended with Masonic honors. In his death his relatives and acquaintance have met with an inestimable loss. As a son and a brother he was kind and affectionate; as a citizen and neighbor, those who knew him knew his worth; his urbanity and generosity were proverbial; the needy and destitute in him were sure to find a ready helper.

TO GURTH.

Poor Gurth, alas! and must it be
That rats and mice, e'en such as thee,
Should suffer pain and death's dark fears
From country Reps and auctioneers!
Pity a mouse like thee, O Gurth!
Of little mind and far less worth,
An object sweet of every cat,
Thou little long tail'd shining rat,
Should have thy taper tail so neat
Crush'd under country Reps' vile feet.
Pity that you, while crawling on
Thro' that gay street call'd Washington,
Wounded with grief about your letter,
Musing on Burke, had not known better,
And hunted out some old skimm'd cheese
On which to nibble at your ease
From dusky eve to glorious morn
Far from the auction's noisy storm—
Pity alas! for who can tell
The bleeding woes that have befell
Poor Gurth beneath the ponderous steps
Of Lawyers, Priests and country Reps!
I saw thee, Gurth, I heard thee speak
Thy sufferings with a mouse's squeak;
I saw thy monkey face grow pale,
I saw thee shake thy bleeding tail!
What sorrow Gurth for thee I felt!
Altho' you 'scaped the Reps' tar'd heel
With life and breath; and still contending
At your old business, scandal vending!
Beware O Reps! at auction sales
Of crushing little mouse's tails,
Lest when you have them under feet
They bite your boots and sorely squeak.
Lament with me in piteous tears,
Ye country Reps and auctioneers,
Lament with sorrow that sad sale
The night you trod on poor Gurth's tail!

GONE!

MISCELLANY.

MODERN POLAND.

Kosciusko. It may not be uninteresting to our readers at the present moment, when Poland promises to resume her rank among the European powers, briefly to review her modern history and condition.

Poland has not had any existence as a nation since 1793. Formerly the government was a mixed aristocracy and monarchy. The king was the only elective sovereign in Europe. On the death of the reigning monarch ensued an interregnum, during which the archbishop of Guesna was the chief of the republic. It became his duty to summon a general diet for the purpose of electing the future sovereign.

In 1772 a partition of Poland, projected by the king of Prussia, was effected by that monarch, in conjunction with the Empress of Russia (the celebrated Catharine) and the Emperor of Germany. By this first partition one third of the country was wrested from Poland, and the diet was forcibly compelled, and not only to ratify the tyrannical usurpation, but to effect a considerable change in the constitution of Poland.

In 1791 however, the king and nation almost unanimously established another constitution, by which to avoid the broils and civil wars which almost constantly attend the election of king, or for some other reason, the throne was declared hereditary in the house of Saxony. This displeased some of the principal nobility, who repaired to the court of Catharine and represented to that ambitious princess that their rights had been infringed and the constitution violated. She needed no better excuse to interfere a second time, and accordingly sent an army into Poland under pretence of guaranteeing the constitution of 1772, but in reality to a second more complete and iniquitous partition of that devoted country. Her power was too great to be resisted, and the constitution was overthrown. In 1793 the final dismemberment of Poland took place, by which it was divided into tributary provinces, and lost its rank among independent nations.

Such multiplied aggressions roused the spirit of the Poles, who have ever held the character of a brave people. Kosciusko, who had learned the art of war, imbibed the principles of republicanism under our own Washington, headed his countrymen in 1793. At first he was successful against the king of Prussia; but the Russians appeared headed by the sanguinary Sowerrow, who swept everything before him like some destroying angel and the fortune of war changed:

Hope for a season bade the world farewell;
And Freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell.

Severely wounded and taken prisoner, Kosciusko was sent with a number of other patriots to Petersburg, and there retained in confinement for the terrible crime of having ventured to defend his country against foreign tyranny. He was, however, subsequently treated with great respect by the Emperor Paul, who gave him an estate. He revisited this country (we believe) in 1797, returned to Paris about 1798, where Bonaparte tried in vain to tempt him into his service; and died, full of years and honors, at Solothorn, in Switzerland, October 16th, 1817.

The king of Poland formally resigned his crown at Grodno in 1795, and was afterwards detained at Petersburg as a kind of state prisoner, until his death in 1798. With him ended the kingdom of Poland. Austria seized Little Poland, and the greatest part of Red Russia and Podolia, since called the kingdom of Galicia; Prussia had Great Poland, Polish Prussia, and a small part of Lithuania and Polachia, and Russia had Samogitia, the remainder of Lithuania Volhinia and Podolia.

But the same horrors and aggressions which had marked the conduct of the dismembering powers were afterwards retorted on themselves. In the war with Prussia in 1806, the French penetrated into Poland, and at first proclaimed their desire to re-establish the independence of Poland; but ambition was the ruling passion in Bonaparte's mind; he sacrificed to policy the liberties of Poland, and 'lost,' as General Lafayette recently expressed it, 'the opportunity of restoring that fine country.'

In 1813, on the retreat of the Russian army out of Poland, the Russians took possession of the duchy of Warsaw, which has remained in their hands until now, that the Cesarowitch Constantine has been obliged to escape out of a back door in his palace, much after the fashion of the Dey of Algiers, and his conqueror, Charles the Tenth.

PRETTY GOOD.—'What dat you pic up dere, Sambo?' 'Dollar, Pompey.' 'Well just leffem down again; I only put 'em dere to try you.'

TO MOSES THACHER,

Member of the Senate of Massachusetts, Ex-Minister of 'the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham,' Present Minister of 'the Church in North Wrentham,' Member of the late 'Antimasonic State Convention of Massachusetts,' Member of the late 'National Antimasonic Convention,' Seceding Mason, Antimasonic Lecturer, and Editor of the Antimasonic 'Boston Telegraph.'

LETTER VIII.

SIR:

Whether you have experienced the benefit of 'the Science of Moral and Political Philosophy' in your own person, under its influence to produce 'useful citizens' or 'devoted Christians,' I know not. But this I do know; that if you had not availed yourself, very liberally, of Paley's 'Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy,' and had not very liberally appropriated his thoughts to your own use, your 'Address on Masonic oaths and penalties' would have been a very meagre affair. As it is, it forms but a poor compliment to your literature or your genius, unless your invention in putting together entire pages from Paley and unadulterated abuse from the disgusting receptacles of your fellow laborers, be evidence of literary ability. The bold conception of associating that name with the loathsome business of antimasonry, must be your own.

Sir, few men would have ventured so boldly, and with such great self-complacency as you have, on that poor effort of literary quackery. I select the following sentence as much for its curiosity as for its impertinence:

'Thus it appears that Doctor Paley corroborates all that I have said on the subject of unlawful oaths, and brings it down to the apprehension of the lowest capacity.' p. 11.

Who, or what, 'brings it down?' Doctor Paley? Dare you impress the name of Paley into your service to support you, when you pass over the very argument of Paley that should seal up your seceding lips? Why, sir, did you cut off from your extracts on 'Promises' the very sentence, the only sentence, that names 'promises of secrecy'? Was this accident or was it design? I give you the passage: 'Upon the same principle, promises of secrecy ought not to be violated, although the public would derive advantage from the discovery. Such promises contain no unlawfulness in them, to destroy their obligation; for as information would not have been imparted upon any other condition, the public lose nothing by the promise, which they would have gained without it.' You had your reasons for passing this passage; but you quote the very succeeding sentence! Is this fair? Is it honorable?

When you boast that 'Doctor Paley corroborates all that I have said on the subject of unlawful oaths, and brings it down to the lowest capacity,' your modest confidence had not deserted you in taking precedence of that eminent writer, and assigning him a corroborating station. Nor had you divested yourself of the reality, that you was truly adapting your performance to the lowest capacity. You probably knew well your audiences. Any others than those of the lowest capacity might have been disgusted with your arrogance, in connexion with the name of Paley. They certainly would have pitied you for your self degradation, in lending yourself to the views of audiences made up from persons of the lowest capacity.

For your taste, in the chosen language of your 'Address,' no one will accuse you of the crime of refinement; for, although you may have learned eloquence in the school of Apollo, you have not refused to grace your periods by the chaste teachings of Venus Vulgaria. The delicate illustrations of your 'Address' seem truly to be adapted to the lowest capacity, when you make such frequent reference to abandoned wives, infamous characters, pimps, mistresses, and divorces; and talk of 'virtue and dignity' becoming the 'lawful game of Masonic concupiscence.' Fie, sir; it was bold enough in you to publish such trash, without proclaiming it, à la voix, in mixed assemblies of men, women and children. If their desire to learn the duties of 'moral obligation' drew them together, it would not have been a surprise upon you, if the duties of moral delicacy had driven females, at least, from your presence.

As you appear to have taken the arguments of Paley under your special guardianship, to 'corroborate' all you said 'on the subject of unlawful oaths,' it may be well to see if they will sustain you, in all you have said and done, in relation to your engagements with 'the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham.' You agreed to submit to the advice of an Ecclesiastical Council; but you afterward refused to submit to it. You have somewhere declared that you are an 'honest man.' If that be true, by what rule of moral honesty do you honestly enter into a voluntary engagement? You had taken upon yourself an obligation, not a Masonic obligation, and you violate it as easily and as readily as you have violated your Masonic obligation. Does Paley help you to an apology for this too? Why, sir, the general rules of Paley are as applicable to the violation of Church engagements and contracts as to the violation of Masonic engagements.

But there is another topic to which you should apply the rules of Paley. Your 'Covenant' with 'the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham' was not a Masonic obligation; but it was an obligation, and by conscientious Christians is not commonly treated with the indifference with which you violated that 'Covenant.' Did you commit a wrong when you entered into that 'Covenant' with that Church; or did you commit a wrong when it was violated? Both cannot be right. And yet you have made no public confession of your error for entering into that covenant; nor have you done public penance for your crime or your folly. Apply, sir, the same mode of reasoning to your Church obligations that you apply to Masonic obligations.

Should you be disposed to manufacture another 'Address' for publication, wherein your own experience may lead you to the conclusion that your thoughts are 'in accordance with the opinions of Dr. Paley,' I recommend to you his chapter on Slander. You will find the divisions or heads of the article equally convenient as in 'Promises'; and if your preferences do not direct you which to select, 'malicious slander' or 'inconsiderate slander,' you will be at no loss to furnish 'illustrations' of 'the disguises under which slander is conveyed.' Should you want authority, state that Paley declares 'the office of slander' to be 'to infuse suspicions, to kindle or continue disputes.' If you gain by this course no favor with your party, you may recommend yourself to the lovers of truth.

I am, Sir, yours

FENELON.

REVIEW

Of the Rev. Mr. Furguson's Letters to the Rev. Moses Thacher, Pastor of the North Church of Wrentham.

Mr. Furguson's second objection to Masonry is, 'That it was a secret society; therefore dangerous. We had heard of the works of Professor Robinson and the Abbe Barruel. Some of our fathers were frequently insisting upon the validity of their works on illuminism. I did not then doubt that Masonry had been made use of by the French Philosophers to propagate infidelity. But whether that was the design of Masonry, I queried. Still the impression was strong in my mind, and I thought it was in yours, that all secret societies are in their very nature, liable to perversion, and therefore dangerous.'

We are perfectly willing to allow Mr. Furguson the whole force of his objection, stripping it of its surmises and conjectures, which demonstrate nothing. Let the objection be examined in all its bearings, under every possible view. It is not denied that a secret society may be formed and exist, for a short period, whose object may be nefarious; and who may commit most atrocious crimes.— Societies of this description are for temporary objects of short duration. In order to accomplish their black designs, celerity of execution is required. Intrepidity is a necessary ingredient in the composition of their members. Their guilty conscience constantly stares them in the face. They behold an appalling foe to their deeds in all their walks. They dread the sight of man, and become suspicious even of their companions in wickedness. An exposure is their inevitable destruction. They always feel like a man over a loaded mine, with the match lighted for its explosion. Compare the above state, with a society, which has existed, time immemorial, in the exercise of acts of benevolence. It is too true, Masonry has had its opponents, and been pursued by the hand of persecution, not for crimes, but, in consequence of jealous fears of Governments, under which it has existed. Here are perceived the effects of tyranny; for no governments except arbitrary have reasons to fear. To the shame and disgrace of men residing under the influence of free constitutions, we have to observe that Masons have never been persecuted until now, except under tyrannical governments, then, merely because they were known as Masons!

It is not our intention to suggest anything reflecting in any manner upon the Rev. Mr. Furguson; governed by early prejudices, as he is, against Masonry, which is not common to the generality of mankind. A secret undertaking, whether of an individual, or many, is sufficient to excite inquiry. A surmise is enlarged into an important fact; it there becomes a subject of wonder; until it is magnified to a dangerous plot. By such surmises antimasons operate upon the public mind. Family secrets in common concerns of life are, eagerly, sought after, as if their value when obtained would pay the price and trouble of discovery. Whence originates this strong desire, this impatient solicitude to obtain a secret? Is it to replenish the budget of slander, or, is it from envy and pride? This is evidence, at least, of a bad state of public morals. It is said no man has a right to keep a secret; because it is morally wrong, therefore dangerous. The conclusion is as absurd, as the premises are futile; because the position applies, equally, to what may be inoffensive as to what may be offensive. A man's secrets are his own property. His own moral obligations will, or ought to determine the propriety of exposing them to the world. Mankind would be better employed to examine their own hearts, and from thence eradicate the evils therein implanted, than pry into the evils of their neighbor. If reformation in morals is the object, it would be most effectual, if inquiry commenced at home. The greatest evils a man has to fear are of his own household. When individuals universally remove their own evils, the important work of reformation will be accomplished.

We have said that Masonic societies have existed time immemorial; where is the evidence, that during this unlimited period, they, as a society, have encouraged immoral acts, or been instrumental in subverting religious institutions? There is not one word of truth in these bold, daring assertions. We are not ignorant that Abbe Barruel's volume is replete with suggestions and surmises of this nature. We will examine his pretensions to authenticity. He was a French priest, who had expatriated himself, and found in England an asylum from the outrages and violent measures of the French revolution. His book was written after his emigration, and first published in England. His feelings, we may well believe, were vindictive against every description of men, as instigators, or co-operators of that revolution, from the high-minded republican patriot, down to the profligate infidel and anarchist. He viewed with an evil eye and stigmatized as infidels all opposed to royalty and ecclesiastical authorities. We know the principles of infidelity were interwoven, by some of the French Philosophers, with the principle of liberty; hence the perversion of the name, liberty, at that period, to evil purposes. The perversion is no argument against the principle. We have no doubt that principles of the first revolution in France were matured in secret societies denominated illuminati; but the last had no connexion with Masonry. Professor Robinson's book is merely an abstract of Abbe Barruel's opinions, published soon after the Abbe's made its appearance. Professor Robinson professes to have been initiated into the secrets of Masonry; there is no doubt he so believed. The statement he gives is, that he was initiated in Germany. From his account, it appears to those better acquainted with Masonry than he was, that he was deceived, and instead of being admitted to the secrets of Masonry, was only introduced to the secrets of the illuminati. This fact was ascertained after the publication of his book. Both these publications at the time had one object before them, to represent that both church and state were in danger from Masonic societies. Hence, may be perceived that all their arguments were designed to influence the ruling powers to restrain 'freedom of opinions,' effects of which had not only shaken one kingdom from its ancient foundations, but threatened to subvert all the arbitrary governments of Europe. If time permitted, we could extract a few precious morsels from the Abbe's publication, well suited to the present antimasonic taste, and show their close alliance upon the subject of exclusion. The Abbe reprobated the idea of merchants, mechanics and working-men having any voice in government. He would have the whole, or all the branches of government hereditary; because the common affairs of life employed too much of common men's time to judge correctly of the affairs of state. The Abbe is a bold and decided advocate of arbitrary power, a precious specimen of exclusive principles brought before us, as a pattern of piety and justice by antimasons. 'Freedom of opinions' had been so well understood and practised by the people of England, the government thought fit to receive the Abbe's book against Masons with silent contempt. The great body of the nation read and wondered, while Masons amused themselves with his presumptive folly. Such have been and now are the pretensions of Abbe Barruel and Professor Robinson to authenticity and 'validity.' Had the government of Great Britain believed the statements of the Abbe's and Robinson's books, at that period of universal excitement, they would not have passed them over in silence.

Abbe Barruel and Robinson's works, at the abovementioned period, were industriously circulated and read in this country. To give them greater currency, Doct. Morse of Charlestown, availing himself of his popularity, assumed the antimasonic character; he, also, most vehemently opposed Masonic societies in a pamphlet composed of extracts mostly from the Abbe and Robinson with his own additional lucubrations to dignify and grace the work. This was no addition to the Doctor's reputation. His publication, it was believed, added to other difficulties, was instrumental in exciting opposition among his parish, which eventuated in his dismissal from his church. Nihil de mortuis, nisi bonum. The herald who proclaimed the anticipated publication of Dr. Morse's book against Masons, announced their speedy extinction. The book had a most unprecedented extensive circulation, while the printer and author divided the profits. But the people, at that period, were so stupidly blind, they could not appreciate the excellent contents of that book against Masons, and it was most unfortunate, that they had not a Moses Thacher at that time to open their intellectual sight; consequently Masonic societies still exist.

It might have been expected that orthodoxy would have been the last to denounce secret societies dangerous. Judging of effects from their apparent causes, we are led to believe that orthodoxy, as it now is, would not have existed, had it not been at first nurtured and cherished in secret societies. Previous to the reformation, the supreme Pontiff of the Church of Rome not only had unlimited dominion over the minds of men on ecclesiastical affairs in Christendom, but held in his hands, the crowns of temporal thrones. He not only assumed, but exercised the making and deposing kings by his own will and pleasure. His supreme control was not, at all times, borne with equanimity by the princes of Europe. When a man, a Prince or Pope exercises arbitrary powers, he feels himself able to enforce his edicts, either by force of arms, or by the fear of torture. These were the instruments, by which the Pontiff of Rome sustained his power previous to the reformation. In the view of those, it is not supposed that a Catholic Priest, as was Luther, would have presumed to have opposed the doctrines of his church with its corruption, until he had ascertained, in secret association, he would be supported in his opposition by the princes of Germany. Under similar restraints, Calvin rested, until by secret influences he found himself able to resist Popery with impunity. Here commenced the reformation, and with it 'freedom of opinions.' Principles resulting from 'freedom of opinions' have been the basis of every beneficial revolution in Europe from that period to the present. The tree of civil and religious liberty first came to maturity in American soil; its seeds were transported to France, there planted; where after varied success of the husbandmen in its cultivation, it now seems to grow and flourish.

There is another reason for the secrets of Masons connected with Mr. Fergusson's third objection to Masonry, which remains to be noticed, and will be alluded to, under the review of that objection. We will close this number by recommending to Mr. Fergusson, when he reprints a second edition of his Letters to Mr. Thacher to exhibit his impartiality, by pointing out the confusion and discord now existing among orthodox churches—the consequence of secret excluding measures of antimasons—misnamed reformation. Should orthodox ministers and churches make a common cause with antimasons, in support of the exclusive principle against Masons, Mr. Fergusson may have infinitely greater reason to regret such connexion, than he has that Moses Thacher was ever a Mason, or that the society ever existed.

At a meeting of the citizens of South Reading, on the 7th inst. the following resolutions, introduced by Mr. John Gould, &c. were adopted. Such resolutions ought to be adopted by every town in the Commonwealth, where antimasonry has reared its hydra head. A correspondent says, 'the anti made a lame and spiritless opposition. Like the last dying struggles of a serpent's tail, after the head is bruised. The head was bruised last year at this time.'

Resolved, That our Delegates be requested to use their most strenuous efforts to prevent the election of any person on the County Committee, whose skirts are stained with the pollution of Antimasonry.

Resolved, That every political party ought to stand or fall by its own intrinsic merits; and, that we shrink with disgust and indignation, from the attempt to amalgamate Antimasonry, with National Republicanism.

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

ON ELECTRICITY.

The extent and brilliancy of Dr. Franklin's discoveries gave a form and dignity to the science of electricity which it had never before possessed, and raised their author to a high rank among the distinguished philosophers of the eighteenth century.

Astronomy had elevated the mind to the contemplation of the most splendid and magnificent phenomena which the imagination could comprehend. Optics had dared to investigate the properties of that ethereal matter, which constitutes the very soul of the visible world; and magnetism had connected her facts with the polar attraction of the great globe itself. It had indeed been conjectured, that the shock and spark of the electrical machine, were miniature effects of a more tremendous agent; but it was reserved for Dr. Franklin, not only to give a form and character to this infant science, but to raise it to a higher rank among the other great divisions of human knowledge. The vulgar were astonished at the sight of fire brought down from heaven; and philosophers themselves startled at the recollection, that they had been amusing themselves with a thunderbolt in their hands, and trifling with that terrible agent, which had so often alarmed and convulsed the physical world. Human genius indeed seems on this occasion to have made an impious excursion beyond its mortal range, and one victim was demanded to expiate the audacious attempt.

Suspecting that the electric fluid was similar to that which produced lightning, Dr. Franklin drew up a statement of the principal points in which these two agents resembled each other. He found that flashes of lightning, like the electric spark, are generally seen crooked and waving in the air; that lightning, as well as electricity, strikes pointed objects in preference to all others; that lightning and electricity take the readiest and the best conductor, that they both dissolve metals, and inflame combustible substances; that they rend solid bodies, strike persons blind, reverse the poles of a magnet, and destroy animal life. These points of resemblance appeared to Dr. Franklin so very striking, that he resolved to examine, by direct experiment, the truth of his conjecture. For some time he waited for the erection of a spire in Philadelphia, to assist him in his views; but he afterwards thought of a more simple method of carrying it into effect. Having extended a large silk handkerchief over two cross sticks he formed a kite, which, unknown to any person but his son, he elevated during the first thunder-storm, which happened to be in the month of June 1752. The kite remained a considerable time in the atmosphere without any appearance of electricity. A cloud, which had the appearance of being charged with lightning, passed over it without producing any result, and Dr. Franklin began to despair of success. His attention, however, was roused by the erection of some loose fibres on the hempen cord, and on holding his knuckles to the key upon the string, he received an electric spark. Before the rain had wetted the string, other sparks were obtained; but when the string was thoroughly wet, Dr. Franklin collected the electric fire in great abundance. About a month before Dr. Franklin had made these successful trials, the French philosophers had obtained similar results. In order to show, by direct experiment, that the electricity collected from the atmosphere had the same properties as that which was generated by the friction of an electric, he erected an apparatus in his house at Philadelphia, consisting of an insulated iron rod connected with two bells, which indicated by their ringing that the rod was electrified. After numerous trials, he found that the natural and artificial electricities were in every respect the same; that the clouds were sometimes negatively, and sometimes positively electrified; and that sometimes, in the course of one thunder-storm, they changed several times from positive to negative. On one occasion, when there was no thunder at all, he found the air to be strongly electrified during a fall of snow.

About this time, the death of Professor Richman, of St. Petersburg, while employed in bringing electricity from the heavens, created a great sensation in the scientific world. This eminent individual was engaged in a work on the electricity of the atmosphere, and was therefore extremely desirous of observing the electrical state of the air during thunder-storms. On the 6th of August 1753, he had prepared his apparatus for observation. From a metallic rod passing through a perforated bottle, and fixed upon the roof of his house, there passed a chain surrounded with electrics. The other end of this chain was fixed to another metallic rod placed in a glass vessel, and to this second rod was attached a linen thread, which marked, by its elevation on a quadrant, the intensity of the electricity of the rod.

While Professor Richman was attending an ordinary meeting of the Academy of Sciences in the afternoon, his attention was excited by the sound of distant thunder. He immediately set off for his own house to observe the electrical state of the air, and took with him his engraver Sokolow, that he might be enabled to give a better representation of any phenomena that should present themselves. Richman remarked, that the thread pointed to four degrees on his quadrant; and while he was describing to his friend the dangerous consequences that might ensue if the thread rose to 45 degrees, a dreadful clap of thunder alarmed all the inhabitants of St. Petersburg. Richman inclined his head to the ground to see the degree of electricity which was indicated, and when he was in that bent posture, with his head about a foot distant from the rod, a large globe of white and bluish fire, about the size of Mr. Sokolow's fist, flashed from the rod to his head, with a report as loud as that of a pistol. The Professor fell back upon a chest behind him, and instantly expired.

STEAM.

Since the steam-boat disasters upon the North River, there have some questions agitated my mind as to the particular cause of the bursting of the boilers. I have read communications upon the subject in a number of papers; but they have not gone far enough to satisfy my inquiries, or vary the opinion that I wish to express.

All that is necessary to be ascertained is the manner in which the power is generated that occasions the explosion. It is necessary that the chemical effect of heat upon water be shown, before the point can be touched to any purpose. If we take a piece of ice and apply heat to it, in the first place the caloric enters as it would any other body, for instance a piece of wood, without any tendency to reduce it to a liquid until it becomes saturated, and from that moment the process of dissolution commences, and as it dissolves it inclines to occupy more space.—While it is dissolving it ceases to be a medium through which the caloric passes, its capacity and affinity increase, and that which was free becomes latent heat, until it is all a liquid, when it again becomes a medium.

There does equally as much force attend this process as that of producing steam, with this difference—steam fills a much larger space in proportion to the quantity of water, than water to the quantity of ice. Were we to fill an iron vessel full of ice and expose it to a heat sufficient to melt the ice, it would burst as readily as if it were filled with water and exposed to sufficient heat to generate steam. It would not be quite as destructive, because it would not extend its force so far, by reason of its not inclining to fill so large a space.

But to return to the water; If the degree of heat be increased until the water becomes completely saturated with caloric, then commences another process—that of generating steam. Again, the heat that was free becomes latent, the water assumes the character of vapor, and inclines to fill a larger space; the process continues until all the water is wasted or becomes steam, and in this new character it is again a medium—no longer inclined to occupy more space than the caloric alone requires. Generating steam is generating power.

Were we to fill a vessel with steam and throw it into a furnace, were there no water in it to be converted, the vessel would not burst, and the reason is obvious—the steam no longer inclines to fill more space than the caloric itself will occupy, to which the vessel will give room, and no explosion can take place.

I shall suppose that a boiler to a steam-boat is capable of sustaining a pressure of 50 pounds the square inch; that a pressure of 40 is sufficient to carry the machinery; the fire kept up, the steam generating, and the machinery starts. Now the increase of steam, unless it has a chance to escape as fast as produced, is operating upon the strength of the boiler, and if it rises to the degree of 50, an explosion follows; therefore the greatest caution ought to be exercised in fixing and observing that ratio. After the water becomes converted into steam, the extra or free heat is ready to act and generate more steam; and if cold water be admitted into the boiler, at first it has tendency to lessen the pressure, because it receives the heat until saturated; but from that moment the extra heat converts the water into vapor and adds to the pressure. If there could be a sufficient quantity of water admitted to receive all the free caloric, and condensate all the steam, there would be no danger in introducing it; that however, cannot be done. Under these circumstances, there ought no more to be admitted than will supply what has escaped in steam.

The explosion on the Ohio has been accounted for in this manner. The boat while lying by the shore inclined upon one side—consequently one side of the boiler became greatly heated; and when the boat righted in starting, the water in the boiler came in contact with the heated side, by means of which the steam was rapidly produced, and occasioned the disaster. Such circumstances must be followed by like results, unless the escape be equally rapid with the increase, in my HUMBLE OPINION.

THE REASON WHY MAN CANNOT SEE UNDER WATER.

A man under water, sees objects as a very aged person sees through a concave glass, placed close to the eye.—The fish is long sighted under water and the man is short sighted. If he uses spectacles whose convexity is just double the convexity, or equal in convexity on both sides to the cornea of his own eye, he will see under water.—The necessity of this is obvious; the aqueous humor is of the same density with the water, and there cannot, therefore, be any refraction of the rays in passing from the water into the land-seeing eye.

Euclid and other distinguished ancients, contended and, indeed, suppose that vision was occasioned by the emission of rays from the eye to the object. He thought it more natural to suppose that an animate substance gave an emanation, than that the inanimate body did. In 1560, the opinion that the rays entered the eye, was established. Kepler, in 1600, showed, geometrically, how the rays were refracted through all the humors, so as to form a distinct picture on the retina, and he also demonstrated the effect of glasses on the eyes.

The reasons why Cross-Eyed Persons see only with one eye.

With such as have a permanent squint, (cross-eye) only one eye is attended to, though they may not be apprehensive of the fact. From continued neglect, the distorted organ wanders farther and farther from the axis of vision, till it finally becomes totally useless; hence one is doubtful at times, which way the cross-eyed person is looking, from a want of parallelism in the motions of the eyes.—When the wandering eye is exclusively attended to, the vision appears unimpaired. The image is well painted in the natural one, but weak in the other, solely because the place of the image does not correspond with the place of the image at first. The mind instinctively, therefore, is devoted to the eye that gives the liveliest impression, to the entire neglect of its aberrating fellow.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE MEMOIRS OF FOCHE,

DUKE D'OTRANTO.

It is very difficult to appreciate the value of this work, and much more in the character of the singular man who survived so many revolutions, laying (to use his own expressive phrase) with his head nightly on a scaffold for five and twenty years. His firmness of temper, thorough knowledge of the varying state of parties, his accurate estimate of individual character, that instinct of genius by which he had discovered change in its germs—revolution in its organic form and the meaner instinct for which he provided for himself in the infinite contingencies to which his fortune and his life were hourly exposed, are manifested in the details of this volume of adventures. The truth of the main facts of his disclosures, rest not so much on the credit of the author as upon the history of his time. The recent revolution in France has likewise given a new value to the work from the perfect coincidence of that event with the opinion of Fouché, as evinced in his letters and declaration during the horrors of Jacobinism, the reign of the Directory, the rising fortunes of Bonaparte, his imperial progress and his final fall. The restoration of the Bourbons and the rapid succession of events from that period until the banishment and disgrace of the Duke of Otranto, gave further scope for the development of his variable resources, of that miraculous clearness of vision and that steadiness of purpose which enabled him to control the iron temperament of the Emperor—to modify the resolves of the allied sovereigns, and to force the restored king of France to employ the talents of the murderer of his brother as the surest means of establishing his own throne and of giving a temporary claim to his kingdom.

The morals of the Duke of Otranto were what we call lax, and yet he was benevolent as well as beneficent. He appears to have been seldom swayed by passion; and in the political ethics of his school a fault was worse than a crime. His versatility was wonderful. His combinations with men of all parties, while apparently trusted by and devoted only to one, were so various, so complicated so seemingly contradictory, as at times to make one's head turn in calculating the chances of his disgrace. He at the same time intrigued with the Royalists, guided the Jacobins, influenced the Chouans, had emissaries unknown to the Emperor in England, was courted by the Bourbons, caressed, trusted and suspected by the Imperialists. There is one point, however, in all his vicissitudes of fortune, in all the changeful phases of his times, he seems to have kept steadily in view; it was, that however accident or force might alter the apparent aspects of things, the course of France in her revolutionary movements was still onward. He played with all parties for partial effect; but for permanent power, relied on none but the children of revolution. From the moment of Bonaparte's marriage, the Duke of Otranto dated his downfall and that of the Corsican, and he began to prepare for circumstances by obtaining personal indemnities from the allies, from England, and from the Bourbons. Notwithstanding, and pending his efforts to effect these little matters, he points out in his protests, in his remonstrances, in his strong and eloquent appeals to the Emperor, the necessity of relying upon Republican France; the expediency of calling forth national enthusiasm by concessions and guarantees in favor of the liberties of France and Frenchmen. Liberal institutions, curb upon Imperial power, national privileges and immunities, were alone his means of giving to the falling fortunes of the Emperor a power to resist the accumulating forces of the old European Dynasties. These remonstrances, too, were offered when the Duke was disgraced and under the eye of that very police of which he had been the chief. While looking to the fall of the Emperor as morally certain while considering from the temper of his master, control or modification of his views impracticable and hopeless—while preparing an eventful security and retreat for himself, he still energetically points out to the Emperor at every opportunity peace for a while, as the best policy for France; and if that were desperate, a reliance on the enthusiasm of the Republican Party as the only secure means of securing the Empire and the Emperor from the abyss into which Napoleon's ambition and self-will were about to plunge himself and it. There is something singular in all this, but subsequent events have given the force as it were of accomplished prophecy, to the principles of Fouché's speculative politics. Turning from the Emperor to the rising power of the Bourbons, with whom the Duke of Otranto had made his particular bargain, he urges on the Princes of the house whose head he had been instrumental in bringing to the scaffold, the necessity of basing their power upon the rock of public opinion, upon conceptions to liberty, upon equality of laws, upon the abolition of distinctions not founded on service or merit. In fine, the same language and the same conduct—the same inflexibility in his opinions—the same temporising and ductile policy in reconciling and packing men. He seems to have looked to measures as the source of permanent influence—to men as mere instruments. Such a minister was not an unworthy adviser of the hero of Marengo, but totally useless to the conqueror at Austerlitz. When Napoleon allowed himself to be made a graft upon the legitimate tree of European Monarchy, he committed a great mistake. Still he might have perceived when Austria was cold, and Russia, Prussia and Holland, in fine all Europe combined for his downfall, that he had only to choose between disintegrating his empire and arousing the energies of France by a concession in favor of her wants and her present aspirations. To this latter instead of the former the Duke of Otranto strenuously urged him, putting, however, before him the fair alternative.—Bonaparte could not bend to either—he fell.—The Bourbons who succeeded him, not instructed by events and blind to the causes that recalled them to the throne, though not in the power of their ancestors, were under the same hallucination. They have fallen.

The Historian with a just discrimination of the character of the actors, will class causes and effects in the same chapter of ambitious perverseness and aristocratic pride. Public opinion, when the index of public interest, is the only sure safety-lamp for the practical politician—the only sure guiding star to the political theorist. We may take the lesson home. The Duke of Otranto and the Prince of Benevento were both Ministers of Bonaparte—the former of Police, the latter of foreign affairs. They were both committed by acts against the restoration of the Bourbons; they were both forced by their clear perception of final results, without forgetting the revolution to abandon the man of the revolution, and to trust themselves to the faith of those they had mortally offended.—The former died in exile—the latter lives.

It is worthy of notice that both the Duke and the Prince were disgraced for protesting against the Spanish war and the Russian invasion. Their boldness was equal to their frankness, and the resentment of the Emperor was durable and irritating. Whilst the royal family of Spain were prisoners in France, Mr. and Madame Talleyrand paid them every attention. The Emperor took occasion from this circumstance publicly to sneer at Talleyrand as having incurred from the king of Spain the last disgrace that can befall a husband: to which the ex-minister replied with an imperturbable and immoveable countenance, 'Sire it were well for your majesty's glory and mine that the princes of the house of Spain were never mentioned.' Nothing is more clear than that Talleyrand and Fouché foresaw at an early date that the fabric of Bonaparte's power was tottering, neither had they any confidence in the stability of the restoration. It is not quite so clear that they heartily and honestly strove to prevent the final catastrophe.

Posterity will give them credit for great genius, great coolness, self possession and firmness. Honesty, rectitude and frankness, will scarcely be allowed them. At all events, they deserve the praise of having clearly shown that the dynasty of the Corsican might have been preserved during his life, if not perpetuated after his death. That the Bourbons could only rule by promoting the interests of the nation, and that Europe was on the eve of a revolution that must restore man to his rights and melt Nobility and Royalty, Jesuits, King and Priests, into the mass of the people.

ANECDOTES.

A SNORER.

In the days of yore, when it was fashionable to wear the hair in a queue, a countryman was heard one Sunday snoring most sonorously at church. As he very much annoyed the congregation, the minister despatched the deacon to awaken him. The deacon approached on tip-toe and was about to give him a jog, when what was his astonishment to find his eyes wide open.—'My gracious!' exclaimed the deacon, 'who ever seed the like? a man snoring with his eyes open! Surely it is a judgment upon him sleeping at church. A crowd gathered around and various were the remarks made on the subject of the miracle, when it was finally discovered by an old woman in specks, that the poor man's hair was tied so close to his head, as effectually to prevent him from closing his eyes.

A gentleman from Carolina recently giving us descriptions of the state military tactics at the south, said that a captain one day exercised his men on a point of land, at the junction of two rivers. Instead of the usual direction to front, he said, 'Soldiers, stand with your faces to the Congaree, and your backs to the Saluda!' Another captain ordered his men to 'oblique to the left.' 'That isn't right, Captain,' cried a man in the ranks, 'it is oblique.' 'Do you think I don't know?' replied the officer, 'I tell you it is oblique in my book.'—[Lynn Mirror]

LIVING WRITERS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

NO. X.

Those persons who are familiar with the foreign periodicals may have noticed the effusions of a lady by the name of Mary Anne Browne. She is the author of Mont Blanc, Ada, Repentance, and other poems. She is quite young, and is as fair as young. A vein of religious feeling pervades her compositions. We select as a specimen the following lines from a piece entitled.

MOSS.

How I love to look on the fresh green moss
In the pleasant time of Spring,
When the young light leaves in the quick breeze toss,
Like fairies on the wing.
When it springeth up in woodland walks,
And a natural carpet weaves,
To cover the mass of withered stalks,
And autumn's fallen leaves.

And I love, I love to see it much,
When on the ruin gray,
Which crumbles to Time's heavy touch,
It spreads its mantle gay.
While the bold ivy only gives,
As it shivereth, thoughts of fear,
The closely clinging moss still lives,
Like a friend forever near.

But oh I love the bright moss most,
When I see it thickly spread
On the sculptur'd stone, that fain would boast,
Of the forgotten dead.
For I think if that lowly thing can efface
The fame that earth hath given,
Who is there that would ever chase
Aught that is not of heaven!

Henry Brougham, though an ardent politician, is one of the most distinguished writers of the day. He presents at one view the capacity to generalize and to enter into detail, to classify and to dissect. So many memoirs of this gentleman have already appeared that we shall not attempt to write his biography. We shall only notice a few of the most remarkable points in his career. He was the principal defender of the late Queen of England, and whatever may have been his real opinion of her conduct, he certainly shewed himself fully equal to the management of her extraordinary case.

He has distinguished himself in the House of Commons by his bringing forward with the whole force of his talent and eloquence, motions to extend the liberty of the press, and to inquire into the abuse of charities.

He has advocated the doctrine of general education. His efforts as a lawyer are well known, and in Scotch appeal cases he is very celebrated. He has been a candidate for parliament in several prominent counties, and knows what it is to have warm friends and active enemies, to reap the fruits of success, and to bear with the mortification of defeat. He is the author of the 'Inquiry into the Colonial policy of the European States, in 2 vols. 1808,' and a work on the State of the Nation, in 1 vol.

His articles in the Edinburgh Review are splendid efforts of a masterly intellect. As president of the Society for Diffusing Useful and Entertaining Knowledge, he has been actively engaged in the production and publication of those elegant essays which have appeared in numbers under its patronage.

His present station is the result of untiring industry and great talent. There are many persons who do not hesitate to pronounce him an intriguer, and to say that he has for years had his price.—We are quite unwilling to believe this statement, and we hope that he will be able to confer as many benefits upon the commonwealth of England, as he has upon the republic of letters.

MISCELLANY.

The Providence Daily Advertiser of Thursday last, contains the following letter from Mr. ARNOLD, in answer to the request of the Antimasonic convention, to become a candidate for the office of Governor:

Providence, March 3, 1831.

Dear Sir,—I received yesterday your communication of the 1st instant, made at the request of 'the Antimasonic State Committee, empowered by the Convention of December 29th, to fill vacancies,' informing me 'that they have adopted a resolution to place my name at the head of the Antimasonic ticket for the office of Governor, in place of that of John Brown Francis, Esq. declined.'

Having accepted the nomination of the National Republican Convention of the 17th ultimo to the same office, I shall be pleased to have the support of that portion of my fellow citizens, whom your Committee represent. Although you are acquainted with my views, it may not be improper for me, in giving my assent, to state with frankness, that I am neither a Mason nor an antimason. I consider that the citizens of this state, as such possess equal rights and privileges, without reference to any association to which they may or may not belong, or any name by which they may be called; and should I ever be required to consider or decide any question relating to Masonry or Masonic institutions, I shall endeavor to do it as candidly and impartially as I should any question relating to any other subject. Please assure the Committee, and also their constituents, that I fully appreciate the honor they have done me, and accept yourself my thanks for the delicate manner in which you communicated their wishes, and for the personal interest you have manifested in my success.

I am very respectfully, &c.

B. HALLET, Esq.

On the existence of Animacula in Snow—The following account was sent by Dr. J. E. Mure in a letter to Dr. Silliman.—'When the winter had made considerable progress with much frost, there happened a heavy fall of snow. Apprehending that I might not have an opportunity of filling my house with ice, I threw in snow, perhaps enough to half fill it. There was afterwards severely cold weather, and I filled the remainder with ice.—About Aug. the waste and consumption of the ice brought us down to the snow, when it was discovered that a glass of water, which was cooled with it, contained hundreds of animalcules. I then examined another glass of water out of the same pitcher, and with the aid of a microscope, before the snow was put into it, found it, perfectly clear and pure, the snow was then thrown into it, and on solution the water again exhibited the same phenomenon—hundreds of animalcules, visible to the naked eye with acute attention, and, when viewed through the microscope resembling most diminutive shrimps, and, wholly unlike the eels discovered in the acetous acid, were seen in the full enjoyment of animated nature:

'I caused holes to be dug in several parts of the mass of snow in the ice-house, and to the centre of it, and in the most unequivocal and repeated experiments had similar results; so that my family did not again venture to introduce the snow-ice into the water they drank, which had been a favorite method, but used it as an external refrigerant for the pitcher.

'These little animals may class with the amphibia which have cold blood, and are generally capable in a low temperature, of a torpid state of existence. Hence their icy immersion did no violence to their constitution, and the possibility of their revival by heat is well sustained by analogy; but their generation their parentage, and their extraordinary transmigration, are to me subjects of profound astonishment.'

ORANG OUTANG.

Father Caubasson had so won on the good graces of a young orang outang, that withersoever he went, it was desirous of accompanying him, inasmuch that when he had to officiate on Sunday, he was obliged to confine it. On one occasion however, it had contrived to make its escape and silently mounting the sounding board, lay perfectly quiet until the sermon commenced. It then crept to the edge of the board, and, overlooking its master, counterfeited all his gestures in so grotesque a style, as to excite the risible faculties of the audience. The preacher, surprised and confounded at such unreasonable levity, had recourse to reproof, but without effect, when redoubling his vociferations, the mimic continued to act his part with such ludicrous accuracy, that the congregation gave way to a loud and reiterated laughter. A friend now stepped up, and explained the adventure, when the good humored Father found no small difficulty in preserving his own gravity.

ONE GOOD TURN DESERVES ANOTHER.

Santeuil, a poet of the 17th century, returning one night to the Abbey of St. Victor, at eleven o'clock, was refused admittance by the Porter, on the plea that the prior had absolutely forbidden the doors to be opened at so late an hour. A good deal of altercation ensued; at last the poet slipped a piece of gold under the door, which was opened immediately. When fairly in, he pretended that he had left a book on the stone, where he was sitting during the dispute, and begged the porter to go for it. Encouraged by the generosity of the poet, the man readily complied. In the meanwhile, Santeuil fastened the door; and the porter half naked, was obliged to stand knocking in his turn. 'I cannot let you in,' said the poet; 'I am very sorry for it: but the prior has given positive order not to have the doors opened at so late an hour.' 'I let you in said the porter,' in a very humble tone. 'So you did, replied Santeuil; and I will do you the same good turn for the same price.'

The porter not liking to sleep in the street, and fearful likewise of losing his place, slipped the piece of gold under the door again: saying 'I thought a poet's money would not stay long with me,'—and so gained admittance.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, MARCH 19, 1831.

PETITION OF THE GRAND LODGE.

We continue our notes of the progress of the Petition of the Grand Lodge. Though in our last we brought the subject down to Friday morning, at which time the petition was before the House, in order to a more perfect understanding of the whole matter we must recur to the doings of

THURSDAY.

In the afternoon of this day, the report on the petition of the Grand Lodge was taken up; and after a 'powerful exposition' of the 'many and great evils of Masonry,' by Mr. Lazell, of Bridgewater, the whole subject was indefinitely postponed. [The gentleman here named, we are told, enlightened and edified the House, for about two hours, by reading Bernard's 'Light on Masonry,' and other documents of equal credibility.] Mr. Bigelow of Boston, said he was confident that the vote was taken under a mistake; and, as he felt sure the House did not mean to deny the prayer of the petition, but only to cut short the reading of interminable and unauthenticated documents about Masonry, he would give notice, that he should move a reconsideration of the vote to-morrow.

One or two remonstrances were presented this day. In regard to the remonstrance from North Wrentham, we learn on authority that is not to be questioned, that at least one of the signatures thereto attached, was put there by the hand of a woman, whose husband cannot write his own name, and who hardly possesses intelligence or mind enough to know when he is doing 'right or wrong.'—There are names on that remonstrance also, as on that from Bridgewater, and others already mentioned, that we can prone be obtained by misrepresentation. On the remonstrance from Roxbury, we are told that there are 70 or 80 names of persons, who are unknown to the most aged and business men of the place. It is believed there are no such persons in the town. The remonstrants are generally among the dregs, the offcasts of community. Such men as can be obtained for a gill of rum, to do any unclean or wicked work that the leaders of antimasonry may project. Thanks to the good sense of the legislature they have been repaid with the contempt they merit, and permitted to rest undisturbed under the Speaker's table. There they will probably remain, until the veteran messenger of the House is ordered to see the accumulated filth removed.

FRIDAY.

Mr. Bigelow, of Boston, on moving a reconsideration of the vote by which the report of the Judiciary Committee on the petition of the Grand Lodge was indefinitely postponed, disclaimed having ever been influenced in his public conduct by any feelings connected with the subject of Masonry. Some of the opponents of Masonry in and out of this Hall were his personal friends, and it was not his intention to reflect upon the motives which had induced the gentleman from Bridgewater to adopt a course of argument and reasoning wholly inapplicable to the subject now before the House. The strictures which that gentleman had passed upon the reputed oaths and principles of the higher orders of Masonry could certainly have no bearing in any case upon the lower degrees, which, and which only had anything to do with the Grand Lodge. Besides, what possible bearing can a discussion of the general principles and effects of Masonry have upon the present subject.

Such reasoning might apply if it were now a question of granting or taking away the charter of the Grand Lodge; but in reality all that is asked for is simply a modification of the charter so as to allow the institution to hold less personal, and a proportionable amount more of real estate, for the purpose of enabling the Lodge to erect a Masonic Hall, instead of being obliged to hire their place of meeting as at present. And surely more danger, if any, is to be apprehended from the influence of dollars, in the way of 'bribery, corruption,' &c. than from real estate. The Lodge in thus asking leave to redeem their personal property, have requested that which has invariably been done for other corporations upon application to that effect. If this corporation is mischievous or has done anything worthy of censure, repeal the charter, but until you see cause for doing that, allow it the same privileges which you grant to other incorporated institutions.

But waiving other considerations Mr. B. said that his particular purpose in making the motion was that the question on the report might be fairly taken by the House. A mistake existed yesterday in relation to it; and with all deference to the chair, he thought the decision of the chair was erroneous in relation to the 'main question,' the chair having decided that the 'main question' was the indefinite postponement. The 'previous question' takes precedence of the motion to 'postpone,' and it had been uniformly decided that the motion to postpone indefinitely was the last in order. He thought, therefore, and he believed such was the sense of the House, that the previous question should have taken precedence of the motion to postpone, and not have been applied to it, and that the main question should have been on the acceptance of the report. He did not wish for discussion, and the friends of the measure would not discuss it. He was willing to allow the case to stop after the opening speech of the gentleman from Bridgewater, for the prosecution, and to trust a decision without the advantage of a reply. Whether the report were accepted or rejected he cared less than that a decision of the House should be had understandingly.

Mr. John D. Williams, of Boston, argued the matter with his usual ability, eloquence and pathos. The House was deeply affected, truly! When the learned gentleman rose he seemed to be laboring under a powerful impression of the vast importance of what he was about to say. Our compassion was so much excited that we lost a great portion of the gentleman's argument. We recollect, however, one remark which we thought savored a little of what sailors call having an 'eye to the windward.'—It was this, that the Grand Lodge, and the subordinate Lodges, sell their jewels and give their funds to the Insane Hospital! Was this said with a view to the future interests of the Suffolk Committee? The gentleman himself can have no fears in relation to the stability of that Institution!

A Reverend Mr. Brigham of Randolph, next took the floor. He proposed that the Grand Lodge take $20,000 and send 40,000 Bibles to the valley of the Mississippi.—He contended that as the Grand Lodge of this state had not 'by the necessary papers, signed by its proper officers,' disclaimed their approbation of the Morgan conspirators, 'it must be held answerable to the charge of participating in the same principles!'

Mr. French, of Berkley, read documents to show that Masonry is powerful and mingles in politics, and said that John Brooks was elected Governor of this state by Masonic influence. He thought the reconsideration ought not to prevail.

Mr. Forbes, of Millbury, moved the previous question.

Mr. Sullivan hoped the gentleman would withdraw his motion to allow him to make an explanation, necessary to the dignity of the House and to a just understanding of the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. Forbes said he would withdraw for that purpose.

Mr. Sullivan then made some remarks in vindication of the Judiciary Committee. He said aspersions had been cast upon him, as being interested in the sale of the land to the Grand Lodge. In other times he should request the House to inquire into the abuse cast upon its officers. Some persons, opposed to Masonry, had waited on him and asked a hearing in behalf of the remonstrants; but as these gentlemen had no interest in the object of the petition, the committee thought themselves as capable of judging of the matter as they, and therefore refused to hear them. He spoke of the excitement—said the antimasons were the authors of it, and not the Masons. Let the Masons alone and they would injure nobody. He had been 80 years in public life.—14 in the service of the militia, and long acquainted with most every walk in life, and he had never seen any bad effect arise from Masonry. He thought it was productive of positive good, and that the legislature would be doing its duty to put its seal upon antimasonry.

Mr. Forbes renewed his motion, and the House refused to reconsider the vote by which the subject was indefinitely postponed. Yeas, 128—Nays, 133.

CONCLUSION.

To such of our readers as are unacquainted with the circumstances which led to the result, the rejection of the prayer of the petitioners may appear somewhat unaccountable. We frankly acknowledge that we did not expect it. We were aware of the strong prejudice—of the settled determination of the members of the House, not to permit a discussion of the loathsome subject of antimasonry to take place; but we did not expect that, even to effect an object by them so much desired, they would sacrifice the just and reasonable request of the petitioners. And from conversations had with several gentlemen who voted for the indefinite postponement, we are persuaded that if the question had been fairly stated, or properly understood, on Thursday evening, the bill would have passed by a vote of 7-8ths of the members. But it was not understood, and therefore the only opportunity to pass the bill without discussion, was lost. Had the motion for reconsideration, made by Mr. Bigelow on Friday morning prevailed, the subject would have been fairly open for debate—it could not have been avoided. To this, a majority of the members were opposed. The result is known. Besides, the session was near its close—last Saturday was fixed on by the Senate for a recess,—much important business remained to be acted on,—many of the members had already gone home, and the others were impatient to follow them. It was generally believed that if the subject was opened for debate, it would occupy the attention of the House for several days; and this belief was strengthened by the introduction of a large portion of the antimasonic library, by the eloquent and erudite orator from Bridgewater. He had already given the House a foretaste of what was to come, in the reading of half of Elder Bernard's book!—But whether the fear of this, formidable as it was, furnished a sufficient reason for sacrificing the rights, (for so we regard the request of the petitioners,) of a portion of their fellow-citizens; whether by so doing the gentlemen who voted in the negative, acted consistently with their obligations as the Representatives of the whole people, is a question that may perhaps as well be settled in their own breasts as anywhere else.

We are told that Masons ought to be satisfied with the result, inasmuch as the House have unequivocally expressed their disapprobation and abhorrence of antimasonry, by refusing to listen to the abusive accusations and inflammatory harangues of its leaders. If the Grand Lodge is put to some trifling inconvenience, or has been denied that which, if granted, could be of no essential service to it, the general cause of Masonry has received more than an equivalent by the disrespectful manner in which antimasonry has been excluded from the House; in the marked contempt with which the remonstrances and petitions have been regarded. And so far as we are individually interested, we are satisfied. It has demonstrated to us that the base persecution now raging in all its violence against the Masonic Institution, is not sanctioned by any considerable portion of either branch of our legislature. In the Senate there are but four antimasons; and in the House there are not probably more than twenty; and not more than five or six of these are capable of taking any active part in the matter. But how far the measure is justifiable on the principles of 'equal and exact justice,' is a question we are not at present disposed to discuss. The request of the Grand Lodge was simple and reasonable, and nothing more than what the petitioners had a right to expect would be granted, even though the gentlemen of the House might feel a reluctance to listen to a tissue of abusive misrepresentations from our opponents and persecutors. It is true that the modification asked for in the petition is a matter of little consequence to the interests of the Grand Lodge. Indeed, in our opinion, the act of corporation itself is a mere shadow—a thing incapable of good or harm. The business of the Grand Lodge can be as well and as safely conducted without it. The Grand Lodge has no occasion for litigation;—it can enter into no commercial, manufacturing, or other speculations; and it can hold as many Temples as it has or can procure means to erect, without any special authority from the legislature, or any other body. We cannot, therefore, perceive that the granting or rejection of the petition was a matter either to be particularly desired or regretted.

There is one view of the subject to which we reluctantly advert. We have intimated that the question was not fairly stated by the Chair on Thursday. In this opinion we are sustained by gentlemen experienced in parliamentary debates. We would not impugn the motives of the Chair in giving the decision it did. We have no doubt that it acted honestly, but we have doubts whether it acted correctly. There is one other fact in this connexion that we feel it our duty to state. Several attempts were made by the friends of the bill, to speak in its support; and we think more than one of them had a just claim to the floor. The chair either did not hear them, or thought otherwise. We understand that many gentlemen of the House were extremely anxious the day previous, that the Grand Lodge should withdraw the petition! These gentlemen are not Masons, they say they are not antimasons; but they are politicians.—Did they believe that if the Governor should be required to put his signature to the bill, and should do so, it would affect his popularity with the antimasonic party?—that it might endanger his election? Did the powerful array of 1000 or 2000 names, so essentially affect the political nerves of certain gentlemen, that they deemed it safer to surrender the rights of a class of their fellow-citizens, than to hazard the consequences? We trust no such unhallowed motives operated to produce the result; and we wish there were no grounds for suspicion to rest upon. In our editorial capacity, we know no distinction in political parties; but that party, of whatever name or creed, that will debase itself by an unnatural connexion with a faction so worthless and unprincipled, as the antimasonic, is unworthy of the support of honest and honorable politicians.

REV. MOSES THACHER.—Pierce and Parker have just published a report of a committee of the Church in the North Parish in Wrentham, on the reply of the Rev. Moses Thacher to their request to administer to them the Lord's Supper, with an Appendix, containing a statement of facts—and appalling facts too,—exhibited to the Ecclesiastical Council convened in the North Parish in Wrentham. We have not room to day for a review of this pamphlet, but we would recommend it to all persons who feel an interest in the matter to which it relates, as the most important document that has yet appeared on the subject. The facts disclosed are such as would cover any other man than Moses Thacher with disgrace and infamy. What effect they may have on him, we shall not attempt to predict. More anon.

The Remonstrants.—We are requested by Mr. Chas. French, apothecary, at the north part of the city, to say that if the name of Charles French on the remonstrance against the petition of the Grand Lodge, be intended for him, it is a base forgery. The remonstrance was presented to him for his signature, but he never signed it.—Though not a Mason, he has no wish to be classed with antimasons.

MORGAN TRIALS.

"It seems the light is coming out at last—and the fate of Morgan is beginning to be ascertained—and what is singular, the Regency Judges and Regency Special Counsels, as Tharlow Weed calls them, are the only men who brought the truth out. What will the political antimasons say to this? what will J. C. Spencer? There is no doubt of the fact that the 'political anties' have been the most industrious during the last few years, in spiriting away evidence and keeping back facts for the mere purpose of making a political handle of the mysterious fate of Morgan. Tharlow Weed knows something of the mode in which he caught a witness and let him again slip through his fingers. By the inflexible firmness and perseverance of republican judges, such as Judge Marcy, and Judge Nelson, and such Counsel as Mr. Birdseye, the perpetrators of that outrage against the laws will be discovered and brought to punishment—social harmony and unanimity restored to the west—and such a ridiculous political faction as that headed by Weed, Tracy, Grauger & Co., deprived of the only nutriment that held it together."

[We copy the above from the New York Courier and Enquirer of Saturday last. We sincerely hope that the truth of the prediction of the editors will be fully established. We trust in heaven that the fiend-like perpetrators of that daring and unhallowed outrage against the laws of God and man, 'will be discovered and brought to punishment.' This has ever been our most earnest prayer. It has been the sincere prayer of the whole Masonic fraternity. If the offence were committed by Masons, it was no less an offence against the precepts of Masonry than against the laws of God. Masonry neither sanctions nor justifies crime; whether committed by Masons or by others. If a Mason commit crimes which dishonor him as a citizen, he is also dishonored as a Mason. The very act that deprives him of his privileges as a free citizen, deprives him also of his privileges as a Freemason. There is no compromise of character in Masonry. When a member of a Lodge ceases to be a man, he ceases to be a Mason: when he violates the moral laws of God, that moment he violates the fundamental principles of Masonry. We speak of Masonry as we have learned it. We speak of it as it exists in New England. We have taken all the degrees acknowledged in this section of the country; and we pledge our reputation as a man; and, as we hope for happiness hereafter, solemnly declare, that we speak the words of truth. We know not that this declaration will have the weight of a feather on the minds of our opponents; but we do trust that those who know us, will believe us to be sincere, when we express a hope that the perpetrators of this unrighteous outrage, may be 'discovered and brought to punishment.'

We think there cannot be a doubt that the perpetrators would long since have been detected, had not the power to do so, been invested in the hands of persons whose pecuniary and political interests were intimately connected with their escape or concealment. Much contumely has been cast upon Mr. Birdseye, by the antimasonic presses. He has been frequently charged with being in the interest of Masons; with a lack of information in relation to the business of his appointment; with inefficiency of purpose, and want of decision of character, &c.—the result will show with what propriety he has been thus calumniated. If we know anything of the principles and views of political antimasons, the discovery of the perpetrators is the very thing they least desire. It is what the leaders of that party have been most solicitous to prevent. John C. Spencer, as Special Council, labored for years, and what did he effect? He squandered seventeen or eighteen thousand dollars of the people's money; raised the excitement; indicted scores of innocent men; subpoenaed hundreds of useless witnesses, kept them dancing attendance on Courts, while their farms were going to ruin; and finally, when the Governor would not be duped and made the instrument of bribery, threw up his commission in a huff; turned antimasonic office seeker, and left the mystery still more a mystery than when he undertook to disclose it! This was antimasonic investigation!—Mr. Birdseye,—the Masonic Special Council, as the venal presses of antimasonry were pleased to call him—in less than a year, has probed the mystery to its bottom, and will, by the blessing of God, bring the perpetrators of that horrid transaction to condign punishment! This, if antimasonic authority be taken, is Masonic investigation!

When we receive the particulars of these disclosures, from a source that may be credited, we shall lay them before our readers.]—Ed. Masonic Mirror.

ANTIISM IN LEXINGTON.—We learn that an antimasonic convention was held at Lexington last week, for purposes connected with the election in Middlesex. The convention was composed of sixteen persons, including the Reverend Mr. Sanborn, of South Reading—the man who figured somewhat ridiculously in the infamous State Convention held in this city, rather more than a year since. They nominated a list of Senators, most, if not all, of whom are decidedly opposed to the hypocrisy, trickery and villany of antimasonry. A county committee was also chosen, and delegates appointed to attend the contemplated Convention in this city.

At the election in Lexington last week, the most desperate efforts were made by these men, to secure the election of their candidates. Caucuses were held almost every night during the preceding week; the most deceptive and dishonorable means were resorted to for the purposes of cheating the electors, and imposing upon them men whom they despised; men wholly unqualified for public stations. But the good sense of the citizens of Lexington enabled them to penetrate their base artifices, to strip the cloak of hypocrisy from the monster, and to hold him up in his naked deformity to the scorn and contempt of an insulted community. The managers in this disgraceful transaction were boldly met and defeated at every point; and it will probably be long before they attempt to reenact the ridiculous farce.

VERY, VERY HONORABLE! There are some transactions of which abandoned and malignant men may be guilty, that are rather calculated to excite our contempt, than our anger. A case of this kind occurred here on Saturday night last. We allude to the disfiguring of the basement stones of the Masonic Temple! A transaction which will subject the contractor to an expense of some dollars. It can have no other effect, unless it be to exhibit the magnanimity of the antimasonic faction in this city. We leave it with an intelligent community to give to this transaction its proper name; and to estimate the character of the cause that attempts to sustain itself by such means. We have no comments to offer.

We perceive by the doings of the legislature, that Mr. Thacher introduced an order on Wednesday, and a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law against maiming or defacing buildings, fences and building materials, by cutting, staining, painting or otherwise. In our opinion the introduction of such an order was a gratuitous act. If the gentleman will point out to us the wretch who committed the base outrage in view, there will be no difficulty in finding a law to punish him. It requires no very discriminating intellect to perceive what the Reverend gentleman designed by this move!

BISHOP HOBART.—Messrs. R. P. & C. Williams have just received a very neat and, to Episcopalians, interesting little volume purporting to be a collection of Sermons on the Death of the Right Reverend John Henry Hobart, D. D. Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the state of New-York; with a Memoir of his Life and Writings. The Bishop was born at Philadelphia, Sept. 14th, 1775, while the Continental Congress was at the critical juncture of its session in that city, a few months before they issued the immortal charter of our liberties.—He was a worthy and good man, a fine scholar, eloquent speaker, and devout Christian. He died on the 12th of September last. The portrait appended to the volume is a very beautiful specimen of that class of engraving. It is worth the price of the book.

THE WREATH.

LUNATIC GIRL.

[BY J. G. PERCIVAL.]

'T was on a moonlight night like this,
We took our last farewell;
And as he gave his parting kiss,
I felt my bosom swell:
He said, 'Adieu, my Caroline,'
But I said not a word;
Yet never heart was found like mine—
How wild that dark bush stirred!

The moon was round, the moon was bright,
The moon was riding high;
It was just such a pleasant night,
As he was standing by:
The sweet bird sung his roundelay,
He mocked me all night long;
'T is winter, and he's flown away,
Or I should hear his song.

The moon looks down upon the spring—
She cannot melt it, though;
The pretty bird has spread its wing—
He does not love the snow.
The wind blows hard—they say at sea
Such winds will raise a storm;
I wish my love was here by me—
My heart should keep him warm.

I have a hat of straw for thee—
I wove it, and I wept
To think thou wert so far at sea,
And I the toy have kept:
I made a basket, which I filled
With lilies to the brim;
But plucking them their beauty killed,
And so I thought of him.

They say the moon loves such as I—
Her love is very cold;
She floats so softly through the sky,—
I'd take her down and fold
My cloak around her snowy face,
And warm her on my heart—
Oh no!—she needs a warmer place—
How could we ever part?

What can my heart have done to make Me love so much the moon?
My fingers are so cold they ache—
I shall be frozen soon;
I would not love my lover so—
My tears are never dry;
I hear him call and I must go—
And so, sweet, moon, good bye!

MISCELLANY.

GENEROUSITY REWARDED.

During one of the wars in India, Major Gowdie became Tippoo's prisoner, and was confined with many other gentle gentlemen in Bangalore, where they suffered every species of insult, hardship, and barbarity. A humane and beneficent butcher, whose business led him often to the prison saw and felt for their sufferings, for they had been stripped of their clothes and robbed of their money before they were confined. It would have cost the butcher his ears at least, and perhaps his life, had he discovered any symptoms of pity for the prisoners before his countrymen. They were allowed only one seer of rice, and a pice, or half-per day, for their subsistence; but the butcher contrived to relieve their necessities. Upon opening the shees' heads which they frequently bought of him for food they were astonished to find pagodas in them. In passing the yard of their prison, he often gave them abusive language, and threw balls of clay or dirt at them, as if to testify his hatred or contempt; but on breaking the balls they always found that they contained a supply of money for their relief: and this he did frequently for a long time, until the prisoners were released.

In the following war, Major Gowdie was destined to attack Bangalore: and he had not long entered the breach, when he saw and recollected his friend the butcher. He ran with eagerness to embrace him, saved him from the carnage, and led him to a place of safety. The transports of the two generous souls at their meeting gave the most pleasing sensations to all who beheld them; it softened the rage of the soldiers, and made the thirst of blood give way to the soft emotions of humanity.

ATHEISM.—AN EXTRACT.

Miserable is the blindness of the mental eye—terrible is the darkness which shrouds the soul in its mysterious gloom. Better would it be to live in all worldly pain with a blessed futurity awaiting your approach, like sweet happiness and love, prepared for the weary wanderer over the ocean of darkness and storm, than feel the consciousness of present being, bewildered with the withering idea that that being must end. Better that we were drenched in long ages of agony, triumphing over the gloomy desolation of the heart, if it may only end at last, than to think that the joyous soul can be hurled from its blessed and beautiful career of hope and life into that eternal lethargy, that dreamless slumber—that annihilation of thought, feeling, and affection, never again to be awakened into their delicious existence. Such an idea to an aspiring mind would come over all its young affections as blasting as the poisonous air of Arabia upon the flowers which withered at its touch. The idea is revolting to reason. To be no where in all the wide and interminable extent of this vast creation—while the sun's bright ray yet shines as it was wont to do—and the moon yet wheels in her beautiful circle, serene and undecaying midst the storms of time—while all the universe keeps on in the same regular undeviating and silent revolution—turning and returning from year to year, and age to age; and yet to be apart from all these things, to hold no hope nor joy, nor sympathy in their unchanging and noiseless perfection. The sense of life eternal; the joy of virtue and innocence; the young budding hopes of future bliss; the sweet and absorbing love; the adoration of beautiful woman; all cut off in their dream-like being, and that most brilliant and wonderful creation of God; the soul of his creature, just as it was opening to the warmth of its faculties, to the energies of its inconceivable nature, to be hurled into the deep and tremendous nothingness which wrenches down the young spirit in the blackest night for ever and forever.

DUELLING.—I allow that gothic appeals to cold iron are no better proofs of honesty and veracity, than hot iron and burning ploughshares are of female chastity. But a soldier's honor is as delicate as a woman's—it must not be suspected.—

TO MOSES THACHER,

Member of the Senate of Massachusetts, Ex-Minister of 'the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham,' Present Minister of 'the Church in North Wrentham,' Member of the late 'Antimasonic State Convention of Massachusetts,' Member of the late 'National Antimasonic Convention,' Seceding Mason, Antimasonic Lecturer, and Editor of the Antimasonic 'Boston Telegraph.'

LETTER IX.

SIR:

In your 'Address on Masonic oaths and penalties,' you state one reason why the obligations of Masons are not binding, which in your mouth is truly a singular argument. You say of the candidate:

'Instead of finding an equivalent, he finds nothing like it. The Institution is neither ancient, moral, scientific nor charitable; but the contrary. The conditions, therefore on the part of the promisee (the Institution) are altogether false; and the candidate, of course, is justly released from his obligation.' p. 21.

You could not well have employed a worse argument against yourself. It proves at least that you are guilty of MEAN SUBTERFUGE.

You suppose a Mason does not find 'an equivalent' when 'he pays his money,' and that 'the candidate, of course, is justly released from his obligation.' I confess, this is the very first time I ever have known a Christian minister make the force of his moral obligation depend on the reception of his legal rights, he settling the value of those rights. The candidate 'pays his money,' and thereupon he becomes a member of the Masonic Institution. Is not the condition of membership, so far as the consideration is concerned, complied with as fully and completely as in obtaining membership in any other institution?

But even admitting your doctrine to be correct, what was your valuable consideration for which you did not 'find an equivalent'? You absolve the Mason from his obligation because he does not receive 'an equivalent' when he 'pays his money.' Suppose, sir, he does not 'pay his money'—what then? Why, it follows that he receives something, without a 'consideration,' and if that something be of no value in his estimation, still as it is gratuitous, as he does not 'pay his money,' there is no failure of 'an equivalent.' Wherein, then, was you injured? You did not pay your money. You came into the Institution without money. You received its honors without price. Even if the Institution was of no value to you, most certainly you had been of no value to the Institution. There was neither consideration nor 'equivalent.' You cannot then apply to your own case the result of your reasoning: that 'the candidate of course, is justly released from his obligation.' Do you not perceive that, on your own reasoning, the negative of that inference is true, as applicable to yourself: that the candidate, of course is not released from his obligation? How, sir, can you escape from your own meshes? Here is your own reasoning; here is your own inference; and here you stand convicted of violating your obligation, on your own testimony, without the miserable justification that you received no 'equivalent'—without the poor apology that you did not receive your money's worth.

But there is another view of this memorable moral corollary, in the doctrine of considerations and equivalents, that may never have presented itself to you in your search for moral justifications. One 'equivalent' that an honest candidate finds, 'when he pays his money,' is, that he perceives bitter animosities among men for difference of opinion to be altogether unjustifiable; and that it is better to indulge in kind feelings toward those who differ from us, than in those unrighteous maledictions that are so little consonant to the mild spirit of Christian forgiveness.

Among the 'equivalents' that Masonry offers, it is true there is no engagement that the 'candidate' shall be honored with political distinction, by becoming a candidate for a seat in the Congress of the United States, or even by becoming a Member of the Senate of Massachusetts. If the ardent ambition of an aspiring 'candidate' be sometimes disappointed, the world will give him little credit for compromising with his integrity for political purposes, and sending his reputation into the political shambles of the day. Suppose, sir, immediately on your becoming a Mason, all the members had united to elect you, and had succeeded in electing you, to the Senate of Massachusetts; would that 'equivalent' have been adequate to the force of your 'obligation'? Prepare, sir, a table of 'equivalents,' side by side with Masonic obligations, that the dealers and bargainers in Duplicity, Apostacy and Perjury, may learn the value of 'oaths and obligations;' but spare the Institution of Masonry from the charge of neglecting to gratify the political ambition of its members, and driving them to antimasonry to find their 'equivalent.'

It has occurred to me as a matter somewhat strange, that you, who labor so furiously and so zealously to persuade your followers that Masons are bound to help each other to business, to emolument and to office,—never had received from the hands of Masons some demonstration of their good will, by advancing you to some office of 'honor, trust or profit.' Sir, your own example makes you a very bad argument for your cause, or proves that you was a very bad member of the Masonic Institution. The inference is against you. Your want of success proves either the badness of your argument, or the badness of your Masonic character.

If Masons had promoted your worldly expectations and condition, beyond mere acts of kindness and charity, your flaming zeal would never have been kindled at the persecuting fires of antimasonry; nor would their baleful light have led you through the dark and crooked by-ways of political intrigue. You tried Masonry; but it did not aid your ambition. You tried antimasonry; and it has made you—a Senator!

I am, Sir, yours,

FENELON.

ANTIMASONRY.—There is now a prospect that antimasonry has got its death blow in the recent trials at Lockport. The fate of Morgan is now known. At the recent town elections, the antimasons have been generally defeated.—[N. Y. Courier.]

REVIEW

Of the Rev. Mr. Fergusson's Letters to the Rev. Moses Thacher, Pastor of the North Church of Wrentham.

Mr. Fergusson's third objection to Masons. 'Their pretensions to religion. What those pretensions were,' observes Mr. Fergusson, 'I know not; but I have seen the Bible, and what to my ignorance seemed to represent the ark of the covenant, carried in their processions; and I knew that their forms of prayer had no respect to a Mediator. And I felt, and I should then have said that you [Mr. Thacher,] felt, that no man, nor body of men had a right to approach the throne of God, in their own polluted lips, or, even in form, to set aside the intercession of a Mediator.'

We have much reason to believe that Mr. Fergusson was most sincere in his preceding objection; we thank him for his plainness and candor, because it gives us an opportunity to make him better acquainted with the principles of the institution, and remove errors derived from impure sources and incorrect suggestions. We wish to make him distinctly understand, that Masonic societies have never considered themselves, religious institutions, in the sense, which all religious denominations are known to be established; they, as firmly contradict the insinuation, that they are antireligious. All religious sects and denominations are founded on creeds, which are their articles of faith. It is well known these doctrines of faith are various and contradictory to each other; and to which individuals, on becoming members, respectively must assent. To all these, we as Masons have no objections, because the society does not recognise any articles of religious faith; in so doing the Masonic Institution would become a religious society in some form, as all religious sects are. It is known that different and opposing articles of religious faith are sources of discordant feelings of men in the same neighborhood, not unfrequently in the same religious society upon doctrines of faith; but much less so now than formerly; as moral science is improved, charity is more cultivated and doctrines of faith less insisted upon. Mankind are also divided in opinions upon forms and administration of government. Political discussions between individuals and larger bodies are far from being conducted by a spirit of neighborly and brotherly love. Political controversies introduce into society all the vindictive feelings, not unfrequently overt acts of the most corrupt heart.—St. Paul, where speaking of 'Faith, Hope, and Charity,' gives the pre-eminence to Charity.

Masonic societies are established on the broad basis of Charity, united by bonds of love, goodness and benevolence, not merely as speculative virtues, but such as may be brought into operation in life. The doctrines of Charity are assented too by all religious denominations and sects: upon these, there is no difference of opinions among Christians, Jews and Mahometans. The doctrines of Charity are derived from the word of God. Is it become a matter of wonder, the Masonic institutions should publicly and solemnly exhibit the sacred volume from which they are taught the divine precepts of Charity?—As the belief of one God and the moral precepts of Charity, are only required by Masons, no religious denomination, or sectarian can object to the principles of the institution, leaving each individual at liberty to continue in the articles of faith, which, he has received by education, or may choose to embrace. To the doctrines of Charity there can be no objection, except for the purpose of opposition; when a purpose is the avowed object, misrepresentations and perversions are resorted to. As the Masonic Institution, as such, is not fettered by religious articles of faith, it cannot be opposed to any religious doctrines whatever the belief may be, for it is shown that religious sects and denominations are only known by their specific articles of faith. Hence may be understood, the harmony of lodges is never interrupted by dogmas of faith, or religious creeds. Neither doctrines of faith on religious subjects, nor political discussions are allowed by Masonic regulations to interfere with the charitable designs and benevolent operations of lodges.

We cannot but think it strange, that Mr. Ferguson should advance the sentiment 'that no man, or body of men had a right to approach the throne of God [in prayer we presume he meant] in their own polluted lips, or, even in form to set aside the intercession of a Mediator.' Mr. Ferguson will not object that all mankind are sinners, and that sinners are required to pray for Divine blessings. If all men are sinners, who are required to pray except polluted men? In that form of prayer which Jesus Christ taught us to use in our devotions, His holy name is not literally mentioned. There are Christians, who believe themselves as orthodox, as Mr. Ferguson may esteem himself, who differ from him in opinion respecting the understanding of those passages of the apostolic writings, where the name Mediator is mentioned. We do not say that Mr. Ferguson discovered sensitiveness, on account of sectarian feelings, when he expressed the above sentiment. As Masons we are not disposed to controvert the subject. There are many Masons who will acknowledge his opinions correct. We are now defending the principles of Masons, and hope to satisfy Mr. Ferguson by fair statements of their correctness, short of theological disquisitions. The doctrines of religious faith must be settled by sectarians, not by Masons in their Masonic characters.—We have already said that Masons do not consider their institutions religious; and that religious sects are founded on articles of faith.

With respect to the omission of the Mediatorial office of Christ, in their addresses to the throne of heaven, of which Masons are implicitly charged; it is to be remembered, that ancient Masonry, (its first seven degrees) had its origin long previous to the Christian era. This fact, it may be hoped will be received a competent reason, why the name of Jesus Christ, in so many words, is not alluded to, in the Masonic form of prayer. It is to be further observed, that Masons have not nor do admit innovation in their essential principles, nor ancient forms. There is indubitable evidence Masons do not object to the sacred name of Jesus Christ in their religious devotions, besides that holy name is recognised in the more modern degrees of knight templars. The last are conferred upon those, only, who previously, have received the degrees of ancient Masonry. When the Masonic institution was first established, Jehovah, the God of heaven and earth was the only name known, as the true object of worship. The above facts remove the imputation, cast upon the institution by misrepresentations, that it was antichristian in principle. Pretensions to antiquity, which have been assumed from time immemorial are objected to. There are casual notices of the institution interspersed in the history of the middle ages, many centuries further back than its opponents admit; and then it was denominated ancient. We are superciliously asked, where are the records of its antiquity found? We can assign a valid reason, why its ancient records have not been handed down in usual form. Being a secret society, the fact known they were such, would have proved the destruction of all the members.—It has ever been the policy of all arbitrary governments to suppress secret societies whatever their forms, under apprehension of intrigues and plots against tyrannical power. Although we boast not of ancient records, yet we have the principles engraved on our memories; they are found in the symbolic language of the institution, preserved from time immemorial down to the present period.

Next to the sacred oracles, the principles of the institution are more clearly defined, more distinctly preserved by its emblems than the most ancient historic facts relative to events of the nations and kingdoms of the earth.

In this connexion we will call the reader's attention to the sacred oracles. There we learn, there had been a gradual declension in religion and morals from the first lapse of man to the flood; also, from Noah to the period of Nimrod. His posterity, when employed in building the city, and in their impious attempt to erect the Tower of Babel, were dispersed by the confusion of language.—From that time to the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ; dark ages of more than two thousand years; idolatrous worship prevailed throughout the nations of the earth. The name of Jehovah was lost. Excepting the knowledge of Him restored to the Hebrew nation, first through Abraham, next by Moses, true worship was perverted to idolatrous rites by all other nations; whence originated their mythology, which, under various forms was transmitted down to ancient Greece and Rome. Although idolatrous worship had become the established worship of nations under severest penalties for disobedience, yet it cannot but be supposed, there were individuals, who notwithstanding the threatened proscriptions of that age, worshipped the true God, if not openly, yet in families, or in secret association.

Secrecy was a necessary bond of union, as it was important for their preservation. Their emblems involving their essential benevolent principles become their signs of recognition. These emblems inscribed on the tablets of memory, were more durable than their open exhibition engraved on metals, or stone, which would have led to the destruction of the institution. Hence Masonic emblems are more authentic evidence of their antiquity, than have many portions of ancient history, the source of tradition and fable. We might enlarge, but the limits of a newspaper communication reminds us we must not proceed.

'Experientia docet.'

Being at one time, Mr. Editor, in a vacillating state of opinion respecting the tendencies of the Masonic order, a state not founded on any feeling produced by positive knowledge or observation of any evil arising therefrom, I commenced a regular examination as far as was practicable, of what was then within my reach, and the result of which I will here detail; but first I must premise (and the reason of my eventual adoption may be wholly founded on it) that I was unbiased by any unworthy motive of political or worldly advancement, and I wish I could state the same of those who were at my elbow, to enlist my feelings in their pursuit. For, with the enemies of Masonry I first took part, heard from one of their leaders all he could urge in his support, and finally attended the exposé at Boylston Hall. And here commenced a revolution of opinion, a downright horror of those men, who could have cast off from their consciences those promises, which even as told by themselves, were of such solemnity, and so binding on all who 'have souls.' With the abettors of such I then could no longer assimilate. I saw among the leaders there, sanctioning by their acclamations the miserable being whose object was '25 cents from each,' men whom I knew were as unenlightened and as selfish as any in the community; whose very ignorance would have hurt any cause, except such an one as theirs. On the other side the Masons could only be judged by their deeds and associates. Their charities I positively knew and their associates were comprised among those whom the world was proud to acknowledge.

From such experience, even from their own mouths, from their own measures was I induced to become a Mason. Indeed, Master Allyne can effect something advantageously. Ever from so foul a stream may be derived an eventual good. But it is truly 'ex fumo dare lucem.'

I am now, and it is my glory, a Mason; and in this society have I truly found unity, harmony and friendship.—

And I advise those who now 'halt between two opinions,' to weigh these two parties in their respective balances.—If thus canvassed, the result cannot be doubtful. For, let any one read the names of those who signed the protest against the Grand Lodge, and if he is not satisfied that obscurity, ignorance and selfish ends, are the sole components of this ill-assorted mass, then prejudice must have effectually blinded his optics.

Mr. Editor, I am not accustomed in any way to obtrude my views upon the public, but I could not repress the desire of giving to the community, the experience of a

QUONDAM ANTI.

ABDUCTION TRIALS.—A special court for these cases is now in session at Lockport. Elisha Adams has been tried, but the jury could not agree upon a verdict and were discharged. Eleven were for convicting and only one against. This is the Adams to whom the special counsel, John C. Spencer, wished the governor to give two thousand dollars and a pardon, as a bribe, to induce him to swear away the life of somebody, and the very narrow escape he has from conviction already, makes it apparent enough that he would not have been very backward in closing with so good a bargain. The court were proceeding with the other causes, and Adams of course, is to be tried again.

The notorious Giddins was admitted as a witness in the case of Adams, and it is said that his disclosures implicated him as being fully as culpable as he has acknowledged himself in his almanac.

But little of the proceedings of the trials has yet been published, as we have understood that the court had desired the evidence should not be made public while the trials were pending — [Fredonia N. Y. censor.]

BASE IMPOSITION.—Our readers have probably noticed an advertisement in our paper of the 28th ultimo, purporting to be an expulsion of Samuel W. Porter and Samuel G. Hawkins, from St. John's Lodge, No. 31, for 'un-masonic conduct.' During the last week, we have received a letter from the Secretary of the Lodge, notifying us that no such proceeding had ever taken place, and that the advertisement was a base malicious imposition! We forbear to detail the probable motives that led to this manoeuvre, we have no wish to intermeddle with the actions or opinions of a certain faction in this state, but the fellow who sent us the advertisement, shall have his reward to the full extent, if we can learn his name. So base and detestable an action should not go unpunished.

[Vt. Patriot.]

What being is there on earth more dangerous than a Judas? The same is he, who from adventitious circumstances, numbers himself with your friends, worms himself into your confidence and affections, with cool calculating heartlessness, in moments of unreserved freedom of communication, draws disconnected sentences and abstract ideas from your mind, which he treasures up for future weapons against you. These double-faced insinuating hypocrites, have a greater effect to dis sever the strongest cords of social intercourse, and to compel many an honorable, generous soul, to abandon the world in disgust, and look upon all mankind, as enemies to truth and social happiness, than all the corruptions incident to our fallen natures.

[Erie Observer.]

Ezra S. Coiser, Esq. has been re-elected President of the village of Utica, by a majority of 550, over James Platt, Esq. the antimasonic candidate. Mr. Platt received 42 votes, which the Observer thinks is a pretty liberal estimate of the antimasonic strength in that village, as aside from his connexion with the antimasonic party, he received considerable support in consequence of his personal popularity. From this we should judge that antimasonry, in Utica, was looking up.

Mr. Joseph Morton of Norfolk has declined the nomination of his antimasonic friends, for the Senate.—Francis Brinley was chairman of the Convention at which he was nominated.

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

SELECTED.

The Life of Sir Humphrey Davy. By Dr. Paris.

We must at present content ourselves by abstracting from Dr. Paris's able volume such traits and anecdotes as are illustrative of the personal character of Davy; and this we think will be more consistent with the tone of our Journal and more agreeable to the curiosity of our readers than scientific disquisition, which, in such a place, must necessarily be superficial and confined. It would be superfluous too. All the world knows of Davy's fame, and of his deeds as a philosopher, but only a very small portion of it are acquainted with his very interesting character as a man. Let our columns, therefore, help to disseminate a knowledge of a few of those incidents which marked the philosopher's private life, and which will, in future, be treasured up with other personal anecdotes of the illustrious dead, among whom the great chemist must now be ranked.

One of Sir H. Davy's Experiments.

Mr. Watt's observation on the respiration of diluted hydro-carbonate by man, and experiments of D. Beddoes on the destruction of animals by the same gas, proved that its effects were highly deleterious.

As it destroyed life, apparently by rendering the muscular fibre irritable, without producing any previous excitement, I was anxious to compare its sensible effects with those of nitrous oxide, which at this time I believe to 'destroy life by producing the highest excitement.

In the first experiment, I breathed for nearly a minute three quarts of hydro-carbonate mingled with nearly two quarts of atmospheric air. It produced a slight giddiness, pain in the head, and a momentary loss of voluntary power; my pulse was rendered much quicker and more feeble. These effects, however, went off in five minutes, and I had no return of giddiness.

Emboldened by this trial, I introduced into a silk bag four quarts of gas nearly pure, which was carefully produced from the decomposition of water by charcoal an hour before, and which had a very strong and disagreeable smell.

My friend Mr. James Tobin, junior, being present, after a forced exhaustion of my lungs, the nose being accurately closed, I made three inspirations and expirations of the hydro-carbonate. The first inspiration produced a sort of numbness and loss of feeling in the chest, and about the pectoral muscles. After the second, I lost all power of perceiving external things, and had no distinct sensation, except that of a terrible oppression on the chest.—During the third inspiration, this feeling subsided, I seemed sinking into annihilation, and had just power enough to cast off the mouthpiece from my unclosed lips.

A short interval must have passed, during which I respired common air, before the objects around me were distinguishable. On recollecting myself, I faintly articulated, 'I do not think I shall die.' Placing my fingers on the wrist, I found my pulse thread-like, and beating with excessive quickness. In less than a minute, I was able to walk, and the painful oppression on the chest directed me to the open air.

After making a few steps, which carried me to the garden, my head became giddy, my knees trembled, and I had just sufficient voluntary power to throw myself on the grass. Here the painful feelings of the chest increased with such violence as to threaten suffocation. At this moment I asked for some nitrous oxide, Mr. Dwyer brought me a mixture of that gas with oxygen, and I breathed for a minute, and believed myself recovered.

In five minutes the painful feelings began gradually to diminish; in an hour they had nearly disappeared, and I felt only excessive weakness and a slight swimming of the head. My voice was very feeble and indistinct.

I afterwards walked slowly for half an hour, with Mr. Tobin, and on my return was so much stronger and better as to believe that the effects of the gas had entirely passed off, though my pulse was 120, and very feeble. I continued without pain for nearly three quarters of an hour, when the giddiness returned with such violence as to oblige me to lie on the bed, it was accompanied with nausea, loss of memory, and deficient sensation.

In about an hour and a half, the giddiness went off and was succeeded by an excruciating pain in the forehead and between the eyes, with transient pains in the chest and extremities.

Towards night these affections gradually diminished; and at ten no disagreeable feeling, except weakness, remained. I slept sound, and awoke in the morning very feeble and very hungry. No recurrence of the symptoms took place, and I had nearly recovered my strength by the evening.

His eccentric habits.

Such was his great celebrity at this period of his career, that persons of the highest rank contended for the honor of his company at dinner, and he did not possess sufficient resolution to resist the gratification thus afforded, although it generally happened that his pursuits to the laboratory were not suspended until the appointed dinner hour had passed. On his return in the evening he resumed his chemical labors, and commonly continued them till three or four o'clock in the morning, and yet the servants of the establishment not unfrequently found that he had risen before them. The greatest of his wants was time, and the expedients by which he economised it often placed him in very ridiculous positions, and gave rise to habits of the most eccentric description; driven to an extremity, he would in haste put on a fresh linen, without removing that which was underneath; and singular as the fact may appear, he has been known, after the fashion of the grave-digger in Hamlet, to wear no less than five shirts, and as many pair of stockings, at the same time. Exclamations of surprise very frequently escaped from his friends at the rapid manner in which he increased and declined in corpulence.

His interviews with Buonaparte and with Josephine.

During his visit to Paris, Davy was not introduced to the Emperor. Lady Davy observed to me, that, although Sir Humphrey felt justly grateful for the indulgence granted to him as a philosopher, he never, for a moment, forgot the duty he owed his country as a patriot, and that he objected to attend the levee of her bitterest enemy. On the other hand, it is said, that Napoleon never expressed any wish to receive the English chemist; and those who seek in the depths for that upon the surface, have racked their imaginations in order to discover the source of this mysterious indifference; but I apprehend that we have only to revert to the political state of Europe in the year 1813, and the problem will be solved.

Amongst the reasons for supposing that the Emperor must have felt ill disposed towards the English philosopher, the following story has been told; which, as an anecdote, is sufficiently amusing; and I can state upon the highest authority that it is moreover perfectly true.

It is well known that Buonaparte, during his whole career, was in the habit of personal intercourse with the savans of Paris, and that he not unfrequently attended the sittings of the Institute. Upon being informed of the decomposition of the Alkalies, he asked, with some impetuosity, how it happened that the discovery had not been made in France? 'We have never constructed a Voltaic battery of sufficient power,' was the answer. 'Then,' exclaimed Buonaparte, 'let one be instantly formed, without any regard to cost or labor.'

The command of the Emperor was of course obeyed; and, on being informed that it was in full action, he repaired to the laboratory to witness its powers; on his alighting to the taste produced by the contact of two metals, with that rapidity which characterised all his motions, and before the attendants could interpose any precaution, he thrust the extreme wires of the battery under his tongue, and received a shock which nearly deprived him of sensation. After recovering from its effects, he quitted the laboratory without making any remark, and was never afterwards heard to refer to the subject.

It is only an act of justice to state that Davy, during his residence in the French capital, so far from truckling to French politics, never lost an opportunity of vindicating with temper the cause of his own country. At the Theatre de la Porte Saint Martin, a melo-drama was got up, with the avowed intention of exposing the English character to the execration of the audience. Lord Cornwallis was represented as the merciless assassin of the Tippoo Saib. Davy was highly incensed at the injustice of the representation, and abruptly quitted the theatre in a state of great indignation.

Whatever objections might have existed in his mind, as to his attending a levee of the emperor, they did not operate in preventing his being presented to the empress at Malmaison; but he could not be prevailed upon to appear in any other than a morning dress; and it was not until after repeated entreaty, and the assurance that he would not be admitted into the Salle de reception, that he consented to exchange a pair of half-boots that laced in front, and came over the lower part of his pantaloons, for black silk stockings and shoes. His constant answer to the remonstrances of his friends was, 'I shall go in the same dress to Malmaison as that in which I called upon the Prince Regent in Carlton House.'

His Death.

With that restlessness which characterises the disease under which Sir Humphry Davy suffered, he became extremely desirous of quitting Rome, and of establishing himself at Geneva. His friends were naturally anxious to gratify every wish; and Lady Davy therefore preceded him on the journey, in order that she might prepare for his comfortable reception at this place. Apartments were accordingly in readiness for him at L'Hotel de la Couronne, in the Rue de Rhone: and at three o'clock on the 28th of May, having slept the preceding night at Chambéry, he arrived at Geneva, accompanied by his brother, Mr. Tobin, and his servant.

At four o'clock he dined, ate heartily, was unusually cheerful, and joked with the waiter about the cookery of fish, which he appeared particularly to admire, and he desired that, as long as he remained at the hotel, he might be daily supplied with every possible variety that the lake afforded. He drank tea at eleven, and having directed that the feather-bed should be removed, retired to rest at twelve.

His servant who slept in a bed parallel to his own, in the same alcove, was, however, very shortly called to attend him, and desired that his brother might be summoned.—I am informed that, on Dr. Davy's entering the room, he said, 'I am dying,' or words to that effect; and when it is all over, I desire that no disturbance of any kind may be made in the house; lock the door, and let every one retire quietly to his apartment.' He expired at a quarter before three o'clock, without a struggle.

Such are but a few of the numerous interesting anecdotes with which the scientific pages of this valuable work are sprinkled. Dr. Paris, in constructing the noble piece of biography, has entitled him to the gratitude of his country, and of the civilized world at large.

AUTHORITY.

I seldom resort to authorities in support of my opinions, not because I think myself wiser than others, but I never met with a writer who did not, in the course of his reasonings, furnish arguments in support of two entirely opposite systems.—Paulding.

DELAYS.

Inexperienced persons think when great plans only stand still they must be going backwards. The truth is, however, that wise men are never in a hurry to force events. They know that patience works more wonders than activity.

As metaphysic wit can fly.—Butler

ELECTORS OF NORFOLK!

IT IS TIME TO KNOW YOURSELVES.

'Know thyself' is an ancient maxim;—important and as applicable to the present period, as it was during the age of that celebrated moral philosopher, who first pronounced it. It is to be regretted there are some, at this, who do not know themselves. Living under the benign influences of a liberal constitution, with our general moral improvements, and increased light of science, it might have been expected, that men of classical education, of religious professions, teachers of divine truth, set apart, (as they profess to be,) from the temporal concerns of the world; anointed to the sanctified office of the priesthood, under sacred injunctions to devote their whole lives to God and their religious duties, would faithfully fulfil those duties. What are the legitimate inferences; when they are beheld not only neglecting their appropriate services of preaching peace and good will to the members of their society; but vagrant-like, running about the country, exciting the most malignant passions, inflaming bigotted minds of citizens against their neighbors, kindred against kindred, brother against brother for political effect, their own mad ambition and civil ferment? Can such men be heralds of peace? These men assuredly do not know themselves. Had they been better acquainted with their own hearts, had they retired into the inmost recesses of their own souls, they would have discovered their own incompetency, their totally unprepared state for the ministerial office. But their evils are doubly magnified, when under the assumed garb of sanctity, they desire to be placed in civil authority, to dictate the affairs of state, or general government to restrain liberality of sentiment, freedom of opinions, and disfranchise a large and respectable class of citizens.

The preceding remarks will not be deemed wanting in truth, nor charity, after having read the published documents of the respectable ecclesiastical council, respecting the conduct of the Reverend Moses Thacher of Wrentham, attempting to excommunicate a correct and moral member of his church from its privileges, not for alleged vicious conduct, but in consequence of possessing an independent opinion; and refusing to submit to the unsocial measures and base injunctions of his pastor. The member criminated was acquitted of the vexatious charges preferred against him; and the respectable enlightened council of the same denomination, mutually chosen, disapproving the measures adopted by the Reverend Moses Thacher in the case, has, virtually, implicated him, as a calumniator and a vexatious prosecutor. 'A tree is known by its fruit;' the quality of the fruit has been tasted. Its poisonous effects, woefully experienced, will be further delineated.

Moses Thacher is a seceding Mason. The ground of controversy, it appears, was, the pastor finding he had not persuasive influence to convert to his faith and practice a member of his church, a Mason, previously, held in high estimation, and between whom had existed a warm friendship, came to the infatuated determination to pursue him with fearful persecution. Herein the pastor, devoid of that spirit of christianity, of that humility, of that meekness, of that interior knowledge of spiritual things, so necessary for every pious minister to possess, did not know himself. Let us review the pastor's subsequent measures. He had influence to divide his once peaceable church, (which to him should have been precious) and with a minority established a new society, in contravention of the discipline and long established usages of congregational churches, of which his was one;—particulars of which may be read in the decision of the council, annexed to the published letters of the Rev. Mr. Furguson, (also an antimason) addressed to the Rev. Moses Thacher, not only severely reprobating his conduct and measures, but implicating him in prevarication and falsehood. The evils of Moses Thacher's conduct do not here cease. The church united, small as it was, found it a burthen to support the preached gospel;—a burthen cheerfully borne. In their state of division, the difficulty is much increased. Herein, the pastor, by his persecutions, his dogmas, and by his proud overbearing measures, has been instrumental of marring the happiness of a small parish, who, previously, had lived in harmony and peace.

We will suppose, for the sake of argument, the criminated member had really given cause of offence;—would it not have been the duty of a christian minister to have attempted his reclamation from evil by kind, affectionate means; not by severe persecutions? This is strong evidence the pastor did not know his spiritual duties. He took upon himself the responsible office of a christian minister, without possessing the spirit of his Lord and Master. Let us again suppose, that the pastor, by threatened persecutions had induced his brother to succumb to his opinion, and abjure Masonry, as he had previously. Could strong reliance be placed on a proselyte coerced by fear? Instead of mild means, the pastor held a rod of correction over his brother to compel him to assume the character of a hypocrite to avoid his reckless vengeance. 'Wo unto you scribes and pharisees and hypocrites, for you compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, you make him twofold more a child of hell than yourselves.'

Citizens of Norfolk! descendants of your noble progenitors, who religiously, and gloriously contended against arbitrary power, for the sake of freedom of opinion; for the sake of all those civil and religious privileges, you now possess; can you have forgotten, so soon, your respective duties?—duties you owe not to yourselves only; but, to every member of society, to respect the rights of each other; not to be made by falsehood and misrepresentations, the unrighteous instruments of depriving others of freedom of opinions, which, you wish to enjoy yourselves. You will not give your suffrages to a man for a public office, who would have deprived a member of his church of its benefits, for adhering to opinions different from his own. If, Moses Thacher has transgressed in, comparatively, small things, can he be entrusted with the more important affairs of the state, or nation? This question, Moses Thacher has already, answered by measures adopted by himself in the Senate of Massachusetts, January last; measures anticipated, previous to being elected to the responsible office of Senator, and which, by some strange popular infatuation, were the means of his election.

Had Moses Thacher's inquisitorial position, respecting 'extra-judicial oaths' the last session of the General Court, preferred for the consideration of the honorable Senate, been approved and passed into a law, thousands of the best and most respectable citizens of the state, would have been disfranchised. Without spending time to exhibit the iniquity of the proposition in relation to moral and civil liberty; will Moses Thacher plead, he was so ignorant of the constitution of Massachusetts, as not to know an ex post facto law would have been null and void? Moses Thacher's WILL we take for the NEED. He has publicly announced what he wished to have effected. Enough has been exhibited to expose his intentions. Knowing the man by his own deeds, our only design is to show him to the electors of Norfolk in his true light. Is not this premeditated public official act of Moses Thacher sufficient to open the eyes of every considerate man, not obscured by the phantasmagoria of antimasonic delusion and falsification?

Electors of Norfolk! rise in your strength redeem your former reputations as warm advocates for freedom of opinion; do not elect that man for a Senator, who imposes on your good sense by hypocritical cant, 'and for pretence makes long prayers.' If, for party considerations, you determine to elect an avowed antimason, be advised to select from your body, an honest, upright, sensible man; not a political fanatic—a man who respects his own moral obligations;—not a seceder. In language of truth, it is asked, can confidence be placed in a man, who has violated the disciplinary regulations of his own denomination; and religious obligations, by which, he was bound to his own church? Can confidence be placed in one, who has publicly avowed himself an oath breaker? Will he claim your confidence, who has demonstrated, with a vindictive spirit, his infidelity to a moral, charitable association; an association he did not abjure, until prompted by ambition to raise himself to some degree of consequence on the whirlwind of phrenzy, to direct the storm of popular commotion? Will you give your votes for a man, who by his senatorial transactions discovers himself a tyrant in principle, providentially, without the ability to carry his nefarious designs into operation? Will you give your suffrages to one, identified with a BAND, a leader of whom declares, 'WE WILL PUT DOWN MASONRY BY THE SWORD, IF WE CANNOT PUT IT DOWN WITHOUT?' Will a minister of the gospel be your choice, who in the senatorial chamber, said, 'IF CIVIL WAR BECOMES NECESSARY, LET IT COME, I FEAR NO CIVIL WAR; who would piously for the good of your souls revive the fires of Smithfield; and impiously, for the Lord's sake infuse the fanatical spirits of the Spanish inquisition and Salem Witchcraft into the public mind? In fine, will you elect a man who, repeatedly, by his conduct has demonstrated, he will be bound by no moral obligations, ecclesiastical, nor civil; but determines to make his own will a law, his own ambition his governing principle? It is presumed your good sense and judicious discernment will determine this question on the day of election.

THE GIPSY HAT.

There's poetry in moonlight skies,
There's poetry in quivering shades,
There's poetry in Zephyr's sighs,
And poetry in mossy glades—
But none is half so sweet as that Beneath a certain Gipsy Hat.

Let him, then, who would touch the Lyre,
And in sweet numbers pour his soul,
On fancy's wings in speed retire,
From shade or glade or glassy knoll—
For they have not the beauties that
Are 'neath a certain Gipsy Hat.

When I first saw this Gipsy crown,
Its ribbons fluttered in the wind,
Their hues of pink were fine, I'll own
But brighter hues mine eyes could find
In rosy cheeks, the brightest that E'er glow'd beneath a Gipsy Hat.

But there were other beauties, too,
Beneath that Gipsy crown, I deem—
Sweet eyes, of Heaven's purest blue.
From whence a host of cupids gleam;
But there was even more than that
Beneath this charming Gipsy Hat.

I followed whither crowds repair
To send their weekly thanks on high—
Forgive me, saints, that even there
I could not force away mine eye,
From all the thousand beauties that
Were crowded 'neath this Gipsy Hat.

Soft glossy curls, of raven hue,
Reposing on her forehead fair,
And lips whence gales of fragrance blew,
Might with their charms a saint ensnare—
No muse can sing the beauties that
Were nestling 'neath this Gipsy Hat.

And, whether on the mountain wave,
Or Mississippi's mighty streams
In prairie wide or sparry cave,
In waking moments or in dreams,
All that is mine, I'd give for that
Which moves beneath this Gipsy Hat.

NOVELTY.

Every thing and being, even a dog, has its day.
So, logically, men have dogdays, just as we prove a cat has three tails. They are ups and downs—life's aberrations—novelties. They vivify—they depress—animal spirits. Tears start when smiles cease. Pleasure is the forerunner of displeasure.
Our temperaments, like the temperatures, are accidental. Uncertainty is certain. There is an uniform irregularity of feeling. This is novelty.

Events are novelties. The people cry 'rotation'—and civil office and officers change. The parish ere long begin to think the minister monotonous. These are species of Antism. A lady makes most infidels—a gentleman most sectarians—and seceders make themselves most ridiculous. Nobody knows what charity means.
The common maxim of these eventful times is that 'it is't fair for you to eat cheese when I don't.'

Mankind have lost their patriotism, and this is the reason why they don't finish Bunker Hill Monument. What is history? Mutation. What is life? Motion.

There is novelty of character. The 'originals' are everybody. Nature exceeds all your milliners in odd fashions. We cannot hide her habits and ways. Our peculiarities constantly appear.
Proportional trees are rare, but those that are knotty, crooked and cracked, are common. They represent character. Sameness is the 'old road,' but novelty a 'railroad.' Even popularity depends on novel thought, animation, action, expression.

Behold men every way occupied, every way accustomed, and you see the zest of existence.—
What is stationary in a moving universe? And are men no part or parcel of this rolling planet?—
Fancy loves new creations. Feeling ever finds fresh outlets. Like bees we fly from delight to delight, seeking new gratification. Thus it is heaven's decree that we should never tire of life.
While organic vision takes its real outline the mind speculates, and life itself is found a novelty, incomprehensible, various as it is, the mysterious gift of God!

MISCELLANY.

[From the New-York Constellation.]

A NEW-YORK NEGRO AND A KENTUCKIAN.

Not long since a gentleman from Kentucky was standing at the door of one of our hotels whence he was about starting for the steamboat. Wishing for some one to carry his baggage, and seeing a spruce looking negro passing along the street, he called out to him—Here, you nig, take my trunk and carry it down to the steam boat.

The negro stopped, and raised his quizzing glass to his eye, stared at the Kentuckian with a mixture of indignation and astonishment. Having scanned him sufficiently with his glass, he gave his hat an independent twist to one side, pulled up his dickey about his ears, drew himself up to his fullest height, and thus replied 'Did you 'dress that language to me, Sir?'

'Yes, you black rascal; I want you to take my trunk to the boat.'

'Indeed! I guess you come from the slave holding states, didn't you, if I may take the liberty to ax?'

'Ay, you black dog—and what if I did? You take too much liberty, I can tell you.'

'Why, I was sure you must have come from the slave states, otherwise you wouldn't treat a gentleman in this supersilly manner just because his skin is't of the same color of your own.'

'Shut up your thick lips, or I'll stick my fist down your throat.'

'We don't have any gag laws in this state.'

'Well you ought to have, to stop the mouths of such saucy black rascals as you are. I wish I had you in Kentucky once.'

I spose you'd would gouge me then. But thank heaven, I'm not in Kentucky, and not a slave, neither. And what's more, I undertake to tell you, Mr. impotence, that there is no gouging, no gagging in this free state, and one man is as much inspected as another, if he behaves as well, although he is a black man, or a Nig as you call him. Behaviour makes the man, sir. For my part, I should be ashamed to show my face among other gentlemen, if I 'dressed a man in the super-silly manner you did me.'

Having finished his speech, the dark colored beau again raising his quizzing glass to his eye, and giving his antagonist a look of ineffable disdain, walked on; while the Ketuckian almost doubting his senses, wondered what sort of republican principle that could be which gives a black man as much liberty as a white one.

SENTIMENT OF REV. J. LELAND.

The following is an extract from an address of the Rev. Mr. Leland, to a company assembled to commemorate the battle of New-Orleans, on the eve of the 8th of January last.

'I close, fellow citizens, with the following section:'

'I was a man grown when the grand drama opened at Lexington, and lived through the Revolutionary war. The most prominent defeats are yet fresh in my mind. At the close of war, Confederation was found insufficient to protect the states from anarchy; energetic government superceded. Under the new government, I have witnessed eleven presidential elections, and twenty-two elections for members of Congress. And now in the eve of a life (very poorly spent) I would say to the people of the United States, 'Let no one deceive you. Only will to be free, and you will hold your freedom. Place confidence enough in your rulers to enable them to act sentimentally—give a fair interpretation to their measures, and time for their operation: but always hold the reins of responsibility in your own hands. Never surrender the right of free suffrage, which is the strong hold of republicanism. Adhere to the vital principle of free government, that the voice of a majority is the voice of the whole.—
Shun that rock of considering religious opinions objects of civil government. Believe and act for yourselves, and guarantee the same for your neighbors.

Remember that christianity is of divine origin
—the only religion that ever brought pardon to a guilty world; but it has suffered more injury, by its pretended friends, (who have undertaken to regulate it by law,) than from its enemies'.

THE DIVORCE.

A married couple determined to be divorced;
but not being able to agree with respect to disposing of the children, they referred the dispute to an aunt, to whose arbitration they respectively agreed to submit. 'We have three children' said the husband, 'I insist upon keeping two; the third shall be left to the care of the mother.' 'But I,' said the mother 'have a right to two—the care of one will be more than sufficient for you. 'There is no way to settle this dispute,' said the aunt with the gravity of a Judge, 'but by waiting for the bird' a fourth child, you can separate on equal terms. The decision restored good humor. The contending parties embraced, and the idea of a divorce was forgotten.

RETIREMENT.

One of the most beautiful descriptions of retirement is in an ode of Charles Cotton, the friend of old Isaac Walton, the famous piscator.

How calm and quiet a delight

It is alone

To read, and meditate, and write

By none offended, and offending none;

To walk, ride, sit, or sleep at one's ease,

And pleasing man's self, none other to displease.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, MARCH 26, 1831.

NORFOLK SENATORIAL ELECTION.

We give below a list of the candidates nominated at a Convention of the electors of Norfolk, held at Dedham, on Monday the 21st inst. It is a list in which all parties, with the exception of the most infamous of all factions, are united. It is what may be properly called the Freedom of Opinion Ticket.

SENATORS.

HON. LEWIS FISHER, of Franklin.

JOHN ENDICOTT, of Dedham.

SAMUEL P. LOUD, Esq. of Dorchester.

Let the people of Norfolk, opposed to the proscriptive policy of Antimasonry, one and all, go forth to the polls. Let no man withhold his vote. We would that every free and honest elector in the county, might have it in his power to say, that he raised his hand to crush the most antirepublican, proscriptive and dishonest faction that ever reared its hydra-head in a republican government. The question is not whether a Democratic, National Republican or Workingmen Ticket shall succeed. All these parties are happily united in the candidates above named. The only question is whether freedom of opinion shall be tolerated—whether liberal principles shall prevail! The electors of Norfolk will decide this question by their votes on the first Monday in April next. Let them rally at the polls—inspect their votes—for frauds will again be practised. Let them do their duty—a duty they owe to themselves and their country—and the result will be just, and honorable to them as American freemen. Neither of the candidates are Masons, nor are they antimasons. They are men of liberal and honorable views; such men as are worthy of the suffrages of the yeomanry of Norfolk.

What is antimasonry in Norfolk County? What is it anti to? Surely not to Masons, for none are before the people for their suffrages. The candidates to whom the antimasonic party are opposed, are Republicans, are Workingmen. Are not then the terms antimasonry and antirepublicanism, synonymous?—are they not one and the same thing? We cannot perceive the difference. Were Masons up as candidates for the Senate, the party opposed to them would be anti-Masons. But Republicans are before the people; not Masons. Are not their opponents then anti-Republicans? Let the Republicans of Norfolk think of this. It is time enough to form an anti-Mason party when Masons are candidates for office. It seems to us preposterous to talk of an antimasonic party, in this election, where there are no Masons to oppose. It is obvious enough that the design of these men is to conceal their opposition to the Republican party, under the pretence of opposition to Masons; and when Masons are to be opposed, this pretence may serve them; but it cannot in the present case. The foot is laid bare. Let Republicans look to it. Let them not be swindled out of their senses, and they will not be cheated out of their rights. But if they must be robbed of both, let the robbery be committed by a party not entirely destitute of moral and political honesty. Let it not be done by such a degraded, profligate, and unprincipled set of men, as the political jugglers by whom they are now beset.

LOCKPORT TRIALS.

We give the following extracts of letters addressed to the editors of the Albany Record, without comment; not yet being in possession of the evidence necessary to enable us to form a correct opinion. Some of the antimasonic papers are publishing what purport to be abstracts of the trial of Adams; but as the court requested that the evidence should not be made public until after the final termination of the prosecution, we cannot place much reliance on the report of any individual, who has so little regard for his own character as to disregard a request so reasonable, and essential to the cause of justice. Much allowance should therefore be made for any statements that may appear on the subject. The testimony of Giddins can have no weight, further than it is corroborated by the evidence of others. In this view it seems to have been regarded by the court. The Judge did not undertake to determine the competency of his evidence; but left the question to be settled by the Jury. One of the Jury did not believe his testimony; and is therefore charged with being a Mason, and acting under the influence of Masonic obligations. There is no obligation in Masonry that interferes with his duties as a Jurymen. And as told by these reporters that, in empanelling the jury, a great number of jurymen were called and set aside; some having expressed an opinion, and same on account of their Masonic obligations. Now it appears to us somewhat anomalous, that a part of the jurymen called should be set aside on account of their being Masons, and yet a Mason be permitted to serve! It seems also not less remarkable, as the question of Masonry in regard to the jurymen was agitated, that the counsel for the prosecution should voluntarily consent to a Mason's serving. We believe that Masons have invariably been rejected as jurymen on these trials. The only evidence we have that the dissenting juror is a Mason, is the declaration of Tharlow Weed, a reckless political antimason, rendered conspicuous by stripping the corpse of Monroe of its whiskers, to give it a greater semblance to the natural appearance of Morgan: in which condition he thought 'it would make a good enough Morgan till after election!' Much allowance is to be made in receiving the testimony of such a man. We do not wish to be understood as saying that the jurymen in question is not a Mason. The public have the same means of determining that question that we have. We only mean to say that it seems to us highly improbable that the prosecuting counsel would object to one man on the grounds of his Masonic obligations, and admit another against whom the same objections were equally valid. But such may have been the fact. And may not the disagreeing juror have been honest and conscientious in his disagreement? We have no desire to go into an elaborate argument on this subject, and have adverted to it merely for the purpose of calling the attention of our readers to the circumstances as they really exist. We do not think that a correct opinion can be formed, on the evidence now before the public, in regard to the character and extent of the disclosures said to have been elicited on the trial of Adams. The extracts from the record follow:

Lockport, February 27th, 1831.

The court convened last Monday, judge Nelson presiding. The trial of Elisha Adams was first called on. The usual difficulty was had in procuring a jury; one was however obtained tolerably fair. The trial commenced. Giddins was introduced. He was objected to on account of religious belief. The same testimony that appeared at Canandaigua against him was produced, and if anything stronger. He had been in the training of the antimasons. Witnesses were introduced [members of the Morgan committee] who swore to his good character; extenuated his infidelity; swore they would believe him under oath;—proved that he had recently taught his children prayers, &c. &c. He was admitted—with the charge from the court however, that the jury were still to be the judges of his competency. Giddins related his story, not differing much from the almanac. The trial has occupied the week. The jury retired last evening, and news came to the judge this morning (Sunday) that they could not agree. The judge manifested his determination to keep them until they did agree.

Lockport, February 28th.

There is not upon record, a clearer case of infidelity than that of Edward Giddins; and no man endowed with common sense, a correct idea of the laws of the country, and impressed with proper respect for the rights and privileges of his fellow citizens, would, I am bold to say, have permitted him in a court of justice, to have called upon the name of the Almighty, whom he so freely and positively declares incapable or indisposed to punish the perjured—nay, no man—it is mockery! Yet, this is done, and the liberty of a fellow man placed in jeopardy, upon his solitary oath. * * * * * The testimony of Whitney, Bruce, and Lawson is very interesting, inasmuch, as it forms a chain of testimony, clearly proving the fact, that Morgan went through the country voluntarily. This testimony, with that of Giddins, a man of the name of Shed, (a singular object of pity and contempt) together with another by the name of Farwell, is all that is new, and its importance will be, when time permits, a sufficient inducement to furnish you with a report. There is no evidence against Adams, except that of Giddins and Shed.

Lockport, March 1st.

Shed was the last witness on the part of the prosecution. When he left the stand the court adjourned till Saturday morning. No witnesses were called by the defence. About 10 o'clock, W. H. Adams, esq., commenced summing up, and occupied a little more than five hours. Birdseye occupied about three hours in reply. The judge closed his charge between 8 and 9 P. M. when the jury retired, and the court adjourned for one hour. The jury had not agreed. Court adjourned till Sunday morning at 9. Met accordingly. Jury not agreed. Adjourned till Monday morning at 7. Met accordingly. Jury not agreed. Discharged. So these trials are precisely where they were one week ago. The court adjourned at 8 o'clock last evening. Jury unpanelled in the case of Gen. Whitney, Shaw and others.

Since preparing the above, we have received the following from the Lockport Balance. It will be seen that no person has been convicted. Two having been discharged, and the jury not agreeing on the others.

SPECIAL COURT.—We this week commence the publication of a full report of the trial of Gen. P. Whitney and others, for the alleged abduction, &c. of William Morgan. The trial occupied eight days. Two of the defendants, Timothy Shaw and William Miller, were acquitted. The jury could not agree as to the other three, and were discharged, after being kept together about twenty-four hours. As in the case of Adams, Edward Giddins was permitted to take the stand as a witness against the defendants. Hence, as a dernier resort they were compelled to attack his credibility, and never have we seen a witness so completely shook to pieces. He was clearly contradicted in more than twenty different particulars, and in many others was proved by the most respectable witnesses to have made statements opposite to what he swore—or rather affirmed on the stand. Still it appears there are men who believe him—nay, a number of witnesses swore that notwithstanding he had been a willing and leading participant in the Morgan conspiracy, and had been guilty of another immoral act of rather a delicate nature, appertaining to his domestic affairs, yet they would believe him if they KNEW HE WAS AN ATHEIST.

The trial of Maxwell and Shepherd has taken place.—The panel was completed Tuesday afternoon. Some part of this testimony will occupy different ground from the others. Should any part of it be new and interesting we shall publish it, after having disposed of the rest. After examining about twelve witnesses on the part of the people, the Special Counsel informed the Court he had no testimony, and the jury immediately returned a verdict of not guilty. There was not even a circumstance against the defendants. The court was then adjourned, sine die.

SPIRIT OF FREEMASONRY.

A POEM:

By John Nichols.—John Panchard, Boston, 1831, 12mo. 24 p.

This beautiful little poem we have only had time to peruse in a hasty manner, reserving to ourselves the privilege of making a longer acquaintance with its merits in those hours devoted to intellectual recreation, when the mind, unburthened of its cares, may roam over the fields of fancy, and, losing itself amidst the fairy creations there presented, may taste of pleasure unalloyed, and inhale sweet incense from each flower that helps to variegate the paradise of thought. We cannot put aside this poem without bestowing on its author our feeble praise, and, feeble as it is, we give it cheerfully. We were not prepossessed in its favor because the author touched upon a subject that was near and dear to us; for we have learned to look around us with an unprejudiced eye—the fulsome praise of friends and the bitter revilings of enemies, alike, unheeded pass us; we should be ashamed to acknowledge that, because our friends have spoken well of us, we are, in duty bound, to laud them to the very skies; and, acting on this principle, indiscriminately heap honors upon their heads. No! we despise the sycophant too much ever to follow in his track; and let us be adjudged as guilty of what crime soever, that of wanton flattery shall never be brought against us by our unsparing enemies.

There breathes throughout this poem a spirit of parity. The author has not carelessly applied the lash of ridicule; they whose persons it is intended to reach will quail beneath the chastising hand that wields it; if they are men, and have the feelings common to mankind, they must feel, severely too, its point, and cry aloud unto the earth, to open unto them and admit their degraded forms into its dark abyss.

The author has proved himself, by this effort of genius, what none will deny—a poet! and a poet of no common rank. Go on in thy pleasing task. Cull a few more flowers—present thy rich bouquet to thy delighted readers' gaze again and again—and we will dare predict that the name of John Nichols will not go unhonored to the grave. We make a few extracts:

'Suppose the organ, rich in every tone,
Is to a rude and wondering savage shown;
Its gilded pipes and ornaments he views,
And thinks it made for show, and not for use.
His untaught fingers on its keys are laid,
He starts astonished at the noises made,
And shocked, confounded by the horrid din,
Exclaims, "Cursed evil spirits dwell within!"
But let a master of concordant sounds
Touch but those keys, what melody abounds,
What soft enrapturing harmony we hear—
What peals of music burst upon the ear.
So Antimasons view Masonic tools,
As implements of knaves, or toys of fools.
The common gavel, which we say prepares
Stones for the builder's use, the Anti scares—
His morbid fancy dwells on murder still;
The thing he swears was made to fright or kill.'

'But to our theme. Freemasonry we know
To be of vice and bigotry the foe.
The vicious and the prejudiced we find
In fierce array against her now combined—
In vain combined; their fury and their toil
On their own heads must certainly recoil.
By hatred urged, those poor, deluded men
Work hard for our destruction; shall we then
Invoke the tempest in its wildest power,
Hail, fire, and thunder on their heads to shower?
Not so our order's laws we understand,
"Forgive your enemy" is her command.'

The author here gives a perfect delineation of the 'Spirit of Freemasonry.' List, ye anties! and, listening, be convinced that the Spirit of Antimasonry is a spirit of a far different character, and of a hue partaking more of the diabolical tint:—read and you will acknowledge, that, for once at least, we speak the truth!

'Foes to their fate to leave, is wise, we deem;
Our thoughts pursue a more instructive theme,
The Spirit of Freemasonry. She comes,
Unseen, but felt, to cheer and bless our homes;
She visits the afflicted, and bestows
A balm to mitigate their keenest woes;
Goes with the joyous to the festive board,
To every scene, that can delight afford
To enlighten minds, and gives a richer zest
To every social, every mental feast.
Freemasonry, in spirit, still persuades
All men to duty, all in duty aids;
Goes with the Patriot where his country calls,
To fields of blood, or legislative halls.

* * * * *
Goes with the Laborer to his daily task,
Who murmurs not, although his neighbors bask
In sunny places, while he delves in mire,
To win the pittance daily wants require;
Tells him that honest poverty bestows
More bliss than purse-proud avarice ever knows,
For that in God's all-wise, all-glorious plan
Content alone can make a happy man.

* * * * *
Goes with the Christian Pastor, when he feeds
His flock, or guides them into flowery meads,
Or guards them 'gainst those savage beasts of prey,
Bad passions, lurking ambushed near their way;
When feeble lambs he in his arms infolds,
Takes care of all, and good from none withholds;
Goes with the kind Physician who extends
His aid alike to strangers, foes, or friends,
When rich and poor, the good and vicious, share
Alike his medicines, services, and care;
Goes with the Lawyer, who defends the cause
Of injured worth, or vindicates the laws,
Which unto all their sacred rights secure,
Be they as devils vile, as angels pure!

'Wherever Art has greatest progress made,
Or Vice, by force of principle, been stayed,
Wherever Liberty has blessed mankind,
The foot-prints of Freemasonry we find.
There its blest spirit, in some LAFAYETTE,
Has bounds to despots, bounds to anarchy set.
By showing Freedom's best supported cause,
Where all uphold a government of laws—
Laws to secure the rights of all designed,
To loose the oppressed and the oppressors bind.'

Moses the Reverend may understand the following:

'There stands a church; a pastor too was there,
Who loved his flock, and spent his life in prayer—
The rich man's almoner, in friendship sure,
The guide, the father of the suffering poor;
To all that's good, to all that's pure allied,
He lived Freemasonry personified.'

A Seceder appears—now behold the contrast!

'Confusion reigned, where order dwelt before,
Friendship and love were chased from door to door,
The best of pastors from his people driven,
The church, each family, asunder riven,
Base scandal honored, perjury employed,
Justice corrupted, confidence destroyed,
And monuments erected o'er the dead,
Around the yard in broken fragments spread,
Signs, which more forcibly than words declare
What modern Goths and Vandals triumph there.'

'If demagogues, to raise themselves to place,
Can bring upon Freemasonry disgrace,
By senseless clamor and extraneous strife,
Who is secure in property, or life?
If Masonry may be condemned, because Misguided men have, unrestrained by laws,
Inhuman outrage done,—what Church can stand?
Some Judas larks in every chosen land.'

GEORGE IV.—In the Appendix to 'Croly's Life and Times' of George IV. we find the following paragraph.

'On the death of the late Duke of Cumberland, George the Fourth, the Prince of Wales, was elected Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Freemasons, and in that character his royal highness presided at the subsequent anniversary dinner, consisting of the members, of all the inaugurated Lodges of Masons in London. The meeting was held at Freemasons' Tavern, and nearly five hundred persons were present. On this occasion the Prince exhibited, in various speeches, powers which astonished the audience; and while he expatiated upon the character and virtues of his recently deceased uncle and predecessor in office, many were in tears. This, we believe, was the only great public occasion in which the oratorical powers of the Prince of Wales were exhibited during three or four hours. Lord Moira occupied a place on the right hand of the Prince, who appointed him Deputy Grand Master, which, by the death of the Duke of Manchester, had become vacant.'

[Henry IV. is the present Grand Master. Is it not a little remarkable that the kings, princes and noblemen of England, should consider it an honor to belong to and preside over such a murderous, infidel, treasonable, and abominable society as the Masonic? It is a wonder there is not an antimasonic party got up there to turn them all out of office! Is it not the duty of the 'Suffolk Committee' to look to it?]

HENRY CLAY.—The Commercial Gazette has the following remark: 'It is understood that powerful efforts have been made to induce Mr. Clay to abandon the institution of Masonry, but without effect—this decision is highly creditable to him.' It then speaks of the probability that the antimasonic party will nominate John M'Lean for the Presidency. 'This nomination, whenever made, will undoubtedly be satisfactory to a large portion of the country; but it can never be made by antimasons. John M'Lean we are told is a Mason; and like Mr. Clay, (if the Gazette be correct,) will never be induced to abandon the institution of Masonry.' Mr. M'Lean is a high-minded, honorable politician, far above the low intrigue of party. We hope in proper time to see him President of the United States.

[We learn that the notorious A. B. C. Jonathan, of Lynn, has perpetrated and published through the columns of the receptacle of infamy over which he ostensibly presides, a base falsehood concerning this paper; but such being strictly in character with the man, and in keeping with his occupation, our friends in Lynn will pardon us, if we take no further notice of him. He's altogether too poor game. It is true that we are sometimes compelled in self defence to quarrel with asses and knaves; but in no case can we condescend to quarrel with any man in whom the two characters are combined.]

MIDDLESEX.—The antimasons of this county have nominated for Senators, Messrs. Francis Winship, of Brighton, Nathan Brooks, of Concord, William Austin, of Charlestown, Benjamin Wyman, of Woburn, Jacob Reeves, of East Sudbury. The two gentlemen first named are supported by the National Republican party, and are not antimasons. It is believed also that Mr. Wyman is not an antimason. Mr. Reeves is a superannuated old gentleman, and has probably been duped by the political managers into whose hands he has fallen.

GREAT BANK ROBBERY.—The New York City Bank was entered sometime between the closing of business on Saturday and the commencement of it on Monday morning last, by means of false keys, and robbed of bills and Spanish doubloons, amounting to more than $200,000! A reward of $5,000 is offered for the apprehension of the robber and recovery of the money. Forty thousand dollars were of the Lansingburg Bank; a large amount in the Morris Canal Banking Company's bills.

FAMILY LIBRARY.—R. P. & C. Williams have just received the 16th No. of this work. The subject is 'Discovery and Adventure in Africa, with maps, and engravings,' most miserably executed. The volume is highly interesting.

THE WRATH.

THE GIFT.

[BY WILLIAM PITT PALMER.]

I asked the airy sprites that dwell
By fount and green-wood tree—
What precious gift so rich as man's
'From nature's hand have ye?'
'We've countless things of mystic worth,
Of every form and dye;
But nought of all the wealth we prize
With that one gift can vie.'

I asked the earth, inlaid with gems
And sands of glittering gold—
'What sparkling boon, like heaven's to man, Does thy regalia hold?'
'Golconda's wealth. Potosi's stores
Are mine,' proud earth replied,
'With many a priceless pearl, but all
Are poor that gift beside!'

I asked the ocean's favored king,
Amid his gorgeous hoard—
'What prouder gift than man can bring,
Within thy realms are stored?'
And frankly free in all his pride
The trident king declared—
'Take all the wealth of all my realms,
Tis nought with that compared.'

I asked the jewelled stars that light
The shadowy throne of even—
'Boast ye a richer, fairer boon,
Than hath to man been given?'
And from the stilly depths of night
There came an answering tone—
'Though many a glorious gift we hold,
Man bears a nobler boon.'

And nature speaks, 'thy quest forbear;
No more my favors scan
Of all who've shared my free bequests,
There's none so blest as man.'
And what his high and hallowed gift,
That hath no counterpart
In all the treasured universe?
'Tis woman's blessed heart!

MISCELLANY.

POOR VIRGINIE!

The Paris correspondent of a morning paper, gives this characteristic account of a scene which occurred during the late events in Paris, taken as he states, from the manuscript of a well known French poet and patriot. 'Poor Virginie! I had known her for twenty years. She had sat at the corner of the Rue——, for a great length of years. She was seventy years of age on the 28th of July. I had purchased many an apple from her stall, and never failed to raise my hat, when I passed by her charming old face. Poor Virginie! She had sat at the same corner, and sold her apples at the same bench for nearly half a century.—For twenty years she had been a widow, and she had only one son. She had seen Louis XVI. proceed to the scaffold, and had wept for his fate. She had expressed dislike of Robespierre from the corner of the Rue——, and yet had never been arrested. She had cried 'Vive l'Emperor!' She had no sort of respect for kings, but paid great homage to men of talents. No mobs ever frightened poor Virginie—no arm had ever been raised against her. She was a sort of predestinarian, and said 'What is, is for the best.' Poor Virginie! it was well she thought so for she often sat the whole day long, without taking enough sous, to buy her a potage. I had often smoked a cigar at the corner of the street at nightfall, to knock up a chat with her, for she knew all about my neighbors, and sometimes told me news of myself. Her cap was the prettiest I ever saw. I have preserved the last one she wore, as you will find hereafter.—Her face was placid as a lake; and though she loved liberty, she was no noisy lover. The old lady could read without spectacles, and the proprietor of the adjoining cafe always lent her the Constitutional. Well, on the 28th of July, my poor old Virginie was seventy years of age. She proceeded as usual, to the corner of the street, and placed her little stall: but the gendarmes came and ordered her to retire. 'Why should I be driven away?' said Virginie, 'no one will harm me.' 'Retire without delay,' roared an incensed gendarme, and at the very instant of saying this, I arrived. The Boulevard was in confusion—the troops of Charles X. were arrived, firing was heard, the people were collecting together with arms, and I entreated poor Virginie to retire. She knew I was her friend, and she consented. She proceeded to pack up her basket, and arrange for departure, when the gendarmes rushed upon our party of fifty citizens, who were collected at the corner of the street, and with sword in hand, threatened to cut us down. I was armed with a musket. The mob rushed on the gendarmes, and endeavored to destroy or disperse them. 'Vive la Charte!' cried poor Virginie—and when I turned my head, she was a corpse. The Royal Guards had arrived; one of them had fired at the corner of the street, and a fatal ball had prostrated in an instant, my acquaintance of twenty years, by my side. I raised my musket—'Villain,' I exclaimed, 'you shall perish!' I advanced two paces and took aim. The monster was dead ere I could reflect on my position; but on turning round, who should be raising the lifeless body of Virginie, but her brave though disconsolate son? I had time only to take from her head her last cap, and to tell her son that her murderer was a corpse on the Boulevard.'

HOUSE OF REFORMATION.

A person not living thirty miles from Boston, hearing that one of his neighbors had killed an ox, and thinking that a piece of the surloin would make a good Sunday's dinner, called a companion and proceeded, after the family had retired to rest, to the barn where the ox was suspended, with a stick between the flanks in the usual way. It was agreed that he should mount the cross stick and cut away, whilst the other kept watch. He had scarcely commenced operations when the stick slipped from under him, the ribs closed in and fairly locked him inside the carcase, his arms extended above his head and his feet projecting from the neck of the animal. His companion fled, leaving the prisoner to be released from his confinement by the owner of the ox, who, upon opening his barn at sunrise, greeted him with a hearty 'Good morning.'

TO MOSES THACHER,

Member of the Senate of Massachusetts, Ex-Minister of the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham, Present Minister of the Church in North Wrentham, Member of the late Antimasonic State Convention of Massachusetts, Member of the late National Antimasonic Convention, Secceding Mason, Antimasonic Lecturer, and Editor of the Antimasonic Boston Telegraph.

LETTER X.

SIR:

The first demonstration you made of your antimasonic inclination, was given in the extraordinary publication called an Address before Montgomery and St. Alban's Lodges, with a preface and notes. That publication should have been entitled: a Preface and Notes, to which is added an Address before Montgomery and St. Alban's Lodges. The 'Address' was made public, in order that you might set forth that 'Preface' and those 'Notes.' Perhaps it was wise in you to adopt some respectable, paternal name, under which you might introduce into good society the illegitimate progeny to which you stand in the intimate relation of more than putative father. But this world is not sufficiently charitable, not so excessively indulgent, as to permit this bold intrusion of your unlawful banlings, even if disposed to overlook your faux pas. Least of all, sir, could you expect that Montgomery and St. Alban's Lodges would readily stand sponsors for your left-handed offspring, to whom no one claims maternity, unless it be that degraded, meretricious thing, called antimasonry. Your shameful attempt to palm upon the Masonic Fraternity, these hideous productions, under color of the respectable names of Montgomery and St. Alban's Lodges, was an earnest of your partizan devotion; a pledge to your political party. How well you have redeemed that pledge has already been seen,—whether you have received your full, promised reward, is less certain.

Allow me, sir, to take in hand the eldest born of all your hopeful, antimasonic race, and point out a single feature, so remarkable in expression, so very like its parent, that any one might swear to its parentage by its resemblance, were it permitted to do a thing so very like an extrajudicial oath. I mean your own, your favorite, your first born, which you have dignified with the cognomen of 'Preface.' A very appropriate, significant and philological name! A veritable courier en avant, 'introductory to the main design!' You bespoke for it the charitable indulgence of all kind, good-natured persons who might notice the early virtues of the infant. But, sir, let the first pledge of your antimasonic loves speak for itself.

With the Masonic and antimasonic discussion, which has raged, for two years past, the writer of the following Address has had, and wishes to have, nothing to do. He la-ments the intemperance and acrimony, with which the subject has been treated, on both sides. He has not been biased, in his own judgment, by anything which has agitated the public in this controversy, nor does he now intend to take the ground of a partizan.

What an unpretending exordium! How meek the spirit that pervades it! How subdued the temper it indicates! How artful the design that deprecates the anger of Masons, that jesuitically implores the indulgence of the wavering, that tenders its humble devotions at the footstool of its new idol! Why stand with such coyness at the threshold of the temple of that idol? Sir, apostates are received there with open arms: they are affiliated on the easiest terms. But, to your 'Preface.'

Here are several, independent, distinct assertions, as extraordinary as they are incredible. Allow me here to make a passing observation. It is very singular that you should recognise a discussion which has raged for two years, and should, in the same 'Preface,' talk of 'the Lodge of which I have been a member for nearly two years!' It seems by your own admission that the discussion and your membership were nearly simultaneous! For this I make no accusation; but I do say, it is very strange!

One of your most extraordinary assertions is, that you had then had, and wished to have, nothing to do with 'the Masonic and antimasonic discussion!' I avail myself of the right to say to you, that neither the sanctity of your canonicals, nor the honorable political station you hold, should shield you a moment from the charge of GROSS HYPOCRISY. Can you, sir, read that 'Preface' and those 'Notes,' and then say you have had nothing to do with the 'discussion?' Do you call it nothing, in the very moment of public, feverish excitement, to express your misgiving whether Masonry be not 'a hindrance to religion,' and whether there is not 'more of a disposition to conceal and deny, than to correct and remove abuses?' Is it nothing that in your 'Notes' you question the 'original design' of the Institution as 'moral and charitable,' that you charge it with 'the admission and retention of unprincipled members,' that you make Lodges 'nurseries of conviviality,' that you charge 'Lodges and Chapters' with 'political intrigue?' Is it nothing that you state 'from experience' how great has been the disappointment of 'the divine' in not finding in Lodges the lights and illustrations to aid him in his theological speculations? Sir, these things are 'set in a note book' of your own making; and yet you have the unblushing effrontery to introduce it with a declaration that 'with the Masonic and antimasonic discussion, which has raged for two years past, the writer of the following Address has had, and wishes to have, nothing to do!!'—Had shame wholly deserted you? When the community are bereft of their senses and understanding, you may then conceal your ulterior objects under such bold and impudent disguises; but not till then.

Another of your extraordinary assertions is in the following words: 'He laments the intemperance and acrimony, with which the subject has been treated, on both sides.' Wonderful excess of impartial grief! If you really have shed tears on the occasion, it would be worth some philosophical investigation to learn whether the tears you shed over Masonry, and the tears you shed over antimasonry, had any sympathy of union, when they stained the skirts of your garment. The scene, sir, is made sufficiently dramatic, without tears; and your robes are sufficiently defiled, without mourning over the 'intemperance and acrimony' of Masons. If they shall ever doubt the goodness of their cause, it will be when Moses Thacher shall express any sympathy for Masons or Masonry. Sir, I had heard before of the sting of ingratitude, and of crocodile tears; but I never expected to see the mean, dastardly attempt to extract the poison of that sting by the tears of hypocrisy.

It is not the least, among your extraordinary assertions, when you aver, of yourself, 'He has not been biased in his own judgment, by anything which has agitated the public in this controversy, nor does he now intend to take the ground of a partizan.' Your evil genius did however betray you into an expression which shows that your conscience was not at rest. Your anticipations prompted you to solicit indulgence, at the same time that you put yourself, with some show of parade, on your own integrity. 'If any are disposed to charge me with using severity, and acting a disingenuous part, my only answer is 'What I have written I have written.'' Was you conscious then that you should probably be charged with acting 'a disingenuous part?' If you was not at that moment guilty, why did you anticipate the imputation? If I understand the application of your italicised quotation, it is this: that you shall never defend yourself against the imputation. In this you show some cunning, not to say wisdom. It is prudent to pass in silence that which you cannot contemplate with peace of mind, nor defend with a prospect of success. Next to conquering, is the merit of making good a retreat. Remain silent, and a very short period will hide you in your own worthlessness and obscurity.

Your declaration, that you did not 'intend to take the ground of a partizan,' has obtained for you no credit for veracity. The truth is, sir, there never was a felon yet who made a public declaration that he was about to commit a felony; there never was a traitor who placarded his intention to commit treason; there never was a perfidious deceiver who forewarned the subject of his treachery.—Neither could it be supposed that you would disclose the secret designs that influenced you; and thus put it in the power of others to counteract your designs. As the felon, the traitor, the deceiver severally stand on the precipice where they take their last plunge into the abyss of ruin, and survey the prospect of the present and the hopes of the future, so stood you on the memorable 14th of May, 1829, the date of your 'Preface.' Sir, firmer nerves than yours might have been moved at the irrevocable step you was about to take. Having reached the brink of that abyss, you might well pause and declare you would not 'take the ground of a partizan;' you might well shrink from a final plunge into the wide, and deep, and dark gulph of infamy. You did shrink—you did pause.—But the resistless passion of Political Ambition drove you onward. You leaped the precipice; and you now stand, on 'the ground of a partizan,' a recreant Mason, and a disgraced man.

I am, Sir, yours,

FENELON.

REVIEW

Of the Rev. Mr. Furguson's Letters to the Rev. Moses Thacher, Pastor of the North Church of Wrentham.

Let it be remembered that the Rev. Mr. Furguson is a minister of the orthodox denomination, as is Mr. Thacher, to whom the letters are addressed. Mr. Furguson apprises Mr. Thacher that the difficulties in his church over which he is pastor, commenced at the time he became a Mason. He purposely waived the consideration at the time, when he took upon himself the Masonic obligations. The time alluded to, was during the excitement of Morgan's abduction. Had it not been for that excitement Mr. Thacher never would have thought of becoming a Mason. He was already united in feeling and principle with the antimasonic party; this is evident from Mr. Furguson's statement of his previous opinions. Connected with his opinions in opposition to Masonry, Mr. Thacher had a higher object in view, than merely to join the hue and cry of a tumultuous collection to be drawn together by powerfully exciting misrepresentations. Inordinate zeal is no criterion to judge of the goodness of a cause.—In order to effect the high object Mr. Thacher had in contemplation, it became necessary to violate the obligations he was under to his church and the general cause of the kingdom of the Lord, to assume the character of the hypocrite, which he must do, to act the various parts he was about to perform. First, he became a Mason; the object is above stated. When in Lodge, he affected not only to be pleased with the principles, but, unreservedly expressed himself in strong language, in favor of the institution. So far was flattering to the fraternity. He was repeatedly elected their orator; in his addresses he did not fail to exercise all the powers of his eloquence to laud the morality and benevolent principles of the institution.—The lodge was a good theatre, on which without reserve he might improve that eloquence, to be employed in a different part of the drama, he had in contemplation to perform. After having frequented lodges, times sufficient to be inducted to many of the degrees of Masonry, he, secondly, abjured, in the most public manner, those very principles, which a few days previously, he had approved in strains of more eloquence, than he had, on any occasion preached the religious doctrines of his church to his people. Will this sudden versatility be justified by any principle of religion, or morality? It is most evident that Mr. Thacher's conduct from first to last was deceptive and hypocritical. Every prudent man would have hesitated to become a Mason at a period of commotion against Masonry. 'Turn rogue to catch a rogue' is proverbial. However despicable the character, yet, in civil life it is winked at. But in sacred concerns, will a similar deception be admitted in justification before the throne of heaven, when in addition to the character of hypocrite, the character of accuser is assumed by false declarations? Had Mr. Thacher been disappointed in his first step of Masonry, why did he progress? Because, it became to him important, as he was about to assume the new character of a civilian, to be able to say to the world, I am not an antimason, on the mere supposition the principles of Masonry are vicious and dangerous; but, I am an antimason, knowing their principles to be most corrupt, opposed to religion and the doctrines of Christianity. Here we have a clue to the hypocrisy of Mr. Thacher, from the moment he became a Mason in form (he never was a Mason in principle) to the period of his secession. His unblushing effrontery is no evidence of the justice of his cause. We have seen the convicted criminal on the gallows meet his doom with the same apparent fortitude and submission, as has been reported of the sainted Martyr. We give Mr. Thacher credit for one qualification, in the performance of the second part of his hypocritical drama. This is industry; yes, he has been most industrious; indefatigably industrious, preaching slander and abuse throughout the country. He has even contaminated the walls of the Senate chamber with the vituperation and abuse of men, of pure and spotless reputations. Has he the infatuation to believe, his clerical office will sanctify his denunciations of better men, of purer principles, than was ever awarded by his best friends, in his best days, to himself? Has Mr. Thacher hardened his soul against the shafts of truth? Is there not one redeeming principle of virtue to be found in his mind? If there may be, the mild and Christian-like rebukes of the Rev. Mr. Furguson may rekindle the latent spark.

Mr. Furguson proceeds. 'In drawing attention to the manner and circumstances of your renunciation of Masonry, permit me for the present to regard you simply in your relation to the church and congregation of North Wrentham. You sustained to them a very sacred and endearing relation. You was their pastor and teacher, in things pertaining to eternity, and the kingdom of God; and many among them doubtless regarded you as their under shepherd, set over them in the Lord. In this endearing relation, every opinion of yours was of importance and of weight to them. They had known, that you had two or three years previous entered a lodge, and to some of them, you were by that means united in what to them appeared an additional obligation. But at length you were compelled, by what you deemed a sense of moral obligation, to renounce Masonry. I lament that such a step was necessary; that you were by your own act brought into such a state of trial. But here let me ask, what under all circumstances, would have been the path of duty, had your eye been directed by wisdom, and your heart been fixed exclusively on the people of your charge.—You knew that your church was divided in sentiment on that very subject, which you were about to agitate—that a larger than usual proportion of your brethren were members of that fraternity, from which you were about to separate yourself in a manner (according to your own showing) most awful to a thorough going Mason. And now, brother, what, in another case, would have been deemed proper in similar circumstances? Would you in the very commencement, have charged your brethren in the church, in common with other Masons with the blackest crimes? I here say nothing of the complaint urged by Masons, that you obtained their vote of thanks for a purpose very foreign from that for which it was given. But I am now regarding you simply as the pastor of the North Church of Wrentham, and when I ask myself, whether in publishing your address, with its accompanying notes, you pursued the course best calculated to maintain peace, and to gain your brethren, I am driven to the conclusion, that you served the cause of antimasonry and Christianity, in that renunciation, so far as Wrentham was concerned, in a bungling manner. Nor am I alone in this conclusion.—And here I would again ask, whether your manner and the circumstances of your renunciation of Masonry were the best which could have been adopted, regarding you simply in your connexion with the church and people of North Wrentham? You was their pastor; and Oh brother, have you acted towards them, in all this matter, as though one lost sheep from the fold was of more value, than the ninety and nine which had not strayed? But there is yet another view of this subject. You might conclude,

2. 'That the circumstances of the times and of your situation, called you to overlook North Wrentham, and to act in reference to the general cause.—[of antimasonry] Suppose, if you please, that it was your duty to enter the Senate, to be a candidate for Congress, the Editor of an antimasonic paper, a lecturer in different parts of the country on speculative Masonry, a member of the National Antimasonic Convention, &c.; what I ask, would have been a magnanimous and honorable and Christian course in regard to the people of your particular charge?' The question involves Christian virtues erased from Mr. Thacher's vocabulary. The tender of Mr. Furguson's affectionate suggestion to his recreant brother, is like casting pearls before swine, who trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you. We will hear the suggestions of Mr. Furguson. 'Suppose you had stood before them and said, Brethren, I am acting, or about to act, in reference to a cause, which will greatly agitate and perplex your minds. I am about to come out in opposition to what has been my own known and established opinion, and I cannot take that contemplated stand, which I know will deeply affect your peace, without first asking a dismission from my particular relation to you—suppose this course had been adopted, is it likely that the church in North Wrentham would now have been as sheep having no shepherd?' When a man finds himself involved in evils brought upon himself by his own ambitious folly, he is like the mariner navigating his frail bark between Scylla and Charybdis, on all sides are seen either breakers, or quicksands.

3. 'There may be yet another consideration,' adds Mr. Furguson; 'you may tell me, that it was circumstances which placed you where you are. Allowing it to be so, are you to have all the advantage of circumstances, while your afflicted church are trodden in the dust, because they have felt those circumstances bear hardly upon them? Admit, if you please, that you did not mean to go beyond your first [antimasonic] address—that after telling the world, that you and a number of your brethren had been for years connected with a society, which obligated you to perpetrate and conceal crimes, you meant there to stop. Admit if you please, that you was driven by circumstances at home and abroad, to take step after step until you, reached your present position; are you to have the advantage of all these circumstances, and to be regarded as an injured, persecuted, righteous man, while your brethren in the church and in the ministry are to be deserted and proclaimed to the world as persecutors because they cannot see with your optics, nor move in your orbit? Truly, Brother Thacher, if this is the reward of your righteousness, and if thus others are to drink of your cup, it would be better to fall into the hands of God, than thus to fall into the hands of men.'

It appears that Mr. Thacher in his own justification, alleges, he was led on in the pursuit of his adopted measures by circumstances. Whenever was there a criminal brought to the bar of justice, who has not attempted to vindicate his nefarious deeds by the plea of circumstances? Circumstances are his only defence. Of these Mr. Thacher abundantly avails himself.

EDITOR THACHER.—Can this gentleman faithfully discharge the multifarious duties of Minister, Editor, and Senator, at one and the same time? It is very certain that he cannot. No man can do it; and that Moses Thacher cannot, is sufficiently evident from the fact that much of his time in the Senate Chamber the past year, was occupied in selecting from the newspapers, probably for his own honor, such paragraphs as suited his fancy. Are the electors of Norfolk willing to pay this gentleman four dollars a day for the honor of his presence in the Senate?—are they willing to pay him for the time he employs in his editorial capacity? I have no wish to see the Senate Chamber converted into an editorial room, and shall therefore give my vote for the 'freedom of opinion ticket;' and I trust most of my fellow-citizens will 'do likewise.'

NORFOLK.

'Your Bull has gored my Ox.'—Some of the anti editors begin to discover the unfairness of charging to the account of Masonry every evil with which the world has been afflicted since Adam's fall, and of affixing the title of Mason upon every criminal since Cain became a murderer. Having now made the discovery, we trust that they will profit by it, and in future let every 'tub stand on its bottom.' The way, however, in which this grand discovery was made, was simply this:—Some one who discovered that the anties were not a whit better than their neighbors—that they had 'a beam in their own eyes,' made a list of a few of the antimasonic rogues and rascals that have been hung, shot, and penitentiaryized within something less than the last 2000 years and that list being pretty formidable in numbers, the anti editors just then discover that it is very unfair to charge the sins of any one man upon a party. Agreed to. We can find enough intrinsically evil in antimasonry to crush any party, without resorting to the sins of one man or a few men.

AURORA BOREALIS.

Various theories have been adduced, to account for this singular phenomenon, but none, as yet, perfectly satisfactory; by some who have more imagination than philosophical research, it has been imputed to the eruption of a vast volcano; situated somewhere, but where, they do not pretend to say. In our hemisphere it uniformly appears in the north, extending towards the north-west and south-east. In Greenland, it is said sometimes to be seen towards the south, tending to prove that the cause is not a local one, on the earth. In the southern hemisphere, it exhibits but a feeble light, in the direction of the south pole.

It was first noticed in New-England, in 1719. It is more frequent some years than others, and, generally most apparent near the autumnal equinox. Some years it is scarcely ever seen, in others it has appeared every night during the months of September and October, and then disappeared during the remainder of the year. In Europe it is common only near the 60th degree of latitude. In America, it is usual towards the 50th. It generally appears in France, not much elevated above the horizon. This appearance commences between 8 and 9 o'clock, in this latitude, and is preceded by a dark cloud, nearly resembling the segment of a circle, of which the horizon forms the chord. Its circumference very soon is bordered with a whitish light, which sometimes appears gently to expire. Frequently, the cloudy segment opens in different parts, whence issues streams and rays of light, of a yellow, rose, purple, white, and a sea-green color. A general movement agitates all the cloudy and enlightened space; rays becoming more and more bright, shoot across each other, attended with a crackling noise. By degrees, there is formed in the zenith, a luminous crown, which seems to be the central point of all the motions of the luminous matter. After having occupied for an hour or two, almost the whole of the northern expanse of the heavens, it contracts itself, at first, on the southern side, afterwards, on the west and east, and finally disappears towards the north. Almost all philosophers agree in supposing it to be an electric or an electrochemical phenomena. The hypothesis of Professor Libes appears to be the most simple and philosophical.

It being known that the component parts of the atmosphere are oxygen and nitrogen gases; this philosopher has laid down the six following principles. 1st. If the electric spark be transmitted through a mixture of oxygen and nitrogen gases, the result is the production of nitric or nitrous acids, or of nitrous gas, according to the proportion subsisting between the oxygen and nitrogen, which compose the mixture. 2d. Nitric acid acquires additional color and volatility on being exposed to the rays of the sun. A glass receiver being placed over the saucer containing nitric acid, and being exposed to the sun, the acid became colored, and the receiver was filled with reddish vapors, which remained in it for some time diffusing a lustre similar to that of Aurora Borealis. 3d. In fluids containing nitrous acid, we always perceive above the acid a very red and volatile vapor, which never condenses. 4th. Nitrous gas, when in contact with atmospheric air emits deep red vapors, which escape into the atmosphere. 5th. The hydrogen gas which is disengaged from the surface of the globe, occupies a space in the higher regions of the atmosphere, marked out by its specific gravity. 6th. The solar heat has but little influence in the polar regions.

In reflecting upon these principles, it is easy to perceive the production of hydrogen gas, being extremely small, if at all in the polar regions, the electric fluid in flowing back from the equator towards the pole, must pass through a space, occupied only by oxygen and nitrogen gases; that the electric spark fixes and combines these gases; that this combination ought to cause the production of nitrous acid, or of nitrous gas, according to the proportion of the two component gases; and that the gas and the nitrous acid thus formed, should exhibit red and volatile vapors, which give rise to the phenomena of the Aurora Borealis. If these phenomena do not occur in lower latitudes, the reason may be, that in the heated atmosphere there is always to be found a mixture of oxygen and hydrogen gases, which attracts the electric spark, thus occasioning thunder and lightning. It is worthy of remark, and goes to confirm the hypothesis that the Aurora Borealis is owing to electricity, that thunder and lightning are seldom if ever known above 70 degrees of latitude.

This explanation does not account for the blackish segment forming the base of the luminous atmosphere; this must be left to future observations to determine. Professor Malte-Erun suggests that the Aurora Borealis may be the effect of one of those optical illusions, which so frequently occur in some countries, called the mirage, and that the circular segment may be the image of the terrestrial globe, reflected in the nocturnal atmosphere. If so, the luminous rays which appear to issue from this cloudy segment, would, in fact, issue from the earth itself.

Cementation of Iron by Cast Iron.—Pure iron, when surrounded by, and in contact with, cast iron turnings, and heated, is carbonised very rapidly, so as to harden, to temper, and in fact to exhibit all the properties of steel. M. Guatier finds this to be a very advantageous process in numerous cases, especially where the articles to be case-hardened, or converted into steel, are small, as iron wire, or wire gauze. The temperature required is not so high as in the ordinary process of cementation, and the pieces to be carbonised are not injured in form. The kind of cast iron used should be gray metal, and the more minutely it is divided, the more rapid and complete is the operation. By covering the mass of cast metal, in which the iron to be carbonised is enveloped, with sand, oxidation from the contact of the air is prevented, and the cast metal may be used many times. Plumbago experimented with in the same manner does not produce the effect.

Indelible Ink.—As the art of man can unmake whatever the art of man can make, we have no right to expect an indelible ink. However, a sort of approximation to it may be made as follows:—Make a saturated solution of indigo and madder in boiling water, in such proportions as to give a purple tint; add to this from one-sixth to one-eighth of its weight of oil of vitriol, according to the thickness and strength of the paper to be used. This makes an ink which flows pretty freely from the pen; and when writing which has been executed, is exposed to a considerable but gradual heat from a fire, it becomes completely black, the letters being burnt in and charred by the action of the oil of vitriol. If the acid has not been used in sufficient quantity to destroy the texture of the paper, and reduce it to the state of tinder, then the color may be discharged by the oxymuriatic and oxalic acids and their compounds, though not without great difficulty. When the full proportion of acid has been employed, a little crumbling and rubbing of the paper reduces the carbonaceous matter of the writing to powder, but though this be done, we can still, by putting a black ground behind them, render the letters legible; and thus a species of indelible writing is procured (for the letters are, in a manner stamped out of the paper,) which might be useful for some purposes, perhaps for the signature of bank notes.

Iodous Acid.—In making this substance, M. Pleischl bids us take three parts of the chlorate of potassa and one of iodine; he also bids us keep the receiver cool during the process.

Hypo Sulphuric Acid.—In preparing this acid M. Heeren says the black oxide of manganese should be in fine powder when we pass the sulphuric acid over it, and the temperature should be low. We thus get a larger quantity of the hypo-sulphuric acid than by any other mode.

Oxide of Lead made soluble by Lime. We are indebted to M. Fournet for our knowledge of the fact, that with the assistance of heat lime will render the oxide of lead (lytharge) soluble in water. From this we perceive how this deleterious substance may get diffused through fluids without our being able to detect it but by chemical means, for M. Fournet says it forms a transparent and colorless solution.

Evolution of heat during Compression of Water. M. Despretz has ascertained experimentally that the compression of water by force equal to twenty atmospheres causes the disengagement of one sixty-sixth part of a degree of heat.

Paper to resist humidity.—M. Engle prepares paper which will resist moisture; to accomplish this, he dips unsized paper once or twice into a clear solution of mastic in oil of turpentine, and dries it by a gentle heat. The paper without becoming transparent, has all the properties of writing paper, and may be used for the same purposes. It is especially recommended for passports, workmen's books, legal papers, &c. When preserved for years, it is free from injury, either by humidity, insects, or mice. It is further added, that a solution of caoutchouc will produce even a still better effect.

NEW METHOD OF FINDING THE VELOCITY OF A SHIP AT SEA.

As the writer of this is not aware of any other method of finding the velocity of a ship when running her course than the log-line, and as much depends on the accuracy with which that velocity is ascertained, the following plan is submitted to the judgment of those qualified to judge upon its merits, as offering a nearer approximation to the truth.

In the running of a ship a powerful effect is produced in the hinder part of the vessel, which the writer thinks available in finding the velocity at which a vessel moves. This effect may be traced to the following cause:—On every square inch of the ship's vertical area, when she is in motion, there is a powerful action upon the stern, occasioned by the adhesion of the fluid particles to the vessel. The extent of the effect hereby produced must always be in exact proportion to the speed of the vessel; and to render it available to the purpose of measuring the ship's way, the following apparatus is proposed. Let a copper tube of about one-fourth of an inch in diameter be placed in a hole, perforated through the hull of the vessel at the stern, about two feet below the ballast-water line, and let the tubes mouth be open so that the water may have free access into it. From the inside of the hull the other end of the tube by a knee is to be turned to an erect position with its diameter increased to about two or three inches, extending upward to about one or two feet above the load-water line. In this tube, when the vessel is standing still, the water will rise to the height of the surface outside of the vessel, and when she is put in motion the water will sink in the tube in proportion to the velocity of the vessel. The rate of sinking in the tube cannot as yet be accurately stated; to ascertain this will require experiments on a large scale. From some experiments, however, which I have attempted with a small rectangular tube in running water, I have been led to conclude that about one inch to each mile of speed will not be far from the amount. Proceeding on this data, if one mile of speed cause the water to sink in the tube one inch, and if sixteen miles per hour be about the highest speed that vessels are known to make, then, by adapting to sixteen inches of the tube a perpendicular scale, resembling that of a barometer of the old construction, or by means of a dial-plate of the circular form, the speed with which the vessel goes may be ascertained with as much ease as we ascertain the time of day by looking at a clock.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

[Original.]

We live in a very marvellous age, Mr. Editor,—an age fraught with wonders strange and signs portentous—truly we ought to feel very grateful that it has fallen to our lot to live and be, if not participators in, beholders at least of, the wonderful mutations and twistifications which are now being done and carried on. At no age of the world of which I have ever gathered any account either from history or by tradition, has there been such an overturn, overthrow, overflow and inundation upon this mundane sphere as at the present.

Virtue, light, beauty, happiness and liberty are about to dawn in all their magnificent effulgence upon our hitherto darkened, grovelling and benighted world. And this Mr. Editor, is wholly in consequence of the Herculean, untiring, patriotic, disinterested, benevolent, charitable and humane exertions of that glorious, and immortal phalanx and galaxy of heroes, worthies and patriots, which are compounded of and compose that three times thrice puissant host, called known and y'clept antimasons, and compared to which the band at Ther mopylae sink with their deeds of heroism into utter nothingness and insignificance.

What gratitude do we not owe to those devils incarnate, otherwise called Masons, for their abduction of William Morgan? Surely, instead of branding them with villanous epithets, we should hail them as the origin (if not the rise and progress) of that immaculate and immortal sect 'the true blue Anties.' For unless they had so done, the world would in all probability have lost the illumination which the anties as a body have thrown around, above and below them.

I have been led to these profound and well digested cogitations, thoughts and speculations (I love triplets) by noticing the late acquisition which the anties have gained in the renunciation of Masonry by a gentleman in the south part of this County, who states in his valedictory address that he was initiated into the secrets and took the oaths required to become a Mason, at King David's Lodge in this town.

Now, Mr Editor, I have a word or two, to talk upon that affair—the gentleman, doubtless believes, and honestly too, that he was made a Mason, some fifteen or twenty years gone by, as he has stated. But it is the lot of humanity to err. Memory sometimes proves, if not treacherous, still very stretchers; and we are in consequence thereof at times with the most honest convictions and intentions led astray from truth. Selfish considerations not unfrequently bias the mind and wrestle with the memory of man, until the former claims the victory over the latter and warps and bends them to its purposes and wishes.

Suppose Mr. Editor, (and I ask pardon for the base supposition) that you were an antimason and afflicted precisely in the same manner in which all anties are, with a terrible and inexpressible itching and desire for honor, office, titles, power and filthy lucre; and moreover that you knew or had good reason to believe, that by denouncing both Masonry and Masons, your chance of obtaining these deeply cherished wishes would not only be facilitated and accelerated, but would in all probability be brought to a speedy and happy consummation? What then I ask would be the nature of your reflections, provided that it was necessary for you to forget or deny what you knew to be true in order to attack the long sought and hitherto dimly discovered land of promise.

Would not selfishness and antimasonry give battle to honesty and virtue until they were completely driven from the heart. Or in other words would not the spirit of antimasonry (than which a worse was never permitted to scourge our land) break down every barrier, and overcome every moral, and religious obligation to accomplish its own detestable designs? I leave it to you who have witnessed the operations of that party to answer?

But this is not german to the gentleman in the South part of this County—he as I before stated honestly thinks he is a Mason, or was at least before his renunciation. I shall now proceed to give some account of that affair and to notice some little discrepancies as it regards his statement of facts.

In the first place I think he is mistaken as it regards the time which has elapsed since that important epoch in his not unimportant and eventful life. Instead of its being some fifteen or twenty years since, I am somewhat positive that it cannot exceed ten years at the most—and instead of his being manufactured from his own original purity into a filthy and unclean Mason by the officers of King David's Lodge, I am quite as positive that that important ceremony was performed by a certain wandering vagabond, a manufacturer, administrator and ventilator of exhilarating gas which he carried about in a bladder.

This fellow was one of your swaggering, bold faced impudent horse jockey vagrants, who stopped in this place and took up his residence in the Hotel during the session of the court. And while here he manufactured his gas to please such babies, boys and children of a larger growth as felt disposed to patronize such a worthy hero. The gentleman before alluded to in the South part of the County, was here at this time and among a host of other wise men of Gotham concluded to try the effects of exhilarating gas. He accordingly took it and immediately imagined himself to have been made a Mason. I know not whether the vender of gas, gave him a deeper or a stronger portion than he usually gave, but certain it is that from that time down to his renunciation he has continued in the firm belief of being a Mason. And I have no doubt that he really supposes he went through all the ceremonies and complied with all the requisitions of the Lodge, at that time, for I understood that the gas worked strangely upon all who had the honor and pleasure of inhaling the same. Under its influence some fought the chairs, floor and walls—some told strange stories—some danced and cut divers singular capers and somersets—some sung—some laughed—some cried—some revealed their affairs, some received broken noses and none were any wiser for inhaling the celebrated Mr. Cliff's still more celebrated gas. The unfortunate hallucination wrought upon the gentleman by the effects of gas taken at that time has continued upon him ever since—and would probably have continued till the day of his death, had not the spirit of antimasonry, pointed out through the vista of the future—the high places of honor and profit, which the gentleman was to fill, provided he would renounce his Masonry.—But instead of renouncing Masonry, he has after all renounced nothing more nor less than Mr. Cliff's gas. I make these remarks not for the purpose of injuring the gentleman's popularity among the anties. It matters not to them whether a man renounces Masonry—religion—exhilarating gas—his country—his wife—his children—his honesty or his God—provided he will join heart and hand in their unhallowed designs to subvert everything sacred and holy—and to brand with infamy and contempt a large and respectable portion of the community. He of course will not suffer in their estimation, provided he will give them his hearty support in future.

New-Bedford, March 1881.

MOSES THACHER.

We would call the attention of the electors of Norfolk to the following STATEMENT OF FACTS, prepared for and submitted to the Ecclesiastical Council convened at North Wrentham, Dec. 14, 1880. We would invite them to read it, and then candidly to declare by their votes on Monday next, whether the Rev. Moses Thacher is calculated to add to the dignity or respectability of the Senate of Massachusetts.

STATEMENT, &c.

The Committee chosen, Nov. 20, 1880, by the Church in the North Parish in Wrentham, for the purpose of calling a council, &c. met on the 2d of December, voted that, Brothers Claudius Hayward, Daniel Cook, and Darius Ware be a sub-committee to prepare and lay the business before the Council. The sub-committee have agreed to the following statement of facts; which, in their opinion, are a part of the events which have led to the present unhappy and divided state of this church and people.

Article 1st. On the 11th day of May, 1829, Mr. Thacher stated to a brother in the church, that he was fully convinced that Masonry was a corrupt institution, and that it led directly to infidelity.—On the 13th of the same month, he delivered an address before St. Alban's Lodge, in which he called the Masonic a 'moral and charitable institution.' The address is among the papers laid before the Council; the notes attached to the address were written before the address was delivered. The preface, which bears the date May 14th, was written and submitted to a number of clergymen on or before the 29th of April, and the testimonials of Messrs. Cummings and Warren were received about that date.

2d. A number of the brethren of this Church, and others who were present when Mr. Thacher delivered his address, stated, that Mr. Thacher, in a conversation after the address, said that he had no idea of renouncing or denouncing the Institution. Mr. Thacher does not say they are mistaken, but charges them with wilful misrepresentations, both in his conversations and in his writings. See 'Letters to a brother in a Church,' p. 17, and 18.

3d. On the 12th of Feb. 1830, a Committee, consisting of Dea. Asa Ware, Daniel Cook, and Benjamin Rockwood, was chosen by the church for the purpose of investigating the cause of our present divided state. The committee after consulting with the brethren who were Masons, agreed to advise the church to request the Masons to withdraw; so far as not to attend, or have anything to do with, any Masonic meeting.

A vote was written and given to Mr. Thacher by one of the Committee, with a request to have the church stop the next Sabbath after public worship, for the purpose of having the vote passed.—The church tarried the next Sabbath but one ad ter, but the business of the committee was not mentioned.

Mr. Thacher stated to the church that he had it from good authority, that there was deposited in the Knight Templar's Armory at Boston, arms sufficient to arm two thousand men. Mr. Thacher spoke on the subject at some length, and with apparent feeling. During the week, three of the church went to Boston in order to ascertain the fact, and found the story without foundation; but Mr. Thacher insisted that the story was correct, and charged the brethren with going to Boston for the purpose of proving him guilty of falsehood.

4th. Mr. Thacher has charged a number of the members of the Church, in a public manner, with acting from improper motives.

5th. In connexion with the above article, we would call the attention of the Council to an article in the Boston Christian Herald, Oct. 6, 1830, headed Freemasonry and the Church.

6th. At a church-meeting, held Oct. 8, 1830, the Church having previously voted to unite with Br. Anson Mann in a mutual Council in a case of discipline, a committee was mentioned to sign the letters missive. Mr. Thacher said that he was the proper organ of the church, and should sign the letters in behalf of the church. The next Sabbath the church tarried after public worship, and Mr. Thacher then informed the church that he should not sign the letters, and stated as a reason that the Council was called through Masonic influence.

7th. On the 20th of Oct. the Council met; and the next morning the Council advised Br. Mann to make such an acknowledgement as they presented, and advised the church to accept it.

Br. Mann and the church readily accepted of the advice, twelve of the church voting in favor and none against it. There were eight present who did not vote. The next Sabbath, Mr. Thacher read to the church a paper signed by a number of the members of this church, requesting to be dismissed, for the purpose of forming a new church. The church appointed a week from the next Saturday to attend to their request. Mr. Thacher stated that if they did not have an answer then they should consider it a refusal. Mr. Thacher and a part of those who had signed the paper, met the next morning at 10 o'clock, and formed themselves into what they called a new church.*

* In referring to Br. Mann, we feel it our duty to give a history of the case of discipline in which he was involved. There were three articles of charge brought against him, on the first of which he was acquitted by the church; and for the third he made satisfaction and was forgiven. The second was for charging the Pastor with writing and publishing Atheism. The circumstances as they appeared on trial before the church, and also before the council, to which this charge was referred, were as follows:—More than a year previous, in conversation with Mr. Thacher, Brother Mann did say, with regard to certain pieces alluded to, that he believed Mr. Thacher to be the author of them, and that they contained Atheism or Deism. His meaning was, not that Mr. Thacher, was a Deist or an Atheist, but that he thought the same arguments might be urged against the Scriptures, or against the being of a God, which were urged in these pieces against Masonry. This declaration produced no breach of fellowship or affection between him and Mr. Thacher, until more than a year afterwards; and then the grievance was not made manifest by Mr. T.; but by one who it was well known to numbers in the church, was not the most friendly to Br. Mann. The public will see from this statement, the reason of the peculiar nature of the result of the council to which this

8. On the Friday and Saturday after the Council, Mr. Thacher, went to members of the church, to get signers to his paper, and called on a number of women, without calling on their husbands, who were also members of the church.

9. Nov. 6th the church met according to appointment. Mr. Thacher not being present, the church chose Br. Daniel Cook, Dea. E. Pond, and Dea. C. D. Hayward, a Committee to wait on Mr. Thacher, and ask him if he considered himself as Moderator of the church in the North Parish in Wrentham. The committee soon returned, and reported that Mr. Thacher says that he does not consider himself the moderator of said church.

At a church meeting on the 20th, Mr. Thacher denied the above statement.

10. At a meeting of the church on the 6th of Nov., a vote was passed to ask Mr. Thacher the reasons why he and others wished to be dismissed. On the 13th, Mr. Thacher offered to give them verbally, but the church voted not to receive them unless they were in writing. Mr. Thacher said that he could furnish them, but could set no time. The church has not yet received them.

11. The church, by their committee, have repeatedly asked Mr. Thacher whether he considers himself their pastor, and he has declined giving them an answer.

12. Mr. Thacher and those that adhere to him, have held their communion every month, thereby depriving the church of the privilege of the meeting-house. The stated period of the communion was once in two months.

13. A committee chosen by the church to provide for the communion on the first Sabbath in December, waited on Mr. Thacher and asked him if he would administer the Sacrament to the church. Mr. Thacher said he would on certain conditions.

N. B.—Explanations and proof to be given as called for by the Council. Mr. Thacher has asked a dismission during the past season, which ought to have been mentioned in another place, but the committee will explain how that subject was disposed of. A true copy from files,

Messrs. Moore and Sevey:—

Gentlemen:—I observed in the Masonic Mirror of the 12th ult., the name of James Pierce on the list of the Antimasonic Remonstrance. I have since that time endeavored to find a person, other than myself, of that name; have applied to the directory, to the tax book and have offered a reward, to any person who would bring one of that name to me, belonging to this city; but all in vain, —and I feel it a duty which I owe to the public at large, and especially to myself, to state publicly that the name of James Pierce in the Remonstrance against the petition of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, was never signed by me, and if meant for me, it is a barefaced forgery. It may be there is another James Pierce; but it never was signed by

JAMES PIERCE, of Hawkins St.

To the editor of the Mirror.

We are doing well in the cause here, antimasonry is almost extinct in this town, city and county. We have recently fitted up, and dedicated a new Hall, and have had occasion to turn out in procession at the funeral of a brother, and the brethren generally manifested as much zeal as the times require. We are doing well in both our Lodges, our Chapter and Encampment. I subjoin a list of the officers of the several orders which you may insert in your paper, if you have room, and are so disposed.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL, 2, 1831.

NORFOLK SENATORIAL ELECTION.

MOSES THACHER, with a recklessness of consequences without a parallel in the history of political effrontery, has again offered himself to the free and independent yeomanry of Norfolk, as a candidate for re-election to the Senate of this Commonwealth! He again solicits at their hands the highest office in their power to bestow! Will this be granted? Will Moses Thacher again be permitted to cast off the surplice, for the robes of the Senator? Will the good people of Norfolk again deprive the little flock of Christians, whom Providence has committed to his charge, of the protection and counsel of their Pastor? Will the electors of Norfolk be instrumental in diverting the 'labor and talents' of an expositor of the gospel, from the 'work' of the ministry; a work which Mr. Thacher declares to be 'more than sufficient to employ all the time, and all the talents, and all the labor, of men vastly more able than himself?' We cannot believe that they will be so regardless of the sacred interests of the ministry, as to be instrumental in diverting into a secular channel, the 'talents and labor' of the divine who now asks for their suffrages. The electors of Norfolk cannot wish to do such violence to the cause of the ministry: they will not deprive it of one of its pillars: they will not take one of its supporters from the scene of its supposed usefulness, and place him where his 'talents and labor' will be inoperative; where he can be of no service to the ministry, but where he must be, from his acknowledged destitution of political honesty, and want of political knowledge and experience, a hindrance to the operation of the wheels of legislation; an expense and a discredit to the government of the State.

Before they take this important step; before they cast their votes on Monday next, we urge them to review the services rendered by the Reverend gentleman, in his Senatorial capacity. What measures has he proposed? In what manner have the interests of the Commonwealth been advanced by him? He has rendered himself conspicuous, only by an exhibition of his folly. It is to Moses Thacher that our Senate is indebted for the disgrace of that ill-formed, unconstitutional and extra-judicial monster of folly, designed by its apostate father for the suppression of extra-judicial oaths.—This superlatively ridiculous act of extra-legislation, occupied the time of the Senate, (consisting of 40 members, at $4 a day,) not less than four days; and, consequently, cost the State not less than six hundred and forty dollars! In other words—that he might have an opportunity to display his antimasonic talents and exhibit the evidence of his own moral depravity, Moses Thacher mulcted the citizens of Massachusetts in the trifling sum of six hundred and forty dollars!—Add to this amount his own salary, say $400, and we find that the gentleman's Senatorial labors for the year past, have cost the State not less than one thousand and forty dollars!! Per contra—an antimasonic lecture!!! Is this satisfactory to the people of Norfolk? Will they send this man back, that he may again squander away their money and bring disgrace upon their Senate, by another exhibition of antimasonic buffoonery, and another recitation of unlocated falsehoods? They will be called upon to answer this question at the polls, on Monday next. Let that answer be worthy of their characters as free, intelligent citizens: let it be full, unequivocal, distinct. If, as Mr. Thacher has publicly declared, the 'interests of religion' and the 'work of the ministry,' require all his time, all his talents, and all his labor, and 'furnish him with a sufficient excuse for considering himself no longer a member of the Masonic Institution,' they also furnish the citizens of Norfolk with a sufficient reason why they should consider him no longer a member of the Senate of Massachusetts. If the gentleman's political ambition or love of country induced him to sacrifice his duties as a minister, let the electors of Norfolk tell him on Monday, that they ask no such sacrifice.

We have another and, in our view, a strong objection to Mr. Thacher, as a Senator. We would have no minister of the gospel in our Senate, who has violated his solemn covenant with his church. An Ecclesiastical Council at North Wrentham, have found Moses Thacher guilty of this offence. We would have no minister of the gospel in our Senate, who has been found guilty of prevarication, duplicity and falsehood, in his transactions with his church and society. We would have no minister of the gospel in our Senate, who has the ruffian effrontery to declare himself an oath-breaker. Would the people of Norfolk have such a man to represent them, in the Senate of Massachusetts? If they would, they will elect Moses Thacher. But if they would not; if they would erase the deep stain that rests upon their political escutcheon, they will rally at the polls on Monday next, and, like honest freemen, declare their disapprobation of such bold offences.

MOSES THACHER,

Candidate for the Senate of Massachusetts!

A few weeks since we attempted to show the binding force of that class of oaths, legally termed extra-judicial. We selected for this purpose, the oath read by Rev. Moses Thacher before the Senate of this Commonwealth; which he avowed he had taken and, as a seceding Mason, had deliberately broken. From this avowal we endeavored to prove that, that gentleman, and his associate seceders, were as guilty of perjury, in the view of the moral law and in the eye of Heaven, as though they had violated their solemn oath, administered in legal form and by a legal agent. How far we were successful in that attempt, can be better determined by the reader than by ourselves. But it is some evidence of the correctness of the position we assumed, that it is sanctioned by high antimasonic authority! It is also satisfactory to us, to learn that there are those among our opponents who have honesty enough to declare their conviction of the moral turpitude of the avowed oath-breaker.

As we said on the occasion referred to, so say we now again. The violator of an oath, voluntarily and solemnly subscribed to in the presence of Almighty God, must inevitably be regarded by the moral portion of community, as a being too wicked and debased to mingle in the society of moral men. Will then the moral people of Norfolk permit an avowed oath-breaker, again to contaminate by his presence the moral atmosphere of the Senate Chamber of Massachusetts? We think not. It is contrary to the natural constitution of the human heart; to the principles implanted, by the Creator of all things, in the breast of man, that the traitor or the renegade should find favor, longer than interest demands, even with those at whose bidding, and on whose fair promises, he has been induced to betray his country, party or friends; and for whose special profit he has, perhaps, bartered away his temporal and eternal happiness! This remark is fully exemplified by the subjoined extract from the leading antimasonic paper in this city; to which we invite the attention of the olectors of Norfolk, as showing the estimation in which Mr. Thacher, as a seceding Mason, is held by intelligent members of the antimasonic party

I don't believe any adhering Mason an honest man, because the very principles which actuate and govern him, are in opposition to that which is honest; he cannot in accordance with his Masonic oaths act honestly and uprightly towards the mass of his fellow-citizens—HE MUST EITHER PERJURE HIMSELF, BY BREAKING HIS UNHALLOWED OBLIGATIONS, or he must deny justice to the uninitiated.

Here is a direct, positive, unequivocal avowal that seceding Masons are guilty of PERJURY! Moses Thacher is a Seceding Mason! Let the electors of Norfolk make the application,—let them apply the argument. The premises are before them. They are furnished by Mr. Thacher's antimasonic friends. They are presumed to be correct.

It is on the evidence of seceding Masons that the present proscriptive crusade against the Masonic fraternity is predicated. Antimasons say these men are perjured! Is their testimony then to be received as sufficient to warrant the persecution of individuals against whom no offence is alleged, other than that of being Masons?

We did not expect that this class of beings, vile as they may be, would be thus prematurely cast off and abandoned by the men for 'whose special profit' they had made such immense sacrifice. We did not expect that the time had come when the interests of their employers no longer required their services. But thus sure and speedy is the reward of treachery! To be scorned and detested by those for whose interest the treachery was perpetrated! Thus it was with Judas; so also it was with Arnold; and it will continue to be so through all coming time. Men may love the treason, but will abhor, detest and execrate the traitor. It is a lesson for seceding Masons. Mr. Thacher may learn from it that he is held in no higher repute by the honest and candid of his antimasonic friends, than he is by those to whom he has proved recreant;—whom he has deserted, and falsely and basely calumniated. He may learn from this first honest expression of antimasonic feeling, that a writer of the party in whose interests he is engaged, has stamped on the forehead of the seceding Mason, the enormous and appalling crime of PERJURY! This charge is preferred by that paper in whose columns he first figured as an antimasonic disputant! It therefore has peculiar claims to his personal attention. That Mr. Thacher may be certain that the sentiment avowed in the quotation already made, is concurred in by the party, we will now extract another sentence from the editorial remarks contained in the same paper, of the same date:

Remember that by putting Masons in places of public trust, it is you (antimasonic electors,) who put them in the dreadful situation of breaking either their civil or Masonic OATH.

The breaking of Masonic oaths is here very properly declared to be a dreadful alternative. It is unnecessary to say more to show that even Mr. Thacher's antimasonic sponsors do not agree with him in his estimation of Masonic 'oaths and penalties.' The electors of Norfolk will signify by their votes on Monday next, in what estimation they hold the violator of oaths. They will say whether Moses Thacher shall re-occupy his seat at the Senate board, or whether he shall be left to the reflections of 'dignified retirement,' and to the compunctious visitings of his own conscience.

The antimasons are making desperate efforts to secure the success of their candidates in Norfolk. They have had their mountebank about delivering lectures in every part of the county, for a fortnight past. The county is groaning under the oppressive weight of their lying and abusive handbills, papers, and electioneering vagrants. It is all to no purpose. The electors of Norfolk are aroused, and they will acquit themselves manfully on Monday next. They have had enough of antimasonry; and they will have no more.

POLITICS—Norfolk Election.—That our readers, unacquainted with the peculiar circumstances which characterise the pending election in Norfolk, may not presume that we are about to enter the political arena, as a combatant, we deem it proper to disclaim such intention.—With politics we editorially have no connexion. Our opposition is to the unhallowed principles of antimasonry; against which we shall array ourselves at all times and on all occasions. The stand we have taken in reference to the Norfolk election, is predicated on the sacred principles of self-preservation. Antimasons have entered that field of political strife, not as the opponents of Masons asking for office; but they have entered it with the avowed purpose of carrying their persecution of Masons even into the consecrated retreats of private life!—Against such fiendish, hell-generated principles we would raise our arm, though that arm should wither in the attempt. We have never studied the doctrine of passive obedience; though we have fully complied with the scripture requirements: 'Unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek offer also the other; and him that taketh away thy cloak forbid him not to take thy coat also.' We have been smitten on the one cheek, and we have offered the other, and been smitten on that also. We have been robbed of our cloak, and we have quietly permitted our coat to be stripped from our back. But our enemies are not satisfied. They now grasp at the skin, and are ready to strip that from us also. He who will submit to this, is recreant to himself. Forbearance in this case becomes cowardice—it is criminal. When we quietly submit to such degradation we shall righteously deserve to be proscribed, to be persecuted, disfranchised and cast off from the society of freemen.

The contest in Norfolk is between the honest yeomanry of that county and the political jugglers of antimasonry—it is between the people and a base proscriptive faction—between the republican institutions of the country and a banditti of political disorganizers. If the electors do their duty—a duty they owe to themselves, their children, their country and their God—the result will be a triumphant vindication of freedom of opinion—of the natural and constitutional rights of freemen. Put down antimasonry in the county of Norfolk, and you put it down forever in Massachusetts. Let the electors bear this in mind. The eyes of the intelligent and honest men of the whole community are upon them. The honor of crushing the proscriptive demon of antiism in its infancy, has devolved on them. Let them go forth boldly to the work, and redeem themselves from the thralldom of fanatical delusion.

SPIRIT OF ANTIMASONRY. We extract the following sentence from an antimasonic paper published in this city the present week:

'The present is a period big with interest to all that we value and revere. A great struggle is now going on between the people of this Republic, and three hundred thousand MIDNIGHT CONSPIRATORS.'!!

These 'midnight conspirators' are the members of the Masonic Institution!—many of whom are among the most active and intelligent citizens of this Commonwealth. The electors of Norfolk will say by their votes on Monday next, what credit they attach to this atrocious charge.

In character with this, is the declaration of a certain Deacon of Weymouth, who publicly avowed that if the thieves who broke open the Lodge room in that town, stole the regalia, and attempted to set fire to the building, were detected, and arrested, he would fix his bayonet to his gun, and rescue them by force of arms! This declaration was made by a Deacon of a Church! Will the people of Norfolk sanction such fiend-like principles, by re-electing the leaders of such a base faction to represent them in the Senate of this Commonwealth?

The celebrated ball which was recently given at Paris, and at which Lafayette and his grand daughters and all the royal family were present, took place on Sunday—the popular day for such fetes in that country.

NORFOLK SENATORS.

Hon. LEWIS FISHER,

" JOHN ENDICOTT,

SAMUEL P. LOUD, Esq.

The above gentlemen were nominated by the National Republican Convention at Dedham, on the 21st ult. and concurred in by the Workingmen's Convention held at the same time and place. We are told by gentlemen from Norfolk that a better or more popular ticket could not have been selected. The gentlemen named, are such men as will do honor to our Senate; and we trust, and believe that they will receive the united support of all parties. The importance of this election should be felt by every man who is friendly to the perpetuity of our free institutions.—If the antimasonic faction prevail in this country, it will not be satisfied with the demolition of the Masonic Institution. It will go farther. It will attack every institution, whose principles may be obnoxious to its leaders. Already has one of its religious periodicals denounced the Unitarians, and charged them with exercising an improper influence even in the election now pending! The Phi Beta Kappa, justly ranked as the first literary society in the United States, has been assailed by the rude blasts of antimasonry; and a worthless mountebank has undertaken to disclose and denounce its forms and ceremonies! So they will go on, if not checked, until every society in the country, worth preserving, is destroyed. It is now in the power of the electors of Norfolk, to put a stop to the ravages of this infernal spirit. Can they hesitate? We think not. Let every man, old and young, capable of going or being carried to the polls, 'be up and doing.'—Inspect your votes—frauds will be attempted.

LOCKPORT TRIALS.—We extract the following from Niles' Register. It will be seen that the editor of that celebrated and deservedly popular work does not attach the same importance to the disclosures had on these trials, as the editor of the 'Commercial.'

'We rather hastily adopted a paragraph from the New York 'Commercial Advertiser,' and published it in our last paper, concerning a matter about which, because of its prolixity and uncertainty, we had resolved to do no more than record results. We have read the trial of Adams, at Lockport. The testimony on behalf of the people, was given by Edward Giddins and James A. Shed, the accomplices in the false imprisonment and conspiracy against Morgan. The testimony is not of that direct character, which the 'Commercial' led us to expect, as to the murder of Morgan; because the Judge, in his charge, said 'the defendant, if guilty at all, was guilty of assault and battery and false imprisonment of William Morgan, and of a conspiracy actually carried into effect. The punishment was imprisonment, not exceeding two years, and a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars.' To these things Giddins and Shed were as much parties as Adams, the prisoner at the bar; and, relying on the testimony of the witnesses, it seems they understood that Morgan had been murdered, but how and when, and where, or by whom, they knew not—or did not tell. And though the probability of murder is so much strengthened, as to inspire a belief that Morgan's life was surely taken, the dark transaction has not been cleared up by this trial, as we supposed that it had been, on reading the article in the 'Commercial.' Eleven of the jury agreed upon a verdict of guilty against Adams, for assault and battery, &c. as stated by the Judge—but the twelfth man 'would not believe the witnesses who were accomplices,' and the jury, not being able to agree, was discharged.'

A Philadelphia ship builder says, vessels may be constructed almost entirely of yellow pine, instead of white oak, which is now high. He says a ship built of yellow pine, copper-fastened to the low water line with 'yellow pine wales,' would be equal, if not superior, to the common oak ships, and would be constructed at nearly one-third less expense, lasting equally long.

VOTES.—We would impress upon the attention of our Norfolk friends, the importance of having a plentiful supply of votes. Their enemies will destroy all they can get possession of, in order to force off their own. Let every voter before he goes to the polls write at least three—if they are not wanted the loss of labor will not be much. We would remind them also that many victories are lost by procrastination—let it not be the case on Monday. Let the friends of toleration, of liberal principles, and the rights of man, rally at the polls in season; and watch the manœuvres of the vile faction that will attempt 'then and there' to rob them of their dearest and most sacred rights.

MR. THACHER'S PRESS.—We understand that the Reverend (Ex?) Senator has removed his press from Boston to North Wrentham; for which we heartily congratulate our fellow-citizens, though we must commiserate the people of Norfolk on the evil that has befallen them. We further understand that it is in contemplation to change the name from that of the 'Boston Telegraph,' to the more appropriate cognomen of 'Tuckertown Hornet!' [Tuckertown is the familiar name of North Wrentham.]

MASONIC TEMPLE.—It is with much pleasure that we are enabled to announce to our friends at a distance, that this building is rapidly progressing. When finished it will be one of the most elegant superstructures in the city; alike honorable to the fraternity and creditable to the metropolis of New-England. The location is one of the most beautiful that could have been selected. The style of architecture is chaste and appropriate; and the workmanship, judging from what has been done, we feel ourselves authorized in saying, will not be excelled by that of any other public building in the country.

ITEMS.

The Tremont Theatre will re-open on Monday evening next. The entertainments of the evening will be for the benefit of Mrs. G. Barrett. This lady's claims on the admirers of chaste and spirited dramatic representation, are a sure pledge that her benefit-night will be honored by a full and fashionable audience.

The robber of the New-York City-Bank was taken in that city on Saturday night. His name is Edward Smith,—has a wife and two children, all of whom are now in prison; the children at the request of the mother. $175,738 have been recovered. $63,000 are missing. Smith is said to be an Englishman, about 35 years of age.

An English gentleman at Lima, has spent 110,000 in sea shells, with which he has freighted a ship, for speculation.

In the granite quarries near Seringapatam, India, the workmen cut a long groove in a rock about two inches deep. Upon this a fire is kindled, and when the rock is thoroughly heated, a line of men and women, each with a pot of cold water, sweep the ashes quickly away and pour the water into the groove. Blocks six feet in the side and 80 in length are thus detached. Such a block would weigh nearly 200,000 lbs.

MISCELLANY.

ARMSTRONG,
And the Four Dutchmen.

Until within a few years past, many of the descendants of the original Dutch, on the Mohawk, were remarkable for their rude, brutal and boisterous behaviour. To a fondness for boxing and bruising, they added the habit of drinking to excess, and the vice of compelling all within their reach, if possible, to become as boozey as themselves.

It happened that four of these turbulent Dutchmen were one day swilling at a tavern, when they observed, in the bar-room, a respectable and modest young man, who was engaged as a teacher in the neighborhood. He was from New-England, and as the Dutch bore no very good will to the Yankees; who surpassed them in shrewdness, sobriety and knowledge, it would be a matter to boast of, if they could bring the schoolmaster to the same beastly level with themselves. They accordingly asked him to drink with them, which he declined. They insisted; he refused.

'Wont you trink mit us?' said one of them angrily; 'if you wont, I'll trow dis krog in your face.' With that he dashed the contents of the glass in the eyes of the young man, and for a moment nearly blinded him. Irritated with the insult and the smart, the teacher expressed his resentment in pretty strong terms; and as the clump-headed Dutchman could not maintain an equal war of words with a Yankee, they fell upon him and kicked and beat him in a most shameful manner. He was bruised from head to foot; but he escaped with life, and related the case to another Yankee of his acquaintance, by the name of Armstrong.

This man was rightly named, for he was really a fellow of strong arms—a man of noble stature, of mighty bone, and corresponding muscle. He was at the same time a man of excellent disposition, and never picked a quarrel with any human being. But while he was gentle and pacific to the peaceful and unoffending, he was a very lion to the abusive and quarrelsome. In short, he was, as far from submitting tamely to an injury, as inflicting one; and as he would not pocket an abuse himself, so he would not willingly see one offered to his neighbors.

As soon as the teacher had so far recovered from his bruises as to be able to get abroad comfortably, Armstrong accompanied him to the tavern, where the violence had been offered, to obtain satisfaction. The bruising Dutchmen were not there; but being sent for, at the request of Armstrong; soon came.

'Well,' said one of them, 'wat do you want mit us?'

'I want you should make satisfaction to this young man, whom you have so shamefully abused,' replied Armstrong.

'Satisfaction!' exclaimed the Dutchman, 'de tyvel! wat satisfaction do you want?'

'Why,' replied the champion, 'that you should pay him for his wounds, bruises, loss of time and doctor's bill; and then beg his pardon on your knees.'

'He may go to de tyvel,' said the Dutchman, 'mit his bruises and his toctor's pill; and you may go along wit him, you tam lubbering Yankee, you.'

'Wont you make him satisfaction then?' said Armstrong.

'No we will not,' answered all the bruisers.—'If he wants satisfaction, he may take it out of our hides, and be tam to him.'

'I'll do that myself,' said the hero coolly, 'I'll flog every scoundrel of you.'

'You'd petter try it!' said they, confident in their numbers, 'You'd petter try it, mishter!'

'Very well said he, and taking off his coat, he rolled up his shirt sleeves and discovered an arm that might have struck terror to Hercules himself; when stepping towards the door, he invited them to follow.

They did so, and as he was a going out, one of them struck him on the back of the neck, so as to sally him forward a little, but not sufficient to bring him to the ground. He recovered instantly, wheeled round and striking the two who were nearest, one with the right and the other with the left hand, he felled them to the ground, as a butcher would an ox. They rolled heavily in the sand sent forth a Dutch groan, and kicked as if it had been their last.

The third now came up, when the victor seized him by the collar and hurled him across the road with the same ease that a common mortal hurls a cat. His head struck a fence, and he dropped bleeding. The fourth was advancing, but when he saw the catastrophe of his three companions, he belloyed with terror, and took to his heels. But flight did not avail him, for Armstrong was as swift on foot as he was powerful of hand. He pursued, and in a voice of thunder bade the flying coward stop. Seeing that he could not escape, the refugee turned back, and begged for life. The victor with becoming clemency, accepted his submission, and they returned to the field of battle, where the other three having by this time ascertained that they were not entirely dead, began to get upon their feet and look about them. Their first impulse was to fly.

'Stir not a step!' said the appalling voice of Armstrong, 'if you do, down you go again. Now tell me, will you make satisfaction to this young man, or not?'

'Yaw, yaw, yaw,' said they all in a breath, 'we will make satisfaction to de schoolmeister.' And turning to him, they said, 'What you ax for de peating and de prusing that we gin you?'

'Nothing,' replied the young man, 'but what is reasonable. I have suffered a good deal of pain lost some time, and incurred considerable expense at the doctor's.'

'O yaw, that is no more as right,' said they, 'we was trunk when we peat you and prused you; but dat is notting to de matter, you must be paid for de lost time, and de toctor's pill; dat is all fair.'

The Dutchmen being brought to this humble mood the matter was settled without further difficulty. They shook hands with the young man and his champion, called Armstrong a tyvelish good fellow, and insisting upon treating them both to as much as they would drink.

The Dutchmen never forgot this lesson. From that day forth, Armstrong was an antagonist they never dared encounter. His very name was a terror to them; and as he was always known to take up on the side of the weak or injured party, they became extremely cautious in offering violence, where it was likely to come to the ears of the chivalrous yankee. 'Mein Got!', said they, 'he has got two fists like a sledge ham uer, and I would sooner put mein hand under de dunder-bolt, as his tyvelish big paw. He is a little more mach for all on us by a tam sight.'

TO MOSES THACHER,

Member of the Senate of Massachusetts, Ex-Minister of the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham, Present Minister of the Church in North Wrentham, Member of the late Antimasonic State Convention of Massachusetts, Member of the late National Antimasonic Convention, Seceding Mission, Antimasonic Lecturer, and Editor of the Antimasonic Boston Telegraph.

LETTER XI.

SIR:

The man who adopts a crooked, dishonest policy, should be careful what he writes, and particularly cautious what he publishes. I know not what your reputation might have been previous to the publication of your 'Address to the Church and Congregation,' commonly called your renouncing address; but no candid, intelligent man can read that production, without discovering on every page, that it is rather an apology for treacherous conduct, than a fair exposition of honest opinions. You even prefix an advertisement; a singular appendage to a tract of twelve pages; and a curiosity for its terms.

'The writer consents that this Address may be published, in order to correct certain misrepresentations which are abroad. He is willing what he has written should speak for itself; but he is not willing that others should put words into his mouth, which he never uttered. However the public, or individuals, may judge respecting the step which he has now taken, and the motives by which he has been actuated, he sincerely rejoices, that "all things are naked and open to the eyes of Him, with whom we have to do," and that the day is coming when "every secret thing" shall be brought into judgment.' With this view of the subject, he lays aside his pen, praying for the general prosperity of the church, that the despised LAMB of God may be honored, all his people be reclaimed from their wandering, and his name be glorified throughout the earth.'

You also proclaim in your title page, the sickly affectation: 'published by particular request.'

You might have given the light of your wisdom to the world without making proclamation of its importance; without stating a word of 'the divers good and sufficient reasons thereunto moving.' But the simplicity of that course would not have satisfied the complexity of your views. You have contrived to make a merit of yielding to 'particular request;' of honorable desire 'to correct certain misrepresentations;' of pious inclination to promote, by your prayers, 'the general prosperity of the church, that the despised LAMB of God may be honored.'

There is, in all this, a degree of spiritual pride and affectation, that might well excite the remark of the most casual observer. And, sir, he would not know which most to admire; the arrogant manner in which you identify the honor of 'the despised LAMB of God' with the movements of 'the writer' of that jesuitical effusion, when 'he lays aside his pen;' or the great equanimity with which you call up disorder and confusion, and then deprecate any consequent 'harshness of feeling, any bitterness of expression, or any excitement of passion.' There is also, in this introduction to your little book of penitential confessions, a degree of profane freedom and irreverence, in naming so lightly, and in such a connexion, the name of 'Him with whom we have to do,' that, without your allegation of the fact, no one could have supposed its 'leading sentiment to be that confession of sin affords relief to the penitent heart.' If your 'confession of sin' has afforded you relief, then indeed your relief must have been realized to an almost unbounded extent; for, if your statement be true, your 'sin' has been as ample as you could well bear, and your 'confession' has been quite as public and notorious as your 'sin.' But it is of little consequence what 'confession' you make before a human tribunal. There is a tribunal to which all are amenable, and to which you will be held accountable; and that you may prepare for that tribunal, it is of more consequence that you obtain future pardon by repentance, than that you obtain present relief by 'confession.'

You make 'confession' to your Church, not for irreligious or immoral conduct, but for opinions. Suppose you really once thought the Masonic Institution beneficial, and afterwards injurious; what then? Do you consider it necessary to make public 'confession' of all your errors? Have you confessed all your errors before your church? Why, sir, you carry the doctrine of auricular confession farther than even the Romish Church! There, confession of sin is made to a spiritual father, and his aid and assistance are asked in the work of repentance and reformation. Do you make your 'confession' that your church and congregation may aid you in your work of repentance and reformation? You become their spiritual dictator! You set at defiance the doings of the Church and Congregation. Do you make your confession to your 'fathers and brethren in the Ministry,' and ask them to advise you in your spiritual embarrassments? You have set them wholly at defiance. Your Church and your 'fathers and brethren in the ministry' have unitedly advised you. And yet you treat their advice with contempt! It is a misfortune with some men to betray themselves by overacting their part. You make parade of asking forgiveness of 'the Church.' Why ask forgiveness of 'the Church?' They had not preferred charges against you; they had not become your accusers; they had not arraigned you; they had not put you on trial. If you had offended, it was not against a human tribunal. If your conscience accused you, your answer must be to God, and not to man.

Even you do not pretend that the obligations of Masons necessarily involve crime. And yet the principle you would settle is, that Masons are to suffer pains and penalties, civil and religious disabilities, merely because they are Masons, and not for any act injurious to society or to morals. Is this persecution? It is persecution; and persecution for opinions merely. I can only say to you that Fanaticism and Hypocrisy may gain by it; but religion and morals never can. You may force men's manners, but not their morals. You may control actions, but you cannot control the will. Things almost immaterial, become of consequence when we are called upon to abandon them as rights. They then become principles.

The reasons you state for not withdrawing 'in silence,' show you to be a vain, heartless, ostentatious man. Take the following specimen:

'Should I do this, I must necessarily leave the weight of my name, example and influence, however light they might appear, in favor of the Institution.' p. 11.

Sir, this inuendo of affected modesty, 'however light they might appear,' in the mouth of one who speaks so complacently, and so arrogantly of his 'name, example and influence,' is almost too much misplaced, even for your inconsistencies. But why so tender of your 'name, example and influence?' What had you done for patriotism, for letters, for religion, for humanity, that you should be so chary of the 'name' of Moses Thacher? What music, what 'concord of sweet sounds' is there in the 'name' of Moses Thacher, which brings upon the ear recollections of distinguished merit, of exalted virtue? What magic is there in the uncompromising 'name' of Moses Thacher to conjure up any associations, except those which arise from the political legerdemain that has made him notorious? It is not known that for your saint-like virtues you have yet received deification. And although your pretensions to sanctity are quite enough for your purposes of saintship, no one of the Kalendars enrols the spiritual honor, unless, ex abundantia, it appear in the immortal columns of the Antimasonic Annual.—Sir, there are hundreds of ordinary names, which, when ornamented with the prefix of Reverend or Honorable, are as comely and as fair-proportioned as yours. 'The weight of my name!!' Prodigious! How touching the application! How dignified the phrase! How modest the sentiment! Yes, sir, there is indeed 'weight' in a name. Cunning and duplicity, treachery and misrepresentation, give a weight of infamy to some names, that become quite as notorious as the names of the benefactors of mankind. Write out the name of Moses Thacher. Has it beauty of proportion? Measure it in poetic numbers.—Is there inspiration in its smoothness? Chant it in song. Has it harmony? Sir, ecclesiastical legends preserve the reminiscences of unseemly saintly relics, and of such strange and uncommon names, that even you may not despair of obtaining the reward of antimasonic devotion, and of yet seeing your own apotheosis recognize the name of Saint Moses.

With some, the distance of time, when they are 'pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw,' from that later period, when 'beads and prayer books are the toys of age,' loses the intervening space of youth and manhood. It is hard that, if living disgraced and humbled, you may not sooth your disappointed hopes with the prospect of posthumous fame. It would be hard indeed, if the illusions of fancied greatness were to mislead one through all his appointed days, 'till tired he sleeps, and life's poor play is o'er.'

You not only make display of the weight of your 'name,' but you modestly talk of the weight of your 'example!' What an example! You was placed as an overseer in the spiritual vineyard of Wrentham. The warm 'influence' of Christian zeal, and the mild and gentle dews of Christian graces, might have produced an abundant harvest of 'the peaceable fruits of righteousness.'—But you permitted the wasting fires of contention to blaze in that fair vineyard: you suffered the blighting mildews of angry passions to pass over it; you have thus rendered God's heritage a spiritual wilderness.

I am, Sir, yours,

FENELON.

REVIEW

Of the Rev. Mr. Fergusson's Letters to the Rev. Moses Thacher, Pastor of the North Church of Wrentham.

It is always to be borne in mind that Mr. Fergusson is a pious, sincere and honest antimason, because he is governed in his opinion by correct principles; such a man commands our respect. His objections to Masonry arises from the only evidence he could possibly have of the impure principles of the institution derived from the book of Abbe Barruel and Professor Robison, together with the common opinion that all secret societies are bad, from the assumption that evil is the supposed companion of secrecy. Mr. Fergusson very judiciously opposes the evidence of acknowledged Masons, whom he believes to be good men, to the evidence of Mr. Thacher, a seceder from Masonry, who has implicated himself in prevarication, if not in direct falsehood. It has been shown, in a former number, to what extent the Abbe and Robison's publications, they not being Masons, are entitled to authenticity. They had no better evidence for their opinions published against Masonry, than vague reports; and Mr. Fergusson, from his own acknowledgement, has no stronger grounds for his opinions. The publication of a book is precarious proof, that the handling of the subject treated of replete with conjectures and hearsays, is truth. Mr. Fergusson has long been acquainted with Masons, whose moral conversation and religious life bear testimony to the falsity of those publications. Still he apprehends that good men may be inducted into an institution whose principles are corrupt; therefore, unwilling, as he is, to admit the principles to be good he attempts to draw a line of distinction between Masons and their principles. In this, he involves himself in as great error, as he would have done, to have attempted to prove the institution of Christianity bad, because some professors of Christianity lead immoral lives. The most religious institutions may have vicious members.—The principles of an institution are not the less pure, in consequence of a defection of its members. We have no other criterion to make up judgment of men in society, than by their life and conduct. Mr. Fergusson appears to be conversant with Masons, whose characters, in his estimation, are irreproachable; but his brother Thacher denounces, in toto, Masonic principles as dangerous and antichristian; this we are to believe, because he says so; he would compel by the operation of his exclusive principles, all to embrace his feelings and adopt his practices, because he says they must, for he knows he is right.—To this spirit of exclusion Mr. Fergusson is strenuously opposed. We, as Masons, are not unwilling to submit the parity of their institution to his impartial judgment.

Mr. Fergusson as a minister of righteousness and peace, may think, that if Masons would dissolve the institution, there would be peace. Masons by their own acts did not commence the excitement; they have acted only in their own defence. The commotion was first produced by the anti-masonic leaders for political effect. Since the condemnation of two antimasons for murder, in the state of New York, the Morgan excitement began to flag.—To keep alive the fire of party zeal, the Boston Anderton story was fabricated; to prove the falsity of this abomination, some time was requisite to obtain authentic statements from Belfast in Ireland. It was done, and the abettors of the story silenced with infamy on their reputations. For want of exciting material to effect the elections in New York, the antimason Elder Witherell's night attack upon the headboard of his own bed, and the feigned fright of his wife, was imposed upon the public as evidence of Masonic outrage. This vile farce got up for political purposes; no longer exists in the minds of an enlightened public, but to excite their indignation. The anti-masonic papers and their editors are well known, their designs well understood by all men of impartial consideration. Under the weight of so much evidence and a host of similar impositions which might be adduced, can Mr. Fergusson believe that peace would follow the dissolution of Masonic institutions? Such is the thirst for office and political preferment, it is no difficult matter to furnish materials to produce political fermentation; verifying an observation of the celebrated and honorable James Otis of revolutionary memory; 'that when the great political pot boils the scum will rise.'

We will now attend to more important arguments of Mr. Fergusson, who continues—'I have taken a very hasty view of what has appeared to me to be the cause of existing difficulties among the people of your charge. You have said that these difficulties had their origin in Masonry. But whose Masonry Brother [Thacher]? Was it your own Masonry, or that of your brethren? I verily believe, that you must admit with me, that your own Masonry, in connexion with the time and manner of your entrance and secession from the Lodge, have had an abiding influence in bringing upon you, and upon your people, your present trials. In drawing this conclusion, let me not be understood to imply, that you alone are to blame.—Alas, some of your people in North Wrentham were Masons, and all of them men. Their Pastor also became an aspiring Mason; and in a little space, he became a renouncing Mason. The fact of your becoming a Mason was enough, in these days of commotion, to have kindled a fire among a people, so situated as the people in North Wrentham; but when to this, we add the circumstances and manner of your renunciation, it was almost impossible, even admitting that there was no such thing as Masonic obligation, that they and you should have passed through such changes without agitation and division. And yet, as if the nature of the cause were not sufficient to excite division, we are told of Masonic oaths, and Masonic influence, and how people under the influence of Masonry would vote.' The last insinuation of Mr. Thacher alluded to by Mr. Fergusson, with others of a similar complexion, mark the depravity of the man. Mr. Thacher knew they had no foundation in truth. Mr. Fergusson proceeds—'But surely your people in North Wrentham must be a remarkable people,' 'if they needed all the machinery of Masonry, in addition to other exciting causes, to move them.' 'A parish minister in these days is not an immovable being; he can be moved without the aid of oaths and treasons. But I am treading on delicate ground. I am attributing to natural causes, that which it may suit you and others to attribute to secret crime. Let me attend a little to my catechism. What are the obligations of Masonry? Neither very definite, nor very good, I fear. I suspect, brother, although I have not been initiated, there is a great difference of opinion, even among Masons, in regard to the extent of their obligations.' The last observation of Mr. Fergusson will apply to mankind in general, even those who admit they are bound by moral obligation. Did he intend, it might be applied to his brother Thacher? who has evinced by his own conduct, he is not restricted by any obligations, neither ecclesiastical, civil, nor Masonic. Mr. Fergusson continues. 'I expect some of them regard themselves bound to keep Masonic secrets relating to the craft; while others feel themselves bound to keep all kinds of secrets, and to do all kinds of wickedness, under the name of Masonic obligations.' A reply to the last observation may be found in a prior number. 'And I can easily conceive, that different men, according to their different principles, would be disposed to relax, or to stretch their obligations to suit themselves. In making this supposition, allowing it to be true, I think none the better of Masonry on account of it; but I do hope, that if I were a Mason, I should be disposed to make my Masonic obligations comport with my moral and civil obligations. When, therefore, I am told that the Christian brethren in North Wrentham have given up their moral and civil obligations and are linked together by ties of blood and perjury, to accomplish a known crime against God and man, my feelings revolt from such implications, and I regard them as the whims of a disordered imagination.'

I can admit that brother Masons may feel a mutual sympathy [for each other], and when called to renounce Masonry, or become outlaws, may be associated for mutual defence. But I must have other evidence, besides the fact that a man is a Mason, before I can give up years of intimacy, and that confidence which grows out of an upright walk and conversation. I must have evidence, such as I can estimate, before I can believe that men of all professions and in all circumstances, from the retailer of a dram, to the Minister of Christ, and to the Judge on the bench, are leagued in a conspiracy, by secret signs and barbarous obligations. When, [brother Thacher] you tell me what Masonry is, I am prepared in the view of the obligations before me, to form an opinion, just so far as I have evidence, that Masonic obligations are uniformly the same; but when you tell me how you understood the extent of its obligations, your opinion can weigh no more with me, than the opinion of another witness of equal credibility. I may be told that this man is a Mason, and that you are a renouncing Mason; on one part, I may be told that he is under an obligation to lie, to swear falsely or to decide unjustly; and on the other, that you are perjured and not to be trusted on your oath. But, brother, whatever I may be compelled, by evidence hereafter to believe, I cannot give much weight to these suggestions. I judge of you, and I judge of Masons, from personal evidence. And whether it is from instinct, from a natural bias, or from moral principle, I confess, that I cannot even by effort, judge, or form my conclusions on any other evidence. I mention these things not by way of criminating any body of men; but it has become the order of the day, and if I mistake not, it is particularly true in its application to yourself, that whatever stands in the way of the attainment of a favorite object, must be resolved into the secret and treasonable influence of Masonry. Are your people divided on a subject, which under all the circumstances, must in the very nature of things, have agitated and divided them; all those exciting causes are to be overlooked, and we are called upon to believe, that your cause is so good and the evidence of it so convincing, that nothing could have prevented entire unanimity, except the demoralizing and secret obligations of Masonry. Are the members of your church called to act upon a question coming regularly before them? We are to believe, that all who view the question in the same light with yourself are under the influence of truth and righteousness; while all who differ from you in opinion, whether Masons or otherwise, are under the secret influence of obligations, which bind them to violate every social, moral and Christian duty. In the decisions of questions affecting the peace and discipline of your church, is a council of Ministers and delegates convened among you? That Council meet, act, deliberate and result, under the all pervading influence of Masonry. In order to accomplish your own measures [brother Thacher] must the reasonable decision of your church, and the principle of Congregationalism, and your own covenant obligation, be trodden under foot? Ah! you are getting rid of Masonry—you are fleeing from the plague—you are changing your garments, and no matter what is prostrated. And brother, I confess that I am astonished at that self-confidence, which can carry an individual forward, when thus trifling with that which has been held sacred; can prostrate that which he is bound to uphold; and in the face of all conflicting decisions, says I knew I was right.

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

ELECTRICITY.

On the Phenomena of Thunder Storms, and on the probable Sources of Atmospheric Electricity.

The spark and its attendant report, observed when a jar or battery is discharged, are effects perfectly analogous to a flash of lightning and its consequent thunder; and the variety of sounds which characterises this last, is equally the characteristic of every single explosion when it reaches the ear from a distance. A piece of artillery, discharged in any situation where the surrounding objects present irregular sources of reverberation, produces an effect which might be mistaken for the roar of thunder.

An observation of the varieties of the natural phenomenon will confirm the idea. At sea, where there is no diversity in the reverberating objects, the sound is regular, and decreases in intensity at every reverberation, until it gradually dies away; but in other situations, where the bodies capable of reverberating are numerous and irregularly placed, a succession of sounds are heard, varying in loudness and duration with the situation, distance, and nature of the sources of reverberation, and having no relation to the interval of time. When the flash is immediately followed by the report, a single explosion of a peculiar crashing sound is usually all that is heard, for the discharge has then taken place very near the observer, and damage will in such cases most frequently be found to have occurred in the immediate neighborhood. When the sound does not immediately follow the flash, the rumbling and irregular noise most frequently occurs, for the distance is then sufficient to render reverberation (from its extent) the most prominent feature of phenomenon.

The interval between the flash and explosion offers data for calculating the distance of a thunder stroke. For light moves with so much velocity, that the time it requires to traverse any ordinary distance may be considered as nothing; but sound travels only at the rate of 1142 feet in a second. The flash and the report are really contemporaneous, but the one is immediately seen, and the other requires a second of time to traverse 1142 feet. Consequently the interval that elapses between the flash and the report being multiplied by 1142, or this last by the number of seconds in the interval, will give the distance of the explosion from the observer in feet. Thus, suppose the flash of lightning to take place five seconds before the thunder is heard, then 5 times 1142 equals to 5710, or 1 mile 430 feet, which is the distance of the explosion from the observer. The distance it may, however, be proper to state, cannot be considered as a measure of his removal from danger, for it is the measure of an explosion which has taken place, and those that follow may occur in very different situations; for thunder clouds are sometimes continued over a considerable extent of country, and two or more flashes are not unfrequently seen in distant parts of the atmosphere at nearly the same time.

When the spark which causes lightning is seen, it is of the zigzag form, assumed by all powerful sparks when they traverse a considerable space of air, and in this, its natural exhibition, the spark sometimes traverses a most prodigious interval. The appearance of two distinct streams at no considerable distance from each other, is sometimes produced, when a part of a long zigzag is concealed by an intervening cloud; and the sudden and universal flash called sheet lightning, results from the reflection of an explosion which is more completely concealed. Of this last kind also appear those bright flashes that occur on summer evenings, and are not accompanied by thunder; a circumstance which it is difficult to account for, unless it may arise from their great distance from the earth's surface.

But far the greater number of the flashes of lightning are harmless discharges from one cloud to another, and the instances in which it strikes the earth are comparatively rare; hence it appears that the clouds, or different portions of the atmosphere, are oppositely electrified, and it has been conceived with good reason by Mr. Morgan, the celebrated Electrician, that when the lightning strikes the earth the latter may merely act as a discharging rod, to shorten the striking interval between two charged clouds. Mr. Morgan has indeed supposed, that the earth cannot have its natural quantity of electric fluid either increased or diminished, because it is a conductor; but it is surrounded by air, and consequently it is an insulated conductor, and experiments teach us, that insulated conductors may be rendered positive or negative, therefore the same may be inferred relative to the earth.

Others have supposed, that when such discharges occur, they result from the electrified cloud, producing by its proximity the contrary electricity in the earth; but when the size of the largest thunder cloud is compared with our globe, it will be evident that such an opposition could produce no more effect than would result from the approximation of an excited stick of sealing-wax to an insulated mountain. Besides, we have experimental evidence that, during the occurrence of such phenomena, different parts of the atmosphere are in opposite states of electricity at the same time; and as these states are dependant on each other, the discharge cannot take place without passing from the positive to the negative, either directly or by the intervention of part of the earth, between them.

THE STUDY OF BOTANY.

For the sedentary student, there is nothing so admirably adapted to the purposes of recreation as botany. It requires just so much attention of the mind as to occupy without fatiguing it,—to furnish it with a gentle stimulus to activity, without agitating or straining its faculties by too powerful an impulse. Addressing the sense not less than the understanding, acting on the mind through the medium of external perception, and exciting the memory more strongly than the judgment, it is precisely the kind of study needed as a relief in the intervals of severer intellectual labor. Nor is this the least of its excellencies in the present relation. The votary of botany is called forth by it from the solitude and confinement of his study, he is torn from that sedentary life, which, combine with constant exercise of the mind in abstract speculations, weighs so heavily on the health and spirits. Exercise ought to enter into every scholar's religion. And yet all students, I apprehend, experience the greatest repugnance to taking regular exercise from a mere sense of duty as a bodily regimen. We need an additional motive to stimulate us. There is something in the practices of the ancients, in the oral instructions given by their philosophers in the perambulations of the Porch, in the wisdom gained by their youth, not in the debilitating vigils of nocturnal research in the student's cell, but under the face of the heaven, and drunk in with the living eloquence of the orator's lips, amid Athenian groves, or under the cool shades of the Tusculan plane tree,—there is something in this, which, to me seems not more delightful to the imagination, than consonant to the dictates of nature. Modern learning is most generally drawn from the pages of books. The lectures of our universities constitute but a small portion of the intellectual aliment, which the modern scholar, the modern advocate, the modern gentleman, nay, the modern man of business, requires. Day after day, and year after year, he must pore over the printed records of human knowledge, condemned to a mode of life which, however necessary in refined existence, and however capable nature may have made our bodies of recovering from its deleterious effects, certainly is not a state which she designs as the properest one for the human constitution. She did not make man sedentary; she made him, says the great Roman, to stand erect towards heaven: Primum eos humo excitato, celsos et erectos constituit, ut deorum cognitionem, cælum intuentes, capere possent.

Now the study of botany is to be pursued with advantage only in the wild woods and fertile meadows, where the vegetable world flourishes in the luxuriance of unstinted nature; and it therefore impels the naturalists to active invigorating exercise in the open air, and exercise of a kind the most useful to the body and the most useful to the mind. For myself, I shall never cease to be grateful to botany, where it only for many a delightful ramble, into which it has led me, amid rural scenes of tranquillity, beauty and peace, where, dropping the burdens of life, and throwing off the oppression which sedentary occupations loads upon the spirits, I have passed from green valley to green valley, exultingly hailing at every step, the discovery of some lovelier and rare floweret whose acquisition imparted a temporary triumph, I do not say greater, but how much more innocent, than the triumphs gained in prouder conquests. And how revivifying it is, in the heat of summer, when the whole sky seems to swim in a sea of dazzling light, to quit the world of brick and mortar of our cities, for the cool, refreshing shades of the country, whither the botanist is summoned. Art may present you with the spectacle of riches and power springing out of her persevering efforts. She may point to the curious fabrics wrought by her fingers, and the wonderful machinery set in motion by her skill. She may tell you how the enterprise of her children has prompted them to descend into the bowels of the earth for jewels and precious metals, and plough the faithless seas for the spice of the eastern clime. She may show you the busy haunts of men enlivened by her activity, and place before you the marble palace and the city thronged with the gorgeous specimens of human genius, to illustrate the splendor of her success. But notwithstanding all this, there is a lavish and careless profusion of beauty and grandeur in the production of Nature, which the narrow art of man strives in vain to emulate. We shall leave the sublimest exercise of human power, the most faultless exhibitions of human genius, to find all its sublimity shrink into littleness, and all its beauty seem lifeless and tame, when compared with the works of nature. And amid these it is, that the ardent lover of botany seeks the gratification of his taste. His favorite haunts are the mountain side clothed in its everlasting forest, the margin of the sun-brightlake spotted with islets and embosomed in picturesque hills, or the banks of the stream winding along amid gay fields fertilized by its waters, where his imagination and his heart are equally elevated and improved by the contemplation of God's magnificent creations.

These are among the considerations, which recommend this charming science to the studious lover of nature, to the female sex, who are in a manner barred the study of all other branches of natural history, and to persons of whatever class or condition of life who seek relaxation from more arduous pursuits in the examination of the beauties of the vegetable world.

THE LEECH.

One of the most sensitive of all animals is the leech, a disposition owing probably to the curious arrangement of the cutaneous annules of his outer coat. This creature, being put in a phial nearly filled with water, has been used as a means of foretelling changes of the weather several hours before hand. In fair or frosty weather, it will lie rolled up in a spiral form, at the bottom of the vessel, but prior to rain or snow it will creep to the surface; if there is wind, it will glide quickly about the bottle, and if lightning be approaching, it starts convulsively near the top, and gets as much out of water as it can.

HOW TO BOIL RICE.

Put your rice in an open pot, covering it with water, then put it on the fire to boil. When it is boiled so as to become soft, (which is easily ascertained by the means of a wooden ladle, which we call a hominy stick,) take it off the fire, drain off the water, and cover the pot so as to retain the heat, then put it on coals or hot ashes for about 15 or 20 minutes, so as to throw off the steam, or as it is usually called, to soak.

HISTORICAL.

HISTORICAL ACCOUNT OF THE TORTURING OF THE KNIGHTS TEMPLARS.

On his entrance into the Hall of Tortures, Philip of France seated himself in a large arm chair of crimson velvet, the only ornament of this theatre of the cruelty and barbarity of the 14th century. Enguerrand and the other nobles of his train were seated behind him, on benches so coarsely and carelessly made that save for the want of blood upon them they might easily have been mistaken for instruments of torture. The king commanded the culprits to be brought before him, forgetting in his eagerness to make them acknowledge their crime, that even their confession could not blind him to the motive which urged him to prosecute them. A side door suddenly opened, and preceded by their jailor, six Templars entered the hall of their doom. Jaques Molai entered at their head. He bowed to the king, as did his companions with the exception of one, who passed proudly in front of the king and his train, and seated himself on a bench near them. Philip pretended not to see him, and seemed hesitating whether or not to return the salutes made to him by the others who came slowly, one by one, through the dark and narrow door. All was calm and silent in that dismal hall. At last the king spoke—'Let those knights,' said he, 'who have made a sincere confession of their crimes, and have thus obtained their liberty, repeat here, in the presence of their God and their king, what they have already confessed in private, that it may be known that no worldly thoughts or feelings have urged us to this trial. Our sole object is the honor and glory of the church.' Some of the prisoners raised their eyes to the face of the king, as he made this hypocritical speech, but instantly cast them again to the ground.

Flamel touched his friend's elbow, and he, raising his voice to its utmost pitch, exclaimed, 'I Guillen de Boisine, Knight of the Temple, declare the order of the Knights Templar unworthy of existence, and infamous; for felony, impiety, blasphemy, and crimes of every kind'—

'May the God of truth confound thee!' exclaimed the Grand Master.

The enraged Boisine replied, 'May all the devils in hell seize!'—

'Silence!' cried Philip. 'Molai, wait till thou art questioned, or rather see if among the knights who accompany thee, there are none likely to make the confession I require; if not tortures must extract it.'

'There are none here who fear thy tortures,' replied the Grand Master calmly.

'Thy boast shall not avail thee,' replied Philip, 'Thou thyself shalt feel if the executioner understands his business. Drag Molai to the torture!'

The Grand Master gave the king one glance of supreme contempt, and exclaimed with fervor, 'God grant me strength to bear this trial.' A yellow curtain at the bottom of the hall drew up with a horrid creaking noise, and in the midst of wheels, racks, saws, screws, and other fearful instruments, stood a half naked man, humming the tune of a drinking song, and greasing with a sort of yellow and dirty lard, the screws and hinges of the different machines. He gazed for one moment stupidly and vacantly around him, and then continued his occupation. Among the assembled persons in that Hall some turned away their heads, others shuddered, while Flamel smiled and pressed the hand of Guillen de Boisine, who considered himself most happy in having escaped from the tortures which now threatened the ill-fated Grand Master of the Templars. 'Choose,' cried Philip, 'confess thy crimes or seat thyself in that iron chair.' Molai did not even answer him, but calmly and proudly sat himself down in the dreadful chair. The executioner rudely tore off the white mantle which covered the shoulders of the Templar; he then touched a spring, and two large iron hooks twisted the feet of Molai, while six long bars of the same metal, disposed in triangles, crossed on his chest, and pressed his naked shoulders on the sharp points with which the back of the chair was garnished. Molai raised his eyes to heaven, but did not utter a word, a shriek, or even a groan. His breath came whistling from his crushed and wounded chest, and the blood flowed in torrents from his shoulders on the shining and polished instrument of his torture.

'Speak,' cried Philip, 'I am innocent,' replied Molai, in a faint and faltering voice. 'Sire,' whispered Enguerrand, 'he will never confess.'—'Take him away,' said King Philip, 'another one less resolute will speak;' and Molai released from the iron bars which were crushing his chest, breathed freely once more. While the Grand Master was seated in the accursed iron chair, one of the younger Knights had shed tears, and when he was released from the torture the youthful Templar exclaimed—'God be praised.' Philip now turned to him and said—'What is thy name?' Pierre de Villeneuve, replied the Knight. 'Perchance,' continued the King, 'thou wilt prove less obstinate than thy Grand Master, and tortures will force thee at least to confess.' 'Thou art mistaken,' replied the Templar. 'Drag him to the torture,' cried the infuriated Monarch. 'My liege,' said a voice, 'it is the same to you which one of us submits to the torture, your aim being only to enjoy the sufferings of a Knight. My brother is young, exhausted by imprisonment, hunger and care, and to curtail his sufferings he may betray his honor. Let me be tortured in his place. My name is Fulk de Freycy.' 'No, no, my brother,' eagerly replied young Villeneuve, 'do not doubt my constancy. Executioner do thy duty;' and he advanced towards the yellow curtain. 'He is very young,' whispered Marigny, to the King, 'he cannot bear the torture long.' 'So much the better, Marigny,' replied the King, 'he will confess the sooner.' And these words were pronounced in such a terrible tone of voice that the astounded minister did not venture on another whisper during the whole trial. The eyes of the King sparkled with rage; and this same prince who had consented so reluctantly to witness this dreadful scene, seemed now determined to exhaust all the resources of cruelty, as if to appease his conscience, and to persuade himself he had listened only to the voice of justice. 'Pierre de Villeneuve,' he said, 'it is not yet too late.'—The young man gazed at him disdainfully, and made no reply. The executioner instantly seized him, and bound him on a machine called the cross of St. Andrew. It consisted of two beams laid crossways, and almost at right angles. On the limbs of this dreadful cross, the executioner bound the naked arms and legs of the young Templar, and then slowly turned a winch that set in motion a small sharp pointed lance that penetrated the loins of the sufferer. The executioner stopped one moment to give the King time to interrogate his victim while the lance had already penetrated between the cartilages which unite the vertebrae. 'Speak,' cried Philip, Pierre de Villeneuve opened his mouth slowly, and from his purple lips came forth in short and feeble accents, 'Not guilty, not guilty.' 'Go on, go on,' exclaimed the king, enraged at so much resolution and fortitude—The executioner again turned the winch, the lance rose by degrees, till suddenly the knight gave a shriek, shook the St. Andrew's cross with great violence, and the terrible and bloody lance breaking his bones like so much glass, penetrated into his bosom. The youthful Templar closed his eyes, and his head fell on his shoulder. 'My brother, my brother,' shrieked Fulk de Freycy, 'Ye have murdered him.' 'Why did he not confess then,' said Philip, carefully averting his eyes while the executioner unbound the corpse of the ill-fated Pierre, and bore it away on his shoulder, leaving a long track of blood behind him. When the captives were first summoned into the presence of the King, one of them, as we have already stated, passed before the royal judge without bowing to him, and had seated himself on what now proved to be an instrument of torture. His name was John de Beaufremond,—he had grown grey in the service of the temple, and had been in all the campaigns against the Saracens. He was remarkable tall and strong, and during the whole execution had kept his large black eyes, arched by long thick and grisly eyebrows full on the King. Irritated by his bold bearing, Philip ordered him to be tortured—'Thank you,' said the Templar, 'I began to think that you had forgotten me. Let me expire under the same torture which killed Villeneuve. I loved him as my son. I first taught him to wield the lance; let my blood be mingled with his and I ask no more.' 'No, no,' replied the King, 'by Our Lady that would be too easy a death for thee. Every bone in thy body shall be broken ere thine eyes close on the light of day.' 'As you will,' replied Beaufremond, 'but I thought as I had shed so much blood in the cause of Christianity, that I might have chosen where and how to shed the last drops that flow in these old veins of mine. Tie him to the clock,' exclaimed Philip: This of all the tortures, was the most dreadful. The sufferer was suspended between two beams, and above him swung an immense leaden weight, which at regular intervals fell and crushed one of the limbs of the victim. The executioner tried to drag this machine into the centre of the room; but it was so heavy as to resist all his efforts to stir it. Beaufremond sprang up, and with one firm grasp drew the immense apparatus into the middle of the hall. Astonished by this exhibition of strength, the executioner looked upon this victim as a supernatural being, and if Beaufremond had only given him one glance of his bright black eyes, he would never have dared to touch him. Observing his hesitation, the Knight placed himself without assistance on the dreadful machine, and the weight began to move regularly above his head. He had time to confess before it reached a large black spot, whence it was to fall on one of his limbs. 'Look at that weight,' said Philip. No answer. 'Remember that when it touches the black spot it falls,' continued the Monarch. No answer, but the bright black eyes remained fixed on the King's face. Suddenly the weight touched the black spot—it fell and crushed the Templar's leg. 'I have only one more leg at your service,' said Beaufremond firmly and proudly, and still gazing intently on the King. 'Bear him hence,' cried Philip, and starting up, as if to avoid the gaze of his victim, he left the hall, called for his horse, and rode off towards the palace. Marigny followed him, and none were left in the hall but John Flamel, the legate of the Pope, and those Templars who had confessed. They were sufficient to have tortured those among the captives who still survived, but their calm and majestic mien had such an effect on their judges, that they unanimously started from their seats and rushed out of the Judgment Hall. The prisoners were reconducted to their cells, and John Flamel announced to the crowd without the prison, that the confessions had been complete and entire, and that in a few days the King's pleasure and justice would be known. Long live King Philip—long live John Flamel, shouted the crowd as they dispersed, in anxious expectation for the execution of the Knights of the Temple.—[Extract from the Priest and the Jewess, a Chronicle of the time of Philip the 4th, by Israel Jebusah.—Translated for the New-York American.]

MISCELLANY.

THE FAT TRAVELLER.

I never, for the life of me could understand why a man of ten stone should pay as much for a coach hire as a man of twenty. There's neither reason nor virtue in it; and the stage coach proprietors must be a set of unjust jolterheads not to alter it. The rogues weigh your dead stock—your luggage; and, if it be what they call over weight they make no scruple of charging so much a pound for every pound over a certain number of pounds, but they take no account at all of overweight in living luggage, and will charge just as much for carrying a little whipper-snapper of a passenger whose entire corpus, in full dress, might be tucked into a coach pocket, as they will with a great over-fed fellow, whose empty waistcoat would button round a haystack! If a man will stuff himself till he's as big as a roasted Manningtree ox with a pudding in his belly, let him do so—there is no statute to the contrary thereof, that I know of; but I see no reason why he should obtrude his fat upon folk of reasonable compass—or expect to have his over weight of blubber carried about the country for nothing. Twelve stone is about the average weight of a man; and if the owners were not blockheads and boobies—blind to their own interests, and to common equity, they would establish a scale of fares, hanging weighing chairs in their coach offices, and demand so much additional fare upon every stone weight above twelve; reducing the fares to those of less weight in proportion. If they would do that, a man, wedged into a six inside coach between two of these enormous bowel-cases, might take some little comfort to himself in knowing what he suffers by suffocation he saves in pocket. And truly, your political economists—your Malthuses and M. Cullochs are little better than strainers at gnats and swallowers of camels, or they would have proposed some such regulation as a check upon over-consumption; it would do more towards saving the national victual than any other of their fine drawn schemes for stinting day laborers in brats and potatoes.

It was our fate to have one of those two legged prize cattle—'A certain Franklin in the wilds of

Kent,' as a travelling sixth in the Dover coach. We took him up—or rather, he was heaved up, by the coachman and a half-a-dozen helpers, at a road-side public house, somewhere between Sandwich and Deal; and when he was up, and had poked forward, half way across the inside of the coach, his hips stuck in the door way, so that he was obliged to turn aside, before he could bring in his rear. At length he was all in; and down he went, squash! into the only vacant seat, between two very venerable spinster like ladies—his bowed elbows spreading over them in front like a couple of Brobdignagian sausages, and his stupendous catastrophe tearing all before it as it subsided—'Mercy on us!' cried one of the spinster-like venerables—I declare you have torn my gown completely out of the gathers!' And mine too! said the other. 'Really, Sir, we must get you to set up a little,' said both. 'Ay—I thought I felt something give way,' grunted the mountain of mummy; and then, instead of sitting up, as they had requested, he leaned slowly from side to side, so as to almost smother each lady in her turn, whilst the other was dragging her torn gown from beneath his abominable brawn. However, all that being arranged, and room having been made for his legs, as he called them, on he went; but he had not gone more than a mile, when he grunted—'Can't stand this!'—'Stand what, sir?—you seem to be sitting,' said somebody. 'Can't ride backward—never could,' granted tallow-keech in reply. Now it so happened, that directly opposite to him sat a fine bouncing dame—fat, fair, and fifty, tightly done up in blue braided broad-cloth, overhung with a gilt Belcher chain, almost big enough for a chain cable, and she no sooner heard his complaint of not being able to stand riding backward, than she offered to change places with him—whether from sympathy with his fat, or, respect to her own blue broad-cloth, did not appear. But how this exchange of places was to be brought about, was a thing—to the lookers on it seemed to be almost as easy as turning a couple of bullocks in a watch-box; but as the necessity for it was growing more and more urgent, the attempt was made. In the first instance they each essayed to rise like ordinary people; but that wouldn't do; before the male was half up, down he went again—squash!—and they repeated the attempt a second time with no better success. 'I tell you what, mummy,' grunted tallow-keech, 'you'd better catch hold of my hands.' The lady complied; and having hooked their fat fingers together, in the way boys call butcher's hold, they succeeded in bousing each other up, fairly out of their respective seats;—but in the attempt to turn, they miss'd stays, as it were, and swung round horizontally, across the laps of the rest of us. Here was a pretty predicament!—In a moment we were all mixed up together like so many maggots in a grease pot, all trying to get the upper hand of each other; the spinsters were shrieking; the bouncing dame squalling; the fat fellow grunting; and all of us sprunting with might and main to keep our heads above brawn. Luckily, the two fat ones had 'a kind of alacrity in sinking'—their ability to sprunt being diminished into an exact ratio to their superabundant blubber, so that we soon got them pretty well under; but, nevertheless, there is no knowing what the upshot might have been, had not a lean and long-neck'd linen dealer, in the corner, poked his head out at the window, and implored the coachman to stop—'Coachman,' cried he—'coachman! for Heaven's sake stop the coach.' The coach did stop, and that right speedily—for the cry was urgent, and both doors being wide open, we—the four lean ones, as soon as we could disentangle ourselves, got out upon the road, shoe-top deep in mud, and the rain raining as though it thought the sooner we were cooled the better; whilst the two fat ones, assisted by the coachman and others, were getting themselves set upright on their own propria persona, seats; and this matter achieved, we all got in again.

QUALIFICATION OF A SCHOOLMASTER.

A young collegian, itinerating in the state of Maine, fell in company, and also in love, with a very pretty girl, the daughter of an old curmudgeon, whose brains were made of sawdust, hogs lard and molasses, but who, on account of the spaciousness of his farm, had been for years at the head of the school committee in the district. The collegian's attachment to Sally (for that was the name of the daughter) was so overpowering, that all the logic and philosophy he had learned in the schools was, compared to the force of his passion, as chaff in a hurricane. But not having the where-with-all to winter in Maine without a resort to employment, he intimated to Sally that he should like to keep the school in that district; when the kind hearted girl informed him that her father was the committee man, and she also informed him what questions would be put to him, and how he must answer them, if he expected to gain the good graces of her father. Accordingly, on Sunday evening, the young man of classic lore informed the old ignoramus that he should like to take charge of their school for the winter, and board in his family.—Whereupon the old fellow assumed an air of much importance, and looking at the applicant with his usual dignity while examining candidates for keeping school, put the same questions that Sally had informed her paramour would be asked.

'Do you believe in the final salvation of all the world?'

'Most certainly, (answered the young collegian) it is the only belief that the scriptures justify.'

'Do you believe that God ever made another man equal to Thomas Jefferson?'

'Certainly not—and I have been of this opinion ever since I read his Notes on Virginia.'

'Can you spell Massachusetts?'

'I ought to know how, sir, for it is my native state.'

'Well, spell it.'

The young man spelled the word very distinctly, when the father turned to the daughter and said, 'Did he spell it right, Sally?' Yes sir, answered the affectionate girl,—when her father, turning again to the candidate, triumphantly exclaimed—'You may begin school to-morrow.'

How the young pedagogue and Sally managed affairs through the winter, is another part of the story.—[New- Bedford Gaz.]

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1881.

DISCOVERY AND ADVENTURE IN AFRICA.—We noticed the publication of this interesting work, a few weeks since and promised to advert to it again. With the following paragraph from the New-York Constellation, we now introduce a few short extracts: 'It is collected from travellers of the earliest times down to the present; and embodies in a single volume of a moderate size, an account of the various expeditions, and of the fate of their bold and enterprising authors, nearly all of whom have perished in their attempts to explore the interior of Africa. An inhospitable climate and still more inhospitable men, have rendered it almost certain death to attempt penetrating this interior; and it is melancholy to reflect how many fine spirited men have laid down their lives in the undertaking. Still Africa is in a great measure unexplored. The outlet of the Niger is yet a matter of doubt, in spite of all the attempts made to ascertain that point. Conjecture has indeed identified it with that of the river Benin; but other conjectures on the contrary have fixed on the lake Tchad as the probable receptacle.'

Though these many expeditions have failed in some of the principal objects of their undertaking, they have nevertheless furnished a variety of interesting particulars respecting the soil, climate, productions, &c. of the regions travelled over; as well as a view of the manners, custom and condition of the inhabitants.'

AFRICAN MATRIMONIALS.—Farther acquaintance discovered other irregularities, against which a painful struggle was to be maintained. It was a prevailing practice, that before marriage the two parties should live together for some time, and make trial of each other's tempers and inclinations, before they formed the final engagement. To this system of probation the people were most obstinately attached, and the missionaries in vain denounced it, calling upon them at once either to marry or to separate. The young ladies were always the most anxious to have the full benefit of this experimental process; and the mothers, on being referred to, refused to incur responsibility, and expose themselves to the reproaches of their daughters, by urging them to an abridgment of the trial, of which they might, afterwards repent. The missionaries seem to have been most diligent in the task, as they call it, of 'reducing strayed souls to matrimony.' Father Benedict succeeded with no less than six hundred; but he found it such 'laborious work,' that he fell sick and died in consequence.

AFRICAN CHARMS.—Another subject of deep regret respected the many superstitious practices still prevalent, even among those who exhibited some sort of Christian profession. Sometimes the children brought for baptism proved to be bound in magic cords, to which the mothers, as an additional security from evil, had fastened beads, relics, and figures of the Agnus Dei. The chiefs, in like manner, while they gladly availed themselves of the protection promised from the wearing of crucifixes and images of the Virgin, were unprepared to part with the enchanted rings, and other pagan amulets, with which they had been accustomed to form a panoply around their persons. In case of dangerous illness, sorcery had been always contemplated as the main or sole remedy; and those who rejected its use were reproached as rather allowing their sick relations to die than incur the expense of a conjurer. But the most general and most pernicious application of magic was made in judicial proceedings. When a charge was advanced against any individual, no one ever thought of inquiring into the facts, or of collecting evidence; every case was decided by preternatural tests. The magicians prepared a beverage, which produced on the guilty person, according to the measure of his iniquity, spasm, fainting, or death, but left the innocent quite free from harm. It seems a sound conclusion of the missionaries, that the draught was modified according to the good or ill will of the magician, or the liberality of the supposed culprit. This trial, called the bolungo, was indeed renounced by the king, but only to substitute another, in which the accused was made to bend over a large basin of water, when if he fell in, he was concluded guilty. At other times, a bar of red hot iron was passed along the leg, or the arm was thrust into scalding water; and if the natural effects followed, the person's head was immediately struck off. Snail-shells, applied to temples, if they stuck, inferred guilt. When a dispute arose between man and man, the plan was to place a shell on the head of each, and make them stoop; when he from off whose head the shell first dropped had a verdict found against him.—While we wonder at the deplorable ignorance on which these practices were founded, we must not forget that the 'judgments of God' as they were termed, employed by our sage ancestors during the middle ages, were founded on the same unenlightened views, and were in some cases absolutely identical.

HORRORS OF THE DESERT.—The travellers had not proceeded far when the melancholy aspect of the Desert was heightened by a succession of objects which could not be viewed without the deepest horror. The ground was strewn with the skeletons of former travellers, who had perished in the attempt to cross this extensive wilderness.—These at first appeared singly, but afterwards increased till they amounted to fifty or sixty in a day. At Meshreo a hundred were seen together; and near the wells at El Hammar they were found lying in countless multitudes. One forenoon, as Major Denham was dozing on horseback, he was awakened by the sound of something crashing under his horse's feet, and on looking down, saw the animal trampling on two perfect human skeletons. A movement of one of the feet had separated the skull from the trunk, and driven it forward like a ball. In some of these remains portion of the flesh and hair were left, and even the features were still distinguishable. Two female skeletons lay closely twined together, having evidently been faithful friends, who had died in each other's arms. The Arabs gave little proof of their boasted sensibility in the utter indifference with which they viewed these dismal objects, driving about the limbs with their firelocks, passing coarse jests upon the dead, and deriding the sympathy manifested by their English companions. They told them these were only blacks, 'damn their fathers,'—the barbarous prejudices arising from difference of religion and lineage having thus extinguished in their breasts every touch of human sympathy. Major Denham appears in one place to countenance the popular belief that these bodies were the remains of caravans buried beneath tempests of moving sand; but none of his facts support this conclusion, or contradict the opinion of Browne, that such victims have in most cases perished from other causes. They were lying exposed, without even a covering of dust; and the catastrophe of the largest group was too well known, having been a body of slaves, the chief booty obtained by the sultan of Fezzan during his last expedition into Soudan. The troop had left Bornou without an adequate supply of provisions, which failed entirely before they approached Mourzouk. That want, or perhaps fatigue, was the real cause of this destruction was manifest from the fact that the sufferers were all negroes, while their Arab masters had taken care to reserve for themselves the means of reaching home.

OPHIDIAN REPTILES, OR SERPENTS. Among the most remarkable of the African species of this division, is the cerastes, or horned viper. It is characterized by a small curved horn over each eyelid. It lives in the sand, and was well known to the ancients. Another singular serpent is the haje (Coluber haje, Linnaeus.) The Egyptian jugglers, by pressing the neck of this creature between their fingers, produce a kind of catalepsy which renders it stiff and motionless. This is rather a curious fact when considered in connexion with the scriptural narrative in the seventh chapter of Exodus, where the rods of the magicians when thrown down are converted into serpents.

LOCUSTS.—Locusts are of common occurrence in many parts of Africa. Mr. Farrow records, that in the southern districts which he visited, the surface of an area of nearly 2000 square miles might literally be said to be covered by them. The water of a wide river was scarcely visible in consequence of the innumerable dead locusts that floated on its surface, apparently drowned in their attempts to reach the reeds which grew along its shores. Except these much-wished-for reeds, they had devoured every other green thing. Their destruction on a former occasion was sudden and singular. All the full grown insects were driven into the sea by a tempestuous north-west wind, and were afterward cast upon the beach, where they formed a bank three or four feet high, and extending nearly fifty English miles. The smell, as may easily be supposed, was abominable, and was sensibly felt at a distance of 150 miles.

The migratory flight of the locust, and its desolating effects upon vegetation, and consequent injury both to man and beast, have afforded a frequent exercise to the pen of the poet; but by none have their injurious inroads been so magnificently treated as by the Prophet Joel. 'A day of darkness and of gloominess, a day of clouds and of thick darkness, as the morning spread upon the mountains; a great people and a strong: there hath not been ever the like, neither shall be any more after it, even to the years of many generations. A fire devoureth before them, and behind them a flame burneth: the land is as the Garden of Eder before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness; yea, and nothing shall escape them. The appearance of them is as the appearance of horses; and as horsemen, so shall they run. Like the noise of chariots on the tops of mountains shall they leap, like the noise of a flame of fire that devoureth the stubble, as a strong people set in battle array.' 'The earth shall quake before them; the heavens shall tremble: the sun and moon shall be dark, and the stars shall withdraw their shining.' 'How do the beasts groan! the herds of cattle are perplexed, because they have no pasture; yea, the flocks of sheep are made desolate.'

MORGAN TRIALS.—On these trials the Lockport Balance has the following remarks:

The trials of these causes have been a subject of intense interest not only to the parties concerned, and their personal friends, but to the public generally. The defendants well knew, that whether guilty or innocent, no effort would be spared to convict them, and that a fair and impartial trial could not be had, without the most powerful exertions, and that then, they might easily fall victims to the excited prejudices of community against a society, of which they were members. The late Special Circuit in this county, was perhaps, more than any other preceding it, calculated to produce this state of feeling. It was intended to be the closing scene, and it was in the neighborhood of the outrage. The June Circuit had passed with three acquittals—eight more were to be tried, and what would the public say if this should likewise end without a conviction. Something must be done for the cause of antimasonry abroad, by way of convincing the public that the fraternity are as generally guilty as has been represented. These, judging from visible facts, were undoubtedly the silent reflections and midnight whispers of the leaders of political antimasonry in this region. It was not reasonable to presume that the public could much longer be imposed upon by the pretence that a dwindled and fallen minority of Masons, could forever continue to screen the guilty from punishment, in opposition to a powerful and proscriptive party, with the full control of the jury-boxes, and the disposition to use them for the accomplishment of its own designs, backed by a Special Counsel whose industry and perseverance is untiring; with a court specially appointed for the purpose, as if our constitution and laws were too feeble to effect the objects of justice; and what is more potent than all, the treasury of the state laid open as it were, without ceremony, and witnesses from the four corners of the earth, ostensibly invited to come and swear, and take, and be satisfied:—we say it was not.

reasonable to presume that the public could be longer made to believe that the guilty could be screened from punishment, with such a searching and overwhelming power brought to bear upon them, and hence if they should be acquitted under these circumstances, their innocence would be fully established in the eyes of all impartial men.

This accounts for the powerful efforts that were made to produce a conviction in the case of Whitney and others. Every prominent member of the party seemed to think himself called upon to make the cause his own, and he did so, with a zeal which would have done honor to pure intentions and a righteous cause. Western New York, Ohio, Canada, &c. were thoroughly raked, as well as every other place where there was the least prospect of finding a witness, no matter of what shape, or color, who could remember to have dreamed of a circumstance that could be tortured to speak against the defendants, or the wicked institution of Freemasonry; and it must be confessed that some things of a strange and 'questionable shape'—'black spirits and white, red spirits and grey,' were conjured up from the cauldron of human depravity, and took the stand 'with intents wicked,' and 'swore terribly.'

The result is known. Not a conviction was had, and antismasonry is again disappointed of her prey. The effect of this disappointment is visible. They feel the blow sensibly, as they do everything calculated to injure them politically. They must now suffer under the just imputation of having pursued and proscribed for years a number of innocent and respectable men, merely for political effect. It is in vain for them to say that they have not received all the aid which government had the power to afford, and that the law was not administered with a rigid regard to the detection and punishment of crime. They will not say that Judge Nelson did not preside with ability and impartiality, or that he did not hold the scales of justice with a steady and even hand, or that the public prosecutor did not exert every nerve to produce a conviction. There is no alternative but to say the defendants were all innocent.

With regard to the defendants, they had able counsel. We do not recollect to have heard a cause summed up more ably and eloquently, than was this by Mr. W. H. Adams. Some of his flights of eloquence and satire would have done honor to the efforts of a Ciceronian. As the cause entirely turned on the question as to whether the jury should believe the testimony of Edward Giddins and one James A. Shed, from Ohio, who was by a previous contract paid a dollar per day, besides his expenses, and who was, with Giddins, one of the EARLIEST and most WILLING offenders, the greater part of Mr. Adams' speech was necessarily directed to them. It is certainly a fearful thing for such witnesses to pass through such an ordeal. Giddins could not endure it, and left the house; Shed remained in visible torment, undoubtedly cursing his dollar a day, and wishing himself back to Ohio. He will long remember the name of the Canadian butcher, with whom he had the conversation about murdering Morgan.

The Special Council will undoubtedly enter a nolle prosequi on the remaining indictments, as further endeavors to produce a conviction is obviously hopeless. We cannot think that justice requires that they should be longer harassed, when it is not pretended that any additional testimony against them can be found. Giddins was the last resort, and he has failed them.

The Editor of the Portland Courier has been presented with a mess of new potatoes, some of them large as hens' eggs, raised the present season by Capt. Benjamin Waterhouse of Cape Elizabeth. The Editor of a Wisconsin paper acknowledges the receipt, in that quarter, of a snow storm, which made tolerable sleighing for a day or two.—[Gaz.]

A package of watch tools worth $50, has lately been returned to a jeweller by a conscience-stricken thief.

NORFOLK ELECTION.

It is probable that Messrs. Webb and Baily are elected Senators from Norfolk county. The election of the third candidate must be decided by the House, in June; the Rev. MOSES THACHER not having the requisite number of votes. Mr. Loud has the highest number of votes on the National Republican ticket, and will probably be elected by the Legislature. The antimasons will elect representatives with a view to the decision of this question, in every town where they have the majority. Let the friends of correct principles be on the alert. In Wrentham Mr. Thacher received 151 and Mr. Endicott 205!

PLYMOUTH.—It is probable there has been no choice of Senators in this county. The Legislature will be called on to settle this difference also. The approaching Representative election will be one of great importance; in which every friend to the free institutions of our country should feel a deep interest.

BRISTOL COUNTY.—The antimasonic ticket has prevailed in Bristol county: we understand, however, that two of the gentlemen elected are far from being political antimasons. There is probably no choice for member of Congress. Mr. Ruggles is supported by the antimasons, Jacksonians, and anti-tariffites. Mr. Hodges by the National Republicans. The vote is about even.

CITY ELECTIONS.—Messrs. Charles Welles, Alexander H. Everett, George Blake, Benjamin T. Pickman, Otis Everett and James C. Merrill, were elected Senators from this city on Monday. The antimasonic party run a ticket composed of three gentlemen from the National Republican party and three antimasons. Through fraud and deception, they were enabled to carry about 800 votes. A portion of their votes was headed by Levi Lincoln for Governor, and Thomas L. Winthrop for Lieutenant Governor; another portion with Marcus Morton and Nathan Willis; by which means many voters were deceived, and unwittingly cast votes for men to whom they were decidedly opposed. Several instances have come to our knowledge.

The venerable Isaiah Thomas is no more!

This venerable and well-beloved man died at Worcester on Monday last. He was the father of American printers; and past Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of this Commonwealth. He was born in this city in January, 1749. 'He began his career,' says Mr. John Russell, in his address to the members of the Faustus Association, in 1808, 'about the time Franklin was called from the private studies of his office, to fulfil the duties of public minister abroad. On his first entrance into business, he was distinguished for enterprise and ingenuity—and possessing an ardent mind, he pursued the natural bent of his enthusiasm in the cause of liberty, by eminently contributing in his private example, and professional ability, as editor of a newspaper, to the progress and consummation of that glorious revolution, which seated the proud empire of America on the throne of independence.'

At a meeting of the Council of the American Antiquarian Society, held at the house of the Rev. Dr. Bancroft, on Monday the 4th day of April, A. D. 1831, being the day of the decease of the late ISAIAH THOMAS, L. L. D. and late President of said Society—

Resolved, That this Society deplore the death of their venerable President, as a distinguished public benefactor, to whose munificence we are almost exclusively indebted for our valuable literary and other property.

Resolved, That for a long succession of years he has devoted his valuable services with great zeal to the interests of this Society, and has left to the public in the Library, a legacy for which they ought to be grateful.

Resolved, That this Society will attend his funeral, and request a member of their body to deliver an appropriate address on that occasion.

Resolved, That Rejoice Newton, Esq. be requested to communicate these Resolutions to the surviving relatives and to make all necessary arrangements.

Attest,

REJOICE NEWTON, Rec'g. Sec.

His funeral was attended at the meeting-house of the Second Parish in Worcester, on Thursday last.

FOREIGN SUMMARY.

ROME.—The Editors of the New York Gazette give the following extract from a letter from Rome, dated Jan. 24. The date of this letter is also prior to the date of the revolutionary movements in the neighboring Duchies of Reggic, Modena, &c.

'You will no doubt feel anxious, from the extravagant reports in the French Journals respecting Italy, but I assure you that they are much exaggerated, and at present all is tranquil. The Cardinals, who have been in conclave more than a month, have not yet fixed upon a Pope. It is however expected, that a decision will be made in a few days, after which the Carnival will commence. At present there are many Americans here, viz: Mr. Harper, and family, Secretary of Legation at Paris; Mr. Depeau and family; Mr. Boggs and family, Mr. Cohen, Mr. Cutting, Dr. Hamersly, and Mr. Courson, all of New York; Mr. Otis and Mr. Fisher, from Boston, besides many Englishmen.'

Another letter of the same date observes, 'Every thing at Rome is tranquil. The noble Roman people appear so little conscious of the greivous yoke they bear, that their loudest complaint is, that the Cardinals now in conclave are so slow in making a Pope, that they are in a fair way of being deprived of their Carnival. I feel but little sympathy for such a people—they are not fit to be free.—The best change for them would be a change of master.'

Prince Metternich was married on the 30th of January to Princess Melanie de Sacy. The ceremony was performed by the Pope's Nuncio.

The Paris Journal du Commerce of the 10th says, 'The Messenger of this evening announces several extraordinary matters; in the first place an insurrection in the Russian dominions in Finland, next, an offer made to Poland by Austria of 10,000 men, and the Archduke Charles for a King; the possibility thence deduced is, of an approaching struggle between Prussia and Russia on the one hand and Austria and Poland, on the other. All this it may well be supposed, is not given as positive; it is, at all events, sufficient to exercise the mind of the reader.'

A report was current in Paris that Constantine and his army had gone over to the Poles, but it wanted confirmation. It was also said that Prince Radzivil, already a Generalissimo, would be elected king of Poland.

[Neither of the above two last items are entitled to credit.]

One fact appears certain; which is, notwithstanding the thermometer was at eighteen, firing was heard on the 1st of Feb. on the banks of the Bug; but no serious engagement had taken place.

The Emperor Nicholas has named Gen. Diebitsch Governor of Poland; and if the weather permitted he would commence his movements on the 2d or 3d of February.

The inauguration of the Rev. Mr. Palfrey at the University in Cambridge as Professor of Biblical Literature, and Dean of the Theological Faculty, took place Wednesday afternoon.

The Western half of the Cheshire, N. H. bridge was swept away by ice, on the night of 20th ult.

To Correspondents.—N. B. is received; but for reasons which must be obvious to the writer, if he re-examine his remarks, cannot appear in its present shape.

THE WREATH.

THE ORPHAN GIRL.

I have no mother,—for she died
When I was very young;
But her memory, still, around my heart
Like morning mists has hung.

They tell me of an angel form
That watched me while I slept,
And of a soft and gentle hand
That wiped the tears I wept;—

And that same hand that held my own
When I began to walk,
And the joy that sparkled in my eyes
When first I tried to talk—

For they say the mother's heart is pleased
When infant charms expand—
I wonder if she thinks of me,
In that bright, happy land;

For I know she is in heaven, now—
That holy place of rest—
For she was always good to me,
And the good alone are blest.

I remember, too, when I was ill,
She kiss'd my burning brow,
And the tear that fell upon my cheek—
I think I feel it now.

And I have still some little books
She learn'd me how to spell;
And the chiding, or the kiss she gave,
I still remember well.

And then she used to kneel with me,
And teach me how to pray,
And raise my little hands to heaven,
And tell me what to say.

O, mother, mother, to my heart
Thy image still shall be,
And I will hope in heaven at last
That I may meet with thee.

STANZAS.

Oh! ask me not to sing to-night.
Oh! ask me not to sing to-night,
Dejection chills my feeble powers,
I own that halls of glittering light
Are festive as in former hours.
But when I last amid them moved,
I sung for friends beloved and dear,
Their smiles inspired, their lips approved,
Now all is changed—they are not here.

I gaze around—I view a throng,
The radiant slaves of pride and art,
Oh! can they prize my simple song,
The soft low breathings of the heart?
Take back the lute, its tuneful string
Is moistened by a sorrowing tear.
To night, I may not, cannot sing,
The friends that loved me are not here.

‘What time of day is it, Sambo?’
‘Wy, I don’t know, massa, what time he be.’
‘Don’t know!’ why you have got a watch in your pocket, and can look.’
‘Yes, massa—but recollect, he’s a stop-watch.’

MOORE & SEVEY,

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

[Original.]

TO MOSES THACHER,

Member of the Senate of Massachusetts, Ex-Minister of 'the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham,' Present Minister of 'the Church in North Wrentham,' Member of the late 'Antimasonic State Convention of Massachusetts,' Member of the late 'National Antimasonic Convention,' Seceding Mason, Antimasonic Lecturer, and Editor of the Antimasonic 'Boston Telegraph.'

LETTER XII.

SIR:

There is not, probably, 'an intelligent man in the community, who has observed the unprincipled course of policy that you have pursued, who has a single doubt that you entered the Masonic Institution with the express determination of becoming a traitor. You advanced in your course of premeditated wickedness with a degree of unparalleled hardihood, by taking one degree and another, and yet another, until you arrived at the seventh!—Still, your ungorged appetite felt no satiety; nor did your heart feel any generous relents. As the taste of human blood is said to be exciting to the fierce desires of savage, untamed animals; so did your unnatural wishes become more ferocious, in the indulgence of your brutal inclination. With the form of a man, you have combined the unnatural ferocity of a hyæna. You have spared neither the living, nor the dead.

Why was you deterred from the further accomplishment of your wicked purposes? What arrested another bound on some other object of prey? Why did not some other Masonic Institution feel your blood reeking fangs fastened on its defenceless limbs to glut your unsatiated appetite? Read, miserable man, the testimony from the 'Report of the Committee of St. Alban's Lodge:'

'Mr. Thacher had taken seven degrees in Providence without paying any fees, and it has been known to the fraternity that he was anxious to receive further degrees in Boston, and would have received them if he could have been accepted, and the necessary expences, according to the established regulations of the Encampment, had not prevented.' Note, p. 8.

And so, sir, the deeper infamy of further treachery was only prevented by the mean and pitiful calculations of parsimony. The commission of another bold crime was arrested by the interposition of another paltry vice.—Your virtue then, on the score of treason, is indebted to your baseness on the score of avarice. What, sir, not expend the small amount of an admission fee, to qualify yourself for higher services in your base purposes of betraying the unsuspecting who might have reposed confidence in you? The higher you advanced in your degrees, the lower would be your descent. The deeper you steeped yourself in iniquity, the better your qualifications for your business. The more social duties you violated, the more you would recommend yourself by your devotion to your employers. Think, sir, how much you lose, in your inability to declare, from personal inspection, that the 'Boston Encampment of Knights Templars' did truly contain 'TWO THOUSAND STAND OF ARMS!' The boldness of that glaring falsehood lost some credit, even for you; for, at that time, there were some honest persons who did entertain a hope that 'palpable misrepresentation' would be avoided, when truth would be equally serviceable.

If you have any regrets that you have not participated in the honors of Knighthood, recollect that there are causes of consolation, even in your sorrow, sufficiently ample to reconcile you to your loss: it has saved that Institution from the disgrace of your name; it has saved you from additional accumulation of perfidious treachery.

You would be a Knight withal! And what use would you make of the memorials of Chivalry? Would you touch the lance of the order? It would remind you of truth, honor, integrity, charity, fidelity. These are not the aids that unprincipled ambition requires. It must be matter of mutual congratulation, that while you escaped the assumption of such inconvenient virtues, the Rolls of Knighthood escaped the stain of your name. Your habits and practices peculiarly fit you to use a weapon of secret and sinister purposes; the treacherous, deadly stiletto. The armorial embellishments of Knighthood would badly grace your heraldic honors; for it is said that your terrors quite unmanned you under a vision of two thousand stand of arms; that your weakness overtook you even in your pulpit! Sir, courage is an excellent attribute of a soldier; and truth is an admirable quality in an ecclesiastic.

Were I permitted to advise you in a point of Heraldry, I know of no device more significant than a snake in the grass; no motto more illustrative than torqueo et secudo. For this gratuity of service you owe me no thanks, as my compensation is quite ample, in witnessing the notoriety of your merits.

Among other objects of honorable ambition, the indefinite and misty form even of a coronet may have flitted across your 'mind's eye,' and raised up a train of those high imaginings that shadowed forth the magnificence of your expectations. The deepest enthusiasm of wild romance could not promise higher success than you have attained in violating your engagements in seven degrees; and a diadem might have been the higher reward of the cold-blooded calculation of violating higher degrees! Think, then, infatuated man, how immensely greater might have been your height of greatness, how immeasurably exalted might have been your ample honors, could you have violated the vows of the Temple, and thrown into one mass of misshapen ruin all that is dear of manly honor in the recollections of the proud days of Chivalry! Need I say think? There is a fire whose unquenchable burning still proceeds, even when its original aliment seems to be exhausted. It is that self-creating immaterial element that flames on unwasted in your bosom: DISAPPOINTED AMBITION. Years will come, and years will pass away; and still your unsuccessful projects will rise before you like the ghost of Banquo.

'Why do you show me this? A fourth? Start eyes! What! will the line stretch out to the crack of doom? Another yet? A seventh? I'll see no more.'

But you will see more. Your violated duties will still present themselves to your guilty vision; and when 'thick coming fancies' press upon your heart, you may well ask:

'Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased;
Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow;
Raze out the written troubles of the brain;
And, with some sweet oblivious antidote,
Cleanse the stuff'd bosom of that perilous stuff,
Which weighs upon the heart?'

Go on, sir; follow up the high mark of your ambition. You have precedent in the French 'reign of terror.' The butchers of Paris became the great men in that eventful drama; and why may not the butchers of reputation become great men here? They did indeed erect the guillotine in their public squares; but they planted the liberty cap by its side! You require self-decapitation, and then proclaim liberty. If any one were disposed to doubt, for a moment, your indifference to general desolation in the accomplishment of your purposes, his full conviction of your headlong recklessness would be restored when he should consider your bold defiance in the Senate: 'If civil war becomes necessary, let it come; I fear no civil war.'

I am, Sir, yours,

FENELON.

REVIEW

Of the Rev. Mr. Furguson's Letters to the Rev. Moses Thacher, Pastor of the North Church of Wrentham.

Mr. Furguson, in his fourth letter to Mr. Thacher concisely delineates correct principles, by which the characters and reputation of men of adverse sentiments are to be estimated; he points out what is due from a minister to the church and people over whom he is placed. He gives a rule, by which men and Masons are to be adjudged. By their works ye shall know them. In this letter we find much to approve and but little to object to, which have not received our remarks in former numbers; excepting a suggestion that 'there is light now,' of which he seems to doubt, and appropriately asks his brother Thacher,—'but where is the light?' in allusion we presume to disclosures of himself and other seceding Masons. We are bold to say they are palpable misrepresentations of Masonic principles thrown out to mislead the world. They are like the ignis fatuus leading the benighted wayfaring man, from his direct route, into swamps and quagmires, beset with brambles and thorns, a labyrinth of difficulties, from which it is not easy to be extricated. We are speaking of moral principles. There is a wide difference between the false semblance of truth and real truth. There may be disclosures of external forms, in themselves as forms, of little importance, except for the purpose of imposing on the great body of the people; while the essential moral principles, from sinister motives of the fabricators of imposition, are falsified and perverted. We will attempt to illustrate our meaning by daily natural occurrences. The sun appears to rise and set; the major part of the world believe it to be a fact, while the natural philosopher proves by mathematical demonstration, the sun does not rise and set, but accounts for this daily phenomenon by the revolution of the earth upon its own axis. Ignorance is supportable. We cannot submit to counter-tenance perfidious misrepresentations by our silence; which is construed an acknowledgment of our conviction, and unbridles the tongue of slander.

Mr. Furguson judiciously extricates himself from the dilemma presented to his mind, by the false evidence of a brother minister, a seceding Mason, influenced by impure selfish motives, and the opposing declarations of Masons, whose credibility for truth has never been impeached.—He correctly judges of them by their works. And so will the world, when liberated from thorns and brambles.

The moral world is equally liable to diseases as the natural. The body politic is subject to fevers as well as the animal body. The states of both are ascertained by symptoms of irregular actions and inordinate heat. The epidemic diseases of both, political and animal, assume various forms, according to the nature of approximate and existing causes; they both have their epidemic periods, more or less protracted by various existing causes. According to the usual course of epidemics, it might be conjectured, the antimasonic epidemic may be about to subside, unless additional exciting causes should supervene; but as it seems to be a novel moral disease sui generis, the political physicians have found it difficult to prognosticate by the phases of the planets, or sublunary phenomena, its acme, or declension. The remote causes of this epidemic have been traced to mephitic gases emanating from volcanic eruptions of subterranean fires, denominated, infernal. Epidemic diseases, natural or political or moral require remedies adapted to their respective states.—Pallatives, judiciously administered, appear to be the most appropriate remedies for the present antimasonic epidemic. The Rev. Mr. Furguson, as a moral physician, applies his pacific remedies to his sickly infirm brother with better effect, than those gentlemen who administer caustic remedies. We sincerely hope and expect Mr. Furguson's moral applications may have their desired effect to restore his brother from his moral and political mania to his reason and natural senses. We will follow Mr. Furguson in his course of prescriptions.

'In my last, I endeavored to separate between Masons and Masonry, because with the institution, as such, I have no sympathy; but many of its members are men, who in all the relations of life, give evidence of truth and righteousness. And although I could wish them clear of the institution, and in better company than are some of that brotherhood; yet I can no more deny them the common charities of life, because they have not yet separated themselves from Masonry, than I can deny these charities to you, because you were once a Mason. I do not know that I am right; I would not be positive; I have never been initiated, and must be allowed to see but dimly, but I am strongly inclined to draw the conclusion, that if it is impossible for good men to belong to the institution now, [as it is averred by Mr. Thacher] it is impossible that any good men ever could have belonged to it. Let me be understood. Good men may have been drawn into the lodge; for until they entered, they may be supposed to have no means of forming a conclusion; but if blood and treason, blasphemy and deism, are written in capitals over her front; if her obligations are such as to bind her members to support each other in murder and treason [as has been villainously asserted by Mr. Thacher] it is impossible for me to conceive how any good man, knowing such to be her obligation, could have entered one step beyond her vestibule.' Here we behold the hypocrisy of Moses Thacher. He says no Mason can be a good man; this he must have discovered when he took his first step; still he proceeded step after step to the seventh degree, and after this, in his orations eulogized the principles of the institution; what are the inferences to be drawn? We leave Mr. Furguson to deduce,—'I may be told, that the oaths are so administered, amidst noise and affright, that the candidate knows little or nothing of their import; but this ignorance cannot be lasting; for immediately he becomes an agent in administering those oaths to others. Nor can this trepidation and affright accompany the candidate step after step, as he multiplies his oaths, and climbs the royal arch. Again I may be told, that, until very recently, no man could renounce Masonry without exposing his life. But would this danger, allowing it to be real, be any justification or even excuse to the man of principle, who was called to choose between obligations which cut him off from God and bound him to support treason and murder, or lose his life? I have no hesitation in saying, that knowing the obligations of Masonry to be such as you [brother Thacher] have represented them, you were solemnly bound to choose death rather than to submit your lips to seal such obligations.—And your not having chosen death rather than life upon such terms, is to me evidence that you did not define those obligations, as you now define them.' The above argument of Mr. Furguson is most conclusive, we may add from our knowledge that Mr. Thacher knew when he made his statement as above given, it was false. 'And brother,' continues Mr. Furguson, 'by the same reasoning which brings me to this conclusion respecting you, I am led to the general conclusion, that there is a vast difference of opinion, even among those who have taken upon themselves Masonic obligations, with regard to the obligations themselves.' The observation will apply so far as Mr. Thacher is implicated and no further. 'Either I must admit this to be true, or I must believe it to be impossible that any good man should have taken more than one degree of Masonry. And with these conclusions, I am compelled to form the same judgment respecting Masons which I form of other men. I judge them by their fruits. If I have evidence that a man is possessed of principle, that he has the fear of God before his eyes, and that he is a man of righteousness, I may be told, he is a Mason, that he has taken seven or ten degrees; but, I am compelled by the evidence of his uprightness, to believe that some how or other, he has put a different construction upon these obligations, from that which you have, [falsely and perfidiously] put upon them. I believe, from what I have seen, that those obligations are very indefinite, not in their form perhaps, but in their extent and application.' Here Mr. Furguson, like a tender, conscientious man, exhibits his sympathies for a brother in the ministry; so far he has our approbation. But we must controvert his views, when he regards those obligations 'as traps,' which in the hands of designing men may be made to bear hard upon the consciences of good men. And when he wishes them abrogated, and the institution out of existence, he evidently discloses sentiments and feelings founded on early prejudices, which have been alluded to; and which he possessed in common with a large proportion of mankind, without the least evidence the institution is of dangerous tendency; but, merely on the suspicious supposition, that a secret institution is bad, because it chooses to keep its own affairs from the knowledge of the rest of the world. Here the institution only claims for itself that privilege which the rest of mankind, who enjoy liberty, possess—freedom of opinions. 'But,' Mr. Furguson observes, 'I can no more give up a man for being a Mason, than I can give you up [brother Thacher] for having been a Mason. I may be told there is light now; but where is the light? It is true the public have received light from the revelation of seceding Masons; this is doubted; but is there more light in the lodge now than there was ten years ago? Are not its obligations the same, and if you [brother Thacher] and others were able to reconcile those obligations with truth and righteousness, when you were ascending from one degree to another, will not those who are now Masons, by the same casuistry, be able to reconcile their obligations with truth and righteousness? To all this I may be told that William Morgan has been murdered, and that Masons have murdered him, because he revealed the secrets of Masonry. And so far as I have evidence that enables me to form a judgment, I believe it to be true. And brother, with the Mason that justifies that cruel murder, on the ground that Morgan had incurred the penalty, I wish to have nothing to do. He confesses that he understands, and is a dangerous member of community.' To the last sentence the whole fraternity of Masons will religiously subscribe, the declarations of Mr. Thacher to the contrary notwithstanding. 'But why confound the righteous with the wicked? When a man, otherwise of character, testifies, that he does not allow his Masonic obligations to interfere with his duty to God and to his brother; when his actions comport with his professions; when in all the relations of life, he walks uprightly, I must be allowed to treat him as a man and as a brother. He in fact is not, and never has been, in your sense of the term, a Mason.' Nothing can be more truly said than the last observation. Masons have never understood their obligations as represented by Mr. Thacher; 'therefore,' concludes Mr. Furguson, such a man 'ought not to be regarded as having forfeited any of his rights, privileges or character.'

And that man in my view [brother Thacher] says little for himself, who having been a Mason, and standing where you stand, shall on the mere ground of renunciation, claim to separate himself from his Christian brethren, because they have not yet renounced Masonry. If you so understood your obligations, when you ascended step by step through its different degrees, you have much to be forgiven, and a low place becomes you. It does not look well, brother, for you to be the first to deny Christian fellowship to men, otherwise of uprightness, merely because they have not seen the obligations of Masonry to be inconsistent with the profession of Christianity.

ANTIMASONRY.

A few days since Mr. Turner called at the shop of Mr. Seth Geer, who, in the presence of Mr. George W. Geer and others, said to him, 'Is it true that you are an antimason and opposed to Masonry?' Mr. Tucker replied 'I am, an't you?' to which Mr. Geer answered, 'No, I know nothing about it.' Some conversation then ensued about the Morgan abduction, when Tucker said, 'you can as easily bring God from heaven, as procure justice from Masons!!'

N. B. If these facts are denied they will be supported by the affidavits of at least two of the parties in whose presence they transpired.

Remarks.—The foregoing is left with us for publication by Mr. George W. Geer; a man whose character is above suspicion, and who is prepared to make his affidavit to the truth of it if Mr. Tucker, or any person authorized by him, denies its correctness. There can be no doubt of the truth of the statement, and Mr. Tucker must stand before the inhabitants of the eighth, an animason of the most proscriptive character.

We appeal to the honest democracy of the ward to know whether they will vote for a man who has declared himself an antimason. Are they prepared to see our best citizens proscribed, and declared ineligible to sit as jurors—unqualified to appear as witnesses—because they are Masons? Are they prepared to support a party who have basely insinuated that De Witt Clinton committed suicide because he was concerned in Morgan's abduction? Are they prepared to sustain a set of men who declare that Washington being a Mason, was necessarily an unprincipled man, unworthy the confidence of his fellow citizens? We hope not, we think not; and although the editor who pens this is not a Mason, we must say that to do so, would be a disgrace to the character of our city. No republican who respects the fundamental principles of our government can advocate the intolerant doctrines of antimasonry. It is in direct hostility, to the spirit of our free institutions, and if it succeeds, must produce an entire change in our system of government. [N. Y. Enquirer.]

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

PAST HISTORY OF THE EARTH.

Of all the memorials of the past history of our globe, the most interesting are those myriads of remains of organized bodies which exist in the interior of its outer crusts. In these we find traces of innumerable orders of beings existing under different circumstances, succeeding one another at different epochs, and varying through multiplied changes of form. 'If we examine the secondary rocks, beginning with the most ancient, the first organic remains that present themselves, are those of aquatic plants and large reeds, but of species different from ours. To these succeed madrepores, encrinurians, and other aquatic zoophytes, living beings of the simplest forms, which remain attached to one spot and partake in some degree, of the nature of vegetables. Posterior to these are ammonites, and other mollusci, still very simple in their forms, and entirely different from any animals now known.—After these, some fishes appear; and plants, consisting of bamboos and ferns, increase, but still differ from those that exist. In the next period, along with an increased number of extinct species of shells and fishes, we meet with amphibious and vivacious quadrupeds; such as crocodiles and tortoises and some reptiles, as serpents, which show that dry land now existed. As we approach the newest of the solid rock formations, we find lamantins, phocæ, and other cetaceous and mammiferous sea animals, with some birds. And in the newest of these formations, we find the remains of herbiferous land animals of extinct species, the palæotherium, anapotherium, &c.—and other birds, with some fresh water shells. In the lowest beds of loose soil, and in peat bogs, are found the remains of the elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, elk, &c. of different species from those which now exist, but belonging to the same genera. Lastly, the bones of the species which are apparently the same with those now existing alive, and never found except in the very latest alluvial depositions, or those which are either formed in the sides of rivers, the bottom of ancient lakes and marshes now dried up, in peat beds, in the fissures and caverns of certain rocks, or at small depths below the present surface in many places where they have been overwhelmed by debris, or even buried by man. Human bones are never found except among those of animal species now living, and in situations which show, that they have been comparatively speaking recently deposited.'

More than thirty different species of animals have been found embedded in the secondary strata—no living examples of which are now to be found in any part of the globe. Among the most remarkable of these are the following:—1. The Mammoth, which bears a certain resemblance to the elephant, but is much larger, and differs considerably in size and form of their tusks, jaws, and grinders. The fossil remains of this animal are more abundant in Siberia than in other countries; there being scarcely a spot, from the river Don to Kamtschatka, in which they have not been found. Not only single bones and perfect skeletons of this animal are to be met with; but, in a late instance, the whole animal was found preserved in ice. This animal was discovered on the banks of the frozen ocean, near the river Jena, in 1799, and in 1805, Mr. Adams got it conveyed over a space of 7000 miles to Petersburg, where it was deposited in the museum. The flesh, skin, and hair were completely preserved, and even his eyes were entire. It was provided with a long mane, and his body was covered with hair. This hair was of different qualities. There were stiff black bristles from 12 to 15 inches long, and these belonged to the tail, mane, and ears. Other bristles were from 9 to 10 inches long, and of a brown color; and besides these, there was a coarse wool, from 4 to 5 inches long, a pale yellow color. This Mammoth was a male; it measured 9 feet 4 inches in height, and was 16 feet 4 inches long, without including the tusks. The tusks, measuring along the curve, are 9 feet 6 inches; and the two together weigh 360 lbs. avoirdupoise. The head alone without the tusks weighs 414 lbs. avoirdupoise. The remains of this animal have been found likewise in Iceland, Norway, Scotland, England, and in many other places through the continent onward to the Arctic ocean.

2. The Megatherium. A complete skeleton of this colossal species was found in diluvial soil near Buenos Ayres. The specimen is 14 feet long, and 7 Spanish feet in height.

3. The great Mastodon of the Ohio. This species appears to have been as tall as the elephant, but with longer and thicker limbs. It had tusks like the elephant, and appeared to have lived on roots. Its remains abound in America, and particularly on the banks of the Ohio.

4. The Tapir, which also abounds in America. The one named Gigantic Tapir, is about 18 feet long, and 12 feet high.

5. The Elk, or the Elk of the Isle of Man. This gigantic species now apparently extinct, occurs in a fossil state, in Ireland, Isle of Man, England, Germany and France. The most perfect specimen of these species, which was found in the Isle of Man, may be seen in the Museum at the University at Edinburgh. It is 6 feet high 9 feet long, and in height to the tip of the right horn, 9 feet, 7 1-2 inches. An engraving of this skeleton may be seen in vol. 6th of Sup. to Encyc. Brit.

From a consideration of the phenomena above described, Geologists have been led to conclude 'that rocks now buried at a great depth, constituted at one time, the surface of continents, and the seat of organic life; and that many orders of beings have been called into existence, and afterwards destroyed by great revolutions, which introduced new classes of mineral depositions accompanied with new tribes of organic beings.' It has also been concluded by some, that the appearance of man upon the face of the globe, is, geologically speaking, a very recent event; before which the earth had been inhabited thousands of years by various families of plants and tribes of animals, which had been destroyed and renewed in a long series of succession. Whether these conclusions be necessary inferences from the phenomena of organic remains, and other geological facts, I shall not, at present, stop to inquire.—It is sufficient for the Christian Philosopher to show, that, though they should be admitted in their full extent, they are not inconsistent with the records of Sacred History, as some divines have been disposed to maintain. Though it could be proved to a demonstration, that the materials of which the present system of our globe is composed, have existed for millions of years, it would not, in the least, invalidate the Mosaic account of our world. For Moses nowhere affirms, that the materials or substance of the earth, were created, or brought from nothing into existence, at that period when his history commences.—His language, on the contrary, evidently implies, that the materials which entered into the constitution of our globe did exist, at the epoch at which he commences his narration. 'The earth was without form and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep.' This passage plainly implies the following things: 1. That the original atoms, or materials, out of which the terraqueous globe, in its present state was formed, were then in existence, or, had been previously created. How long they had been in existence is not stated. We may suppose them to have existed for a year, a thousand years, or a million of years just as geological phenomena seem to warrant, without in the least invalidating the authority of the Sacred Historian, who states nothing contrary to the truth of either supposition. 2. That the materials of our globe, as then existing, were in a chaotic state. Instead of that order and beauty which we perceive on the face of nature, the whole mass presents a scene of confusion and disorder—such a scene, perhaps, as would be presented, were the earth stripped of its verdure, were its strata universally disrupted, its mountains hurled into the plains, and its rivers and seas, by some terrible convulsion, to forsake their ancient channels. 3. The passage seems to imply, that the whole, or the greater portion of the earth, as it then existed, was covered with a deluge of water. 'Darkness covered the face of the deep,' or the abyss. [Dicks].

MISCELLANY.

THE GHOST OF THE ISLAND.

The hint of this story is found in Gov. Winthrop's Journal for the year 1743. The following are the remarks of the Governor. 'About midnight three men saw lights rise out of the water, in form like a man, &c.' 'The like was seen by many a week after; arising about Castle Island.' 'About the same time a voice was heard upon the water, between Boston and Dorchester, calling out in a most dreadful manner, Come away! come away!' 'These proceedings have some reference to the place where Capt. Chadwick's pinnace was destroyed, gave occasion of speech of that man who was the cause of it, who professed himself to have skill in necromancy, and to have done some strange things in his way from Virginia hither, and was suspected of having murdered his master.'—page 323.

There are several small islands in the harbour of Boston, on one of which stands the fortress which defends the entrance to the city. This island is somewhat celebrated by the tradition of a singular event connected with the early history of New England.

In 1643, the good people of Boston were visited by a stranger named Allen Griffith—a sea-trader, of considerable wealth and agreeable manners.—He was tall and muscular—powerful alike in mind and body; and extremely fascinating in his intercourse with society. He came from Virginia; and told a tale of shipwreck and disaster—that he sailed out in a goodly shallop, and with a brave crew, and that they all perished save himself.—He was indeed first seen in a pinnace, rowing into the harbour from the direction of Castle Island, and his story was consequently very generally believed.

He regularly attended church—he entered with zeal into the wishes and feelings of his neighbors. He told stories to the young people of the strange things he had witnessed in Virginia; and to the elder he explained the manner in which the churches of James River were managed; and disclaimed wisely upon the political affairs of the infant colonies.

He was extremely fond of water excursions.—Not a day passed, but he was seen in his boat rowing towards Castle Island, where he landed and usually remained about an hour, and then returned to the town. His excursions were so regular—so uniformly direct to one place, that his neighbors at last began to question him on the subject. He refused to explain his conduct; but on the contrary, answered somewhat fiercely that he wished no one to interfere with his business. And he continued to visit the Castle regularly; but without revealing to any one his object.

It was moreover remarked by the good people of the church which he attended, that he knit his brows and shook his head when the minister spoke of the torments of the bottomless pit, and that once or twice when the horrid criminality of unconfessed and secret guilt was exposed, the eye of the stranger glared wildly, and his swarthy features were slightly convulsed as if something had been said that touched his heart deeply. And they whispered their suspicions to one another but nothing was said or done openly against one, whose general deportment was so satisfactory.

One mild and beautiful evening in August, Allen Griffith was standing with two discreet maidens—the one a young girl of very lovely countenance and demeanor, the other an elderly sister—on an eminence that overlooked the town and harbour. Griffith had been pleased with the former maiden when he saw her at the house of worship, and had sought her acquaintance, and had been received into the family of her father with much cordiality. The suspicions which had been whispered against him had gradually died away, inasmuch as his mysterious visit to the Island had all at once ceased, no one knew wherefore.

The twilight deepened slowly into darkness, relieved only by the pale starlight. Griffith had listened with rapture to the soft tones of the maiden and had seen by the waning light, the quick color of impassioned feeling flit over her beautiful cheek, as he spoke to her in that softened and subdued tone of the voice of manhood, which so readily finds its way to the heart of the listener. He knew at that hour she loved him: and he whispered in her ear the words of his gratitude and joy.

'What means that light yonder?' asked the elder maiden, as she pointed towards the still waters of the harbor.

Griffith looked in the direction pointed out; and started as if a vision of death had met his view. Three figures were then moving from the shore of Castle Island—apparently creatures of fire, yet bearing the similitude of the human form. One of them was, to appearance, a female; the other two bore the aspects of men. They passed on over the water directly towards the party on the hill.

'It is a vision of the Evil One!' said the elder sister. The younger sister shrieked, and clasped the arm of Griffith. He stirred not, but his eye was fixed as if by some dreadful fascination upon the fiery phantoms which were moving towards him.

The fiery vision drew nearer. 'Let us fly—it is an evil omen to some of us!' shrieked the sisters. 'Allen Griffith!—we adjure thee to fly with us, lest the enemy of souls be upon thee!'

The stout frame of Griffith was shaken as by a mortal chillness—but he neither spoke nor started from his place; and his glazing eye was fixed full upon the evil images before him. All at once the female figure raised her arm and solemnly beckoned to him; and a moment after, a dreadful and appalling voice sounded over the waters,

'Come away! Come away!'

The countenance of Griffith was dreadfully convulsed, and he muttered to himself some half-intelligible words of horrible import. Again the cry was heard, 'Come away! come away!' and the figures sunk down and were seen no more.

The fearful sighs and sounds of that night were heard and seen by many others. The sisters spoke not of the dreadful visitation; they knew not how to account for it—but they dreaded to ask an explanation from Allen Griffith. Three days now passed away and Griffith once more visited them. It was in the early twilight. His countenance was pale and haggard; and there was a frightful look of insanity in his eye.

'Let us go to the hill once more,' he said. 'Go with me now—it is my last request, I have something to reveal; it burns like fire in my bosom;—

and this is my last hour. Those who have called me once will call me again, and I must obey them.'

'Go not with him, sister,' said the elder. 'Go not with him, lest thou partake the punishment of the ungodly.' Griffith buried his face in his hand, and wept aloud as she spoke.

'Nay' sister,' said the younger, 'I fear not to go with this man. Hath he not been to us as a brother, and shall we desert him in his afflictions? The dreadful sight, which the cunning of Satan deviseth to terrify the children of the true faith, hath estranged his reason in some measure, but I will nevertheless go with him, even as he desires.' In vain the elder remonstrated, she was resolved to accompany Griffith; and neither persuasion nor tears would avail with her. The elder recommended her sister to the mercy of Heaven, and bade her farewell as if she never were to see her more.

But the sister did return—a crazy and wretched creature. God had touched her brain, and she had become a maniac; and she talked wildly of the dreadful sight she had seen; and the loss of her lover. The miserable Griffith was never seen again. The fiery figures were seen by many on that night moving along the water, and calling as if to some one on the shore, 'Come away!—Come away!' in a tone dreadful to hear.

The report of these singular matters reached the ear of the Governor, he ordered a search to be made forthwith upon Castle Island, which had for a considerable time been deserted. In an old apartment of the fortress, the visitors deputed by the Governor found the decayed body of a woman, who had apparently been murdered. This led to an investigation of the whole matter, and it was found that the stranger Griffith had sailed as passenger in a small shallop bound to New England in which was an English gentleman and his lady—a beautiful young woman—that he had instigated the crew, three in number, to rise in mutiny, and murder the Capt. and the husband of the lady. This was ascertained by the confession of one of the crew, whose pangs of conscience compelled him to reveal the horrible secret on his death bed. The ghosts never afterwards haunted the Island, which has since reared aloft its grim fortress, guarded with frowning artillery—the guardian giant of the capital of New England.

[From the New York American.]

Some months ago Dr. Cogswell, of Hartford, Ct., eminent as a physician, and beloved as a man, died. His daughter was deaf and dumb—but through the blessed agency of that system of instruction which must ever rank its founder, the Abbe de l'Epée, among the benefactors of the human race, her high capacities of intellect, and the pure and glowing affections of her heart, were fully developed. The attachment between this father and daughter, under such circumstances, may be conceived. The mournful evidence of its intensity is to be found in the fact commemorated in the poem, that in a few days after her father's death, she too died: 'her heart had so grown to his that they could not be separated.' The poem was not written for publication; but having seen it in the possession of a friend, we could not but desire to lay it before our readers, and we were happy in obtaining permission so to do:—

The following lines, from the pen of Mrs. L.H. Sigourney, were addressed to a sister of Miss Alice Cogswell, not long after her decease, and were—accompanied with a letter from which the following is an extract:—'To know the departed as I knew her, in the expansion of her fine intellect, in the first warmth of her ingenuous and ardent affection—to witness her thirst for knowledge, and her delight in acquiring it—was sure to lay the foundation of no common attachment. Nevertheless, we 'sorrow not as without hope.' To the gain of those we mourn, our thoughts should strive to rise. In such contemplations may you find solace for your deep afflictions. Will you, dear friend, accept a few lines suggested by meditating while alone last evening, on what our departed friend might be supposed to say, where she permitted, from the abodes of bliss, to address the object of her fondest earthly regard.'

ALICE.

Sister!—there 's music here—
From countless harps it flows,
Throughout this bright celestial sphere,
Nor pause, nor discord knows.
The seal is melted from my ear
By love divine;
And what through life I pined to hear,
Is mine!—Is mine!
The warbling of an ever-tuneful choir,
And the full, deep response of David's golden lyre—
Did the kind earth hide from me
Her broken harmony,
That thus the melodies of Heaven might roll,
And whelm in deeper tides of bliss, my rapt, my wondering soul?

Joy! I am mute no more;
My sad and silent years,
With all their painful toils, are o'er!
Sweet Sisters! Dry your tears:—
Listen at hush of eve—listen a rising day—
List at the hour of prayer,—can ye not hear my lay?
Untaught, unchecked, it came,
As light from Chaos beam'd—
Praising His glorious name
Whose blood on Calvary stream'd:
And still it swells that highest strain—the song of the redeemed.

Brother! My only one—
Belov'd from cradle hours,—
With whom beneath the vernal sun
I wander'd when our task was done,
And gather'd early flowers,—
I cannot come to thee!
Though 't was so sweet to rest
Upon thy gentle-guiding arm, thy sympathizing breast—
'Tis better here to be.
No disappointments shroud
The angel bowers of joy;
Our knowledge hath no cloud,
No limit, no alloy;
The fearful word to part
Is never breath'd above;
Heaven hath no broken heart;—
Call me not hence, my love!

Oh, Mother! He is here,
To whom my soul so grew,*
That when Death's fatal spear
Stretch'd him upon his bier,
I fain must follow too.
His smile my infant griefs restrain'd—
His image, in my childish dream,

*Soon after her father's death, Alice said, 'that her heart had so grown to his, that they could not be separated.'

And o'er my young affections, reign'd,
In gratitude, unutter'd and supreme.
But yet till these effulgent skies burst forth in radiant glow:
I knew not half the unmeasur'd debt a daughter's heart doth owe.
Ask ye, if to his soul the same fond thrill is given?
Oh, yes; and filial love remains unchanged in Heaven!
I bend to soothe thy woes—
How near thou canst not see;
I watch thy lone repose—
May I not comfort thee?
To welcome thee, I wait:—Blest Mother, come to me!

ANECDOTES.

GENEROUS SACRIFICE.

Some years ago, a Parisian female of humble birth inspired a young gentleman of rank, an officer in the army, with so strong an affection for her, that his parents, fearing that he should disgrace his family by a disproportionate alliance, had him confined in the Bastille. The poor girl no sooner heard of his confinement, which she apprehended would last as long as the fears of his friends should continue, than she resolved to remove the principal obstacle to his liberty, by sacrificing herself. Accordingly, one evening, she drank the fatal cup, which was to put an end to her existence, and thus release her lover from prison. The following letter she entrusted to a friend, charging her not to deliver it to the father of the young gentleman, until her body had been consigned to the grave.

'Sir,—Your son did love me; I felt for him a mutual inclination; you feared lest this growing passion should end in his disgrace; and this motive you have deemed sufficient to justify your acting in a more barbarous manner than is perhaps consonant with the character of a parent. I should look upon myself more cruel than you, were I not to give that beloved man a proof that his happiness has constantly been the sole object of the woman he loved. His confinement must be at an end as soon as you learn I no longer exist.—These are the last lines my hand shall ever trace, and my friend is directed to present them to you, with an authentic certificate of my death. You have hastened that period; but I abstain from reproaches. Read this with as much coolness as I feel in writing it. Restore your son to freedom; do it generously, and forbear embittering the gift, by acquainting him at what price I have purchased it; the fatal tale will reach him but too soon; he will then know how I have punished myself for an attachment, which was to endure to this the last day of the unfortunate

ANTOINETTE.

LORD CASTLEREAGH & MRS. DAMER.

Mrs. Damer's prejudice against her cousin, the late Lord Castlereagh, was softened into something like regard by the following characteristic circumstance:—His lordship had promised to make Sir Alexander Johnson chief justice and president of Ceylon, on which Mrs. Damer sarcastically remarked, 'The fellow will cheat you; he is a tory.' Soon afterwards Lord Castlereagh sent express to Sir Alexander—had his commission drawn out—saw the great seal affixed—shook him by the hand, and wished him joy. This was late at night. On the following morning he fought the duel with Canning. Sir Alexander waited on him, when Lord Castlereagh said with a smile, 'You are come to congratulate me on my escape.' 'Yes,' said Sir Alexander, 'and to say that I cannot help marvelling at your fortitude last night: who but yourself could have transacted business?' 'O, I had a reason for it,' said his lordship; 'had I fallen before the great seal was set to your commission, you would have lost the appointment, and my cousin would have said of me, 'The fellow, sir, was a cheat—he was a tory.' When Mrs. Damer heard this, the tears started in her eyes. 'Go,' she said, 'to my cousin, and say I have wronged him; that I love his manliness and his regard for honor, and that I wish to renew our intercourse of friendship.'

CHARACTERISTIC OF AN IRISHMAN.

As the Brooklyn Ferry-boat was leaving the dock the other morning, a couple of Irishmen came running down, the one close at the heels of the other. The boat was just pushed off, and the forward Irishman, wishing to get on board, made a bold spring for it, while at the same moment, the one behind fearing that his comrade would not reach the boat, or reaching it, would leave him ashore, caught the jumping Patrick by the coat-tail, who was thereby precipitated into the water—

'Arah! Pat!' cried the one on the dock to him in the water, 'and where would you had been if I had not caught you?'

'We--e--w--wh--e--e--w!' exclaimed Pat, spouting the filthy brine from his mouth, and swimming to one of the floating fenders, which he soon managed to bestride, 'Wh--e--w' he again exclaimed, putting himself in a boxing attitude, 'and wasn't it a bastely trick you was after saving me; come on to the log here, and I'll tach you better manners in future.'

'But you'd been kilt droundt if I had'nt caught you, my jewel,' said the humane Irishman, 'but now, you are only soused!'

As the water was none of the warmest, the soused Irishman was soon cooled, he sailed to the end of the log, and with the assistance of his helpmate clambered up the pier, when they embraced each other by the hand, and retired to a neighbouring porter-house, to drown their misunderstanding.—[N. Y. Constellation.]

A MADMAN'S LOGIC.—A gentleman by the name of Mann, met a maniac, who striking his cane on the ground, sternly demanded, 'Who are you?' Thinking to amuse him, the gentleman answered, 'I am a double man: Mann by name, and a man by nature.' 'Well, I am a man beside myself; so we too will fight you too;' on which he knocked him down, and walked off.

That quaint old moralist, Quarles, in his Enchiridion, gives us the following advice:—Gaze not on beauty too much, lest it blast thee; nor too near, lest it burn thee; if thou love it, it disturbs thee; if thou lust after it, it destroys thee; if virtue accompanies it, it is the heart's paradise; if vice associates with it, it is the soul's purgatory; it is the wise man's bonfire, and the fool's furnace.

A QUESTION ANSWERED.—A person asked Zeno, the philosopher, if wise men ever fell in love. His answer was, 'If wise men do not fall in love, beautiful women must be very unfortunate.'

SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 16, 1831.

GIBBS, THE PIRATE.—This man who stands convicted of the murder of Wm. Roberts, mate of the brig Vineyard, on the high seas, on the 23d of November last, and who is to be executed in New-York on the 22d, is a native of the State of Rhode Island. Gibbs is an assumed name. His confession, as given in the New-York papers, and which there is reason to believe to be strictly true, shows him to have been one of the most consummate villains; one of the most blood-thirsty wretches that is to be found on the annals of piracy. We have not room for a detail of all his crimes; and if we had we know not that they would be acceptable to our readers—they are enough to make the heart sick. Having failed in business in this city, and abandoned himself to intemperance and a dissolute life, he sailed for Margarett, where he entered on board the Columbian privateer Maria, Capt. Bell. They cruised for about two months in the Bay of Mexico, around Cuba, but the crew becoming dissatisfied in consequence of the non-payment of their prize-money, a mutiny arose, the crew took possession of the schooner, and landed the officers near Pensacola. A number of days elapsed before it was finally decided by them what course to pursue. Some advised that they should cruise as before, under the Columbian commission; others proposed to hoist the Black Flag. They cruised for a short time without success, and it was then unanimously determined to hoist the black flag, and declare war against all nations. Their bloody purpose was not carried however into immediate execution. They boarded a number of vessels, and allowed them to pass unmolested, there being no specie on board, and their cargoes not being convertible into anything valuable to themselves. At last one of the crew named Antonio, suggested that an arrangement could be made with a man in Havana, that would be mutually beneficial;—that he would receive all their goods, sell them, and divide the proceeds. This suggestion being favorably received, they ran up within two miles of the Moro Castle, and sent Antonio on shore to see the merchant and make a contract with him. Previous to this, Gibbs was chosen to navigate the vessel. Antonio succeeded in arranging everything according to their wishes, and Cape Antonio was appointed as the place of rendezvous. The merchant was to furnish drogers to transport the goods to Havana, which was done by him for more than three years.

The Maria now put to sea, with a crew of about 50 men, principally Spaniards and Americans, with every hope of infamous success. The first vessel she fell in with was the Indispensable, an English ship, bound to Havana, which was taken and carried to Cape Antonio. The crew were immediately destroyed: those who resisted were hewn to pieces: those who offered no resistance, were reserved to be shot and thrown overboard. Such was the manner in which they proceeded in all their subsequent captures. The unhappy being that cried for mercy in the hope that something like humanity was to be found in the breasts even of the worst of men, shared the same fate with him who resolved to sell his life at the highest price. A French brig; with a valuable cargo of wine and silk, was taken shortly after: the vessel was burnt and the crew destroyed.

To reap a golden harvest without the hazard of encountering living witnesses of their crimes, it was unanimously resolved to spare no lives and to burn and plunder without mercy.

The Spaniards were eager to accomplish that object without delay, and generally every unhappy victim disappeared in a very few minutes after they had gained the deck of a vessel.

He now directed his course towards the Bahama Banks, where they captured a brig, believed to be the William from New-York from some port in Mexico, with a cargo of furniture; destroyed the crew, took her to Cape Antonio, and sent the furniture and other articles to their friend at Havana. Sometime during this cruise, the pirate was chased for nearly a whole day by a U. S. ship, supposed to be the John Adams; they hoisted Patriot colors, and finally escaped. In the early part of the summer of 1817, they took the Earl of Morira, an English ship from London, with a cargo of dry goods. The crew were destroyed, the vessel burnt, and the goods carried to the Cape. There they had a settlement with their Havana friend, and the proceeds were divided according to agreement.

Gibbs then repaired to Havana, introduced himself to the merchant, and made further arrangements for the successful prosecution of his piracies.

During the cruise which was made in the latter part of 1817 and the beginning of 1818, a Dutch ship from Curacao was captured, with a cargo of West India goods, and a quantity of silver plate. The passengers and crew, to the number of 30, were all destroyed, with the exception of a young female about 17, who fell upon her knees and implored Gibbs to save her life. The appeal was successful, and he promised to save her, though he knew it would lead to dangerous consequences among his crew. She was carried to Cape Antonio, and kept there about two months; but the dissatisfaction increased until it broke out at last into open mutiny, and one of the pirates was shot by Gibbs for daring to lay hold of her with a view of beating out her brains. Gibbs was compelled in the end to submit her fate to a council of war, at which it was decided that the preservation of their own lives made her sacrifice indispensable. He therefore acquiesced in the decision, and gave orders to have her destroyed by poison, which was immediately done.

City Prison and Bridewell, March 6, 1831.

Question. Charles Gibbs,—my name is Mr. Hopson. I understand from Mr. Merritt you wished to see me. He told me so some ten or twelve days since, and the weather being so cold, I have put off coming until now. He informed me you wished to make some communications which you would not make to any other person.

Ans. I have.

Ques. Gibbs, are you going to tell me the truth, or is it to amuse me, and make me write a long story that will not amount to anything.

Ans. I shall tell nothing but the truth; and it is only on condition that you will swear not to divulge anything I may say, when I am on my trial, and at no time after, if I should get clear.

My reply was, (says Mr. Hopson,) that I should not take my oath, but I would give him my word that it should be kept a secret according to his request.

Under this promise he stated as follows:—that he had commenced piracy in the year 1816, in the schooner Sans Sousee, belonging to the Island of Margarett, and that since that time, has been in several other vessels engaged in the same business. That many of his comrades are now living in the United States, but whose names he never would mention: That they had taken from many vessels large sums of money, and various articles of merchandize. He had no doubt he had been concerned in robbing forty different vessels; and on reflection, could mention many of the names. He then gave me the names of the following vessels:

Brig Jane, of Liverpool; cargo dry goods. Crew destroyed, vessel burnt.

Brig (name forgotten,) of New York, from the Spanish Main; took money from her. Crew destroyed, vessel burnt.

Brig Belvidere, of Boston, taken in the Gulf; crew and vessel destroyed.

Two French brigs, in the Gulf of Mexico; money taken—crews and vessels destroyed.

Ship Providence, of Providence; took from her $10,000. She was suffered to pass, as Examinant could not consent to destroy his own townsmen.

Ship William, of Salem; took from her dry goods and money; crew and vessel destroyed.

Barque Dido, of Breinen; took from her dry goods. Vessel and crew destroyed.

Barque Larkin, of London; took from her a large quantity of dry goods. Vessel and crew destroyed.

Genoese brig, name unknown; took from her a large quantity of plate, some gilt edge paper, and from twenty to thirty piano fortes.

A French ship, cargo wine; vessel and crew destroyed.

The William Dawson, of New York; boarded her and let her pass.

Ship Earl of Moria, of London; took from her dry goods and money. Vessel and crew destroyed.

Ship Indispensable, of London; took from her dry goods and money. Vessel and crew destroyed.

A Dutch Ship from Curacao, bound to Holland. There were thirty passengers in her; some of them were females. Took a large quantity of plate, destroyed the vessel, and all on board except a young girl, the daughter of one of the families. Took her to the West end of Cuba, Cape Antonio, where we had a rendezvous, and where we had a small fort that mounted four guns. We kept her about two months, and she was then killed; and this circumstance hurt his feelings more than any act of his life; and which is the only act he can say he was sorry for. [Afterwards told me she was poisoned.] The girl was about 17 or 18 years of age; her father, mother, and all her relations were on board the vessel.

There were many other vessels taken and destroyed, and among them, Americans. Everything valuable was taken from them, and vessels and crews destroyed. The goods were sent to a Spanish House in the Havana, who sold them. We had a contract with the House, received half the proceeds.

While I was in the schooner Margarett, we took the American ship Caroline, and ran her on shore at Cape Antonio, (Cuba.) The United States armed vessel, the Enterprise, came along shortly after, and before we had a chance of taking anything out of her the crew or some of the crew of the Enterprise landed. We had a fight with them, and some of our men were killed, and I believe some of theirs. We were beaten and driven to the mountains, where we remained some days. We then separated; some got to Trinidad, south side of Cuba; others got to the Havana. The crew of the Enterprise destroyed our fort, took the goods from the Caroline and our two vessels, the Margarett and Picciana, which were principally dry goods. The cargo of the Caroline was dry goods principally, as appeared from the bills of lading.

[Here is a long statement given of the monies taken, and where secreted.]

Ques. Gibbs, why were you so cruel as to kill so many persons, when you had got all their money, which was all you wanted?

Ans. The laws are the cause of so many murders.

Ques. How can that be? what do you mean?

Ans. Because a man has to suffer death for piracy;—and the punishment for murder is no more. Then you know, all witnesses are out of the way, and I am sure if the punishment was different, there would not be so many murders.

Ques. Have you any objection to tell me the names of any persons who have been concerned in piracy, or who received the gains of pirates?

Ans. There are many now in the U. States, but I will not mention their names. I know that when I was cruising, the Governor of the Isle of Pines was concerned with pirates, and I won't mention any others.

Sometime in the course of the year 1819, he states that he left Havana and came to the United States, bringing with him about $30,000. He passed several weeks in this city, and then went to Boston, whence he took passage for Liverpool in the ship Emerald. Before he sailed, however, he had squandered a large part of his money by dissipation and gambling. He remained in Liverpool a few months, and then returned to Boston in the ship Topaz, Captain Lewis. He subsequently, sailed for Havana.

We will pursue this sickening tale no further than to state that in 1826 he entered the navy of Buenos Ayres as a lieutenant, and was captured in his second cruise. He then returned to New York; but hearing of the war between France and Algiers, he attempted to engage in the service of the latter. Failing in this he returned to Boston; sailed for New Orleans and there entered as one of the crew of the Vineyard. The rest is known.

He solemnly declares that he had no agency in the murder of the mate, for which he was tried and convicted, and is unable to understand how he could be found guilty, when he stood by and looked passively on the scene of destruction. He readily admits, however, his participation in the mutiny, revolt and robbery, and in the murder of Captain Thornby.

PROSCRIPTION.—A writer in the Gazette of Monday furnishes the following paragraph:

'As it may be proper the public should know some of the effects of the excitement in a portion of the community against the Masonic Institution and those who belong to it, I hope the following facts may be published for the information and benefit of the public. At the town meeting in Bridgewater on Monday last, the Selectmen reported to the town a revised list of persons to serve as grand and traverse jurymen. In the list were included the names of Daniel Mitchell, Artemas Hale and Avery Fobes, who are members of the Masonic Institution. A heated and leading antimason moved, that the list be recommitted to the Selectmen, with directions to erase the names of these gentlemen, and make report at the adjournment. This motion prevailed. It is only necessary to add, that the persons thus proscribed, are all men of great respectability—have all been representatives of the town in the Legislature—are Justices of the Peace, and one of them now a member of the Court of County Commissioners.'

This is only a single instance of the persecution and proscription of Masons in this vicinity. In Quincy a Mason is not permitted to enjoy the honors or emoluments of even a hog-constable. The same is true in regard to Stoughton, and some other towns in Norfolk county, where antimasonry is in power. It will be the case wherever that infamous proscriptive faction has a majority of votes. This fact is worthy of the serious consideration of the friends of our free institutions—of civil and religious liberty. It does seem to us that this matter is no longer to be regarded with indifference. It should arrest the attention of every man in community, who would preserve the Constitution and laws of the country from the ruthless hands of a band of desperate office seekers.

The gentleman who made the motion to have the names of masons struck from the list was NATHAN LAZELL Jr., who figured so conspicuously in the House of Representatives last session upon the Grand Lodge question, and who is now a candidate for senator from Plymouth County.

SAMUEL H. JENKS, Esq. has retired from the editorial chair of the Working-men's Advocate published in this city, and is now engaged as associate editor of the New-York Evening Journal. Mr. Jenks is one of the pleasantest editors in the country, and is a valuable acquisition to the journal to which he is now attached. His successor in the Advocate is CHARLES H. LOCKE, Esq., a gentleman favorably known in this city as a pleasant and talented writer; under whose editorial management the paper and the cause of the workingmen we doubt not will flourish and increase in strength and importance.

OYSTERS.—The liquor in an oyster is said to contain incredible multitudes of small embryo, covered with little shells, perfectly transparent, swimming nimbly about. One hundred and twenty of these in a row would extend one inch. Besides these young oysters, the liquor containing a great variety of animalcule, five hundred times less in size, which emit a phosphoric light. The list of inhabitants, however, does not conclude here, for besides these last mentioned, there are three distinct species of worms, called the oyster worm, found in oysters, half an inch in length, which shine like the glow-worms. The sea-star, the cockle and the muscle are the great enemies of the oyster.

THEATRICAL.—Our Theatre has been for the past week, most sadly neglected—we never saw a 'beggary account of empty boxes,' more forcibly illustrated. Some of the most prominent members of the company, have put up their names for Benefits, without any kind of success. The Wraith of the Lake which has been so long in preparation, was brought out last week;—the principal characters were sustained much to the credit of Messrs. Scott, Pearson and Smith. The foundation of the piece is good, but an underplot and a stronger development of incidents are highly necessary.

Mr Booth appeared on Wednesday evening in his favorite character of Richard. He was received with much enthusiasm by a very fashionable audience,—all anxious once more to see 'Richard himself again.' E.

THE ELECTION.—Gov. Lincoln is re-elected by a considerable majority. There seems however to have been rather a stranger opposition to him, than was anticipated by his friends. In 21 towns in Hampshire county, the votes were as follows: Levi Lincoln 444—Heman Lincoln 934—Henry Shaw 812—Marcus Morton 179.—Franklin and Berkshire counties are very much divided, and have probably cast a large number of votes for H. Lincoln and Shaw.

There will be 15 or 20 vacancies in the Senate, to be filled by the Legislature: Barnstable 1; Franklin 1 or 2; Essex 3 or 4; Hampshire 2; Berkshire 2; Norfolk 1; Plymouth 2; Worcester 4; Middlesex 1. Among the candidates to fill these vacancies are National Republicans, Jacksonians—and the fag-ends of both, antimasons.

SERMONS.—R. P. & C. Williams have recently received a large supply of the very excellent Sermons upon the ministry, worship, and doctrines of the Protestant Episcopal Church, by G. T. Chapman, D. D. of Lexington, Ky. To the particular denomination of Christians for whom they are especially designed, they will be found peculiarly interesting and instructive.

It seems probable that the insurrectionary movements in Italy are connected with some plan for a great revolution, which would obliterate the distinctions of the little principalities into which the north of Italy is divided, give liberty to the whole population, form them into one commonwealth, and attempt the immediate expulsion of the Austrians.

SONG.

BY T. CAMPBELL.

When Love came first to Earth, the Spring
Spread rose-buds to receive him,
And back he vow'd his flight he'd wing
To Heaven, if she should leave him.

But Spring departing, saw his faith
Pledged to the next new comer;
He revell'd in the warmer breath
And richer bowers of Summer.

Then sportive Autumn claim'd by rights
An Archer for the lover,
And even in Winter's dark cold nights
A charm he could discover.

Her routs and balls, and fire-side joy,
For this time were his reasons;
In short, Young Love's a gallant boy,
That likes all times and seasons.

SPRING.

Few can contemplate, without a lively interest the silent transformation which is gradually taking place around us on the face of creation, or inhale the soft and balmy atmosphere of spring, at whose kind touch--

'Dissolving snows are lost in living torrents,'

Without experiencing a pervading sensation of unmixed delight. After a prolonged and uninterrupted series of rigorous weather, unequalled in severity within the remembrance of the oldest among us, the approach of the vernal months is peculiarly adapted to fill the heart with pleasurable emotions. We behold the neighboring mountains disrobed of their snowy mantle, 'lifting their green heads to the skies,' and encircling us with a bright and laughing landscape.

To the philanthropist other sources of gratification are presented than those which arise merely from the contemplation of inanimate objects.—Cheering and consolatory is the reflection that the cry of human misery will be less prevalent, and the woebegone aspect of shivering penury exchanged for the kindling glance of health inspiring industry. The scenes of distress and wretchedness which so frequently occur in a dense population during a rigid winter will, it is hoped, yield to the general spirit of the year, and plenty and happiness resume their former influence.—While we drink in fountains of delight from the renovated appearance of surrounding objects, and rejoice at the speedy alleviation of human suffering, it becomes us to mingle a devotional and grateful spirit towards that great power who subjects all nature to such mutations as are requisite to the offspring of his creation.

POWER OF SABBATH SCHOOLS.

It was the remark of that distinguished statesman, De Witt Clinton, that 'the institution of Sunday Schools is one of the three levers by which the moral world is to be moved.' The reason of his assigning such an efficiency to it is obvious to any one who has reflected on its nature; for it includes itself the mighty power of truth, applied to the human mind, to carry out the figure, with the greatest mechanical advantage. As certain as there is a connexion between cause and effect in the physical world, so certain it is that a well conducted Sunday School will have a salutary moral influence upon the scholars. Now, only let the institutions of Sunday Schools be universal, and in one generation the face of the moral world would be renewed to righteousness by the mighty power of truth. Only let its full efficiency be tried, and like the lever of Archimides, it will move the world.

TO MOSES THACHER,

Member of the Senate of Massachusetts, Ex-Minister of 'the Church in the North Parish of Wrentham,' Present Minister of 'the Church in North Wrentham,' Member of the late 'Antimasonic State Convention of Massachusetts,' Member of the late 'National Antimasonic Convention,' Seceding Mison, Antimasonic Lecturer, and Editor of the Antimasonic 'Boston Telegraph.'

LETTER XIII.

SIR:

Among the benefactors of mankind, no one has higher claim to grateful esteem than he who honestly devotes himself to the work of tempering the force of human passions, of moderating human desires, and reconciling the jarring elements of society. How much then must he be held in abhorrence who devotes himself day and night, weeks, months and years, to the revolting employment of fomenting suspicions, jealousies and divisions! Not content with converting your pulpit into a forum for malignant invectives against an Institution whose members had never injured you, who had not even breathed roughly on your name and reputation, but had conferred on you acknowledged and continued favors; not content with making a public exhibition of your Antimasonic somerset, and offering inducements, under your ministerial influence, to persuade others into your selfish views and measures; not content with raising yourself into office upon bitter animosities and deadly persecution; not content with all this, you have even established a public press, to scatter the outpourings of a bad heart, and create wider desolation in an excited and divided community. Whether your principal object is, to make a profit out of your establishment, or to secure to yourself the influence of a public office, cannot be known. But that you are not influenced by a desire to better the condition of mankind, to convey instruction in science or morals, or to accomplish any of the ordinary purposes of a periodical paper, is almost certain.

Whether the interests of agriculture, commerce or the mechanic arts have received any accession from the contributions of the 'Boston Telegraph' has not been a matter of speculation; nor will literature or science owe much to your efforts, until corresponding intelligence and disposition qualify you for those high interests.

When the first number of the 'Boston Telegraph' made its appearance, neither its title nor its 'prospectus' nor its 'editorial preliminary' gave any indication of its persecuting, Antimasonic character; and an honest man might have missed the recognition of the master spirit that directed its oracular concerns, had not the subscription of 'Moses Thacher, editor' proclaimed its quality and purpose. Had one been compelled to glean for the information, 'a shrewd guess' might have inferred it from a notice under the head of marriages; for no other man than Moses Thacher, in making his first public bow, would have obtruded a typographical amplification, under a notice so unimportant, to proclaim a consummation 'by Rev. Mr. Thacher.'

But, neither the boldness of the man, nor the ostentation of the priest, exceed the deep cunning or wily disguise of the editor, who conceals the particular and moving purposes of his establishment under the broad mantle of religion. The flippant and common-place phraseology selected from the vocabulary of a religionist has often passed, and will again pass, as demonstrative evidence of an honest heart and devoted affections. You calculated with some worldly wisdom, therefore, when you expunged even the name of antimasonry from your 'prospectus' and 'editorial preliminary,' and substituted an array of expletives, designed to operate upon religious sensibility. It was wise in you to avoid any allusion to the persecutions of political antimasonry, when you talked so boastingly of 'the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free.' It was not so much within the limits of your design to point out the operations of Christian charity and forgiveness, as 'to point out the essential difference between genuine and false religious experience.' It seems not to have been within your purpose to exhort your readers; 'add to your faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity.' It was much more consonant to your purposes to arrogate knowledge of hidden mysteries, when you declared in your 'editorial preliminary,' 'The doctrines of Divine Sovereignty, Decrees, Election, Reprobation, Divine Agency, Total Depravity, Regeneration, and the like, are doubtless the sincere milk and cream of the word, the easiest to be understood and applied of any part of divine truth.' This pert and off-hand mode of settling the facility with which the readers of your 'religious periodical' may understand and apply doctrines that have demanded the patient investigation of the most learned and pious men, may commend you to the unlettered and superficial, but to no others.

This experiment on which you have ventured seems not to have obtained a very sanguine belief of ultimate success, even in your own mind; nor do you evince any confidence that you shall long hold on in the superlative tone of an ultra-religionist. 'In regard to the future, we make no promises.' 'As we make no promises in regard to the future, we have no desire to raise expectation that will not be realized.' For anything binding in your contract, you may convert your efforts to the purposes of the boldest infidelity; for you make no promises! You may resolve your labors into the wildest dreams of enthusiasm; for you make no promises! You may become the most heartless materialist; for you make no promises! The mutations through which you have passed, afford some reasonable assurance that you, have not yet passed your whole series of worldly changes, and that you may yet become an honest man.

If any evidence had been wanting to show your utter disregard to the decent observances that mark the course of those who enter on an honorable enterprise, it might be found in a mean, depreciating allusion to a respectable, established periodical. 'The paper is as large as the "Boston Recorder,"' is designed to contain much more original, and a variety of selected, matter, with a summary of religious and secular intelligence. One grand object, in issuing this paper, is, to afford a medium for the discussion of those great and fundamental doctrinal subjects, which are not discussed in other religious periodicals of the day.' A man must be more than stupid not to see the tendencies of such artful intimations; and all this after you had repeated your observation that you made 'no promises!' In any other person, such conduct would be called dishonorable and disgraceful. But your field of operations seems to consist rather in the subtlety of mysterious 'doctrines,' than in the simplicity of ordinary duties. You may yet learn, that there is as wide a difference between the heat of fanaticism and the zeal of devotion, as there is between the baseness of selfish ambition, and the purity of patriotism; between an ostentatious parade of words, and an honest discharge of duty.

Having now touched, sir, upon the several topics I proposed to myself at the commencement of these letters, I deem it proper to say that their completion is as much a relief to me as it can, in any possible state of feeling, be to you. If a public exposure has operated upon your nervous temperament, the execution of the duty has not been wholly free from loathsome disgust at such a mass of hideous, moral deformity. The desire to part is therefore a mutual sensation; but springing from very different views and feelings.

I would fain believe that in unmasking you to the public, I have done that public some service. That any human efforts can turn you from the error of your ways is altogether hopeless. I look upon you as a fallen, degraded, miserable man, who has voluntarily abandoned himself to a course of unprincipled and desperate measures, that have at last landed you in private mortification and public disgrace. Over one who has fallen so low, it would be unmanly to exult; for the very wreck of character that you exhibit, is certainly calculated to awaken compassion and pity. Remember that even Caius Gracchus, who, under the privileges of a tribune, and sustained by popular excitement, treated the proud patricians with contempt and ignominy, because at last himself an object of popular hatred; and that in his last days, even his own family paid none of the last testimonials of respect to his memory.

It is a mournful and melancholy prospect to contemplate your relation as a man, as a Christian; to imagine what benefit you might have conferred by an honorable direction of the same zeal that has occasioned so much wretchedness. Where will you find those heart-felt consolations that arise from a well-spent life devoted to purposes of mercy and charity? When will you gather up those affectionate recollections that spring from kind associations in the very constitution of social life; the thousand nameless influences that God, in his benevolent Providence, has sent to mitigate human woes? Such can never be your consolations in the retrospect of life. In the bitterness of your soul you will rather exclaim:

'Nay then, farewell!
I have touch'd the highest point of all my greatness;
And, from that full meridian of my glory,
I haste now to my setting: I shall fall
Like a bright exhalation in the evening,
And no man see me more.'

Such is the course, the prospect, the end of a dishonorable life! You have been to the moral world, what a destructive tempest, a destroying fire, or a desolating pestilence is to the natural world. Wonder not, therefore, to find yourself a living monument, that 'the mystery of iniquity doth already work.'

I am, Sir, yours,

FENELON.

REVIEW

Of the Rev. Mr. Furguson's Letters to the Rev. Moses Thacher, Pastor of the North Church of Wrentham.

Mr. Furguson is an antimason, but no less esteemed by Masons on that account; he is opposed to exclusion merely for difference of sentiment; he is willing to admit the principles of 'freedom of opinions' on civil and religious subjects in their full extent, making up his own judgment of men and Masons by their deeds and conduct in life. He is not therefore a political antimason. It has been heretofore stated that 'freedom of opinions' is the basis of all civil and religious liberty. While the mind is restrained by fear, or by any impediment to its researches, it can make no advancement in political nor religious science. 'Freedom of opinions' is the basis of all civil and religious institutions. We have noticed the effects of Mr. Thacher's exclusive principle on the public mind; and the disorders produced in his own parish by its baneful operation. Were it possible to effect the like operations throughout the state, that DESIRABLE CONFUSION which has been anticipated by Mr. Thacher, might be brought into action. Or, did he, in his intemperate zeal, expect to compel the honorable Senate to adopt his proposed measures, when he exclaimed 'If civil war be necessary, let it come, I fear no civil war?' To Mr. Furguson's objections to Masonry, we have heretofore replied, in such a manner as we hope, may prove satisfactory. Upon those particular points we might have enlarged, but, it has been our main object to give, not so much our own ideas upon the subject of his letters, as to place before our readers the substance of those valuable letters themselves.

Mr. Furguson's fifth letter is mostly occupied in exposing Mr. Thacher's tyrannical conduct relative to his church; and more especially his supercilious treatment of the respectable ecclesiastical council convened by the church, at the instance of a persecuted brother to advise a settlement of difficulties, occasioned by the persecuting spirit of the pastor against Masons, particularly against Masonic members of his church, whom, he would have compelled to renounce the institution, as he had previously.

In this letter, Mr. Furguson alludes to certain principles of discipline recommended by his brother Thacher, for the adoption of ministers and churches against Masons, wherein the proposed exclusive tyrannical principles are met and treated by suitable corrective observations. In addition to most conclusive arguments, he does not neglect to treat his brother with a due share of appropriate and well timed satire. Mr. Thacher's published false statement of the doings of the ecclesiastical council, Mr. Furguson also brings to view with a degree of pungency, which, it might seem, would produce salutary effects, upon every man, whose sensibilities had not been previously blasted by repeated infractions of moral obligations.

It might appear, at first sight, that this letter, relative to Mr. Thacher and his church, would not be very interesting to people generally, nor Masons: but, as the whole of Mr. Thacher's statement with his misrepresentations of the doings of the council are before the world; an antidote to evils produced by malicious falsehood is both important and necessary.

'When the Rev. Dr. Hopkins had convinced himself, and had labored to convince his people, that the Slave Trade was, in all its parts, opposed to the spirit of the Gospel, he brought forward a proposition in his church, that they should resolve, 'no longer to tolerate an evil so momentous, within their pale.' To that proposition, only one member made any objection. He was the owner of a number of slaves, and could not be made to see, that dealing in slaves was inconsistent with the profession of Christianity. He was in other respects a good man, an officer in the church, and the Doctor's proposition lay upon the table undecided for several years, until at length the good deacon was gained, and the church acted together.

er. I fear that your Antimasonic zeal is not directed by similar wisdom.

In the paper of which you are the avowed Editor, I have for some time past had my attention directed to certain steps of discipline which you have repeatedly recommended for the adoption of our churches, and which to me appear rather wild, when contrasted with the wisdom and moderation exhibited by Dr. Hopkins. The propositions to which I allude come to us in the form of charges and specifications, and are admirably adapted for the immediate use of any zealous brother, who may be disposed to commence a progress of discipline with such members of his church as have not already renounced Masonry. I have not time, nor is it necessary to examine those charges and specifications particularly. But you propose, first, to prove—by the testimony of such persons as yourself, what Masonry is; secondly, that the brethren on trial are Masons; and thirdly, to call on our churches to judge the persons on trial by the testimony adduced.

Now there are in all, or in many of our churches members, who although they belong to the Masonic institution, profess to know nothing about Masonry, such as you have revealed it, and their whole life bears testimony, that in all their intercourse with the church and with the world, they have always acted on principles diametrically opposite to those which you call Masonic. If Masonry is what you have represented, they are not, and never have been Masons; and the moment you can convince them that Masonry is what you have represented, they will stand forth with you in opposition to it. And yet our churches are to be called upon to discipline these members, for crimes which they detest and abhor; and they must acknowledge that their view of Masonry is such as you have represented, or be excommunicated. Now if this is not Salem Witchcraft in all its mad enthusiasm, I confess, I am not initiated.

In the application of your avowed principles of church discipline, in respect to Masonry, I have been for some time anticipating a Masonic trial of some of the members of the church committed to your charge. The storm has at length burst forth; but I confess not exactly in the way which I had anticipated. A member of the church, long a particular friend and an admirer of yourself, has been arraigned before the church on three distinct charges. By the first, it was purposed to make him accountable for all the facts contained in a publication of the Lodge, of which you had been a member, and to which he had affixed his name, as their Clerk. Somewhat adroitly, he escaped this charge, by showing, that he was not accountable for the facts contained in that publication, but only for the fact that the publication was a true copy from the records of the Lodge. The third charge had respect to his treatment of the church, and the moderator, in a public meeting of the church. This charge was acknowledged, and forgiven. The second charge had respect to a conversation with yourself in presence of your family some eighteen months previous, in which he had stated, that in a certain publication on Masonry, ascribed to you, you had advocated Atheism and Deism. Of this last charge he was convicted by the church. The church did not determine, or attempt to define the crime. They had simply voted, that the charge was sustained. In this stage of the investigation the whole matter, at the request of the brother on trial, was referred to a mutual council. Against the sitting of that council, you entered a protest, on the ground that, in that particular case, there was no need of council. I confess that I was surprised at the reading of that protest. I was surprised that you objected against the sitting of the council, because I had received from you the first intimation of a council being chosen, and I understood you to express a desire that I should attend. I was also surprised at the ground on which you objected to the sitting of council. It amounted, so far as I can remember, to this, that although the council was just such as you should yourself have chosen, and although councils might sometimes be necessary, yet in the present case there was no need of council. Now I thought, that the brother on trial had certain rights which he had vested in that council. He had committed, with the consent of the church, his cause to them. And I thought it was somewhat presuming for you, and a minority of the church to say, he had no need of council. I thought, if you had been the person on trial, you might have judged and acted differently. But what my feelings were is of small moment. On the ground specified in that protest, you declined any further acknowledgment of the council.

The doings of that council have met your severe reprobation. The Rev. Mr. Fisk, one of its prominent members, has been alluded to in your published statement by name; and to others of the Council you have ascribed a large share of Masonic influence. I am not the organ of that Council, and with its result I have as little sympathy, as with the Masonic institution. But I do not believe you have any cause to ascribe the result of that Council to Masonic influence, or to arraign the motives of brother Fisk, for his conduct in the Council. You will, therefore, bear with me, while I attempt to give my own views of its transactions.

After the public hearing, and when the Council had retired for deliberation, brother Fisk offered for adoption the following principle, 'That no charge against an offender is a proper subject of discipline, unless in view of the charge, the church would be justified in proceeding ultimately to excommunication.' Whether Mr. Fisk is chargeable with wrong motives, in offering this first principle for the guidance of the council, I do not know. I am certain, it is not a new principle; I believe it has always been recognized in the churches of our association, and I believe further, that it is the only guide which can carry our churches through the intricacies of church discipline. Whether such a belief, on my part, is evidence of Masonic influence, I cannot determine; but I am certain that such was my opinion long before you became a Mason. Had the council adopted the rule proposed by Mr. Fisk, it is probable, they would have advised the church to dismiss the complaint, on the ground, that allowing it to be true, it did not warrant the church in proceeding to excommunication. This I offer as my opinion merely; for although I should be far from attempting to justify such language towards a Pastor, or any other person, without cause, yet, under all the circumstances, I do not see how they could have resulted differently. There was not the least evidence, that it was the intention of the arraigned brother to accuse you of either Atheism or Deism, as what he said was only the expression of an opinion, that the same arguments, which you had urged against Masonry were equally good against both natural and revealed religion. And although there was no foundation even for this opinion, yet, to me, it would seem wrong to excommunicate a member for an opinion expressed in conversation, so long as there was nothing but argument intended. You will perhaps ask, how I know that there was nothing but argument intended. I answer, I know from the testimony of your friends, and from personal observation, that you and that brother were in habits of intimacy and of frequent argument. It was also in evidence before the council, that your intimacy was not interrupted, and no serious offence at the time taken, by that conversation. But to dismiss my conjectures and return to the council. The Council refused to adopt the motion of brother Fisk. Against it, it was contended by one brother (not certainly under Masonic influence) that Mr. Fisk was determined to fix a net with meshes so large, that the fish would escape; but for his part he was determined the fish should be caught. By another brother it was contended, that a church-member might be disciplined for a very small offence, and be excommunicated, not for the original offence, but for the spirit manifested while under the dealing of the church,—a kind of accumulative treason, by the way, which would consign you, or any other church member to excommunication, for the merest trifle. This, however, was the bottom on which the council embarked;—Whereupon they voted,

First, that the decision of the church was sustained.

Second that the manner or spirit manifested by the offender could not be considered, because it was not specified in the indictment. And,

Third, That the offending brother should be restored, on expressing his sorrow, that the church and the Rev. Mr. Thacher were grieved by what he had said.

I have thus attempted to give a synopsis of the doings of Council, not for the purpose of passing censure, or attempting a justification. In my opinion they ran ashore, when they rejected Mr. Fisk's first motion; but I am not their organ, and I have little personal feeling on the subject. There is one thing, however, of which you may be assured, it was not Masonic influence, which quashed the original motion of Mr. Fisk. Indeed, I do not know that there was a single Mason on the Council; I do not know, that there were some thorough going Antimasons. I hope, however, that the Council in general, were men, who, although opposed to Masonry, were disposed to judge of Masons, as they would of other men, by their works. If, in your strictures upon that Council, you mean to complain, that they would not try an offender for one crime, and condemn him, for another; or, in other words, if the amount of the arraigned brother's sinning was Masonry, you certainly have cause to complain; for the Council did not perform the part, which you would have assigned them. But if you complain, that their result was inconsistent with itself, and therefore defective, I answer it was equally consistent as the principles adopted for their guidance; and on the whole more favorable to the complainant, than I could have anticipated.

Aside from the result of Council, you have, in your printed statement, grievously complained of remarks made in committee of the whole, (as you are pleased to term it) upon a document laid before the Council, by certain members of the church. Upon all that has been stated respecting that document, and the notice taken of it by the Council, I have been led to ask myself whether I was there. Certainly, if you have not been more faithful in representing the interior of the Lodge, than in your representation of the private deliberations of the Council, there may yet be hope for Masonry; for the Council has been grossly misrepresented.

A letter was communicated to the Moderator, signed by certain members of your church, requesting to know whether the Council, as such, or in their individual capacity, could consistently advise them as to their duty in existing circumstances? What those circumstances were, or what advice they wanted, was not stated in their communication, nor did the Council ever receive from them or from individuals, any explanation of that letter. It was stated by Mr. Long, perhaps more than once, but in an affectionate and mild manner, that he believed your dismissal from the people of North Wrentham was necessary; but still, as the business for which we were convened, was not to act in reference to Mr. Thacher, we had better not have anything to do with that communication. And accordingly it was returned, without comment, to the brethren by whom it was presented.

There were other remarks made in the Council, or, if you please, in Committee of the whole, upon the general subject of Masonry and Antimasonry, so far as they effected the world at large, and the people in North Wrentham in particular. They were made during a recess of the Council, when we supposed we were at liberty to say what we pleased; and perhaps, if we had been favored with a little of your instruction upon the laws, by which deliberative assemblies are to be governed, he might have been more particular. But if you will allow me to make confession, I believe I was in all that was said, if it was a crime, the most criminal. If therefore, I may make confession, I did state 'to the Committee of the whole,' that, regarding Mr. Thacher merely as he stood connected with Antimasonry, I considered his stand before the world, as very exalted; but that, when I regarded him as connected with the church and people in North Wrentham, and bound by covenant to consult their good, and to act in reference to their welfare, as paramount to every other consideration, I did lament, that he had not released himself from the one, before he had attempted to devote himself to the other. If these remarks were wrong in principle, I am still wrong; for I do lament, for your sake, and for the sake of the cause in which you are engaged, that you did not leave North Wrentham.

You have also complained of the Council, because they acted ex-parte, and heard ex-parte evidence. But if the Council became ex-parte, how did it become so? After you had read your protest, did you not refuse to acknowledge the Council? Did you not plead your own conscientious scruples, as a reason for refusing to testify to the facts, to be examined by the Council? And in consequence of your refusing to testify, in common with the other members of your family, were not the Council obliged to receive the records of the church, and the testimony of the defendant, as evidence by which they were to be guided, —or to dissolve? You will perhaps say, they ought to have dissolved. But I then said, and I now think, it would have been a very bad precedent, for the Council to allow you to plead conscience at the expense of your brother's right. I thought, if you were so scrupulous as to leave the Council in the dark, because you would not give them light; you, not they, nor yet the brother on trial, ought to endure the consequences.

One remark more, and I have done with that Council. You complain of certain statements made by Mr. Fisk respecting Mr. Cook, and the number of Universalists who had returned to your Parish, in consequence of your renouncing Freemasonry. Perhaps Mr. Fisk did say, that he had claims upon that Council, and that these Universalists had returned to your Parish, for the reasons specified in your statement. I did not however, notice any remarks amounting to what you have alledged. If they were made, they have escaped my memory. It was stated by a good brother, living in the near neighborhood, a member of the Council, and a zealous Antimason, that your people were very much united; that there was no division in the parish respecting you; and none anywhere, except from a few Masons. Now I did wonder at this statement, and I expressed my wonder. I knew there had been opposition in your parish, and I asked, on what basis you had all become united. I knew that the men, who had signed that letter to which you have referred, formed the majority of the acting members of your church. I knew that they had been highly esteemed for their piety and Orthodoxy, and I reprobated the idea of representing or regarding them merely as a few discontented Masons. To my remarks, I know that brother Fisk assented fully; but if the manner specified in your publication, I confess, I did not so receive the impression.

[To be concluded in our next.]

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

SCIENTIFIC AMUSEMENTS.

1. Place on a table an empty bowl, in the bottom of which lay a piece of silver—say a half dollar; step back until the half dollar is fairly out of sight; then let some one fill the bowl with clear water, and the silver will be distinctly seen where you stand, and will appear to rest on the surface of the water. The reason of this is desired.
2. Thoroughly wet a common sewing thread in strong salt and water, tie to one end a button of ordinary size, and suspend the thread by the other end to a nail—now set the thread on fire (being previously dried) at the lower end, and it will burn to ashes, but will still remain whole, and will still support the weight of the button. An explanation is desired.
3. A petty experiment may be made in the following manner; put into a phial any quantity of good Aqua-fortis, into which cast half its weight of Quicksilver, place the phial in a window between you and the light; a beautiful process will be exhibited in the action of the first upon the second body. When this operation ceases, apply the liquid in the phial with a brush or rag, to the surface of a Cent, or any other body of copper, and it will immediately assume the appearance and brightness of new silver.
4. The lengths of pendulums are to one another as the squares of the number of vibrations: a pendulum 39 1-8 inches long vibrates 60 times in a minute; what must be the length of a pendulum that will vibrate 4 times in a second, and what the length of one that will vibrate 30 times in a minute?

5. Cover a wine glass completely filled with water, with a piece of writing paper: then place the palm of your hand over the paper, so as to hold it tight and accurately even. The glass may then be turned upside down and the hand removed, without the water running out. The cause is required.

CARBONIC ACID GAS.

Champaigne, Perry, cider, ale, &c, owe their peculiar characters to the presence of carbonic acid gas. Hence they sparkle when poured out, or a few drops of acid are added. It is found in some mineral springs. In or near Exeter, England, it is abundant, but the Seltzer water of Germany affords the most direct evidence of this kind. An artificial imitation of it we have in what is called 'soda water,' wherein the water is, by a condensing engine, made to take up several atmospheres of carbonic acid gas. This gas is fatal to combustion and to animal life, and is the 'choke damp' of the miner. It is also found in caverns, wells and mines, as well as cellars and vaults long excluded from air. It is the product of respiration, common combustion, nocturnal vegetation and fermentation. Hence crowded rooms are extremely noxious, and when this is conjoined with the combustion of gas, oil, wax, &c, the amount of deterioration is tremendous, and utterly destructive to the healthy functions of the lungs—the theatre and the ball room afford examples, and in these altitude will determine a specific ratio, for the boxes in the former are more insalubrious than the pit, and the galleries than either. Not long ago, the atmosphere of one of the Parisian theatres was analyzed, and the deterioration, compared with the air without, proved to be such, that it is astonishing how the animal functions could hold out against the siege: this is increased manifold by the increase of perfumes; which, though some may be able to withstand, yet others may succumb under; and we are much mistaken if the lungs will, in any case, play freely and healthily in a cearment of aromatic air, though fable tells us birds of paradise may breathe it among the spice islands.—Murray.

The following are among the premiums for the present year, published in the Journal of the Franklin Institute.

1. To the person who shall manufacture in the United States, the greatest quantity of iron from ore, during the year ending September 1, 1831, using no other fuel than anthracite, the quantity not to be less than twenty tons.—A Gold Medal.
2. To the person who shall manufacture in the United States the greatest quantity of Iron from the ore, during the year ending September 1, 1831, using no other fuel than the bituminous coal; the quantity to be not less than twenty tons.—A Gold Medal.
3. To the person who shall invent the best grate or stove for the consumption of anthracite in cooking and other domestic purposes in small families, one hundred dollars, and—A Silver Medal.
The grate or stove must be better than any now in use. Its price must be under fifteen dollars, and the maker must obligate himself to furnish any required number (not exceeding fifty) at the price and of equal quality. No grate or stove shall be received for competition, in which the fumes resulting from the combustion of the anthracite are brought into contact with the food to be cooked.
4. To the person who shall invent the best grate or stove for purposes similar to the preceding, but applicable for large families, hotels, &c.—A Silver Medal.
The conditions to be the same as in the above, except that the price is not limited, but the cost for which it can be made will be taken into consideration in determining the merit of the claims presented.

SKETCHES OF CHARACTER.

DANTE.

Dante Alighieri was born in 1292 of a noble family of Florence at a time when the rival factions of the Guelphs and Ghibellines made that city a prey of carnage and civil war. He joined the party and shared the fate of the former; was driven from his native city, and lived for many years a life of exile, want and danger. Receiving no aid from those whose cause he espoused so unhesitatingly, he went over at last, either from revenge or despair, to the opposite party. He never however, revisited the city which his talents were to immortalize, but his sufferings to disgrace for ever. He closed a life of trouble and sorrow in a foreign land, and yet sleeps,

'Like Scipio, buried by the upbraiding shore.'

There was much in the events of his life, and the situation of his country, to stir up all the bitterness of his naturally gloomy spirit. He saw his beloved Florence the prey of foreign violence and domestic treachery: sold by her children, plundered and trampled on by her friends. He himself was a victim, whose fortune and hopes had been blasted by the same pestilence which destroyed her honor and happiness. He had lost a rank and independent fortune. He had been the victim of injustice and insult, the sport of hazard, the prey of misery. Reduced to seek shelter with the enemies he hated and despised, he had felt, as he says himself,

'How salt the savor is of others' bread,
How hard the passage to descend and climb
By others' stairs.

No wonder, then, that we see at every line the workings of just and implacable resentment, proud and honest sorrow, wounded yet faithful patriotism; no wonder that his wrongs and sufferings have given the same dark tinge to his writings which they shed over his life and temper.

His style is generally hard and rough; obscure sometimes from his abrupt energy; often from the metaphysical speculation into which he wanders, and oftener still from the local illusions with which his works are crowded. His are not the light touches of his pencil dipped in the rainbow; he is rather one who would write on marble, who strikes with rude strength, and whose blows sink deep. His works wear the gloomy coloring of his mind. He was a grave, lofty, reflective spirit, hardened by adversity, and embittered by suffering, hence there is little glow of poetic fervor, little play of the sportive imagination about him. But when the frown his face generally wears does relax, the smile that lights it up is doubly brilliant from the contrast; and when his genius does flash forth from the gloom in which it loves to shroud itself, it has the brightness of the lightning breaking the darkness of the storm. Hence when he interrupts his plain narrative for some episode of pathos or power, the effect is inconceivably beautiful; in particular, we may instance the story of Francesca di Rimini, one of the most affecting tales of guilty, yet delicate and tender love, that ever was clothed in verse; and the darker yet still more masterly piece, of the death of Count Ugolino and his sons by famine. In this last episode there is no load of ornament, no exaggeration of superlatives. It is a plain tale of intense suffering and mortal agony; but all the horrors of the diseased imagination, all the nightmare dreams of German mysticisms, never came up to its simple, appalling reality.

No man ever exercised so great, so honorable, and so extensive a literary influence as Dante.—Homer died without having instructed the ignorance or aroused the emulation of his countrymen; Virgil shone but a single star in a bright and thickly set constellation. But Dante found the Italians illiterate, and left them aroused and enlightened, and substituted strength and confidence for the helpless weakness of their minds; hence his popularity is one of the proudest that any poet ever enjoyed. The natural beauty of Shakespeare is unintelligible & displeasing to the artificial taste of other countries; and Milton soars beyond the reach of their short-sighted gaze. The very names of our poets are unknown to the foreign critic. But the sweetness and melody of the Italian language, which make it every where the chosen vehicle of music, introduce a knowledge of the riches of its literature as well as the graces of its harmony; and Dante, like Homer, is appreciated and admired, where the noblest flights of the English muse would be pursued by the carplings of petty criticisms. Abroad even national prejudice does not deny him the highest honors; at home his popularity amounts almost to idolatry. His works are studied as a branch of education, and the explanation of them has risen almost to the rank of a science. The beauty of his style, the grandeur of his conceptions, the living accuracy of his pictures, these the Italians admire; repeat and consecrate as the richest legacy of one generation to another. These are only claims on their respect, but he is entitled to and receives the further tribute of gratitude. Their love and boasted language is his gift. His strong creative mind brought together its scattered atoms, and united in that fabric of beautiful strength and harmonious proportion, of which he is at once the architect and the noblest ornament. From his works, too, they draw the purest and noblest lessons of patriotism, and learn to cast off sectional jealousies, and glory in the name of that common country which he loved, forgave, and lamented.

THE CASKET.

[From the Horn of the Green Mountains.]

The fate of the accomplished but unfortunate Mary Stewart,—the awful visitation her venial errors received from the inexorable Elizabeth, are familiar to all. Those, who like myself, have ever read with a deep interest, the melancholy story of that unhappy princess, the misguided victim of crime rather than the perpetrator, the sinned against rather than the sinning; whose misfortune it was to be too beautiful, too susceptible of tender impressions,—will feel all the touching pathos and sweetness of the following effusion.—It may not however be amiss to state that it was a surpassing skill in music that commended Rizzio to the notice of 'Royal Mary.' She loved Darnley, her first husband, with all the intense idolatry of woman;—utterly incapable of appreciating such devotion, basely disloyal to his Sovereign, meanly false to his beautiful bride, he flung away, as if 'twere a bauble, the noble heart that with queen-like munificence had lavished upon him its richest and finest feelings! Cruelly deceived where most she had trusted, disappointment poured its burning fires over the soul! Slighted and scorned by the very man upon whom with her own hand she had bestowed the dowry of a crown, an oppressive loneliness crept over the heart that once leaped exultingly at his approach. Her affections bereft of the only legitimate object around which they might fasten and luxuriate, one by one 'fold their broken wings within the soul.'

The heart's rich music is no more.

The exuberant spirit once responsive to every joy, once tremblingly alive to the soft and delicate whispers of love, is broken, tuneless and irresponsible now to all save Rizzio's harp. When his hand wanders over the strings, a chord of early memory is touched, a deep fund of buried tenderness is moved, the fire and feelings of other years kindle in the again bright and laughing eye, and the Monarch Queen under the powerful spell of music, revisits 'her happy France,' the pride and delight and Sovereign of every chivalrous heart. It was such excusable circumstances that made The Favorite. But unmindful of these, the iron souled Barons, envious of the favors bestowed perhaps by a partial mistress, on a concerted day, slew the inoffensive Italian in the very presence, and despite the tears and entreaties of Scotland's Queen.

DAVID RIZZIO.

A little harp with music strung,
And breathed upon when she done it,
In Royal Mary's bosom hung,
And Rizzio performed upon it.

Its chords were tuneful all, yet still
One string did sweetest notes afford;
The harp was tuned by David's skill,
And David's finger new the chord.

But when with rougher, fiercer stroke,
A jealous hand in angry plight
Pass'd o'er the harp—that chord it broke,
And every string was withered quito.

POPULAR TALES.

THE BUCCANEER.

Inured to danger's direst form,
Tornado, and earthquake, flood and storm,
Death had he seen, by sudden blow,
By wasting plague, by tortures slow,
By mine or breach, by steel or ball,
Knew all his shapes, and scorned them all.

W. SCOTT.

[This tale, which is founded on fact, is from the forthcoming volume entitled Sketches and Scenes of Sea Life, by an American Naval Officer.]

The grey mist was gradually dispersing from off the point of Cape San Antonio, when a British cruiser was seen laying off and on under easy sail, awaiting the sun's dispelling force to clear up the fog off this low land. Her intention was evidently to search strictly this den of piracy and murder, as she had been there all night, using every precaution to elude observation, by extinguishing all lights except her binnacle, which was snugly enveloped by a hood of canvass, to prevent its feeble rays illuminating her position or betraying themselves to the wretched they were in search of.

'Mast head there,' said the officer of the deck—who was a mate, with a short tin japanned speaking trumpet in his hand, much scratched and decorated with sea emblems, such as foul anchors, &c. &c. the work no doubt of an idle hour so often occurring to a deck officer in these hot climes,) 'can you see the vessel round the cape yet?' 'Yes sir, yes!' was the reply. 'Then how does she bear?' 'About three points under our lee!' 'Very well, come down from aloft, and lend a hand to work ship.'

This cruiser, was a British vessel; her rig was that of a cutter, and her name the Grecian; her force, was four guns, and her crew consisted of forty men and officers—all told. The Buccaneer of modern days, or rather Pirate, then in sight and at anchor, was the celebrated Sarragosiana, a large topsail schooner, mounting one long heavy pivot-gun, with a crew of ninety of the most cruel and determined murderers that the records of piracy contain any account of. She had long waged a war of extermination on the traders of these seas, and in some cases had even exchanged shots with cruisers, and put them at defiance by her almost supernatural speed. The Grecian, her antagonist, was, on the contrary, rather a dull sailer, and it was only in the continuance of the then existing calm, any hope of capturing this formidable freebooter seemed probable.

'All hands shorten sail, ahoy!' resounded from the throats of a rough honest boatswain and his mate—and the sails of the cutter were quickly brailed up and hauled down. 'Get out the sweeps, and run in the gun clear for sweeping; hurry, and get grummets on!'

The order was obeyed with alacrity, and ere the land was clear of the morning's misty veil, the cutter moved at a rapid rate, propelled by the cheering efforts of as lively a crew as e'er graced the decks of a man of war.

'Give way, my bullies, and we'll get the fox out of his hole before breakfast—and give Gallows point such a decoration it has never had!—Give way and they are ours;' exclaimed the commander, encouraging the exertions of his men.—'Mind your helm and keep her N. E.,—that will run us clear of the Cape's shoals sir,' said the Captain to his executive officer; 'Ay, ay, sir.'

By this time the sun was out, and the fog broke and scattered itself in small columns around the undergrowth of the Cape and edge of the horizon, rendering plainly visible the object of their search—the daring Sarragosiana—then deliberately weighing her anchor, and with part of her men aloft casting loose her sails. The spot she chose for her temporary harbor was a small nook or bay, so hemmed in by shoals that the only outlet was through the narrow channel the Grecian was then entering, so that no probability existed of her getting away from these hardy Britons.

'Unbeckt your grummets—lay in your sweeps, and run out your guns,' cried the officer.—'And pipe to quarters, Mr. Catharpin.' The order was obeyed, and the men mustered at their respective guns.

'Lay off your aprons and out tompions—ram home a grist of grape extra for those fellows, they like forced meat balls better than cold rolls—prick your cartridges—prime—cock your locks—stand by! handle your matches—are they lit?'—'Yes, sir.'—'Then mind, when the order is given to fire, you apply them—I don't like to trust to a flint,'—'Ay, ay, sir.'

By this time the vessels were fast closing, the pirate having got completely under weigh with the foresail hanging in the brails, so as to fight their Long Tom. The Grecian hoisted her jib and hauled out her mainsail, which brailed up (in the place of lowering like most sloops) and was laying off and on the mouth of this channel, waiting her antagonist, whose intentions bespoke contempt of her and her preventive powers,

'Hoist our colors, sir,' said the English Commander, 'and give her a gun across the fore-foot, she may be a Spanish cruiser.'

'Ay, ay, sir,' and the weather-bow gun rung a wide revellie on the placid sea, while the shot hissing and tapping the waters, dashed the briny wave as it struck under the Pirate's bow, on her deck in glittering spray. The wind from the N. and E. had now commenced—and first favoring the Pirates, she luffed, and brought the Long Tom to bear on the Grecian. A bright flash, a crash—and the Pirate's iron messengers of death preceded the loud report of their thirty-two, for such was their guns' calibre, and cut away the jib-stay, and crippled the mast-head of the cutter.

'Ready? ready? All ready, sir?' 'Fire!' And British sailors taught the bold outlaws, they ever knew how to return such marine civilities. A 'carrizo' was heard, and she fired again, and slew some four poor fellows on the Grecian's deck, and wounded several others.

'Load and fire, my lads, briskly, give her marines a touch of musketry,' exclaimed the Captain, and the battle waxed close and warm.

'Mr. Catharpin,' said the sailing master, get a runner on the end of the fore-stay, and bouse it up for the present; sail-trimmers haul in that main-sheet and drop the peak of the mainsail,' which was soon done, and the men ordered to their guns again.

'Give her language, my lads!—ay, ay!'—'Bravely done, cheer, hurrah,' shouted the British tars, as the foremast of the pirate, tottering, fell over the bows, declared they had them at their mercy.

For a moment or so a death-like stillness prevailed on either side, and a crowd of men on the schooner's decks, with hatchets, cutting away the rigging that held the wreck of the fore-mast alongside, showing they were getting it clear of their long gun for further purposes.

A good aim my livelies, among those red shirts—ready, fire,'—and the Grecian's last broadside carried death to at least twenty of these desperadoes, of whose bodies some in agony were hurled on the water, dying it with their blood; and others dropped lifeless across the head rails, with their hands hanging down like senders over her brows:—this was the home thrust of the Grecian's success. The pirates propelled sideways by the sea breeze, fell along side of the Grecian, and the Britons, headed by their officers and captains, boarded this common enemy. The pirates fought, and owing to their still superior numbers, forced the brave tars of old England back to their vessel, leaving some eight or ten wounded and dead of their numbers on the Pirate's deck.

'Rally, boys, rally—at it again. And they re-boarded the pirates, who now gave way. 'Down you son of a——, kill him;' resounded from tar to tar as they hacked and hewed their way through the motley groups of their antagonist's crew.

On one side of the deck lay a British sailor with his head cleft by a sabre, struggling with a wounded pirate, whose wrist he held, whilst with his belt-knife, dull, and his strength almost gone, he sawed its blunt edge across the pirate's throat—and the severed arteries spirted their crimson stream in streaks over this sailor's arm. At last victory was given to the just, and the surviving twenty-five, on bended knees and earnest supplication were granted quarters by their conquerors, whose force was less than their own, having lost fifteen killed, and many wounded, in this sanguinary encounter.

'Where is your Captain,'—'Esta aqui' said several pointing to a thick set man who lay dead across the breach of the long gun. 'Este es el Capitan que fue Senior,' cried all of the pirates;—he was no doubt a brave fellow in a bad cause, and on the waistband of his duck trowsers was written Mitchell; but no farther could they glean of their prisoners, who, after they had confined them in irons, and buried their dead, as well as their own, they secured their fore-stay and rove fresh gear, took her in tow and proceeded on to Jamaica with the largest pirate prize that had been captured for many years in those seas. The twenty-five prisoners were condemned and executed on Gallows Point, Old Port Royal—And never since has the world been troubled with the bloody detail of the Pirate or Buccaneer Mitchell. The action lasted for one hour and a half—the greater part of the time within pistol shot.

LIFE LINE.

ANECDOTES.

CONSIDERATION.—A couple of young people, living near the Potomac, having some notion to try matrimonial life, the young man being diffident and slow in conversation about the matter, the young lady grew impatient, and to bring the business to a close, demanded a more explicit avowal on the part of her lover in the following terms: 'Frank, if you intend to marry me, I wish to know it, so that I may make preparation.' A long pause ensued, at length Frank broke silence, and exclaimed: 'No meat, no corn, and fishing time almost over! Good Lord, Nelly, I can't.'

ANECDOTE.—A lady requested a friend of ours to tell her to what order of natural history man was usually assigned. He of course answered her philosophically, and desired her to give him woman's location. 'Oh,' said she with a smile, 'man embraces woman.'

A WONDERFUL CAPACITY.—A store keeper, rather remarkable for the care he took of number one, was once boasting in the presence of a customer, 'that he could secure a quarter of a pound of tea, in a smaller piece of paper than any other man in the Seven States.' 'Yes,' said Zedekiah Dryasdust, who chanced to hear the observation, 'and you'll put a pint of rum in a smaller bottle, than any other man that ever I see, any way!'

[Pawtucket Chronicle.]

AN INDOSITY. A medical man who had just returned from setting the broken leg of an Arab, gave the following anecdote:—'The patient,' said the doctor, complained more of the accident which had befallen him than I thought becoming one of his tribe. 'This I remarked to him, and his answer, was truly amusing. 'Do not think, doctor, I should have uttered one word of complaint if my own high bred colt, in a playful kick, had broke both my legs; but to have a bone broken by a brute of a jackass, is too bad and I will complain.'

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 23, 1831.

CIVIL ARCHITECTURE: or a Complete Theoretical and Practical System of Building. Containing the fundamental principles of the art, with five orders of Architecture. Also, a great variety of examples, selected from Vitruvius, Stuart, Chambers, and Nicholson; with many useful and elegant ornaments, and rules for projecting them. By Edward Shaw, Architect. Illustrated with ninety-five copperplate engravings. Boston: Published by Lincoln & Edmunds. 1831.

In this work, says the compiler, is given whatever the experience of the most judicious professors has sanctioned, as the best mode of effecting their professional purposes; with the reasons on which that preference is founded.—To this are added examples both of Grecian and Roman antiquities, and remarks on the beauties of each. Particular attention is paid to the theory of Shadows, both from direct and reflected light, and examples adduced of the relative degrees of light and shade, on different surfaces, variously inclined to the luminary and the eye. Also, a select set of problems are drawn from Nicholson's writings, entirely new, and all intimately connected with the subject in hand. They are disposed in methodical order, and are preceded by the necessary definitions. Particular attention has been paid to Ellipses and Curves; the problems relating to which will be found particularly useful in describing elliptical and Gothic arches; finding their joints, and describing mouldings of every degree of curvature under various circumstances, with Conic Sections.

Of the intrinsic merits and practical utility of the work, the experienced architect is, perhaps, the only proper judge. An opinion from us on its adaptation to practical purposes, may be of very little importance. The body of the work is compiled from the writings of authors of acknowledged talent and architectural skill; whose laborious productions have been critically tested and approved by the scientific of Europe and America; but they have appeared in such cumbrous form as to preclude the possibility of their ever becoming, in their original state, useful to the great body of practical mechanics; whose means are generally more limited than their desires for the acquirement of useful theoretical and practical knowledge; the taunts and jeers of the proud patrician to the contrary notwithstanding. To obviate this important difficulty—to remove this great barrier to the intellectual improvement of this numerous, important and respectable class of community, has been the primary and commendable design of the compiler of the work under consideration. 'If I have made a judicious arrangement of the several subjects,' he remarks, 'I have accomplished all I anticipated.' And if he has done this, he has accomplished that which, if properly improved, will at least raise that portion of his fellow 'workingmen,' to whose pursuits his book is more particularly adapted, much higher on the scale of intellectual gradation than they have heretofore, not from the want of mind or disposition, but from the want of means, been able to attain. We entertain no doubt that in this respect he has been eminently successful.

The 'INTRODUCTION,' unlike most papers of its class, combines interest with instruction in a pre-eminent degree. The reader who passes it over without giving to it an attentive perusal, deprives himself of a most interesting and profitable entertainment. This arrangement is very happy. It commences with the definition of the term Architecture, originally derived from the Greek language, in which it signifies the principal handicraft, or mechanical operation, 'an expression very applicable to the construction of habitations for civilized men.' The history of the science, for such it is, from rudeness to refinement, as related by Vitruvius, follows. The arrangement of the different orders, according to the nations by whom, or the country in which, they were originally employed, is next considered. The Greeks employed only the Doric, the Ionic, and the Corinthian; the Tuscan and Composite were used only in Italy; the one more rude and the other more ornamented than the Greek orders, which occupied a middle rank.—The student should more particularly confine himself to the three Greek orders; not only because in them the principles of architecture are the most displayed, but because of all the monuments of antiquity which have successfully resisted the ravages of time, few, or perhaps none, can be pointed out in which the Roman or Italic mode of construction is certainly to be traced. The historical and explanatory remarks on these different orders; and the accompanying definitions of such architectural terms as are employed in a peculiar sense, render it important that this portion of the work should receive the particular attention of the learner. Under this head we likewise find introduced some valuable 'general observations on the construction of houses,' in the study of which a few hours may be profitably employed. One very general fault, to which many of our architects are strangely addicted, is here briefly adverted to. It is this: 'excess of ornament is always placed in small buildings,' which is not only in bad taste, but it gives them more the air of models of other great works, than real places of abode. It was prettily observed of Chiswick-house, on the bank of the Thames, (built in imitation, but on a very small scale, of a noted structure of Palladio, in the north of Italy,) that it was too large to hang to one's watch-chain, and too small for a man to live in. The more simple the construction of cottages and small buildings, the more chaste and beautiful they will appear. The gaudy flourishes and fantastic decorations of the flirting coquette, may dazzle the eye and capture the heart of the coxcomb; but what man of sense and refinement of taste, would not sooner pay his adorations at the shrine of the modest and simply attired quakeress?

The remarks on bridges are not unimportant to mechanics generally; but to builders they possess an additional interest. The perfection of a bridge consists in its having a good foundation, that it may be durable; of an easy ascent and descent, that it may be convenient; and of a just proportion in its several parts, that it may be beautiful.—Bridges should always be placed at right angles to the course of the river, and the piers should never be thicker than is just necessary to support the structure against the force of the current. The simplest theory of the arch, supporting itself in equilibrio, is that of Dr. Hooke, the greatest of all philosophical mechanics who flourished in the latter part of the seventeenth century. The arch, when it has only its own weight to bear, may be considered as the reverse of a chain suspended freely at each end; for the chain hangs in such a form that the weight in each link is held in equilibrio by the result of the two forces acting at its extremities. Two forces or tensions are produced, the one by the weight of the portion of the chain below any particular link, the other by the same weight increased by that of the link, both of them acting originally in a vertical direction. Supposing the chain inverted so as to constitute an arch of the same form and weight, the relative situation of all the lines, indicating the direction of the forces, will remain the same, the forces acting only in contrary directions; so that they are compounded in a similar manner, and balance each other on the same conditions, but with this difference, that the equilibrium of the chain is stable, and that of the arch is tottering.—Firmness in the abutments of bridges is of vast importance. More accidents have probably occurred through want of proper attention in this particular, than from any other cause. Another essential part of the enterprise of building a bridge is to secure a good foundation. So important is this, that when practicable, it has been thought worth the while to turn the river out of its course, or to raise an enclosure round the spot where the pier is to be built, to keep out the water. This, however, can be accomplished but seldom. We mention it to show of how much importance a good foundation is regarded by scientific builders. In wooden bridges, the seasoning of the timber should be particularly attended to. The decay of fir timber is generally owing to the moist, sappy nature of its exterior surface. The bridges leading from this city, particularly Cragie's and Warren, are probably the most beautiful specimens of wooden bridges in the world; and we are more than half inclined to be angry with the compiler of the work before us, for the meagre notice he has taken of them; but in the belief that in the next edition he will supply this omission, we pass it over.

The system of Geometry, with which the work opens, is principally from the writings of Nicholson. It is as concise and simple as is compatible with a proper understanding of this interesting branch of mechanical science. The definitions are full and explicit: the diagrams numerous, and generally well executed. That branch of this science which is of more practical utility, and consequently which is here more fully treated of, is called descriptive; to which the French have devoted much of their attention; indeed, Monge is regarded as the inventor.—Descriptive geometry is employed by artists to communicate a knowledge of different objects. It furnishes the means of constructing geographical charts, plans of buildings and machines, architectural designs, sun dials, &c. It is used likewise to describe the forms and relative positions of objects. It is by this branch of geometry, that stone-cutters, carpenters, ship builders, and other artists, find the dimensions of the works which they execute, inasmuch as these dimensions admit of a rigorous definition. Geometry, in its literal sense, is that branch of mathematics which treats of the properties and extension of figure: or, as the work before us defines it, 'of the descriptions and properties of magnitudes in general.' The name is derived from a Greek word signifying the science of land measuring. Some ancient writers have supposed that it was first cultivated in Egypt, and that it has its origin from the necessity of determining every year the just share of land belonging to each proprietor, after the waters of the Nile, which annually overflowed the country, had returned to their ordinary channel. This, however, is mere conjecture. The most probable opinion is that it took its rise at the time when Sesostris intersected Egypt by canals, and divided the country among the inhabitants. This is the opinion adopted by Sir Isaac Newton. Thales of Miletus, transplanted the sciences, particularly mathematics, from Egypt into Greece. He first measured the height of the pyramids, or obelisks, by means of their shadows; the principles of which are clearly set forth and illustrated in the work before us. He also employed the principles of geometry to determine the distance of vessels from shore; and established the Ionian school, so called from his native country. The Grecians may be said to have had an idea of geometry before the time of Thales; for the discovery of the properties of a triangle is attributed to Euphorbus of Phrygia; the square and the level to Theodorus of Samos, and the compasses to the nephew of Dædalus. But Thales was the first who brought the science to any considerable degree of perfection. He first found that all angles in a semi-circle are right angles. The earliest treatise on geometry, on record, was composed by Anaximander, a pupil of his, who is said to have invented the sphere, the gnomon, geographical charts, and sundials; and Anaxagoras, a pupil of Anaximander, was the first who attempted to resolve the most difficult problem in geometry, that of squaring the circle. Pythagoras, another pupil of Thales, discovered that to any right-angled triangle, the square on the side opposite the right-angle, is equal to the two squares on the side containing it. He is also said to be the first who treated of isoperimetrical problems, for Dio. Lartius has attributed to him the merit of having discovered that of all figures, having the same boundary, the circle among plane figures, and the sphere among solid figures, are the most capacious. Archytas first solved the problem of finding two mean proportionals; and introduced geometrical analysis, which he learned from Plato. Democritus of Abdera, promulgated the doctrine of the contact of circles and spheres, and treated of the principles of optics and circles. Hippocrates attempted the quadrature of the circle, but failed: he, however, first proved the duplication of the cube to depend on the finding of the two mean proportionals between two given lines. Plato, when asked the probable employment of Deity, answered that he geometrized continually! such an exalted idea had he of the science. He probably intended to reply that, Deity governed the universe by geometrical laws. He taught the mathematical sciences with great success. Among the discoveries of his school, is that of the geometrical loci. It is generally thought that the tri-section of an angle was also considered in the Platonic school. To Leon is ascribed the invention of that part of the solution of a problem called its determination. Xenocrates and Aristotle wrote on mathematics; the latter of whom composed four books on geometry; but they are lost.—Ptolemy Lagus established the celebrated school at Alexandria. It was here that Euclid flourished. There is an anecdote told of him, which is worth repeating; Ptolemy Philadelphus having asked him whether there was any easier way to acquire a knowledge of geometry than that commonly taught, his reply was, 'there is no royal road to geometry.' After the revival of learning, the elements of Euclid were first known in Europe, through the medium of an Arabic translation. Besides this, his Data is the only one of his works that has come down to the present time. Of the Alexandrian school, Theon was one of the brightest ornaments. He was succeeded by his beautiful and accomplished daughter, Hypatia, who cultivated geometry with great success. Indeed, she must have been pre-eminently well skilled in the science, to have been thought worthy to supply the place so ably filled by her learned father. She wrote commentaries on Apollonius and Diophantus. This lady, the ornament of her sex, fell a sacrifice to the blind fury of a fanatical mob. Subsequently, through the operation of the same fanatical spirit, the Alexandrian library, the first monument of human genius, was expended in heating the public baths of the city. We are mainly indebted to Arabic translations for such works as escaped this general conflagration. It has been thought by some writers that we are indebted for the restoration of the ancient astronomy and geometry, to the vain speculations of judicial astrology. But we shall not attempt to trace the grounds on which this supposition is predicated.

The 47th proposition of the first book of Euclid, proving that the square, subtending a right angle, is equal to the squares that form the right angle, has been somewhat prettily moralized by the members of the Masonic Institution. From the construction of the figure, it is evident that the triangles within the squares are reciprocally equal; and also, that the squares on the sides forming the right angle are equal to the square subtending the right angle. Pythagoras, in grateful testimony of the discovery, sacrificed a hecatomb. But Freemasons consider geometry as a natural logic; for as truth is ever consistent, invariable and uniform, all truths may, and ought to be investigated in the same manner. Moral and religious definitions, axioms and proportions, have as regular and certain dependence upon each other, as any in physics or the mathematics. As the figure here alluded to depends on the connexion of the several lines, angles and triangles, which form the whole, so Freemasonry depends on the unanimity and integrity of its members; the inflexibility of their charitable pursuits, and the immutability of the principles upon which the society is established. The position is clear; and, therefore, in a synthetical sense, we demonstrate that some of our fraternity, from their exalted situation in life, enjoying every luxury, pleasure and comfort, may, with strict propriety, be considered as standing on the basis of earthly happiness; emblematical of the greater square, which subtends the right angle. Others, whom Providence hath blessed with means to tread on the flowery meads of affluence, are descriptive of the squares which stand on the sides that form the right angle. The several triangles inscribed within the squares, are applicable to those who enjoy every social comfort, without exceeding the bounds of mediocrity. Those who, by application to arts, to manufactures and commerce, not only add to the wealth of the country and to the happiness of the exalted, but administer to the wants of the indigent and industrious, may be compared to the angles which surround and support the figure; whilst the lines which form it, remind us of those unfortunate brethren who, by a series of inevitable events, are incapable of providing the common necessities of life, until aided by our cheerful and ever ready assistance. From the corollary we draw an axiom in Masonry; for by connecting the several lines together, and bringing the unfortunate and industrious into compact with the affluent and eminent, we form a figure, descriptive of the true basis on which our ancient brethren raised the superstructure of Freemasonry; a basis which no mortal power can shake—GENTLE CHARITY.

When we took up the work, the title of which is placed at the head of this article, we did not purpose to bestow on it more than a passing notice; but we find that we have been undesignedly carried by the current of thought, into a digression, from which, in the short space left us for remark, it will be impossible for us this week to return.—We therefore, with much reluctance on our part, and probably not much to the gratification of the general reader, conclude by saying—

TO BE CONTINUED.

¶ The macaronic of a man who presides over the New Hampshire Post, (a John L. Bunce,) has turned traitor, and sold himself to the antimasonic party, for a dozen subscribers. Crossed in his political ambition, he has in his madness and folly, cast off what little of moral integrity he may have been presumed to possess, and connected himself, with a faction, whose existence is sustained by the excess of moral depravity. To promote the interests of such a cause, Mr. Bunce, in point of talents and principles, seems to be particularly well qualified. He is no loss to those whom he has basely deserted; nor can he, of himself, be of any service to those who have purchased him. He says, his subscription list bears him witness already, that the people, the great majority of them, will sustain him. The price of his treachery has been paid over. Let him hug it to his bosom; it may for a time quiet the operations of conscience. With 'the people' he has no concern;—his business is solely with unprincipled, aspiring demagogues—with a corrupt and damning faction, from whose polluted streams he is in future to draw his sustenance. As he has commenced the career so successfully pursued by Judas Iscariot, we advise him to keep the example steadily in view, until he shall have fully and perfectly personated the character of his great prototype, in every particular. In this way, he may do the 'state some service.' He can in no other.

The antimasonic county convention at Worcester on the 14th, chose 40 delegates to attend the convention in this city, on the 16th of May!

The Senate of New York has concurred with the House in a resolution against the renewal of the charter of the United States Bank.

A person of the name of William John Murray has been arrested in Philadelphia, on suspicion of being concerned in the great bank robbery.

The wife of Smith, charged with having robbed the bank in New York, has been set at liberty. She was permitted to speak to her husband in presence of an officer on Monday.

The late news from Europe is highly interesting. The Reform Bill has had a second reading in the British House of Commons. The vote stood 302 to 301 against it.—The result was received with enthusiastic exclamations.—It is thought the bill will be finally rejected. If so, it will give rise to some popular agitation.

The province of Luxemburg is now one of the apples of discord in Europe. Belgium, Germany and Holland claim it. The people are supposed to be in favor of Belgium.

The Austrians have entered Ferrara and Capri, after a battle of nine hours, which the Italian patriots sustained with great perseverance.

A motion has been introduced into the French Chamber of Deputies banishing forever from the territory of France, the descendants, and those allied to the descendants, of the ex-king.

Paris was thrown into great confusion on the 20th March. It was the anniversary of the return of Bonaparte from Elba. A large procession was formed for the purpose of placing either the statue of Napoleon or his son, on the pedestal in the Champs Elysees, intended for Francis I. The national guards were ordered to be under arms. France has much to fear or hope from the operation of this feeling. The new ministry are not in much better repute than were the old. Lafayette has been offered the Presidency of the Council, which he refused unless his friends were appointed to office. France seems to have no disposition to quarrel with Austria, and has therefore given a new construction to the non-intervention laws.—France says to Austria you shall not interfere with the revolution in Italy. Austria turns up her nose, and goes to slaying the Italian patriots. France replies we meant to say that you ought not to do so! So much for chivalry.

A revolution has broken out in Spain—on dits. The king's troops were deserting in great numbers, and the revolution was rapidly extending. If this be true, it is not probable that the revolutionists will succeed. The mind in Spain, is as much shackled as the body. One account says that the insurrection at Madrid was successful, and that Ferdinand was obliged to fly towards Lisbon. The revolutionists in the mountains of La Borda are said to be 10,000 strong. Their object is to establish the moderate monarchy under the daughter of Ferdinand, and during her minority, under a regency.

Our latest intelligence from the theatre of war in Poland is extremely vague and contradictory. The Government, Senate and Chambers, have issued a proclamation, in which they declare, that it is their determination to follow the fate of the army, should circumstances render it necessary to abandon Warsaw. The head quarters of the Polish army on the 8th March, were about two miles from Warsaw. There were 10,000 killed and wounded in that city. Provisions were scarce and high, but as the Russians had been driven from the left bank of the Vistula, the communication would be restored, and the supplies be increased. The Liverpool Courier of March 23, says: 'The struggle of the Poles have done them great credit: they indicate the spirit of the nation, and the noble courage and devotion of its army. The Russians have been frustrated in their plans, and obliged to make new arrangements for attacking Warsaw, amidst the swamps and inundations of the Vistula. So far a most righteous cause has triumphed; but the hope of ultimate deliverance, we fear, there is no reasonable ground to indulge, such is the might of Russia, and such the nature of the country, which presents few advantages to cover the weakness of inferior numbers. The Poles have won two glorious battles; but had not strength for more than to beat back the enemy, and obliged him to change his ground. Unless some new event arise, this cannot last long.' The loss of the Russians since they entered Poland, is estimated at 30,000 men hors du combat, in killed, wounded, prisoners, and sick. No great loss to Russia, still less to the world.

A rebellion has broken out in Hayti. 'The general feeling is that Boyer has presided quite long enough over the Haytian people.'

LATEST FROM THE CONTINENT.

The brig Franklin, Stephen H. Howland, master, arrived at New Bedford on Wednesday, left Flushing the 25th of March. France had joined the Belgians against the King of Holland, and the French General had been at Brussels to take command of the United Armies. An order had reached Flushing to put in readiness the whole of the Dutch navy. It was rumored and believed that AUSTRIA HAD DECLARED WAR AGAINST FRANCE. Capt. Howland brought no papers.

THE WREATH.

[From the Providence American.]

THE REQUEST.

Let not one briny tear
For me be shed—
Weep not above my bier
When I am dead.

If you do mourn for me—
The young in years—
O, let your sorrow be
Too deep for tears.

Let not a dirge of woe
Strike on the heart,
But let me freely go,
When I depart.

Why should we mend the chain
When it is riven?
Why in this world of pain
Keep me from Heaven.

Let not a pageant show
Be made for me;
The semblance of a woe
That should not be.

Give me a quiet grave
In some lone vale,
Where the tall grass shall wave
In autumn's gale.

None e'er comes there to grieve
Who asks this boon,
Save the pale stars of eve,
And the cold moon.

Erect no sculptured stone
Upon that spot,
To tell the tale of one
Who sleeps forgot.

But let the slender grass,
Grow thick and high,
That man may heedless pass,
Nor turn his eye.

THE PEN.

Some strive to be witty
In praising the pretty,
And many's the ditty
That's written I ken,
Not half so sincerely,
So modest or clearly,
As I write queerly,
Concernin' the Pen.

The Pen's a logician,
A mathematician,
A mute rhetorician,
A sage, a fool;
A cunning contriver,
A wicked conniver,
That breaks for a stiver
The 'Golden Rule.'

The Pen! It has power
To sweeten the sour,
To soothe the sad hour
And sadden the gay;
To conquer a hero,
To soften a Nero,
And shed upon zero
A melting ray.

The sighs of the lover
It puts in a cover,
And all the world over
They silently pass;
No mortal ear hearing
Those lips so endearing,
Until they are cheering
The rightful lass.

MISCELLANY.

AN EXAMPLE FOR WIDOWS.

In the year 1799, a tenant of Mr. Way's at Hasketon, in Suffolk, died, leaving a widow with fourteen children, the eldest of whom was a girl, under fourteen years of age. He had rented out fourteen acres of pasture land, on which he kept two cows; these cows with his little furniture and clothing, were all the property he left. The parish of which he had been an inhabitant, was within the district an incorporated house of industry, where the rule was to receive proper objects within the walls, but not to allow anything for the out poor, except in peculiar cases. The directors of the establishment offered to relieve the widow, by taking her seven youngest children at the house. When this was proposed to her, she replied in great agitation, that she would rather die in working to maintain her children, than part with any of them; or she would go with all of them into the house, and work for them there; but if her landlord would continue her on the farm, (as she called it) she would undertake to bring up the whole fourteen without any help from the parish. She was a strong woman, about forty-five years old, and of a noble spirit; happily, too, she had to deal with a benevolent man. He told her she should continue his tenant, and hold the land for the first year rent-free; and at the same time, unknown to her, he directed his receiver not to call upon her afterwards, thinking with even that indulgence, it would be a great thing if she could maintain so large a family. But this further liberality was not needed. She brought her rent regularly every year after the first; held the land until she had placed twelve of the children in the service; and then resigned it to take the employment of a nurse; which would enable her to provide for the remaining two, for the little time longer that they needed support, and which was more suited to her declining years.

NATURAL ANTIPATHY.

We have often heard people speak of natural antipathy, as familiarly as though such a thing existed. The fact is, Nature never made antipathies—they are wholly the work of art. We are led to these remarks by a singular fact which lately came to our knowledge. A gentleman of this village, the past fall, procured a pair of English rabbits, which he permitted to run at large. As they never had been worried by dogs, they had no fear of them, and would play around where they were, as familiarly as if no danger was near. A strange dog, coming along one day, seized one of them, and immediately killed it. The remaining one soon disappeared. Nothing more was seen of it until a few days since, a gentleman on removing the last mow of hay, among the rails at the bottom, found a nest of three cats, and the surviving rabbit—all living together in the utmost harmony.

The gentleman who owned the rabbits, by way of experiment, some time since killed one or two small kittens, and got a puppy to put in place of it. The mother of the kitten, at first, showed some dislike to the intruder, but soon became as fond of it as of her own offspring, and nursed it with equal care and attention. Indeed the puppy, by superior strength, obtained precedence over the kitten, which the cat not only permitted, but of which she seemed to approve.

[Original.] REVIEW

Of the Rev. Mr. Furguson's Letters to the Rev. Moses Thacher, Pastor of the North Church of Wrentham.

[Concluded.]

It may be well supposed, that Mr. Furguson, when he assumed the pious office of reproving his recreant brother Thacher for infractions of his covenant obligations with his church; for his hypocrisy exhibited in becoming a Mason, at the time and manner he did, and, in a short period, seceded from the institution for political purposes; for his general unchristian conduct towards the members of his church, and especially, for his contempt of the ecclesiastical council, convened to advise the settlement of difficulties in the church; we say that Mr. Furguson must have had his sensibilities roused by conflicting affections; bound as he was to his brother Thacher by the tender and endearing cords of love and friendship, strengthened by long intimacy and corresponding sentiments on religious faith and doctrines. United, as they had been, in opinion, on the subject of Masonry, which, at that period, agitated the public mind, and wherein both rested under full persuasion, that the principles of Masonic institutions were antichristian and vicious; under these circumstances, Mr. Furguson could not but be astonished to learn, that his brother had secretly, become a Mason, and after a short period, had seceded from the institution. What inferences could the discriminating mind of Mr. Furguson, with much sorrow and grief, have drawn up, but, that his brother Thacher had assumed the character of a hypocrite for vile political purposes? Every step, from first to last; from the period of becoming a Mason to his secession demonstrates the fact, that he was a hypocrite.

Every considerate man, as well as Mr. Furguson, must believe that the measures adopted by his brother, under the hypocritical garb and sanctity of religion, were, wholly, for political effect.

Thus in the preceding letters, as by his conduct we have seen, in what manner, Mr. Thacher, by false statements and misrepresentations has bartered away what little reputation he had in religion and morality, for a seat in the Senate of Massachusetts. We stop here to take a combined view of his exclusive principles. First, his system of discipline recommended to Ministers and Churches for their adoption; this Mr. Furguson has treated in a very judicious manner. Second, the proposition respecting 'extrajudicial oaths' met its appropriate doom in the Senate. In both, Mr. Thacher has been foiled. Both these measures have one common parent. They originate from the same corrupt source, arbitrary and tyrannical spirit of exclusion. Had the proposed schemes been adopted, where would this exclusive principle have stopped?

This last, as well as the whole of Mr. Furguson's letters, ought to be read by every person, who feels he has an interest in the free institutions of the country. These letters involve sentiments which will ever be cherished by the advocates of 'freedom of opinions.' They are worthy to be carried in bold relief upon the frontlets of the forehead, and deeply impressed upon the heart of every man who embraces the righteous cause of liberty, the palladium of our civil and religious privileges, in opposition to the all appalling spirit and doctrine of antimasonic exclusion; the name is of the least importance, the spirit is that which we oppose.

We, with Mr. Furguson, feel 'sick at heart of these pretences to particular purity and zeal,' either in affairs of church, or state, as 'they bring with them hot contention, noise and war.' This is what Thacher desired when he exclaimed in the Senate Chamber, 'If civil war be necessary, let it come. I fear no civil war.'

Let us now attend to Mr. Furguson.

Rev. and dear Brother,

The late venerable John Newton has somewhere remarked, that some good people spend all their strength, and exhaust themselves in laboring to get rid of evil; but that for his part, he would rather spend and be spent in doing good, because if he could fill the world with good, there would be no room for evil. Alas, while attempting to root up the tares, we are in danger of pulling up also the wheat. And I apprehend, that Satan can fill the field with tares, faster than we can root them up. In North Wrentham, you appear to me to act upon the opposite of Mr. Newton's maxim, and to manifest untiring zeal in your attempts to get rid of evil. In less than a week from the time of the meeting of the Council referred to in my last, you had effected a division in the church over which you are the under shepherd; and without waiting for the formalities of a dismission, either as the pastor or as a private member of the mother church, you had organized what you call a new church, composed of about a third of the male, and two thirds of the female members. Two objects appear to have been especially in your view in this transaction. First, the maintenance of discipline; and secondly, to purge out Masonry. The first of these objects appears to me to have no foundation. It is true you have got rid of the brother (i. e. if your proceedings stand) who was restored by the advice of Council. You have also got rid of all your Masonic brethren, and of those who were not with you in opinion. You are a small body, composed of the veterans of the war, and may now be supposed to be united. But in respect to union, you are not more united now, than the entire church was four years ago. Since that time you have had divisions, and in four years more, you may again have divisions.—And here I would ask, in what better state are you to maintain discipline, in the event of new divisions, than you were before you separated? * Are you not, as a body, composed of individuals of like passions with other men? And what advantage can you have for maintaining discipline, which you had not before your separation? Alas, you are, in this respect, like the poor negro, who built a booth in the wilderness, that he might escape from the world. He found Pomp was there still. Perhaps you also have carried Pomp with you.

* It may be questioned, even, whether you are in as good a state. Suppose you undertake to deal with half a dozen of your members, and they pronounce you out of order, and fly off, and form themselves into another church? What then?

But although you are in no better state to maintain discipline, so far as respects your basis, yet you have got rid of an offender, who, in your opinion ought to have been excommunicated. Suppose it to be so; admit if you please, that the Council did do wrong, and that, by their advice, the discipline of your church was in this case prostrated. Still you, and the members acting with you, were not accountable; the sin did not lie at your door; you had borne your testimony against it and had cleared your garments. Neither was the offence of that brother such as to affect the doctrine or the standing of the church. He was not an immoral person, nor a heretic. He might be a sincere Christian, and yet say all that he had said, and do all that he had done. And why manifest so much feeling on the subject? Why take such desperate measures to get rid of an evil of such comparatively trivial consequence? I confess I can only account for it, by attributing it, to feelings of disappointment, and I fear of vengeance. It was not what the individual had done; it was not what the Council or the church had done or neglected to do; in other circumstances a greater fault might have been overlooked, and a greater burden might have been borne; but in this case, there were purposes to be answered, and ends to be attained, for which it was the occasion, rather than the cause. We come then to the second end to be attained by the organization of what you call a new church, viz. To purge out Masonry. I call it the second end to be attained; but it was in truth the only end; for it was impossible for you to suppose that you could lay the foundation of church discipline on a stronger basis, than that on which it stood before. The contempt which you poured upon all church order and covenant obligations, in the manner in which you broke away from the original church, was of itself evidence, that the maintenance of church discipline was the least of your concern. You profess, in common with your brethren, to regard a Congregational church, as recognizing none other Lord, but Jesus Christ. You believe him to be head over all things to his church. There then you stood, before that body of which Christ is the head, on the Sabbath succeeding the meeting of the Council, with a request to be dismissed, that you and those associated with you might be formed into a new church. The request was proper. You had a right to make but not to demand it. When you condescended to make that request, you ceased for the moment to be the organ of the church. You took the place of a suppliant petitioning for a favor. And how did you treat that body of which you profess to regard Christ as the head? You were told, in answer to your petition, that it was contrary to their established rule, to transact business on the Sabbath, and a day was appointed, (short of a fortnight) to take your request into consideration.—And considering the importance of the question to be by them decided, the time could not have been considered long. Considering that the question to be by them decided involved considerations of the most interesting character; considering that it was the climax of all that your connexion with Masonry had brought upon them; the church must be admitted to have treated your request with unparalleled moderation. But what was your treatment of them? You told them, that if the question of your dismission was not determined then, any delay would be construed into a denial; and you should proceed to organize your church, without further reference to them. And accordingly you did proceed the next day upon your own responsibility. And thus it was you purged out Masonry!! Like the Roman Emperor, who had marked the conquest with universal desolation, you could say, 'I have given peace to my country!' You can look back upon the desolations you have made—upon your walls broken down, and your hedges rooted up, and say, 'I have purged out Masonry from the church in North Wrentham.'

The cleansing process by which you have removed Masonry from the church of your particular charge is recommended as applicable to all our churches. Sir, I am sick at heart of these pretences to particular purity and zeal. They carry with them hot contention, noise and war. I willingly offer my feeble aid to arrest their progress. I have written these sheets under a pressure of heart. Personal considerations could not have drawn from me what I have now written. If aught severe or personal has escaped me, forgive it, I entreat you. Ascribe it to the times and to the occasion. I have written in sorrow rather than in anger, and have only meant to be so understood, as to convey my own impression to my brethren.

I am, your Friend and Brother,
JOHN FERGUSON.

East Attleborough, Dec. 20, 1830.

[Original.]

A respectable Grocer, in the north part of the City, who has long been suspected of being a convert to the sedition preaching of Jacob, and a little tinctured with antiism, although he has hitherto carefully avoided a public avowal of his sentiments, was induced, from some cause or other (probably believing it would never gain publicity) to sign the remonstrance against the petition of the Grand Lodge for a modification of their Charter. Since the names of the remonstrants have been given to the public, his repentance has been severe and pungent, and he declares that 'no act of his whole life ever caused him so much pain and regret;' but still he has a particular aversion to its being made public—This reminds me of an anecdote related to me when quite young, which made an impression upon my mind that time can never efface.

In a country village, a man who made great pretensions to piety and honesty, and on all occasions extremely clamorous in his own praise, was, one day, detected stealing a pair of leather breeches; whereupon was congregated the sage fathers of the town, the parish priest, deacons and experienced laymen, to take into consideration the case of their offending brother. After a long and patient investigation of the subject, they unanimously agreed to the following verdict viz—that the culprit should be placed astride a rail, borne upon the shoulders of two men, and in this manner to be carried through the village, incessantly exclaiming as he passed along, I've stolen a pair of leather breeches, and I am sorry for it. No sooner was the verdict made known than all the men, women and children, far and near, were assembled to witness this novel exhibition and hear from his own lips his confession and repentance. When all things were in preparation, and the busy hum of the surrounding multitude hushed into a death like silence, each stretching forward to catch the first word that should fall from his polluted lips, what could exceed their astonishment to hear him, (instead of expressing his regret for his crime,) vociferated with stentorian voice, 'I have stolen a pair of leather breeches and I'm sorry I'm found out.'

Quere. Does not the gentleman's sorrow and regret consist in his being found out?

It is a petty plain intimation of what is thought of anti-masonry out of this state, that no respectable man will stand one of their nominations for Governor. All recollect how pertinaciously they stuck to Heman Allen in Vermont for a candidate, and the abuse he received at their hands after shaking them off. The antics in Connecticut have nominated the Hon. Timothy Pitkin for Governor, and he too publicly declines their proffered friendship. They will have to look up some Solomon Southwick, some bankrupt politician who has no character to lose.

PROSCRIPTION OF MASONS.

A report is in circulation, which we sincerely hope is without foundation, that at a town meeting at Bridgewater on Monday last, when a list of names of those who were qualified for jurors was presented for acceptance, four were objected to, and by a vote of the town, erased from the list for the sole cause of their being Masons. If this be true, it is proscription in its most alarming form; it is virtually assuming the power of disfranchising a citizen for his opinions, and declaring to the public that a Mason, however competent, however honest and virtuous he may be in his private character, is not to be trusted, shall not be permitted to enjoy any of those political rights which the Constitution has secured to every citizen, and declares him incompetent to perform the duty of a juror with impartiality, and that the public good and safety demand the exclusion of any man from any office of trust, honor or profit, who bears the name of Mason. We have never expressed ourselves the particular advocates or supporters of the parties which are now struggling, the one for supremacy and the other for political existence, and which at the present day are so fearfully agitating and dividing the public opinion. We have always thought that an undue excitement and one which was not called for by the occasion which produced it, has prejudiced many and led them to a more ardent opposition to Masons and Masonry than the cause required. We have never had a doubt but many, very many, have been and still are actuated by honest views, and simply desire that the institution which they believe to be pernicious in its influence and tendency upon the morals of the people, and destructive to the principles of a free government, might be overthrown. Such has formerly been their publicly avowed motives, and such they have explicitly declared to be their sole aim and end. Their publications have constantly held this language—that it is the institution and not the members against which they contend. The above report shows a total dereliction from these few principles, and if carried out who does not see that a proscription of men and their political disfranchisement is to be the result.—And that this is but the commencement of a series of measures, which, if they should obtain the ascendancy in the government, would inevitably follow and deprive every citizen, who may have the taint of Masonry upon him, of every right and privilege, which is secured to him by the constitution and the laws of the land. We believe that every honest well meaning man, whether Mason or anti-mason, would deprecate such a state of things. And we are cheered with the belief that the people, who have avowed themselves hostile only to the institution, will not give their countenance or sanction to measures so manifestly repugnant to the declared rights of every American citizen; and we still trust and believe that there is yet a spirit existing, of forbearance to approach the ark of our political safety with any but patriotic motives; a love of individual and public safety; a sincere desire for the good of the body politic; a disposition to support and maintain the laws under which we live; and a determination that every man shall be made secure from oppression in the exercise of his indefeasible rights; and that none shall be declared aliens from daring to exercise a freedom of conscience, or for a frank and fearless avowal of his approbation or disapprobation of any principle which they may deem wrong. We have repeatedly declared it our fixed determination to avoid giving any opinion upon the merits of the controversy between Masons and anti-masons; and we have been induced to notice the above movement, because we believe it hostile to the rights of individuals, and fearfully imperilling everything which is dear and valuable in our Constitutions, and a complete destruction of the freedom of the people; and because we believe that upon calm reflection, no one will give his approbation to a measure fraught with so much danger, and so manifestly destructive to the very existence of political liberty and the rights of every individual.—[Taunton Sun.]

'THE BOOT UPON THE OTHER LEG.'

By a complete return of the votes for Representatives to Congress from Bristol District, it appears that Mr. Hodges and not Mr. Ruggles, as was before supposed, had a plurality of the votes given in. The whole number was 4845, making two thousand four hundred and twenty three necessary to a choice. Of these Mr. Hodges had 2371.—Mr. Ruggles 2278, and there were one hundred and ninety five for other persons; so that fifty two more votes would have elected Mr. Hodges!

By this it appears that there is not, in fact, an anti-masonic majority in Bristol County; and the success of their ticket for Senators was only the result of local prejudices and personal dislikes. Some of the old Senators pursued an unpopular course with regard to the Militia Bill, &c. and the consequence was that the electors of the District would not support them for another term, so they gave their support to the opposition ticket, without any regard to its character or its name. And now forsooth, with accidental success on their side, the anti-masons have the modesty to come forward and lay claim to a majority, which it is apparent they never had.

It is not so. A majority of the voters in Bristol District are not prepared to say by their votes, that they will disfranchise any portion of their fellow citizens—that they will put forth an arm to strip their neighbors and friends of the common rights of citizenship—that they will drive them from the polls, the jury box and the altar!—that they will refuse to suffer them to worship in the Church of the Most High God, or testify in a court of justice. The great body of the people are not prepared for this, although there are those among them, who would not only assert such a fact but use their utmost endeavors to bring it into actual existence. ANTIMASONRY IN SALEM.

It is reported says the Salem Gazette, that the shameless creatures who contrived the base and wicked 'A.B.C. Plot,' are about to renew their attempts to create an excitement in this town, against a portion of our fellow citizens, who, however it may be elsewhere, are here as respectable, in point of standing and moral character, as any equal number of their townsmen. The diffusion of a fierce and malevolent spirit of proscription against the members of the society of Freemasons, in several towns in this state, demonstrates that the fanatical and persecuting spirit of the seventeenth century, is not yet entirely extinct in New England. It is evidently, even now, in the power of unprincipled demagogues to revive, in a degree, the terrors of those times when it was so easy to raise an excitement against poor old women, and upright and conscientious men, as witches, quakers, baptists, hutchinsonians, &c. The gallows, the stocks, and the prison, have not yet been resorted to, but the unspurring persecution by the ANTIMASONS in Lynn, and other places where they have the ascendancy, of all who will not join a crusade against the unoffending objects of their malice, shows that nothing but the want of power restrains them from bodily outrage.

Hear the language of a Mason who has been a member of the institution more than fifty years.

'I have been a member of this useful and honorable fraternity for more than a half a century, and have never till now heard the calumny uttered, that its obligations, under any circumstances, impugned the ordinances of civil and religious society. On the contrary, we hold ourselves bound to render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's and unto God the things which are God's; and I can with truth affirm, that I never knew a man who became a Mason, and whose practice conformed to the precepts it inculcates, who did not become a BETTER MAN than he had been theretofore.'

Over-civility generally ends in impudence, for as it proceeds from design, and not from any kindness or respect, it ceases with its object.

The attempts of the Antimasonic Itinerant Lecturer, AL-LYNN, and his coadjutors from Lynn, to get up an excitement on the subject of Masonry in this town, have as yet proved abortive, and have been met by the almost universal disapprobation of our citizens. The Selectmen refused to grant permission for the proposed Lecture and Exhibition at Concert Hall, under the Law which provides that no public exhibition shall be given without the approbation of the Town authorities. They next engaged the Hall of the Franklin building, without letting the agent know for what purpose it was to be used. The owners of the building (the Salem Marine Society) on learning the object of those who had engaged the Hall, had a meeting, and by a vote of 3 to 1, refused to sanction the engagement. The agitators however came to town on Tuesday evening, and succeeded in obtaining another room, where the Lecture was delivered, and the ceremonies of Masonry exhibited, to such men and boys as chose to enter the Hall, without money and without price. The visit of these men, however, having been considered by many of our citizens, in the light of an unhallowed intrusion, having for its object to sow discord amongst our inhabitants, and to disturb the peace and harmony of the town, a large collection of indignant people assembled in the vicinity of the place of the exhibition, where they remained until a late hour, and it was with difficulty they were restrained from committing some acts of violence. We hope the general manifestation of public sentiment in our town in opposition to any attempts to excite the prejudices and passions of one portion of our community against another portion, composed of as respectable, orderly, patriotic and worthy a class of citizens as any amongst us, will deter these men from pursuing any farther their very kind intentions towards our town. Let our antimasonic friends in Lynn, guard against the alleged iniquities of Masonry, as much as they please, in their own town; when we shall be persuaded that the wickedness of Masons here has arrived at such a pitch as to need the assistance of our neighbors to put them down, we will send for them to come to our aid!—[Salem Reg.]

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

[From Scientific Tracts—No. VI.]

OF THE SOURCES OF HEAT.

The two principal sources of heat are, the sun, and combustion; there are others, but we shall confine our remarks to these. Heat is constantly radiating from the sun, and evolved or given out during the combustion or burning of bodies.

The vital part of our solar system is the sun, from this source we receive all the heat necessary for producing the fruits and flowers of our earth, which are matured and perfected by the light from the same body. We may behold the wisdom of that Power, that balanced the sun and planets in the heavens, displayed in an equal degree in the distribution of the animals and plants of our little planet, according to their respective nature, as far as respects heat and light. Those animals which are placed in the arctic regions, are all protected from the cold by a covering of fine fur, exactly adapted to keeping out the cold; while those of the tropics have a covering adapted to their climate—like the elephant, who has scarcely any covering.

It is not our purpose at present to inquire into the cause of the immense quantity of the heat and light which we constantly receive from the sun. Dr. Herschel supposes it to be owing to luminous clouds, which float in the atmosphere of the sun, and as these clouds are subject to various changes, both in quantity and lustre, he accounts for the difference in the heat of different years.

When a piece of glass is opposed to the sun, it is not soon heated; but if a piece of iron, of the same thickness be exposed during the same time, it will soon become heated; in the same manner, all transparent bodies stop but few of the solar heating rays, while opaque bodies intercept more or less of them; and the darker the color of the opaque body, the more heat is intercepted. Hence arises Dr. Franklin's rules for the color of clothing. Black or dark colors during winter, and white or light colors for summer. But it is to be questioned whether these conclusions are correct. By a reference to what we have said upon radiation, it will be seen, that dark colors radiate more heat than light ones: therefore, dark clothing carries off more of the heat of the body, than light colored would.

The heat produced by the direct rays of the sun upon a body, seldom exceeds 120°, but by a peculiar contrivance to prevent the heat from being carried off by the surrounding bodies 220° or 230° may be produced.

When the rays of the sun are concentrated, they produce a much greater effect, as with a burning glass bodies may be set on fire at a considerable distance; they must be directed, however, upon a body that will absorb or retain them, if they are directed upon a piece of glass, it will not be heated, nor will any transparent body, such as air or water. In these cases, the heating power of the sun's rays is not augmented by concentrating them; the effect is owing entirely to the great number of rays which are brought upon one point.

PHILOSOPHY OF SOUNDS.

A bell rang under water, returns a tone as distinct as if rung in the air.

Stop one ear with the finger, and press the other to one end of a long stick, or piece of deal wood, and if a watch be held at the other end of the wood, the ticking will be heard, be the wood or stick ever so long.

Tie a poker on the middle of a strip of flannel 2 or 3 feet long, and press with the thumbs or fingers the ends of the flannel into your ears, while you swing the poker against an iron fender, and you will hear a sound like that of a very heavy church bell. These experiments prove that water, wood and flannel, are good conductors of sound, for the sound from the bell, the watch and the fender, pass through the water, and along the deal and flannel to the ear.

It must be observed that a body while in the act of sounding is in a state of vibration which it communicates to the surrounding air, the undulations of the air effect the ear and excite in us the sense of sound. Sound, of all kinds, it is ascertained, travels at the rate of thirty miles in a minute; the softest whisper travels as fast as the most tremendous thunder. The knowledge of this fact has been applied to the measurement of distances.

Suppose a ship in distress fires a gun, the light of which is seen on shore, or by another vessel, 20 seconds before the report is heard, it is known to be at the distance of 20 times 1,142 feet, or little more than four miles and a half.

Again, if I see a vivid flash of lightning, and in two seconds hear a tremendous clap of thunder, I know that the thunder cloud is not more than 760 yards from the place where I am and should instantly retire from an exposed situation.

The pulse of a healthy person beats about 76 times in a minute; if therefore between a flash of lightning and the thunder, I can feel 1, 2, 3, 4, &c. beats of my pulse, I know that the cloud is 900, 1,800, 2,700, &c. feet from me.

Sound, like light, after it has been reflected from several places, may be collected into one point as a focus, where it will be more audible than in any other part; on this principle whispering galleries are constructed.

Speaking trumpets, and those intended to assist the hearing of deaf persons depend on the reflection of sound from the sides of the trumpet, and also upon its being confined and prevented from spreading in every direction. A speaking trumpet, to have its full effect must be directed in a line towards the hearer. The report of a gun is much louder when towards a person than one placed in a contrary direction.

RECIPE TO MAKE NANKEN DYE.

Boil equal parts of annatto and common potash in water till the whole are dissolved.

IMPORTANT TO MANUFACTURERS.

Napoleon Bonaparte offered a premium of three millions of francs to the person who should discover some material, the production of France, that should in all respects answer as a substitute for indigo. In consequence of this stimulus, E. Souchon, a practical chemist and dyer, expended a fortune in experiments, which finally resulted in the discovery of a method for fixing the color of Prussiate of Iron, even more permanently than indigo blue. With this preparation he has succeeded in dying green, blue, blue blacks, and black, at an expense of but little more than one third that of indigo colors, and said to be in every respect equally fine and permanent.

We learn that Mr. Arnold Buffum, of this state, during his residence in Paris, effected a contract with Mr. Souchon, for the communication of the process to him to be introduced into the United States, and that he has recently received full explanation of the method, by which this important desideratum is effected.

The colors are said to resist the action of both acids and alkalis, and when worn for years, (as we have seen stated by a mercantile house of high standing in Paris,) will present no whitened appearance on the seams, or at the pockets and button holes of garments the colors their remain unchanged.

The fact that this substitute, if found successful, will not only diminish the expenses and increase the permanency of the best colors in cloths, but that the preparation of the material will give rise to a valuable branch of manufacture in our own country, shows the importance of the discovery, if it be really what it is represented.

Samples of the cloth dyed by this process may be seen at this office.

QUADRATURE OF THE CIRCLE.

The communication below appears in the Washington papers, and invites the attention of our mathematicians. Perpetual motion, and the mode of squaring the circle, or rather the discoverers thereof, have been often found out in this country, that we are not ever sanguine in anticipating a new triumph of American invention. Mr. Woodside however writes like a rational man:

Gentlemen;—You are no doubt well aware, that the exact superficial contents of the square circle, have never been measured. I have, however, within the last month, discovered a simple method of ascertain correctly the square of any circle. The secret of my discovery has been confidently disclosed to several of my friends, (fifteen in number) who, I feel confident will not divulge it. I have no hesitation in challenging the first mathematicians in the world to confute the principle, and rule or rules, by which I can, by a very trifling calculation, measure, or, in other words, square the circle.

I addressed a letter the 16th of last month, on the above subject, to the Hon. Louis Mc Lane, London, which letter I had the honor to have transmitted to him through the politeness of the Rt. Hon. C. R.
Vaughan, Minister Plenipotentiary from England; and I am waiting Mr. Mc Lane's reply, as regards any premium or premiums, which have been offered in Europe, for the discovery of a calculation suited to the comprehension of common capacity, for measuring the exact contents of the circle, laying aside all approximations. I am aware that what I have here stated for publication, leaves me to the scurrying of mathematicians of the first rank, to whom I am very desirous to explain confidentially, the principle upon which my discovery is founded—a discovery which has baffled, and I will prove ever would baffle, their intricate calculations for measuring, as I can, correctly, the quadrature of the circle.

ASTRONOMY.

One who has not attentively viewed the Starry Heavens, for the purpose of tracing out the several constellations which are now so conspicuous, may suppose it difficult, if not impossible to class them and to designate particular stars; but a slight attention to the subject will show that it is by no means a difficult task: a little practice will enable any one to point out the constellations and stars with as much facility as he could refer to places on the map. One of the most conspicuous constellations in the heavens is that called Orion, which is known by four bright stars forming an irregular square, within which are three stars in a line, lying obliquely, and three others of inferior lustre, hanging in a manner from them. The two most southern stars of the square are called the feet, the two most northern the shoulders of Orion, and they are distinguished by the terms the right or left foot, or east and west shoulder. The three bright stars in a line are his belt, and the three of inferior lustre which seem to be suspended by the belt are his sword. The three stars in the belt of Orion point out on the S.E. the bright star Sirius or the Dog Star in the constellation of the great Dog. On the opposite, the Pleiades, or the Seven Stars which are in a cluster, on the back of Taurus, the Bull. Sirius is now quite brilliant and nearly vertical. The bright star half way between Pleiades and the star called the W. shoulder of Orion, is called Aldebarran or the Bull's Eye; it forms with six or seven stars near it, a figure in the form of the letter V. Aldebarran is the brightest star at the end of one of its sides. Procyon (in the little Dog) is that large star N.E. of Orion, which forms an equilateral triangle with Sirius and Orion's E Shoulder. About 35° west of Aldebarran is Arietas, the first star in Aries; it is of the 2nd magnitude. E.N.E. 45° from Aldebarran, is the bright star called Pollux; N.W. of Pollux 5° lies Castor—these two stars are in the constellation called Gemini or the Twins. A line prolonged from the W. foot of Orion through Procyon, touches the bright star Regulus or the Lion's Heart; it lies E. by S. from Pollux, and forms with six other adjacent stars, a figure resembling and called a sickle, being itself in the handle; it is now vertical, or on the meridian. The first bright star, lying E. by N.E. from Regulus, is called Denebola, or the Lion's Tail. E. by N.E. from the Lion's Tail is Arcturus, the largest in the constellation of Bootes situated between his legs. This star is now high in the Heavens; and is seen on the Meridian. A line extending N. by N.W. from Arcturus falls in with the last in the tail of the constellation of Ursa Major on the Great Bear. This constellation is one of the most conspicuous in the heavens. It is within the circle of perpetual apparition and consequently never sets in our northern latitudes; it has seven bright stars, called by some Charles' Wain, forming some resemblance to the figure of a Plough or a dipper handle. Four of these bright stars form an irregular square, two of which are called the Pointers, because they point almost directly to a bright star, known by the name of the Pole Star, which is about 2° from the North Pole of the heavens. The Northern Pointer is called Dubhe. The two others of the square point nearly to the Pole of the ecliptic. Three others of the seven are in the Tail of the Bear; that next to the square is called Alioth, and that in the extremity of the Tail, Benetnasch, or the last in the Tail. From the square of the Great Bear, extend a line through the Pole Star, and it will pass through the middle of the constellation of Pegasus, which has four bright stars forming a square; the most Northern Star being the head of Andromeda. Markab in the juncture of the wing of Pegasus, is about 48° from the Eagle. East of Markab in the extremity of the wing of Pegasus is Algenib. A line drawn from the Great Bear through the Pole Star crosses the constellation of Cassiopea, or the lady in her chair, which is formed of six or seven stars, in the shape of a chair turned upside down. This constellation never sets; being circumpolar. When Alioth is on the meridian above the Pole, Cassiopea is nearly on the meridian below, being always on the opposite side of the Pole. The constellation called the Little Bear is nearly parallel with the greater one, and is of similar shape. The Pole Star is the last in the tail of the Little Bear. Such are the constellations now most conspicuous. Alioth is now near or on the meridian above the Pole, and the Virgin's Spike nearly on the meridian in the South. This star forms an equilateral triangle with Arcturus and the Lion's Tail. Further north and a little east of this meridian is Arcturus, a reddish star in the constellation of Bootes. The bright star in the Lyre is most splendid. It makes a right angled triangle with Arcturus and the Pole Star, and an equilateral triangle with two small stars near it. The Northern Crown is situated between Arcturus and the Lyre. It consists of 8 stars in the form of an oval. The bright star of a reddish color south of the Lyre, near the Eastern margin of the Galaxy, having a small star on each side is called the Eagle (forming a right line.) A line E.N.E. from Lyre reaches the bright star in the Swan, it makes nearly a right angled triangle with Arcturus and the Pole Star. A great circle passing through Regulus and the Virgin's Spike leads E.S.E. to a bright reddish star called Antares, or the first in the Scorpion. Antares seems to be near the centre of an arc of stars concave to it. Between the Northern Crown and the Lyre is situated the constellation of Hercules. A line from the Eagle almost S.E. leads to the effulgent star Fomalhaut in the mouth of the Southern Fish. This star is about 60° from the Eagle and having a high southern declination its altitude its small in northern latitudes. A good celestial globe will afford assistance in discovering other different stars and constellations. [Balt. Minerva.]

THE MORALIST.

PASSAGE OF THE RED SEA.

[By Bishop Heber.]

'Mid the light spray their snorting camels stood,
Nor bathed a fetlock in the nauseous flood.
He comes—their leader comes—the man of God
O'er the wide waters lifts his mighty rod,
And onward treads; the circling waves retreat,
In hoarse, deep murmurs, from his holy feet,
And the chafed surges inly roaring show
The hard wet sand and coral hills below.
With limbs that falter, and with hearts that swell,
Down, down they pass, a steep and slippery dell;
Round them arise in pristine chaos hurled,
The ancient rocks, the secrets of the world;
And flowers that blush beneath the ocean green,
And caves, the sea-calves' low-roofed haunts, are seen;
Down, safely down, the narrow pass they tread,
The seething waters storm above their head;

While far behind retires the sinking day,
And fades on Edom's hills its latest ray.
Yet not from Israel fled the friendly light,
Or dark to them or cheerless came the night;
Still in the van, along that dreadful road,
Blazed broad and fierce the brandished torch of God;
Its meteor glare a ten fold lustre gave
On the long mirror of the rosy wave;
While its blest beams a sunlike heat supply,
Warm every cheek and dance in every eye—
To them alone;—for Mizraim's wizard train
Invoke for light their monster gods in vain;
Clouds heaped on clouds their struggling sight confine,
And ten-fold darkness broods along their line.
Yet on they fare, by reckless vengeance led,
And range unconscious through the ocean's bed,
Till midway now that strange and fiery form
Showed his dread visage, lightening through the storm,
With withering splendor blasted all their might,
And brake their chariot wheels and marred their coursers' flight.
'Fly Mizraim, fly!' The ravenous floods they see,
And fiercer than the floods, the Deity!
'Fly Mizraim, fly!' From Edom's coral strand,
Again the prophet stretched his dreadful wand;
With one wild crash the the thundering waters sweep,
And all its waves—a dark and lonely deep:
Yet o'er those lonely waves such murmurs past,
As mortal wailing swelled the nightly blast,
And strange and sad the whispering surges bore
The groans of Egypt to Arabia's shore.

ATHEISM.

Now and then our faith is shaken by some chilling breath of infernal philosophy, that comes sweeping over these time-battered institutions, and for a while threatening their destruction. This poisonous essence assumes all shapes from the wily serpent who seduced the mother of the human race to pluck the forbidden fruit, to that of the bearded sage in the sanctity of wisdom. In the form of popular eloquence it is instilled into the mind of youth. The task of unhinging the virtues and the hopes of the world is not confined to age or sex. There have been enchantresses and syrens in every age and nation to allure and to destroy the soul. Ravished by the first glance, he sees only that part that is beautiful. Their deformities to 'young-eyed wonder' are concealed by a cloud which arises from himself. Fully seen, these teachers, like sin would be hideous—

—'Before the gate there sat
On either side a formidable shape.
The one seem'd woman to the waist, and fair,
But ended foul in many a scaly fold
Voluminous and vast—a serpent arm'd
With mortal stings.'

These reformers would remodel your seminaries of learning, would raze your churches to the ground, slay the priests of the Lord, break up the sacrament or holy bond of marriage, pluck from our hearts the charities of life, obliterate the endearing names of father, son, and brother, with all their charming alliances; and substitute for it a cold, spurious philosophy, under the specious names of social system and general philanthropy. But it would be weakness to keep our eye fixed on this little dark spot. It is wise to watch the growth of it; but it would not be pious or brave to believe that it would ever overshadow the land.

The Abbe Mariti says, the palm tree, from its superior beauty and usefulness, is called the Phoenix, and that when they cut down one of these they burn the stump, from the ashes of which arises a vigorous young shoot.

LITERARY.

THE XEROPTERON; OR STEAM-CARRIAGE: A POEM.

BY J. HARDAKER.

We have long expected Poetry, as well as heavier, yea, and lighter materials, to be moved by steam; and having the first instance now before us, we beg, rail-ing apart, to introduce Mr. Hardaker to the public, as the laureate of a steam, and worthy of his subject, i. e. of esteem. The high-pressure upon his imagination, despising safety-valves, has been poured forth with a ten-bard power; so that, along the whole line of his way, he has been impeded by no obstacles, but run smooth and free from the beginning to the end.

The compound title is of Greek construction—aer, air, and pteron, a wing; which seems to imply that vapour is winged air; and with 'all ready,' (the startling words of steam-carriages, as 'all right' are of coachmen,) off the author bursts in the full tide of song.

'I sing of scenes which science in its pride,
Inspired with genius to the world reveals—
The iron-pave, where Xeroptera glide,
Like Phæton's chariot with its flaming wheels;
and, truth to say, no kettle we ever heard sing,
could sing like a steamer.

'The Xeropteron, on its iron-pave,
Outruns the river and outstrips the wind,
Fleeter than skiff upon the curled wave,
Leaving the eagle on her way behind:
Laden with hundreds of both gay and grave,
And all that men from earth and ocean reap,
All that is worthy of the great and brave,
Sweeping o'er mountain tops and valleys deep,
Calm as a dream that fits o'er gentlest sleep.

We like the idea of leaving the eagle behind, that, we presume, being the name of an inferior engine or car, and certainly not of the bird of Jove. With regard to the 'calm,' we are not so sure, seeing that on all the occasions with which we have been conversant, by sea or land, instead of calm, there has always been a most infernal clatter. Indeed, we once heard a housemaid of fine sensibilities, excited, too, by a voyage from London to Richmond, on a lovely summer day, with her sweetheart no doubt, express her sympathies for the steamboat in very simple yet pathetic terms—'I pity her poor thing (said she,) she throbs so!' Where was Mr. Hardaker's 'calm,' here, we wonder? how can he reconcile such a phrase with the truth of poetry? The following is far better in praise of steam.

'The world sees
Those latent powers called forth from darkness vast,
Waking the slumbering intellect of the earth,
Another Neptune smokes across the seas,
Another Hercules in his works of worth,
Whilst genius wonders at her latest birth!'

And truly, though we are not going to examine this trifle minutely, we may state that the writer manifests a warmth very nearly allied to talents in the treatment of his theme; and with much to provoke mirth, is frequently guilty of striking expressions: for example where he styles the ancient and silent statues of Greece, 'her sculptured page;' but his extreme admiration of the big tea-kettles of modern science betrays him into extravagance. What will be thought of a rail road to supersede 'the equator? we have it in verse.

This lengthened pave may belt the rounded earth,
The living girdle of a peopled zone,
Round which, like some bright meteor rolling forth,
Genius herself may guide her gliding throne:

It may be they who own a better birth,
Than in yon spheres harmoniously sing,
This earth of ours may deem of better worth,
When thus now belted on its airy wing—
Another Saturn with another ring.

And now, his mind inflamed with the fancy of this iron circle round the earth, he conjures up creatures very different from Ariel to travel the distance in forty minutes—no other, in fact, than the sultanas, Georgians, and other 'fine women' from Turkish harems, &c.

'With charms untold,
The gorgeous pomp of oriental sheen,
Falling their robes in many a luscious fold,
Curdee and castom, wove in gold and green,
More fit for beings such as ne'er grow old,
But for this frail mortality, oh dear!
The very thought thereof makes one grow cold;
Yet why not flourish when transplanted there,
Th' expanding intellect that blossoms here?

Yes, we may see them, when this iron zone
Connects the German with the Caspian Sea,
Linking the Rhine, the Danube, and the Rhone,
And stretching onwards to the rich Crimea.'

Hang up philosophy, unless philosophy can make a Juliet: hang up science, steam and rail-roads, unless they can bring us an importation of sultanas. Long luck to the merchandise from the Crime-a, though our ladies at home may think it a-crime. Unshackled trade is and shall be the order of the day. In the piping times of peace nothing shall be deemed contraband of war; there shall be no duties—free bottoms shall make free goods:—and so success to Mr. Hardaker, to steam, and to a rail-road round the universe.—[Lit. Gazette.]

DANIEL DEFOE.

A late writer in the Monthly Magazine gives the following account of Daniel Defoe, the celebrated author of Robinson Crusoe, and other works equally curious and original.

'The experience, of Defoe, throughout an unusually protracted life, has established the fact (were any additional proof needed,) that he who presumes to make men wiser or better than they are; who puts himself forth as a reformer, whether in religion, politics, or morals, must make up his mind to bear in turn the abuse of all parties: to be the victim of ingratitude proportioned to the benefits he has conferred on society; to be kicked—spit upon—and trampled under foot by the lowest of the low, the basest of the base; to be cursed by those whom he has blessed—in a word, to be anathematized and excommunicated of men. The way to succeed in life is to wink at the vices of the age, to be chary of its errors of thought and practice, to agree with it, to flatter it, to walk side by side with it. The world, like a man with the gout, cannot endure rough usage: hence those have always been in best repute as moralists and men of sense, who have treated it with lenity and forbearance. To walk with the world with an orthodox steady pace, neither hastening before, nor lagging behind it, is in nine cases out of ten, to ensure its favor: but to step forward, like a fugleman, from the ranks of society, no matter how just be one's claims to such distinction, is at once to rouse, first, the world's attention—next its envy—and lastly, its bitter inextinguishable hatred.

'Defoe was full a century in advance of his age, and he paid the penalty of such maturity in the bitter, unsparring abuse of his cotemporaries. All parties combined to assail him. The whigs detested him, the jacobites avoided him, the high Tories feared him, and even the Dissenters, in whose cause he had perilled his all, for whom he had gone through the ordeal of fire—pillory—imprisonment—even these for a season stood aloof from him. He was like Cain, branded on his forehead with a mark that all men might avoid him. Time, however, did him justice; the malice of his enemies slowly abated; and as the quicksands of party were perpetually shifting, Defoe gained more or less by each change. Still the persecutions he had experienced made visible inroads on his health. In the autumn of life he found himself without a green leaf on his boughs, his spirit blighted, sapless, and ready at the first keen breeze that might blow rudely on it, to fall a ruin to earth.'

'Shortly after the marriage of one of his daughters, in 1729; he was arrested for some trivial debt and confined in prison till the year 1730, which period was passed in sickness and acute mental anguish. As if to till up the measure of his suffering, his very children rebelled against him, and on some mean pretext his son found means to deprive his aged and heart broken father of what little remained to him of the world's wealth. This was too much for Defoe's fortitude. The principle of life within him, already severely tried, now quite gave way; he seldom spoke, was often seen in tears, or on his knees in prayer, and after some months of mental suffering, resigned himself without a struggle to his fate, on the 24th of April, 1731, at the mature age of 70.'

ORIGINAL LETTER, FROM DR. FRANKLIN,

On the death of his brother, Mr. John Franklin, to Miss Hubbard.

Dear Child—I condole with you, we have lost a most dear and valuable relation, but it is the will of God and Nature that these mortal bodies be laid aside, when the soul is to enter into real life, 'tis rather an embryo state, a preparation for living; a man is not completely born until he be dead: Why then should we grieve that a new child is borne among the immortals? A new member added to their society? We are spirits. That bodies should be lent us, while they can afford us pleasure, assist us in acquiring knowledge, or doing good to our fellow creatures, is a kind and benevolent act of God—when they become unfit for these purposes and afford us pain instead of pleasure—instead of aid, become an incumbrance and answer none of the intentions for which they were given, it is equally kind and benevolent that a way is provided by which we may get rid of them. Death is the way. We ourselves prudently choose a partial death. In some cases a mangled painful limb, which cannot be restored, we willingly cut off—He who plucks out a tooth, parts with it freely since the pain goes with it, and he that quits the whole body, parts at once with all pains and possibilities of pains and diseases, it was liable to or capable of making him suffer.

Our friend and we are invited abroad on a party of pleasure—that is to last forever—His chair was first ready and he is gone before us—we could not all conveniently start together, and why should you and I be grieved at this, since we are soon to follow, and we know where to find them.

Adieu, B. F.

One of the most interesting periods in one's life—The interim between the time when the dentist has found out which tooth you intend to have extracted, and the time that he extracts it!!!

REMARKS ON GEOMETRY
Concluded.

That a knowledge of geometry is essential to the greater part of our practical mechanics, does not admit of a doubt; yet they have too generally regarded the subject with a degree of indifference; as though the ends proposed to be accomplished by it, could be as accurately, and much more easily attained by other means. This erroneous notion, however, is fast giving way to the force of truth and demonstration; and perhaps more attention is paid to the subject at the present time, by operative mechanics, than at any previous period since the discovery of the science. Many attempts have been made to simplify the study, and to render the acquisition of it more easy to the learner. In many instances, these attempts have been partially successful; but the student will bear in mind the memorable reply of Euclid, that 'there is no royal road to geometry.' There is no turnpike, though there are some cross-roads; but we doubt not that he who travels the old road, which has been so often proved to be good, and over which so many have travelled before him, will be as well pleased with his journey, when it is accomplished, as he who arrives at the end by a shorter route.—It has been said, but we trust with more severity than truth, that the generality of mechanics are displeased with the sight of a geometrical theorem. If so, very little attention to the subject will satisfy them that no study can be better calculated to awaken the dormant faculties of the mind, and to force them into action.

The ancients 'established the higher parts of their geometry on the same principles as the elements of the science, by demonstrations of the same kind: and they were careful not to suppose anything done, till by a previous problem they had shewn that it could be done, by actually performing it. Much less did they suppose anything to be done that cannot be conceived; such as the line or series to be actually continued to infinity, or a magnitude diminished till it become infinitely less than what it is. The elements into which they resolved magnitudes were finite, and such as might be conceived to be real.—Unbounded liberties have of late been introduced; by which geometry, which ought to be perfectly clear, is filled with mysteries.' To divest the science of the mysticism which had thus been thrown over it, and to render it useful to the practical mechanic, was the great end for which Nicholson wrote. An examination of the work before us furnishes the best evidence of his success.

Much has been said and written about the quadrature of the circle. Thousands, like Hypocrates, have attempted this difficult problem, and, as he failed, so have they. Here the parallel stops. A Mr. Woodside, of Washington city, publishes that he has discovered rules for squaring any circle, or, in other words, for measuring the exact contents of any circle, 'laying aside all approximations;' and has written to our minister at London, to ascertain what premium has been offered in Europe for the discovery! For all the discovery he has made in this particular, we apprehend he will hardly be able to obtain wood enough to keep his side warm of a cold winter day. It has long been conceded by eminent mathematicians, both of ancient and modern times, that there is no geometrical way of finding the quadrature of the circle, though there are mechanical ways by which it may be very nearly ascertained. It has been sufficiently demonstrated, says a judicious writer on this subject, that a method of squaring the circle geometrically, still is, and probably must ever remain a desideratum in mathematics. The same writer has attempted to show how nearly this may be effected mechanically. It is hardly necessary to premise, says he, that 'the object is to construct a square, the area of which shall be equal to the area of a given circle, and the length of the sides of which shall be expressed in parts of the diameter, or of the radius of that circle. The nearest whole numbers by which this can be effected are, probably, 8 and 9; that is, if the diameter of the given circle be divided into nine parts, the side of the square which shall nearly equal it in area, must be eight of those parts. This will rather exceed the truth; and it is impossible to do it exactly, although it may be reduced to a less quantity than any that can be assigned. For instance, a still closer approximation may be derived from dividing the diameter of the circle into 360 parts; then shall the side of the square equal 319.041659, &c. of those parts, nearly. The square of this number will be rather less than the area of the circle, and the square of 319.041867 will exceed it; but these numbers do not differ till we come to the ten thousandth place of the decimals, and then only by 2; therefore, the first number is within 2-10,000th parts of the truth; and it may be seen, by inspection, that the ratio of the numbers to each other is nearly as 8 to 9.' It is evident that there are no limits to this approximation; but the above will probably be found sufficiently near the truth for all mechanical purposes.

We have thus endeavored to show, in the best manner our limits would admit of, the nature and importance of geometrical science, in general, and its connexion with the avocations of practical mechanics; particularly as it relates to that portion for whom the work under consideration is designed. Having done this, we have accomplished all, and in truth more than we contemplated, when we commenced this notice. We, therefore, take leave of the subject, by recommending this portion of the work to the particular attention of students in the art of building.

SHADOWS.

The next subject in order, is that of SHADOWS: an interesting branch of architectural science; or, perhaps it may with more propriety, be termed a branch of geometry; for it is almost entirely dependant on and governed by geometrical principles. We cannot give a better idea of the subject than by transcribing the following definitions and propositions. 1. A body which is continually emitting a stream of matter from itself, thereby rendering objects visible to our sense of seeing, is called a luminary; such as the sun, or any other body producing the same effect. 2. The stream of matter which is emitted from the luminary, is called light. 3. A substance or body which light cannot penetrate, is called an opaque body. 4. If a space be deprived of light by an opaque body, it is called a shade. 5. The whole or part of any surface on which a shade is projected, is called a shadow. 6. A body which will admit of light to pass through, is called a transparent substance. 7. A line of light emitted from the luminary, is called a ray. Propositions: 1. The rays of light, after issuing from the luminary, proceed in straight lines. 2. If the rays of light fall upon a reflecting plane, the angle made by any incident ray, and a perpendicular to the reflecting plane, is called the angle of incidence, and will be equal to the angle that its reflected ray will make with the same perpendicular called the angle of reflection; these two propositions are known from experiment. 3. If the rays of light fall upon any curved surface, whether concave or convex, or mixed of the two, the angle of reflection will still be equal to the angle of incidence. 4. Any uneven reflecting surface, whose parts lie in various directions, will reflect the rays of the sun in as many different directions. Demonstration: If any ray fall upon a part of the surface which is perpendicular to that ray, it will be reflected in the same line as the incident ray; but the more or less any part of the surface is inclined to a ray falling upon that part of the surface, the greater or less angle will the reflected ray make with the incident ray. For, imagine a perpendicular to be erected to that part of the surface where any incident ray impinges on the surface, it is evident that the measure of the angle of incidence is equal to the obtuse angle made by the incident ray, and the reflecting surface at the impinging point, made less by a right angle; but the angle of reflection is equal to the angle of incidence; wherefore it follows that the whole angle formed by the incident and reflected rays, is double of the angle of incidence; and consequently a reflecting surface, whose parts lie in various directions, will reflect the sun's rays in as many directions. Hence appears the reason why objects and their parts become visible to our sight when immersed in shade.

By a knowledge of this branch of science, the architect is enabled to draft his plans and to give to them their true effect, or representation of light and shade; to construct his windows, in order to receive light to the best advantage; &c. &c. 'The art of keeping a degradation of light and shade on objects,' says the author, 'according to their several distances, colors, and other circumstances, is of the utmost consequence to the artist. In orthographical projections, where equal and similar objects stand in the same position to the plane of projection, they will be represented similar, and of an equal magnitude, at every distance from that plane; and consequently planes which are parallel to each other, would not appear to have any distance; so that the representation of any number of objects, at different distances from each other, would be entirely confused, and no particular object could be distinguished from the others; but by a proper attention to the art of keeping, every object will be distinct and separate, and their respective distances and colors from each other will be preserved, but though a proper degradation of light and shade ought to be preserved according to the respective distances of objects from each other, artists in general take too great liberties with nature; we frequently see in the drawings of architects, the art of keeping carried to so great an extreme, as to render their performances ridiculous.

FOLIAGE.

An artificial arrangement, or disposition of leaves, is called foliage. The subdivisions of single leaves are called raffles. The leaves which are chiefly used in architecture, are the acanthus, of which there are several species; the olive, parsley, laurel, and lotus. An artificial arrangement of leaves, branches, fruit, flowers, drapery, &c., either singly or combined in any manner with each other, are called ornaments in architecture. A string, consisting of flowers, fruit, leaves, and branches, either singly or intermixed with each other, and supported at the two extremes, the middle part forming itself into a curve by its gravity; this figure, so suspended, is called a festoon. A curve line, which is continually changing its position in contrary directions on the same side of it; that is, first concave and then convex, concave again, and then convex again, and so on alternately in this manner, to any number of curves of contrary flexure, is called a serpentine line. If from a stalk in the form of a serpentine line, a number of branches issue out, twisting themselves in the form of spiral lines on each side of the serpentine, in all the concave parts on the alternate sides of it, and if these spirals and the stalk be decorated with foliage; a composition so formed is called winding foliage. Both the elements and composition of foliage are considered, and illustrated by very beautiful plates, in this part of the work. The examples are taken from the remains of the most esteemed buildings of Grecian and Roman antiquity. We subjoin the first problem, giving directions to draw ornaments. It will be interesting and, we trust, useful to such of our young readers as may not be able at present to procure the work itself:

The learner should, in the first place, draw a variety of curve and spiral lines of different descriptions, and compare these figures with each other; by which means he will be able at sight to distinguish each particular species of curve from another: then he ought to endeavor to imitate, with precision, the same things by hand, in every variety of position which he can suggest to himself; and hence he will acquire a freedom of hand in every direction.—When he proceeds to copying leaves, a general outline ought to be drawn, circumscribing the whole leaf; he should then form outlines of all the raffles, and round every compartment, circumscribing all the different sets of points or raffles; and afterwards proceed to draw the raffles themselves.

The learner having, after sufficient practice in copying, acquired a freedom of hand, he is then advised to draw from nature a variety of such things as will be most suitable for the purposes to which they are to be applied. By so doing, the parts of his compositions will always appear rich and natural; and hence he will obtain a greater facility of invention. Having had sufficient practice in drawing from nature, he may then apply himself to the designing of ornaments; for which purpose he will find the first part of the problem, viz. that of drawing curve and spiral lines by hand, to be of the utmost utility in forming the general outline of his design; and for finishing the smaller parts, such as raffles, flowers, fruit, &c. he must apply the knowledge he has acquired in drawing from nature, which will complete his composition.

TO BE CONTINUED.

DEDICATION—Agreeably to public notice, the new Hall recently fitted up by Rising Star Lodge, in Stoughton, was dedicated on Thursday the 21st instant. A large number of brethren were present; among whom we noticed several in the 'sear and yellow leaf' of life; whose grey looks were so many pledges of the goodness of the Institution, they had so long and so faithfully served. One old gentleman present had witnessed nearly ninety winters, and had been sixty years an active member of the Masonic Institution! A fine commentary on the morals and integrity of seceders! An able, appropriate and interesting address was delivered by ROYAL TURNER, Esq. of Randolph. The ceremonies of dedication were conducted with much solemnity; and the company dispersed, well pleased with the occasion that had called them together. The Hall is neat, and well adapted to the purposes for which it is designed.

DISSOLUTION OF THE CABINET.—A dissolution of the Cabinet at Washington has taken place; Messrs. Van Buren, Eaton Ingham and Branch, having resigned. It is reported that Mr. Barry, Postmaster General, tendered his resignation, but was induced to remain. Report has also assigned to Mr. Livingston, of Louisiana, the State Department; to Mr. M'Lane, of Delaware, the Treasury; to Mr. White of Tennessee, the War Department; and to Mr. Stevenson, of Virginia, the Navy Department.—Politicians are busy in speculations on the cause and probable effect of their manœuvre. It is further reported that Mr. Buchanan, of Penn. will succeed Mr. Berrien, as Attorney General.

SPECIAL PLEADINGS.—The Legislature of Maine have passed a law providing 'that in all civil actions the defendant shall plead the general issue, which shall be joined by the plaintiff, and either party may give in evidence any special matter in support or defence of the action, upon filing in the cause a brief statement of such special matter, either of law or fact, within such time as the Court shall order, of which statement the other party shall be entitled to a copy.' Approved by the governor.

PIRATES.—The United States ship Peacock arrived at this port from the Havana, on Sunday afternoon, having on board two of the mutineers of the brig Orbit of New-York. They were examined on Monday, on the charge of murdering Capt. Samuel Woodbury, master of the Orbit, and committed for trial at the next term of the District Court, on the 16th proximo. Their names are Joseph Gadett, (black) and [Thomas] Colonett, (mulatto.)

James D. Jeffers, alias Charles Gibbs, and Thomas J. Wansley, convicted of the murder of the Captain and mate of the brig Vineyard, were executed in N. York on Friday. To the last, Gibbs confirmed the statement repecting his horrid atrocities, in nearly every particular. It is said that he has made a full disclosure of all the accomplices, aiders and abettors in his piracies; and that when published, 'it will astound the people of this nation.'

THE BRIDGEWATER PROSCRIPTION.

In compliance with the wishes of several of our readers, we have procured an attested copy of the proscriptive vote passed at a public meeting in Bridgewater on the 4th inst.

'At a legal meeting of the inhabitants of the town of Bridgewater qualified to vote in election of Representatives and in town affairs, held on the fourth of April 1831, a list of jurors as revised by the selectmen, was presented for the acceptance of the town, and the following vote* was passed thereon, viz:—

'Voted, that the said list of jurors be returned to the selectmen and that they be directed to remove from said list the names of Geo. Hooker, Avery Forbes, Artemas Hale and Daniel Mitchell;† that they be further authorized to supply other names in their stead, and also to remove any other names from said list they may think proper, and supply their places according to their discretion;‡ and present said list to the town at the adjournment of this meeting.

A true copy from the record.

Attest, HOLMES SPRAGUE, Town Clerk.
Bridgewater, 21st April, 1831.

*On motion of NATHAN LAZELL, jr. Had the record of the meeting been properly made up, this fact would have appeared. Had the gentlemen named in the vote been felons, and rejected on that account, the record could not have been very differently made. As it now stands, posterity will be warranted in the inference that they were guilty of some crime, for which they were deprived of their franchise. Do the people of Bridgewater intend to cast this infamous imputation upon the reputations of those gentlemen? If they do not, let them look to their records.

†The only objection urged against these gentlemen, and the only reason assigned why their names ought to be stricken from the list, was that they were members of the Masonic Institution! It is admitted even by antimasons themselves, that they are all men of respectability: the three last named have been representatives of the town, in the legislature; Mr. Mitchell is at present a member of the Court of County Commissioner; and Mr. Hale acted as Chairman of the meeting at which the vote was passed!

‡If their discretion be in accordance with the intolerant principles of antimasonry!

'What have been the consequences? What are the benefits which have resulted to the people, in those counties where they have suffered themselves to be misled by the arts and clamors of these leaders of factions? You may find them in the mal-administration of office; you may find them in the dismemberment of families; you may find them in the bitter animosities created in social communities; you may find them in the destruction of churches, for even around altars consecrated to the worship of the ever living God, the unhallowed fires of political antimasonry have been kindled, and still burn with a consuming flame. Such and such only, are the ripe and legitimate fruits of political antimasonry.'

'If Masonry be a dangerous political engine, and Masons have always possessed a monopoly of offices, why has our government been so well administered, and our republican institutions preserved? If we are to believe the antimasonic leaders, the republic will be brought to a speedy ruin unless antimasonry be made the ascendant political party. What interests have Freemasons that are not in common with the rest of their fellow-citizens?—What motives could prompt them to desire such a change in the principles of our government? What calamity could they bring upon the country that would not fall equally heavy upon their heads? What oppressive or impolitic laws could be enacted that would not have a full operation upon them as well as others? Does not reason show the fallacy of the alarms which these leaders attempt to excite?

HARPERS' FAMILY LIBRARY.—Through the politeness of the enterprising publishers of this popular work, we have been favored with a copy of 'The Lives of the most eminent British PAINTERS and SCULPTORS.—By Allen Cunningham;'—comprised in Nos. 17, 18 and 19, of the FAMILY LIBRARY. After having disposed of the architectural work now upon our hands, we shall recur to these volumes, and endeavor to speak of them as their contents may warrant. They are on sale at the bookstores in this city.

The news from Europe is important. Immediate hostilities were anticipated between France and Austria, and both French and English Funds had consequently fallen. Belgium was in an unsettled state. Poland was still struggling gloriously for her national Independence. Great distress prevailed in Ireland.

Spain and Portugal were the scenes of some of the most atrocious acts of cruelty in the records of despotism. It was officially announced that 45 unhappy constitutionalists had been publicly EXECUTED, and in Lisbon seven respectable inhabitants had been executed as constitutionalists.

England is still agitated with the questions of reform.

A letter from Dublin, dated 28th ult. to the Editor of the London Times, says:—'I have just heard sad news from Clare. The military and the peasantry have come into contact. A combat has taken place! and so numerous were the people, that it is said the military would have been cut off but for the interference of a Catholic clergyman, who harrangued the former.'

A Paris letter, of the 29th ult. says—'The most deplorable distress reigns in all branches of trade. Innumerable bankruptcies are said to be on the point of being declared. One hundred and thirteen are already counted.'

The French Ministry now assume a more positive tone. They have sent to demand an explanation of Austria for entering Modena and the Papal territories: on the result of this, seems to depend the question of peace or war, and it was the general opinion that war would ensue.

The first step taken by the army of France beyond the bridge of Kehl would be the signal for insurrection through the entire of the ci-devant Rhenish provinces. Should she pass her Italian frontier, the whole of Savoy and Piedmont would rise and join her. Should war take place, it is in the latter quarter that the first blow will be struck.

Accounts from Mayence state, that an army of 60,000 men of the troops of the German confederation would shortly pass the Rhine, and take up a position between that city and Landau. At Vienna it was said that an army of 90,000 men would be stationed in Bohemia, and a corps of 30,000 men on the frontiers of Tyrol and Italy.

It is announced that Lord Brougham was endeavouring to engage France, Austria and Prussia in a coalition to coerce Russia from her designs of crushing Poland, and to guarantee its independence as a nation.

The news from Spain leaves no doubt of the failure of the constitutionalists. The attempt was a mere abortion, and the revolt was instantly quelled. All is now tranquil at Cadiz.

THE WREATH.

THE FARMER'S VERNAL ODE.

The farmer's joyous season,
Comes tripping gaily on,
Its heralds are the gentle airs,
Warmed by the genial sun.
And now he wends him o'er each field,
Each hedge and fence along:
And through the groves and o'er the hills,
His gladdening herds among.

And joyously he views them all,
From dreary winter free;
And feels as doth the mariner,
Just from the boisterous sea.
Though herbage sere and leafless boughs
Arrest the careless view;
He sees the living germs that peep
Their winter shelters through.

And gladsomely he greets them all,
Those little buds of hope;
Which soon will 'neath the genial sun
Their fragrant flowrets ope;
From which he'll see the future fruit,
Emerge and ripen soon;
And thence the Farmer's store of joy,—
Of hope the promised boon.

O! deem not tame such pleasures,
As come with spring's return,
To fill the farmer's bosom,
Nor yet their offerings spurn;
For O! of earth the sweetest,
The purest joys we sing;
Are those the farmer's feebleth,
On the return of spring.

MISCELLANY.

FASHION.

It is fashionable to complain of fashion. There are some people who make a point of getting quarrelsome upon every change and circumstance in the fashions of modern days. They are perpetually pointing back to times of old, as if the unstable elements of fashion in the days of their grandmothers were never agitated and changed and dissolved. They ask us to imitate our ancestors—and in what? in the powdered wig, the deer skin breeches, and the tail-like queue, which according to the sage opinions of Lord Monboddo, completely assimilated the human figure to the Monkey and Ourang-Outang? Would they have our fair ones—the 'bright peculiar stars' of the horizon of beauty, lay aside the light drapery that now floats round their exquisite forms, like the folding of a sunset cloud around a beautiful spirit of evening, and don the uncouth garb of their grandmothers? Only think of the hoop—the hooped petticoat!—The good saints preserve us from anything of the like. We would as soon see a lady in the indescribable garb of a Block Island fisherman. Seriously, there is a great deal said to no purpose in regard to the dressing-gear of the ladies. It is moreover ungentelemanly as well as entirely useless. What if the ladies through the medium of their magazines and albums, should undertake to criticise and condemn the habiliments of the 'lords of creation?' There would be a universal outcry against such unparalleled presumption. It would not be tolerated. But our gentlemanly writers consider themselves perfectly competent to judge of the fitness or unfitness of any new fashion which finds its way among the ladies. Do they wear a huge bonnet—the sail like Navarino for instance, hanging over their features like a cloud over the White Mountains, or sport a pair of sleeves at their sides larger than those of the old friars of Melrose, who carried off in their's provision and ale for a month's consumption, there is no bounds to the cavilings of the gentleman critics. Then too, there is the corsets, the everlasting corset, and nothing but the corset—a perpetual theme for the ill-natured, and standing subject for the first essay for a young physician. We protest against these unpardonable liberties. Let the ladies dress as they please. If a gentleman strangle himself with his cravat, or if his ears suffer from the edge of his starched dicky, nobody seems to take cognizance of the matter. So if the corset of a lady prove as fatal to her as did the poisoned girdle of Moore's Alethe, let us not interfere in such a delicate affair. For ourselves should the corset be bound tighter and tighter, even to the employment of steam power in the screwing process, we shall look on in silence.

HOUSEWIFERY.

To the middling class of life there is no accomplishment more valuable than housewifery. By that class is it sufficiently prized as an accomplishment, or wisely inculcated as a necessary branch of education? It is feared not. Few girls are regularly initiated into the various household duties; yet, to all girls, the knowledge of them is essential, since, as wives, daughters, or sisters, all will have households to superintend. How extensive the mischiefs caused by ignorance of housewifery, we every day hear and see painful instances.—The misery endured by the helpless, untaught individual, in feeling her ignorance, and seeing the varied forms of evil that ignorance produces, must be more severe. Let no mothers wilfully condemn their daughters to sorrow, disgrace, and error, from which it is not easy to rescue them.

The duties of housewifery being generally of an active and desultory nature, are usually very agreeable in the performance to activity and variety-loving young people, they will therefore be cheerfully attempted and pursued, and we shall enlarge the pleasures of girls, by the same encouragement with which we prosecute their improvement.

The management of the breakfast and tea table will induce some knowledge of performing the honors of the mistress of a house. Occasionally, the whole arrangement of the house may devolve on the housekeeper. At sixteen she may be invested in all the rights and duties of the household superintendence. The mother may sometimes interfere with advice, but let the whole responsibility rest upon the daughter, than thus, being thrown upon her own powers, she may early learn judiciously to exert those powers; and, when mistakes occur, as occur they must to beginners, in all the offices and business of life, it is better that they should occur under the paternal roof, where partial relatives are prompt to excuse and remedy, than in the first day of bridal management, when the agitated mind is full of the variety and novelty of its duties, and new friends and new kindred are less disposed to pardon and correct.

The fair Quakers are certainly the most dangerous sect. There is more peril to be encountered beneath one of their coal-box drab bonnets, than in all the eyes that ever shone through artificial flowers; The coquettish simplicity of dress, its perfect neatness, so emblematical of purity: that latent smile just sufficient to dimple the cheek without uttering a sound: and above all, the snow white stocking fitted exactly to the foot that cannot be concealed, have a witchery about them, which we are sure never entered the contemplation of the good honest Penn.

DISSOLUTION OF COPARTNERSHIP.

Instead of the Card, giving notice that Messrs. CARPENTER & CROCKETT had formed a connection in business, we should have published their dissolution of copartnership, which took place on the 11th inst.

AN ADDRESS.

NO. I.

To the Hon. NATHANIEL TERRY, Chairman of the Connecticut Antimasonic Convention, Delegate to the National Antimasonic Convention, Chairman of the Hartford Antimasonic Convention, &c.

SIR:—

Such is the relation in which you stand to a class of men calling themselves Antimasons, that I make no apology for addressing you on the subject of their claims and pretensions. You are justly considered the leader of the Antimasonic party in Connecticut—you have been chairman of all their public conventions—you attended as an active delegate their National Convention at Philadelphia, and two addresses have been put forth to the public over your signature, and their sentiments sanctioned by your name.

It is a wise provision of the constitution of our government, that every citizen may publish his sentiments on all subjects. The free exercise of this privilege I would not deny you: you have an unquestionable right to discuss the principles of Masonry, and of the fair exercise of that right no man can complain. There is no institution in this country which can claim exemption from public scrutiny; and there is no class of men whose opinions and conduct are not legitimate objects of remark. But when, under the pretended exercise of the freedom of speech and the press, men become regardless of the rights of others, they are objects of just reproach.

Subjected to such reproach, you now stand before the public. The members of a respectable society, embracing men of every profession in life, you have indiscriminately assailed. A political party has been organized, of which you are the leader, whose avowed object is the exclusion from public confidence of the members of the Masonic society. You have publicly charged six thousand freemen of Connecticut with crimes deeply infamous.—You have ascribed to them sentiments which should exclude them from every virtuous community.

In your national address you place the members of the Masonic society on the footing of foreigners, who are constitutionally excluded from the privileges of citizens. You say, 'By stronger reasons,' than exist in the case of foreigners, 'Freemasons are disqualified' for civil trusts.—'There is no government so adverse to ours (the American) as theirs (the Masonic) is, and none which punishes defection from allegiance with less ceremony and severer penalties.' 'Every man who is a Mason, by the clearest intimations of civil prudence, is disqualified for offices of power and honor.' 'They (Masons) cannot safely be our Generals, for they are bound even in behalf of a foreign enemy to stay the uplifted sword of their country's battle.' 'They cannot safely be our negotiators for peace, against the negotiator of a foreign enemy, if he is a Mason, for they are bound to look on his enemies as their enemies.' They cannot safely be our legislators, for Masonry expressly permits them to engage in mean party strife, and conspiracies against the government.' 'They cannot be our executive officers, for they are bound to aid a brother, &c. whether right or wrong.' 'They cannot be our judges or jurymen, because they are bound to an unlawful partiality, in all matters of difference between their brethren and the uninitiated.' 'To this government (American) Freemasonry is wholly opposed.' 'The abuses of which we complain,' i. e. Freemasonry, 'involve the highest crimes of which man may be guilty, because they indicate the deepest malice.'

In one of the resolutions of a state convention of which you were chairman, you say, 'Wm. Morgan has been secretly put to death by the public agents of Freemasonry, and in obedience to the laws and with the approbation of the constituted authorities of that order,' and 'the Masonic government has made open war upon the government of our country.' In another resolution you determined 'to recommend to the senatorial districts to nominate antimasonic senators, and to the several towns to nominate antimasonic town officers and representatives.' In one of your addresses you say, 'we are the antimasonic party, embracing individuals of all the parties that have hitherto existed in this country, whose sole object is to oppose Freemasonry, and in doing that we entirely lose sight of all former party distinctions.'

The Saratoga convention, with which I believe you are in fellowship, resolved—'That we will not hereafter vote for any man who belongs to the Masonic society.' They also resolved, 'That we absolve ourselves from all connexion with either of the old parties; that we will hold no connexion with them.' The New York State Convention, with which I believe you also are in fellowship, resolved, 'That at every election, whether general or local, a ticket should be formed upon the distinct principle of opposition to Masonry.' The Pennsylvania antimasonic convention, another body with which I believe you are in fellowship, say—'All who are not for us are against us—those who are not Masons are their dangerous and less reputable coadjutors—that emasculated class of politicians, entitled to no manly regard, who are only fit to swell their voices in a harem, but dare not sing the song of victory.'

Solomon Southwick, your oracle and the late antimasonic candidate for Governor of New York, in his National Observer, says: 'Antimasonry sprung from the throne of God, and under his almighty wings, it will conquer hell's master-piece. The man who hesitates to support it, stabs his country and dishonors his creator.'

In one of your public addresses, speaking of the Masonic society, you say it is an institution 'which commands its votaries to commit crimes against the laws of society, and when they have done it shields them from a just punishment.' Again, you say that the object of the society 'is to acquire unlimited power, and to control the government and affairs of the whole civilized world.'—And again you say that Masons embrace principles which 'allow of fornication and adultery and enjoin slander, persecution, oppression, revenge and murder.'

In looking at these extracts from publications over your own name, and the resolutions of your associates, we discover the real nature of your claims. You have accused those of your fellow citizens who belong to the Masonic society of the foulest crimes, and imputed to them sentiments supremely infamous.

You have charged them with the crime of treason.—'No government is so hostile to the American government as theirs is'—'they have made open war upon the government of the country'—'they are bound in behalf of a foreign enemy.'

You have charged them with the crime of murder.—'William Morgan has been put to death by the public agents of Freemasonry, and in obedience to the laws and with the approbation of the constituted authorities of their order'—'we hold Freemasons of every grade responsible for these acts'—'we impeach them (Masons) with the guilt of this violence'—Masonry 'enjoins oppression, revenge and murder.'

You have charged them with the crime of perjury.—'They have sworn by the name of Jehovah to support the constitution of their country, but you have accused them of violating their solemn vows to Heaven, and 'supporting a government more hostile to ours than any other'—and, as if unsatisfied with these specifications, you have brought against them this general charge of 'committing the highest crimes of which man can be guilty,' and that too 'from the deepest malice.'

You have imputed to them the most corrupt principles and motives of action. As judges and jurors, you have ascribed to them a readiness to pronounce their decisions from motives of criminal partiality and lips stamped with perjury; as officers in our army, you represented them willing to betray their country in the day of battle; as legislators, you have pronounced them 'willing to engage in conspiracies against their government;'—as executive officers, you have accused them of a willingness to 'connive at crimes and to rescue the guilty.'

These charges have been repeatedly made against them, in months past, by disaffected seceders, by rejected applicants for admission, and by irresponsible newspaper scribblers, and have been passed unheeded. But you have now publicly avowed yourself a responsible accuser, and have called upon the citizens of Connecticut to set the seal of truth to your charges, and to declare one hundred thousand American citizens, including six thousand freemen of this state, disfranchised in society,—without the pale of public confidence,—enemies to our common country, and outcasts from the privileges of christianity.

The members of the Masonic society are scattered through the community; they are found in every profession in life, in every religious denomination, and in every political party. Amidst the volumes of infamy which you have so profusely heaped upon their heads, it seems to have been forgotten that they are men—subjects of our common government—children of a common Father.—Liberty, the rights of conscience, and a fair reputation, are as dear to them as to their fellow men. Surely, the time has come when forbearance is no longer a virtue; the time has come when they are called upon by all that is dear to them as men, as patriots, as christians, to meet their accusers face to face. Justice demands that these efforts to blight their reputation and their hopes, and to destroy their usefulness as men, should be resisted. In the name of my Masonic brethren—in the name of six thousand free citizens of this state—I deny the truth of your charges. I set down nothing in anger against you. As patriots, as christians, as men, you have wronged us. With the Holy Bible in our hands, with an humble faith in its sublime doctrines, and a reverence for its heavenly precepts, we submit our cause to God and our country.—We meet you at the bar to which you have summoned us and we appeal to the patriotism and the intelligence of the citizens of Connecticut. By our conduct in life we will be judged. If one half of your allegations against us be true, let our infamy be proclaimed upon the house tops, and the vengeance of the laws overtake us. But if, in the judgment of our fellow men, we shall stand acquitted, we shall call upon you to do justice to those whom you have cruelly abused and injured. You shall hear from me again.

I subscribe myself by the name of one who was once a distinguished member of that fraternity.

Your obedient servant,

BENJ. FRANKLIN.

'A. B. C.'—The Lynn Record, (under the control of Mr. Jonathan Buffum) has at length attempted to give an explanation of the celebrated advertisement signed A. B. C. which was published in this paper in December last.—After so much delay, and so many promises that a full and satisfactory explanation should be given, we did expect, that if an explanation ever should be attempted, it would at least be a story of some plausibility, and that it would in some degree 'fit the case' described in the advertisement. But the pretended explanation entirely fails in both these respects. The story now produced as having given rise to the advertisement, is of the most vague description imaginable, and is said to have been derived from 'intimations given in some parts of Middlesex county for several years past, respecting certain mysterious circumstances which occurred at a public house in the county of Essex.' These mysterious circumstances as related, bear no analogy to the circumstances stated in the advertisement, such as the 'confidential conversation overheard by the Nurse,' &c. After the appearance of the advertisement, the writer states that several cases were reported of the mysterious disappearance of persons from this neighborhood—none of which met the circumstances of the tavern. He then proceeds to relate as follows:—

'On further investigation, it was found that circumstances accompanied with fearful mystery, occurred at the Tavern in Danvers, kept by Ebenezer Berry, who related the following facts to one of his neighbors, immediately subsequent to the transaction, which sufficiently exonerates him from any suspicion of being privy to the affair, and is honorable to his character for frankness and honesty. 'A person came to him, requesting to hire a room in his house for his exclusive use, for a night or two. At first Mr. Berry refused, not knowing what use it was to be put to: he applied again, and with tears in his eyes, earnestly entreated him to grant his request—that he should be ruined if it were not granted! Thinking that the person had been engaged in some unfortunate money transaction, which he wished to meet privately to settle, he consented to grant his request. The first night no one was there, but the person who engaged the room, as was known to Mr. Berry. The next night Mr. Berry discovered a Physician, formerly resident in Salem, now deceased, standing near his house, who entered with another person, an entire stranger; and he knew of no other person who entered the chamber, except the one who engaged it, and the Physician and the stranger. When they went away two persons appeared to be bearing the third between them; and who was handed into a carriage and carried off.'

'After they retired, Mr. Berry went into the chamber and found a lady's silk glove, and he observed that the bed had been disturbed, which created strong suspicions, he then believed that the third person was a female disguised in man's apparel, and who was brought there for the purpose of some operation, to evade a public reproach on her character, and that a murder was there committed! (other corroborating circumstances fully confirming this conclusion.) Mr. Berry as was honorable for him, called on the Physician who is now dead, and demanded an explanation which he declined, 'saying that it did not concern him; that it was not for him to know any thing about it!' As a further investigation would probably affect an unfortunate female, if living, the principle actor being dead; and her wicked paramour, who will one day have to give an account to an offended God, who has said, 'thou shalt do no murder'—all further inquiry is at present suspended. Mr. Berry will, no doubt, substantiate this relation, if called on: if not, his relation can be substantiated by credible witnesses. And it is but justice to state to all parties, that no person who was concerned in this nefarious transaction is known to belong to the Masonic institution. And it may in further justice to them be said, that there was no intention on the part of the individuals who have instituted this inquiry to criminate them, although they have seemed to take it for granted, that they were particularly stigmatized in this affair. A.B.C.

¶ This is the explanation given of the strange proceedings of the A. B. C. concern, after a delay of four months. We have not room in our paper to-day for such remarks as the case seems to require, but shall pursue the subject in a future paper. In the mean time, we hope to be able to ascertain how much of truth there is in the story now so circumstantially given, relative to the proceeding at the Tavern in Danvers.

RENUNCIATION.

'I the subscriber, do hereby certify, that more than two years ago, I was professedly an antimason, for the space of about six months. I was inadvertently caught by this faction, and aided in its promotion. I had attentively read the said to be Masonic obligations with a mind full of that prepossession, which always leads people to misjudge. Viewing many of the supposed Masonic obligations in the most odious light, I ventured to take a decided stand against Masonry—but I soon found myself in difficulty. I frequently conversed upon the subject, with Masons, with whom I had long been acquainted, and in whom I had always placed the greatest confidence. They informed me, that a great proportion of what the seceders have published to the world, as Masonic obligations, is false.—As these gentlemen declare positively that their Masonic obligations was misinterpreted by their enemies, the question occurred to my mind, which shall I believe?—those unimpeached gentlemen of my acquaintance, or those characters who confess before the world, that they do not consider any oath as binding, except it be administered by a civil Magistrate. In view of these circumstances, my highly excited mind become somewhat more settled. I suspected that I was influenced by a zeal not according to knowledge. I again examined the pretended Masonic obligations, published by the seceders, and found that most of them would admit of a more favorable inference than I had yet drawn from them. I at length fell in company with a Royal Arch seceder, with whom I conversed upon the subject of Masonry. I informed him, that several Royal Arch Masons had declared to me, that the obligations, as published by seceders, were incorrect—and requested that he would inform me, if the published obligations were exact copies of the original ones. After being strongly solicited, he reluctantly replied, that 'some parts of them were not!' and added, that they published what they had a right to infer from the original documents. If this man told the truth, seceders are not only guilty of perjury! but forgery! If, as the gentleman admitted that they had forged one obligation, what reason have we to doubt that they all are forged? I could not prevail on the seceder to repeat the obligation, verbatim, he peremptorily refused. Whether Masonry is a good or bad institution, must be decided by something more weighty than the declaration of a seceder.

That antimasonry has for its design, a political object, is too apparent to be doubted—indeed, the anties themselves acknowledge the fact. They urged against Masonry, that it binds its professors to support their brother

Masons for civil offices—and yet they adopted the same creed. The leaders of the antimasonic party are of a desperate stamp—their grand object is to get into office, under false colors, and not as they pretend, to suppress iniquity. All who will not support them, are denounced as murderers, and are held to be blameable in the death of Morgan. Under such specious pretensions do they seek to put down democracy—and by them many honest, credulous and unsuspecting people are caught.

Deeming this to be the case, I do most solemnly declare, that I will use all honorable means in my power, to put down that huge monster of deception, ANTIMASONRY.

OLIVER CLARK.

EQUAL RIGHTS!!!

On Monday last the Selectmen of Belchertown reported to the citizens in town meeting a list of jurors, bearing the names of eight Masons. An eloquent and highly respectable leader of the anties, ycleped Samuel Daugherty, moved to strike from the list the names of all the Masons. He said he did not object to the men, they were unexceptionable, but to the principles of the institution to which they were members. They were bound by oaths and penalties that disqualified them for the jury box. This motion was seconded by a very intelligent, and high-minded young gentleman, who probably knows the way to mill, and possibly can write his own name, called Nehemiah W. Aldrich. The question was put without discussion, and on a division of the house, 91 voted in the affirmative and 69 in the negative. A motion was immediately made to reconsider the vote, and advocated much at length by the mover, who gave way for a motion to adjourn. The meeting stands adjourned to Wednesday the 11th May, at 9 o'clock A. M. when the argument will be resumed. This is the place famed for its christian and benevolent feeling. The 'blessed spirit' of antimasonry is fast improving the religious and social feelings of our community. The harmony that exists among us is truly enviable. The array of intelligence, and virtue, and character on the affirmative of this question, is, indeed, animating to the lovers of the good cause. The honorable mover, may, as a reward to his zeal, obtain a place in the jury box, which small honor he has never yet obtained, although a half a century has beheld his pre-eminent qualifications. We cannot but rejoice in the growing reputation of our good town, and that such a goodly number of conscientious men think it their duty to disfranchise en masse, the ignorant and wicked Masons. They have triumphed long enough. They fought the battles of our revolution. They hold now the first places in church and state, and it is time that they should give place to such patriotic, disinterested, talented, and virtuous gentlemen as Messrs. Daugherty and Aldrich.

[Belchertown Sentinel.]

ANTIMASONRY.

A correspondent informs us that at the April meeting in the town of Stoughton, the Selectmen reported a list of persons to serve as Grand and Traverse Jurymen, containing the names of Messrs. Elijah Atherton, Jonathan Reynolds, Benjamin Capen, and Leonard Hodges, gentlemen whose respectability, intelligence, candor and moral worth, will not suffer in comparison with any other citizens of the town, but who were all Freemasons. The town therefore rejected the list. Abner Drake, Esq. Chairman of the Selectmen, who was chosen with great unanimity in March last, and who is not a Mason, finding that a majority of the town were dissatisfied with the list as reported, immediately resigned his office. The vacancy was supplied by the choice of an antimason. The selectmen were directed to strike from the list the names of the four last Masons, and insert the names of four antimasons, which being done, the list was excepted by a majority of five. Mr. Drake has represented the town in the legislature for several years. [Courier.]

MECHANICS' JOURNAL.

[From Silliman's American Journal.]

OBSERVATIONS ON THE IGNIS FATUUS.

Those luminous appearances, which are popularly called 'Will-o'-the-Wisp' and 'Jack-a-lantern,' have been alike the object of vulgar superstition and philosophical curiosity; and not withstanding all the attempts to apprehend and subject them to examination, they are not much more the subjects of knowledge now than they were centuries ago. They are still an ignis fatuus to the philosopher, and a thing of mystery to the credulous.

I was myself, formerly, familiar with these appearances; they were of frequent occurrence near my father's residence, owing, probably, to the proximity of extensive wet grounds, over which they are usually seen, the house stood upon a ridge, which sloped down on three sides to the beautiful meadows which form the margin of the Connecticut, and of its tributary creeks, and which, owing to their own luxuriance and the deposits of the vernal freshets, are covered with rich and constantly decaying vegetable matter. From the circumstances, also, that we had no neighbors in the direction of these grounds, a light could not be seen over them without attracting our notice. I mention this by way of suggesting, that probably the ignis fatuus, in consequence of its not being always distinguished from the lights of the surrounding houses, and therefore exciting no curiosity, is oftener seen than it is supposed to be.

These mysterious luminaries used often to be seen by the fishermen; who plied their nets by night as well as by day. They commonly reported that they saw them a little above the surface of the meadow, dancing up and down, or gliding quietly along in a horizontal line. Sometimes two and even three, would be seen together, skipping and dancing or sailing away in concert, as if rejoicing in their mutual companionship. I might entertain you with abundance of fabulous accounts of them—the offspring of imaginations tinctured with superstition, and minds of credulous with the natural love of the marvellous. Fables are of little value to the purpose of science: if the following account of some of the phenomena of the ignis fatuus, shall, with the observations of others, contribute towards a true theory of its nature, you will think them worthy a place in your Journal.

A friend of mine, returning from abroad late in the evening, had to cross a strip of marsh. As he approached the causeway, he noticed a light towards the opposite end, he supposed it to be a lantern in the hand of the person whom he was about to meet. It proved, however, to be a solitary flame, a few inches above the marsh, at a distance of a few feet from the end of the causeway. He stopped some time to look at it, and was strongly tempted, notwithstanding the miriness of the place, to get nearer to the place, for the purpose of close examination. It was evidently a vapor, phosphorretted hydrogen, issuing from the mud, and becoming ignited, or at least luminous, in contact with the air. It exhibited a flickering appearance, like that of a candle expiring in its socket, alternately burning with a large flame and then sinking to a small taper; and occasionally for a moment, became quite extinct. It constantly appeared over the same spot.

With the phenomena exhibited in this instance, I have been accustomed to compare those exhibited in other instances, whether observed by myself or others; and generally, making due allowances for the illusion of the senses and credulity of the imagination in a dark and misty night, (for it is on such nights that they usually appear,) I have found these phenomena sufficient for the explanation of all the fantastic tricks which are reported of these phantoms.

They are said to be endowed with a locomotive power. They appear to recede from the spectator, or to advance towards him. But this may be explained without locomotion—by their variation in respect to quantity of flame.—As the light dwindles away, it will seem to move from you, and with a velocity proportioned to its diminution.—

Again as it grows larger it will appear to approach you.—If it expires by several flickerings or flashes, it will seem to skip from you, and when it reappears, you will easily imagine it has assumed a new position. This reasoning accounts for their apparent motion either to or from the spectator; and I never could ascertain that they moved in any other direction, that is, in a line oblique or perpendicular to that in which they first appeared. In one instance I thought this was the fact, and what struck me as more singular, the light appeared to move, with great rapidity, directly against a very strong wind. But after looking some time, I reflected that I had not changed the direction of my eye at all, whereas if the apparent motion had been real, I ought to have turned half round. The deception was occasioned by the motion of the wind itself—as a stake standing in a rapid stream will appear to move against the current.

It is a common notion that the ignis fatuus cannot be approached, but will move off as rapidly as you approach. This characteristic is mentioned in the Edin. Encyclopædia. It is doubtless a mistake. Persons attempting to approach them, have been deceived perhaps, as to their distance, and finding them farther off than they imagined, have proceeded a little way and given over, under the impression that pursuit was vain. An acquaintance of mine, a plain man, told me he actually stole up close to one, and caught it in his hat, as he thought—'and what was it?' I asked. 'It was't nothin'.' On looking into his hat for the 'shining jellie,' it had wholly disappeared. His motions had dissipated the vapor, or perhaps his foot had closed the orifice from which it issued. To this instance another instance may be added. A young man and woman, walking home from an evening visit, approached a light which they took for a lantern carried by some neighbor, but which on actually passing it they found to be borne by no visible being; and taking themselves to flight, burst into the nearest house, with such precipitation as to overturn the furniture, and impart no small share of their fright to the family.

The circumstance that these lights usually appear over marshy grounds, explains another popular notion respecting them; namely, that they possess the power of beguiling persons into swamps and fens. To this superstition, Parnell alludes in his fairy tale, in which he makes the Will-o'-the-wisp, one of his dancing fairies;

'Then Will who bears the wispy fire,
To trail the swains among the mire,' &c.

In a misty night, they are easily mistaken for the light of a neighboring house, and the deceived traveller, directing his course towards it, meets with fences, ditches, and other obstacles; by perseverance, lands at length, quite bewildered, in the swamp itself. By this time, he perceives that the false lamp is only a mischievous jack-a-lantern. An adventure of this kind I remember to have occurred in my own neighborhood. A man left his neighbor's house late one evening, and at daylight had not reached his own, a quarter of a mile distant; at which his family being concerned, a number of persons went out to search for him. We found him near a swamp, with soiled clothes and thoughtful countenance, reclining by a fence. The account he gave was, that he had been led into the swamp by a jack-a-lantern. His story was no doubt true, and yet had a little of the marvellous in it. The night being dark, and the man's senses a little disordered withal, by a glass too much of his neighbor's cherry, on approaching his house, he saw a light, and not suspecting that it was not upon his mantel, made towards it. A bush or a log might have led to the same place, if he had happened to take it for his chimney top.

RECIPE TO MAKE PATENT YELLOW.

Mix two parts of finely powdered red lead with one part of table salt, and form the whole into a paste with water, adding more, occasionally, as the mixture becomes dry; wash off the soda which is separated, dry and fuse in a crucible the white mass which remains, and it will be converted into the paint called patent yellow. This is the muriate of lead.

EXTRAORDINARY DESCENT IN A DIVING BELL.

An attempt is now making to raise the sloop Detroit, of Albany, which was run foul of and sank on the 22d of April last, in the channel of the Highlands, opposite West Point with a cargo estimated to be worth about $32,000. By means of the diving bell, chains have been placed under her forward and aft, which, when properly connected, are to be used in raising her. The weight to be raised, is estimated at about one hundred and twenty tons. Mr. John Blair, who has frequently descended in the diving bell, in various parts of the United States, has on this occasion far exceeded any undertaking of the kind on record. He descended several times to the bed of the river, being a depth of one hundred and eighty feet, where he remained, on one occasion more than three quarters of an hour. The pressure he experienced was so great, that when drawn up it was found necessary to place him in a warm bed for several hours, before he was sufficiently restored to converse. The bell is made of black walnut, about two and a half feet in diameter at the upper part, by seven feet at the base, and about six feet in height; strongly secured with iron hoops, and loaded at the lower flange with pig-iron, secured to the rim by a canvass bandage.—It is perfectly simple in its construction, and unprovided with the means of deriving any supply of air, other than that contained within it, when first let down upon the water. When drawn up it could be distinguished several feet below the surface of the water, from the hissing (or singing noise, as the attendants expressed it,) which the confined air produced through the pores of the wood. It is altogether one of the most unexampled descents ever attempted in this or any other country.—[The Age.]

THE WONDERS OF PHYSICS.

What mere assertion will make any man believe that in one second of time, in one beat of the pendulum of a clock, a ray of light travels over 192,000 miles, and would therefore perform the tour of the world in about the same time that it requires to wink with our eyelids, and in much less than a swift runner occupies in taking a single stride? What mortal man can be made to believe, without demonstration, that the sun is almost a million times larger than the earth? and that, although so remote from us, that a cannon ball shot directly towards it, and maintaining its full speed, would be twenty years in reaching it, it yet affects the earth by its attraction in an inappreciable instant of time? Who would not ask for demonstration, when told that a gnat's wing, in its ordinary flight, beats many hundred times in a second? or that there exists animated and regular organized beings, many thousands of whose bodies laid close together would not extend an inch? But what are these to the astonishing truths which modern optical inquiries have disclosed, which teach us that every point of a medium through which a ray of light passes, is affected with a succession of periodical movements, regularly recurring at equal intervals, no less than 500 millions of millions of times in a single second! that it is by such movements, communicated to the nerves of our eyes, that we see—nay more, that it is the difference in the frequency of their recurrence which affects us with the sense of the diversity of color, that, for instance, in acquiring the sensation of redness, our eyes are affected 482 millions of millions of times; of yellowness, 542 millions of millions of times; and of violet, 707 millions of millions of times per second. Do not such things sound more like the ravings of madmen, than the sober conclusions of people in their waking senses? They are, nevertheless, conclusions to which any one may most certainly arrive, who will only be at the trouble of examining the chain of reasoning by which they have been obtained.—[Herschell's Discourse.]

BIOGRAPHY.

BIOGRAPHY OF ISAIAH THOMAS.

Isaiah Thomas, Esq. L. L. D. who died in this town on Monday, the 4th instant, was probably the oldest printer in this country, the ancient founder of this paper, and for many years its sole editor and proprietor. He was born in Boston, Jan. 19, 1749. His ancestors emigrated from England in the early settlement of that place. His grand father, Peter Thomas, was a merchant, who kept near the Town Dock in a store owned by himself, and died in 1746, leaving four sons and two daughters. The second son, Moses, resided for some time at Long Island, from whence he returned with his family to Boston. Upon a voyage to North Carolina he died, leaving a destitute widow and five children, of whom the subject of this notice was the youngest. At the age of six years, he was apprenticed to Zachariah Fowle, a printer of ballads in Boston. Instead of being sent to school he was placed in the printing office; and to enable him to set the types for the small works executed at the press, he was elevated upon a bench, raised 18 inches from the floor. The composing stick he then used is preserved with a specimen of this early attempt at typography. Without the assistance of any one, as he himself often declared, in this shop he not only acquired a knowledge of the elementary branches of learning, but was so far competent to write, as that at the age of 17, he was enabled to take charge of a newspaper at Halifax, in Nova Scotia, to which place he went upon a disagreement with his master. He remained at this place some months, during which time, the memorable Stamp Act was to take effect in the colonies. To send out a newspaper with this odious badge of servitude was repugnant to the feelings of the young New Englandman as he was then called. An editorial paragraph caused the printer to be summoned before the public authorities. He exculpated himself by casting the blame upon his apprentice, who had the charge of the paper. A second paragraph induced a call upon the young man himself, who was permitted to extricate himself, with a slight reprimand and by being reminded that he was not in Boston. The reams of paper in the office being secretly divested of the stamps, the Gazette was afterwards issued without this obnoxious mark. In March, 1767, he left Halifax and after working sometime in N. Hampshire, returned to the employment of his former master in Boston. After separating from him by agreement, he attempted to establish himself at Wilmington, North Carolina. From this place he went to Charleston S. Carolina, where he worked for two years. In consequence of declining health, he abandoned a project in which he was engaged, of going to England to acquire a more perfect knowledge of his trade. In 1770, he returned to his native town, and in connexion with Z. Fowle, commenced the Massachusetts Spy, a small paper published three times a week. The partnership continued but three months, when he purchased the establishment and published the paper upon half a sheet, until December of that year, when it was discontinued. March 7, 1771, he commenced the present Massachusetts Spy, which was published weekly upon a large sheet. Although firmly attached to the popular side in the rising political contest, he permitted his paper to be open to both parties, but the royalists soon withdrew their patronage and the paper was then devoted exclusively to the whig interest. Overtures were made by the royalists to obtain his influence, but these being rejected, an attempt at coercion was made, by an endeavor to embarrass the pecuniary concerns of the establishment. The interposition of friends prevented any trouble from this quarter. In consequence of an Essay signed Mucius Scavola, published in the Spy of November 1771, he was summoned by Gov. Hutchinson and his council, to appear at the Council Chamber.— He promptly refused obedience to the order. His answers to the messenger, which were written down at the time, discover a knowledge of his personal rights, a resoluteness of purpose, and an intrepidity of character, that strongly indicated the course he would afterwards pursue in the coming contest. A defect of authority in this branch of the Government, suspended further proceedings, until the sitting of the superior Court, when a vigorous attempt was made to procure an Indictment, but was defeated by the independent spirit of the Grand Jury. A proceeding by information, was the next course, but the general intelligence of the people frowned upon this odious engine of government, for shackling the press. In consequence of some supposed libels upon the King, the attempts at prosecution were renewed in 1772, but by the assistance of his friends he was extricated from the danger. A proffer of the professional services from the distinguished James Otis, who had withdrawn from active life in consequence of the malady which prostrated the energies of his mighty mind, was gratefully received by Mr. Thomas, and manifests the interest felt for his security by the leading patriots of the revolution.

At this period there were three other papers published in Boston, but neither of them had a patronage equal to the Spy. Upon its first publication, the subscription list contained less than 200 names, but such was its increase that in two years it had more subscribers than any other paper in New-England.

Questions of political science and constitutional law were no longer confined to the forum and halls of legislation, but became daily themes of discussion in the mechanic's shop, at the farmer's fireside, and in the town meeting. The exigencies of the times called for a Journal conducted by one whose education, habits, and modes of thinking harmonized with those of the great body of the people, where every one could find his own feelings and principles reflected without the expositions of the learned. Such a paper was found in the Spy and such an editor in Mr. Thomas. The ability, prudence, and intrepidity exhibited by him in this department gives to his character an elevation and dignity which can be obtained but by few. It is here his name stands out in bold relief, and claims the applause of mankind. Considering his youth, his limited means of acquiring learning, and the portentous state of the times, it must have required a mind of no ordinary bearing to have sustained itself in so unequal a conflict. On the one side, was most of the learning and wealth of the province, supported by the patronage of the Government, in favor of the existing state of things, and branding with the reproach of sedition and rebellion every movement for liberty; on the other a people of staid and religious habits, enjoying the most unlimited practical freedom, contending not against any actual or tangible oppression, but merely for principles and abstract right. Thus circumstanced, this youthful apostle of liberty took the field. It is true his paper was the medium of communication for some of the ablest writers of the day and was directed in a great measure by the leaders of the popular party, but all the responsibilities were upon the editor and publisher, and a single act of indiscretion might have involved him in serious consequences. That he was indebted for his editorial matter, chiefly to his own pen, is apparent from an examination of the files of the Spy at that period. Matters of fact without the tinsel of ornament, and plain argument without the sophistry of the schools, were the simple instruments by which the tempest of popular indignation was roused, and a virtuous community required no other trident to set bounds to the swelling storm. In a review of that period, he himself observes, 'common sense in common language is as necessary to influence one class of citizens, as much as learning and elegance of composition are to produce an effect upon another.— The cause of America was just, and it was only necessary to state that cause in a clear and impressive manner, to unite the American people in its support.'

During that period of peculiar gloom when the people of Boston were goaded to resentment by the provisions of the Port Bill, an act of wanton tyranny unparalleled in the history of this country, the editor of the Spy continued the publication of his paper in that city. The manner of his defeating the attempts to overawe the freedom of the press manifested a fertility of expedients and patriotic integrity that entitled him to the highest confidence. A numerous standing army held unlimited control of the metropolis and brutal outrages upon the part of the soldiery were not discountenanced by the public officers. Mr. T. had rendered himself obnoxious to the British, and threats of vengeance were thrown out against him and his printing office. Timely information was given him of intended violence, in consequence of which, he privately packed up a press and printing apparatus and transmitted them in a boat across Charles River, under the care of Gen. Warren, the martyr of Bunker Hill. Upon the opening of the Spring of 1775, arrangements were made for sending detachments into the interior to destroy the military property that the people were preserving against the approaching contest. The vigilance of the friends of liberty in town, had faithfully transmitted information into the country, of the intended expedition to Concord. The editor of the Spy was concerned in furnishing this information, in consequence of which he left Boston at day break on the morning of the memorable 19th April and joined the provincial militia in opposing the King's troops at Lexington. The next day he arrived in Worcester, opened his printing office, and recommenced the publication of the Spy in this place May 3, 1775.

This event formed an era in the history of the country as well as in the annals of this village. It was the first printing ever performed in the interior of New-England. To form an estimate of the importance of this branch of business to the past renown or present prosperity of this place, would be no easy task. The influence of a gazette, so centrally located, under the guidance of such an editor, was not lightly esteemed by the patriots of the Revolution.

The Provincial Congress were now in session at Watertown, and it was proposed by them to remove this press to that place, but it was afterwards determined that it should remain in Worcester, and that the Spy should be transmitted by post riders to Watertown and Cambridge. Until presses were established in those places, Mr. Thomas executed the printing for the Congress.

In the indulgence of a peculiar poetical fancy, his papers were generally ornamented with curiously significant devices and appropriate mottoes. In 1774 it bore a dragon and a snake, the former representing Great Britain and the serpent this country. This latter was separated into parts to represent the different colonies. The head and tail were furnished with strings for defence against the dragon, which were placed in the posture of making an attack. This device extended the whole width of the paper, with the motto over the serpent in large capitals JOIN OR DIE.

In consequence of an odious excise upon newspapers in 1785, the publication of the Spy was suspended, but its place was taken by a magazine, which supplied the same matter without submission to the Stamp Act. The publication was resumed in 1788, after a suspension of about two years. The paper began its numbers March 7, 1771, and the series has been uninterrupted to this day.—[Worcester Spy.]

SKETCHES OF CHARACTER.

[From the N. Y. Mirror.]

DANTE AND MILTON.

It is doing no injustice to the character of Milton to compare him with Dante. Both arose in times of fierce dissensions, tumultuous anarchy, and riotous license, and the mind of each was borne along by the strong tide of popular feeling which swayed their lives. Each arose also in the thickest of the struggle between prejudice and liberality, oppression and resistance; and to their credit, to the credit of genius, and to the credit of human nature be it spoken, each was found on the side of truth and justice. Not like the indolent philanthropists of the school of Rousseau,

'Nursing in some delicious solitude

Their slothful loves and dainty sympathy;

but armed champions in the lists, perilling themselves and all that belonged to them in support of a good cause. Each was the eloquent apostle, each was ready to become the martyr of freedom. Both labored with the same benevolent zeal for the welfare of their countrymen. Milton employed of his pen in the Arcopagitica, the Tract on Education, the Defensio Populi Anglicani.—Dante's works were of the same honorable and useful character, the Treatise De Vulgari Eloquentia which led to the cultivation of the language, and La Divina Commedia, which formed and fixed it.

Such is the similarity of their character—in their writings there are more points of difference than resemblance. Milton's mind was high, excursive, and contemplative; Dante's quick, stern, and decided. Milton's power of association was unbounded; it embraced and combined

'All thinking things, the object of all thought,'

Dante, whether the object before him was gloomy or beautiful, mean or majestic, saw it and spoke of it only as it was. Milton was like Noah's dove, which wandered over earth and air before it returned to its resting-place; Dante, like the falcon which fastens its eye on its prey, and lights upon it at once. Milton is like the sun, extending its rays throughout the universe: spreading undivided, and operating unspent; Dante like the lightning flashes out from amidst 'thick clouds and dark,' and ascending in dazzling and blasting power of its victim. The difference of their characters we can discover, or at least fancy in their portraits. On the high calm forehead of Milton we can see enthroned the soaring spirit, which rose in its meditations beyond the visible sphere into the distant glories of immensity, and went on its way in pride and triumph, where other minds paused, bewildered and trembling. His features speak of a soul regulated by rigid discipline, stored with wholesome learning, purified by fervent piety, which bore as little of the stain of this world as ever did any mortal mould. Dante's face is that of a man of sterner and more intense passion, quicker and more irritable feeling. His brow has not the calm expression of Milton's, it is contracted into a thousand wrinkles, the footprints of the various emotions,

'Love, hatred, pride, hope, sorrow, all save fear,' which chased each other through his brain. Dante lived in the world, and found nothing uncongenial to his taste in his contests and employments.—Milton became Latin secretary to Cromwell, and the champion of his party from a sense of duty, but, while he cheerfully performed his task, he would rather have retired from the 'busy hum of men,' to lead the peaceful religious life of pensive but not gloomy melancholy, solemn yet not sad musing, he describes so exquisitely. Dante was of the Roman temper of Caesar and Cato, Milton had more of the attic elegance of Plato and Xenophon. The one loved to be first in a crowd of combatants, the other

'Apart sat on a hill retired,

In thought more elevate, and reasoned high

Of providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate.'

Dante we have always thought a greater master of the affections than Milton. He is most vivid and dramatic in his sketches; quicker, more fervent and impassioned in his tone of thought. Neither of them would have had much success in treating the other's subject. The Englishmen wanted a fair field, untouched and unapproached by man; the Italian could not 'build the lofty rhyme,' without the abundant material which the business and passions of the world supplied. The gloomy caves of hell would not have furnished him with inspiration had he not peopled them with the vindictive jealousies and sharp contest of his own stormy and eventful life.

Dante is often rough and homely in his narrative. Milton's faults are contrary, metaphysical obscurity and over refinement. He never forgets himself; though his wing, after too high a flight, may sometimes flag, he never entirely droops his pinion; to use his own happy expression, on him, wherever he moved

'A pomp of winning graces waited still.'

He is a magician whose art can cover every barren spot with flowers, and beguile the tedious way he leads us by the splendid scenery he scatters around it. Dante is rather a fellow-traveller with us, who in a long journey is sometimes harsh and repulsive, but whom we always feel to be a man of no common order, and whose powers, when passion gives them eloquence or energy can startle, soothe, dazzle, terrify us at will. We love the honest hatred of wrong, the quick sensitive pride, the constant though wounded patriotism of his character; we admire the intensity, sternness, and simple majesty of his genius, and only regret that he speaks a foreign tongue, and not our own. Had he been an Englishman, he would have made a noble triumvir to share with Shakespeare and Milton the empire of the literary world.

MISCELLANY.

CURE FOR THE RHEUMATISM.

A Ghost Story.

'Two individuals, residing in the lower part of Virginia, having pursued several avocations, for a livelihood, without success, turned their attention to pilfering. Starting out upon a certain evening they proposed to themselves different routes, and as a meeting place a grave-yard not far distant, they performed their rounds, through without meeting anything worthy attention. Unwilling to give up, they started out again; one to a sheep fold near at hand, and another to a recently made grave. The one who proposed to rob the 'sacred sanctuary of the dead,' after removing the dirt and obtaining the shroud (for it was this that induced him to perform the action) enveloped himself in it and quietly seated himself in the church door, awaiting the arrival of his companion. About this time a traveller passes, who seeing the object, in such a place, and at such a time, concluded it must be an inhabitant of another region. Feeling his animal courage failing, he gave spurs to his horse, and in a short time arrived at the tavern, where he related the wonderful appearance. He was hoisted at by those present, and particularly by one, who was effected with the rheumatism, and who had long since concluded that nothing immaterial was permitted to visit this world. Confident in his belief, he was willing, he said, to accompany him to the spot provided he could get any one to assist him. The traveller willing to test his courage, takes him on his back—and starts off for the place. When they arrived, near enough to discern the ghost he says;

Do you see it in the door?

I see something, says the lame man, but I want to be a little nearer.

The traveller still going closer, said—

Now do you see him?

A little closer,

Well, now do you see him?

The ghost supposing it to be his companion, returned from his expedition, with a sheep on his back, rises from his reclining posture and inquires—

'Is he fat? ————— IS HE FAT? —'

'IS HE FAT?'

'Fat or lean,' cries the traveller, 'by hoke you may take him,' so disburdening himself of the his load, he takes rather an unceremonious leave of his ghostship and directs his way towards the tavern as fast as his legs would carry him.

The cripple thus left without hope of escape, recovered from his lameness all of a sudden, and to his own, as well as the astonishment of the traveller, arrived first at the tavern, and from that day to this, his belief is firm in the visitation of Ghosts.

ARCHITECTURE.—ORDERS.

We come now to the consideration of a subject, probably more generally interesting than those to which we have already referred. We allude to that portion of the work before us, which treats of the different Orders of Architecture. In all ages of the world, mankind have been induced, from necessity, to seek shelter against the vicissitudes of climate or the attack of wild beasts. In many countries among the rudest tribes of men, excavations and fissures of rocks, hollows of trees, and caves of the earth, have served as habitations. Travellers inform us of a tree growing in Africa, the hollow of which affords a habitation for thirty negro families; which is said to be the largest tree in the world. They also inform us of a subterraneous city or cave, occupied by moors, in which there are several hundred inhabitants. Armstrong, in his Journal of travels in the seat of war between Russia and Turkey, has the following observation: 'The Georgian or Tartar dwellings are seldom to be found above ground: the top is covered with beams of wood, branches of trees, and above all, with a coat of earth, which makes it level with the ground. The natives are frequently disturbed, when sitting round the fire, by the leg of some unfortunate cow or camel making its appearance down the chimney; and it is not uncommon for the lambs to fall through, and spoil whatever may happen to be cooking.' But among a civilized people, the desire of seeking for more agreeable habitations must be soon felt. The nature of the climate and the materials which it more readily afforded, regulated, in a great degree, the construction of the first buildings in which men sheltered themselves. According to Diodorus Siculus, the first buildings of Palestine were of reeds and canes interwoven, and so compact as not to admit of the rain and wind. Wood appears to be a material so proper for building and so easily wrought, that men would, in all ages, employ it for these purposes, in places where it could be easily procured. The branches of trees stuck in the ground and rudely interwoven, formed a material for constructing them. It is probable that this method of setting trees on end and binding them together at top and bottom, first gave rise to the idea of base and capital of columns.—When these branches were daubed with clay and covered over with leaves and turf, they presented a model of those cabins, in which, according to Vitruvius, the earliest tribes of men were accustomed to dwell. At first, before men became acquainted with edge tools of iron, trees were felled by means of fire, or by axes made of sharp stones. They undermined the trees by little at a time, by continuing a fire at their roots; and by the same means they could divide a tree into the requisite length. By degrees, however, tools for cutting and smoothing wood were invented: the tools for smoothing were at first nothing more than sharp stones, sufficiently hard and free from brittleness. Some of our North American Indians make use of the same kind of tools at the present time. 'The use of bricks or masses of clay formed in moulds and dried in the sun, or baked in stoves, as the materials of buildings, is of very great antiquity, and is a sufficiently obvious invention.' According to Moses, the tower of Babel was built of bricks: Go to, let us make bricks and burn them thoroughly, and they had brick for stone and slime had they for mortar—Gen. ch. xi. v. 3. Pkny informs us that in the most remote ages of the Egyptians, they made use of bricks for building their houses, and tiles for covering them. To employ stones for the same purpose was very natural, where they were abundant, and found in masses sufficient to be removed by manual dexterity.

When architecture was in its glory in ancient Greece, the Ionic was the favorite order, as being the most graceful, light, and elegant. Of this order were the temple of the Delphic oracle, the temple of Apollo at Miletus, and the temple of Diana at Ephesus:

'The Ionic then, with decent matron grace,
Her airy pillar heaved. —————'

After the Ionic, the Corinthian was introduced, which, in attempting greater perfection, has deviated from the true simplicity of nature. It marked an age of luxury and magnificence, when pomp and splendor had become the predominant passion, but had not yet extinguished the taste for the sublime and beautiful. Attempts were made to unite all these characters, but a chastened judgment is not satisfied; a corrupted taste is only pleased:

————— Luxuriant last,
'The rich Corinthian spreads her wanton wreath.'

In the Composite order this deviation is more remarkable: this was invented by the Italians, and although rich and profuse in its ornaments, discovers an obvious want of correct taste and judgment, and shows that the Greeks had exhausted all the principles of grandeur and beauty, in the original orders. And in these, they had arrived at the acme of perfection, because the Composite could not possibly have been introduced without combining all the rest; consequently, simplicity is destroyed; which is in conformity with nature, and the great concomitant of beauty. It is said this order was first used by the Romans in their triumphal arches, to show their dominion over the people whom they conquered.

An anonymous writer on the history of architecture observes, that the Art is supposed to have arrived at its glory in the time of Augustus Cæsar; but that, as well as other polite arts, were neglected under Tiberius. Nero, indeed, notwithstanding his vices, retained an uncommon passion for Architecture; but luxury and dissoluteness had a greater share in it, than real magnificence. In the time of Trajan, Apollodotus excelled in the art, and by which he obtained the favor of that prince, and erected that famous pillar called 'Trajan's', which is remaining to this day. But after this time, Architecture began to decline, though it was for some time supported by the cure and magnificence of Alexander Severus; yet it fell with the western empire, and sunk into corruption. All the most beautiful monuments of antiquity were destroyed by the ravages of the Visigoths, and from that time, Architecture became so coarse and artless, that these professed Architects were totally ignorant of just designing, wherein the whole beauty of Architecture consists: hence a new manner of Architecture called Gothic, took its rise. Charlemagne industriously labored for the restoration of Architecture; and the French applied themselves to it with success, under the encouragement of Hugh Capet. His son Robert prosecuted the same design of modern Architecture, and by degrees, ran into as great an excess of delicacy, as the Goths had before done of massiveness. To those we may add the Arabesks and Moresk or Moorish Architecture, which were much of the same nature with the Gothic, except that as the former were brought from the North by the Goths and Vandals, the latter was brought from the South by the Moors and Saracens.—The Architects of the thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, who had some knowledge of sculpture, seemed to make perfection consist wholly in the delicacy and multitude of ornaments, which they lavishly bestowed on their buildings, but frequently without conduct or taste. In the two last centuries, the Architects of Italy and France assiduously endeavored to retrieve the primitive simplicity and beauty of ancient Architecture; nor did they fail of success,—inasmuch that now most churches, palaces, &c. are built entirely after the antique.

The first Grecian order in point of antiquity, is the DORIC, so called from the Dores, a small tribe in Greece; or as some say, from Dorus, an Achaian chief, who first employed that order in erecting a temple to Juno at Argos. In all the most perfect specimens of this order now remaining, the column springs immediately from the foundation, having no base properly so called, but only a small swelling round the bottom, resembling what we see at the root of a tree, and sufficient to show that we see the whole of the shaft. The bæle, we learn from Vitruvius, first appeared in the Ionic column. The Doric column being short in proportion to its diameter, and consequently strong, the entablature placed upon it, is of course more massive than that of the other orders, being in height one-fourth part of the total height of the column. Several specimens of this order are given; the most beautiful of which is the elevation of the temple of Minerva, the chief goddess of the Athenians, to whom it was dedicated. This temple is said to be the most beautiful piece of antiquity remaining. It was built by Pericles, who employed Ictinus and Callicrates for his architects. 'The entablature is charged with historical figures, of admirable workmanship; the figures of the pediment, though seen at so great a height, appear to be large as life, being in alto-relievo, and well executed; the figure in the middle seems to have been made for Jupiter, its right arm being broken off, which probably held the thunder. It is likely that between his legs was placed the eagle; for the beard, and majesty and expression of his countenance, and the figure being naked, as he was usually represented by the Greeks, sufficiently show it to have been made for Jupiter. At his right hand is another figure, covered half way down the legs, coming towards him; which perhaps was a Victory, leading the horses of Minerva's triumphal chariot, which follows it. The horses are finished with great art; the vigor and spirits peculiar to these animals seem here to receive addition, as if inspired by the goddess they drew. Minerva, in the chariot, is represented rather as the goddess of learning than of war, without helmet, buckler, or a Medusa's head on her breast, as Pausanias describes her image within the temple. Behind her is another figure of a woman sitting. The next two figures in the corner, are the emperor Hadrian, and his empress Sabina. On the left hand of Jupiter are five or six figures, which appear to be an assembly of the gods, where Jupiter introduces Minerva, and acknowledges her his daughter. The pediment at the other end of the temple, was adorned with figures, expressing Minerva's contest with Neptune, about who should name the city of Athens; of which there only remains a part of a sea horse. The frieze is charged with basso-reliefs of excellent workmanship; on which are represented the battles of the Athenians with the Centaurs: these appear to be as old as the temple itself. Within the portico on high, and on the collar of the temple, is another border of basso-reliefs round it, at least on the north and south sides of it, which is without doubt as ancient as the temple, and of admirable workmanship, but not in so high a relieve as the other. On it are represented sacrifices, processions, and other ceremonies of the heathen worship! This splendid temple, prior to the late Greek revolution, was occupied as a Turkish mosque.

The next example is from the Temple of Thesus, at Athens; said to be one of the most ancient specimens of the Doric order now existing; and is, in the opinion of many of our architects, superior to the specimen from the temple of Minerva. This temple was erected about ten years after the battle of Salamine, by Cimon the son of Miltiades. The ceiling of the porch is particularly spoken of as remarkable for its construction: there are great beams of marble, the upper sides of which are level with the bed of the cornice, and the ends corresponding exactly to the triglyphs in the frieze, which give the idea of the disposition of the timbers which were first used in buildings, and from which the Doric order had its origin. Examples are likewise given from the Portico of Philip of Macedon, in the Island of Delos, which is of a lighter proportion than either of the preceding; from the Portico at Athens; from an order found in Asia, near the temple of Minerva Polioa; and from the Choragic Monument of Thrasyllos. The plates illustrating this order, are very neatly executed. Some beautiful specimens of the Roman Doric are also given.

The IONIC order derives its name from the Iones, a Greek people on the east coast of the Archipelago, whose capital was Ephesus, celebrated on many accounts, but particularly for the magnificent temple of Diana. This admirable structure was in length 425 feet, and in breadth 220 feet; it was surrounded on all sides by a double range of marble columns, 70 feet in height, and consequently 7 feet 9 1-2 inches in diameter at the bottom.—The Ionic column is taller than the Doric; and although simple, is nevertheless graceful and majestic. If the Doric were meant to represent the manly, robust figure of Hercules, the Ionic might properly be the emblem of the dignified simplicity and elegance of Diana. In this order the base supporting the column was first introduced. Several beautiful examples are given; the only one of which we shall notice is from the Ionic temple on the river Ilysus, at Athens. The simplicity and greatness of the parts, their judicious arrangement, the beautiful turning of the volutes, and the graceful curve of the hem hanging between them, render this one of the most beautiful and bold examples of this order. The elegant base of the column, the grand proportion of the entablature, the masonry mouldings of the cornice, and the spacious surface of the frieze, well adapted for sculptured ornaments, and the architrave for its strength, as it is not broken into two or more facies, are considerations which should recommend this example.

The CORINTHIAN order took its rise in the flourishing days of Corinth, a celebrated city commanding the communication of the peninsula of Peloponnesus, with the continent of Greece. The beautiful foliage of the capital of this order is traced to the following incident: A young lady of Corinth dying, her nurse carried a basket, containing her playthings, the day after her funeral, and placed it on the grave. The basket, covered with a flat tile, was placed accidentally on the stem of the plant acanthus, which sending out leaves soon enclosed it, having their ends turned downwards when they reached the tile. This object struck the fancy of Callimachus, a celebrated sculptor of those days, who immediately introduced a figure of it on the top of an elegant column of his invention. Thus the capital of the Corinthian column always resembles a deep narrow basket, covered with a tile and completely surrounded by foliage. Such is the account given by Vitruvius; but later writers on architecture have imagined they could discover this ornamented capital, in the description of the temple erected by Solomon in Jerusalem; with this difference, that there, the foliage represented branches of the palm, and not the leaves of the acanthus. It is, however, observed, that the foliage of the Corinthian capital is frequently an imitation of the leaves, not of the acanthus, but of the olive, and other plants, according to the taste of the architect. Three examples of this order are given. The first is taken from the Pantheon at Rome; which, though plain, is beautiful and chaste, and is called an excellent model of the order. The next is the outline of the leaves and elevation of the capital, also from the Pantheon. The last is from the three columns in the Campo Vaccino, supposed to be the remains of the temple of Jupiter Stator, at Rome. The engraving exhibited in this plate, is more accurate than any which has been before published. The capital and entablature are restored from the drawings of an artist, who was so obliging as to favor Mr. Nicholson with sketches of the ornament, which he had from the original. 'The elegance and beauty of the capital; its graceful form; the grandeur and excellent proportion of the entablature, with the delicacy of the ornament, render this one of the most complete examples now existing of the Corinthian order.'

The first Italic order is called the TUSCAN, as having been employed by that ancient people, once powerful in Italy. 'It is, however, remarkable, that no vestiges now exist of any building in which the Tuscan column was employed to support an entablature, or any other weight. Vitruvius, it is true, gives instructions for erecting temples according to this order, but it does not appear that such edifices were actually erected. The only examples of the use of the Tuscan column that have come down to our times, are the admirable monuments still subsisting in their original perfection, the column of Trajan and Antonius in Rome, and the column of Theodosius in Constantinople.' Having no complete example from antique buildings, that which is given in the work before us, is taken from the description of Vitruvius. It is almost the same as the Doric, from which it is evidently derived.

The other Italic order, (and the last of the five orders) is called the COMPOSITE; because it seems to be a combination of the Ionic and the Corinthian, to which last it bears the greatest resemblance, imitating the former only in the adoption of the volute in the capital, in addition to the Corinthian foliage. A specimen richly ornamented, is to be seen in the triumphal arch of Titus; of which are represented in scripture, the golden candlestick of seven branches, and other precious articles carried away from the last temple of Jerusalem. The example given, is from that arch, and is made choice of as being the most beautiful and elegant existing, and as the most proper model for this order.

[CONCLUSION IN OUR NEXT.]

LIBEL SUIT.—We understand that the Grand Jury, on the complaint of an itinerant antimasonic lecturer of the name of Avery Allen, a seceding Mason and Connecticut stone-cutter, have found a bill against the editor of the Galaxy, for a libel! This fellow for more than a year past, has been strolling about the country, defiling our towns and villages, by the exhibition of what his party calls the 'blasphemous ceremonies' of Masonry; and, if not creating, at least giving rise to the most indecent outrages on the peace of society. He commenced his agitating career in Providence, where he was beset by a mob of indignant citizens, and we believe bound over either to keep the peace, or to answer to a charge of violating the laws of the town. We next heard of him in Easton, in this State, where having procured the Town Hall, (the selectmen being antimasons,) he attempted to amuse by his buffoonery, an assembly of seventy or eighty persons, of 'no particular age or description.' Others, who were unfriendly to indecency and buffoonery, demanded admittance, but were refused; on which a mob was created and the doors forced; the windows broken, and the inmates being previously armed with clubs, a general riot ensued. Posts and rail-fences were in immediate demand, much to the annoyance of Allen and his party, who believing that the 'better part of valor is discretion,' retreated under the benches and cried for quarters. A truce was agreed upon. But the assailants feeling themselves insulted by one of the mountebank party, again resorted to arms, and quickly cleared the hall. It was soon ascertained that they had fled to another hall, where they were speedily followed; and after the breaking of windows and commission of other violence, the exhibition was abandoned. This was the expression of an indignant community. It was not the work of Masons. There are not more than four or five Masons in the town; and we are authorized to say that they were not present. His next excitement was in Salem, with the particulars of which our readers are acquainted.—This is the man on whose testimony, and in defence of whose character, the Grand Jury of this Commonwealth have indicted a respectable individual! O tempora!—O mores!

If the antimasonic political panders expect to restrain the liberty of the press, by appeals to the laws, they are mistaken in the independence and character of the gentleman who, in this republican country, have the administration of the laws, which are a terror only to knaves.—We are aware that truth is not agreeable to these panders, and we do not wonder that they loathe the sight of their own revolting portraits; but so long as honorable men control the press, they must hear the truth, and behold their baseness hung up to the finger of scorn. They know what honest men think of them. They know that they are regarded by the respectable portions of the community, as a banditti of recreant political jugglers, alike destitute of the principles of honor and honesty. The respected editor of the Galaxy, will not fear to exclaim 'I will meet thee again at Philippi,' in this nineteenth century of the Christian era; whatever he might have been, in by-gone centuries of despotism, bigotry, superstition, witchcraft, infallibility, racks of torture and Inquisitions. Judges, in our times, are learned men, and Jurors are advocates of liberal institutions of government and of rational freedom of speech. Although bills of indictment are found on a partial production of the evidence; yet at the trial the TRUTH, we trust, antimasonic exertions to the contrary notwithstanding, will be allowed to be proved in defence; when published with meritorious and justifiable cause. Anon we shall know. A legal process is pending, and therefore now, MUM is the word!

FIRE.—On Wednesday night, about a quarter before 11, a four story brick building in Broad Street, occupied partly by Mr. Maynard as a ship-bread store, and partly by several Irish families, was discovered to be on fire.—It is said to have originated in the oven used for baking at the back part of the building. Nine persons, it is said, have perished. The remains of six bodies supposed to be those of two children and four adults, were on Thursday morning taken from the smoking ruin:—their screams during the progress of the flames were heard, and struck terror to the hearts of those who endeavored, but fruitlessly to relieve them. A man, without any clothing on, was seen running as though frantic, about one of the rooms in the second or third story, through a window from which he jumped.—Little, if any of the property was saved. We understand that a man who escaped from the burning edifice on Wednesday night died, the next morning, in consequence of his dreadful burns.

LITERARY.—We peruse by the New York papers, that the Messrs. HARPERS of New York have published in one volume, the interesting and affecting sketches entitled 'Passages from the Dairy of a Physician.' The N. Y. Courier says, 'In style, language, and matter, these sketches are unequalled by any thing of the kind we have ever met with, and are evidently from the pen of one who unites to the acquirements of the scholar, a profound knowledge of human nature.' The same gentlemen have also recently published the third series of Romance of History, by L. Ritchie. This series gives sketches of the history of France, from the age of Charlemagne to the present day.

A B. C. The Salem Register of Thursday contains a full and satisfactory exposition of this infamous transaction. We shall lay it before our readers next week. Allen, the itinerant lecturer, is one of the conspirators.

The Commentator has been merged in the Galaxy, which paper will be issued on Saturday evening; the second edition, issued on Sunday morning, to be sent to the subscribers of the Commentator.

The city government have determined upon 60 as the number of Representatives for the city for the ensuing political year.

The house of Mr. O. H. Saxton, of Burlington Vt. was destroyed by fire on the 27th ult.

THE WREATH.

[From the Am. Traveller.]

THEY SAY THAT SHE REMEMBERED ME.

They say that she remember'd me
And oft'esp'ly'd my name,
And though her looks were alter'd then
Her heart was still the same;
Her pride forbade her to express
Her bosom's struggling swell,
Nor did she ever dare to breathe
The thoughts her lips would tell.

Oh, she was fairest of the fair,
The kindest of the kind;
Her gaiety was innocence.
Each accent soft and mild—
The drooping willow waves above
The grave where now she sleeps,
And o'er her humble, grassy bed
The tender ivy creeps.

They told me that another youth
Had gain'd the heart I prized,
And many, many other things
They only had surmised;—
But why did I believe them true?
Too soon her faith was tried!
Thus, thus I broke the heart of one
Who knew me—loved—and died!

THE WHITE HAT OF DOWN.

Of all the fine hats I ever did gaze on Whether Beaver or Leghorn, whether white, red or brown,
There is none which my tongue or my pen would emblazon.
Save the sweetest of all, the white hat of down.

Oh! how it adorns the brow of the wearer,
As spotless and fair as the bosom below;
Sure nothing on earth can be sweeter or fairer
Than the white hat of down, as white as the snow.

The white hat of down; what a contrast producing
To the blushes which glow on the fair face enshrin'd,
The tints of the rose and the lily confusing;
Oh! where such another sweet hat shall we find.

The white hat of down, here 's health to the wearer,
And ne'er may the storms of adversity frown,
And surely her heart is both purer and fairer,
Than her beautiful hat—the white hat of down.

IMPRUDENT LEAP.

An overgrown Johnny Raw, who would measure six feet two in his stockings, made his first appearance in Catskill, (N. Y.) a few days ago, for the double purpose of disposing of a load of lumber, and seeing the wonders of the town. Having never in his life fallen in with a water craft larger than a canoe, his first desire was to see a ship sloop, horsboat, or steamboat, it was all one to him. He drove directly to the wharf—a vessel swinging out a few yards in the stream, by her cable, and the surface of water between her and the wharf covered with a floating mass of scum, chips and rubbish collected by the eddy. He paid no attention to this, but with his eyes fixed on the vessel, walked to the edge of the wharf, and jumped off a distance of about five feet to take a nearer view; down he went, and the scum closed over him! in a moment he reappeared fortunately within reach of the dock,—he seized hold, and crawled out dripping and shivering with the cold.

Oh dear said he, 'I thought it was ground'.

AN ADDRESS.

NO. II.

To the Hon. NATHANIEL TERRY, Chairman of the Connecticut Antimasonic Convention, Delegate to the National Antimasonic Convention, Chairman of the Hartford Antimasonic Convention, &c.

SIR:—

I have already adverted to the charges which you have made against a large class of your fellow citizens.—The manifest injustice of assailing a whole community, without regard to character, seems to have suggested an artful distinction between hostility to the Masonic Society and hostility to its members; and you commenced one of your public addresses with the extraordinary declaration, 'We have no hostility to Masons, many of whom have been among the most distinguished men of our country.' Between the folly and the inconsistency of this remark it is difficult to make a comparison.

You have already passed sentence of condemnation against the whole fraternity; you have pronounced them 'guilty of the highest crimes which man can commit;—you have asserted that they are less worthy of civil trusts than foreigners and outlaws, you have presided in two public conventions, and travelled at great expense to the city of Philadelphia to attend a third, convened for no other purpose than the indiscriminate proscription of Masons; and yet, with an air of self-complacency you now remark, 'We have no hostility to Masons; they are among the most distinguished and best men in our country.' May we not apply to you the language of the inspired writer of Israel—'As a madman who casteth firebrands, arrows and death, so is he that deceiveth his neighbor and saith, am I not in sport?' Take back your charges—do justice to those whom you have injured, or admit the hypocrisy of the remark, 'we have no hostility to Masons.'

Although you have assailed us as men, I will examine this pretended distinction between hostility to the society and hostility to its members.

A society is the union of a number of individuals for a specific object. A Bible society is the union of individuals for one object, a literary society for another, and a mechanics' society for another. Now what is the act of one of these societies but the joint act of its members? Indeed, we can have no idea of the existence of a society independently of its members. If you charge the Bible society with resisting the government, who is implicated in the charge? The act of the society is the act of its members; you of course accuse the members of the crime of treason. If you charge the mechanics' society with murder, your charge implies an act which can have been perpetrated only by the members of that society; you therefore accuse those members of this crime. Now whatever may be the object of a voluntary society, the nature of its acts remains the same. Whether men associate as a mechanics' society, as a Masonic society, or a christian church, the acts of the society will in all cases be the acts of its members.

This distinction being exploded, you attempt to conceal your injustice to Masons by pretending merely to oppose Masonry. What you mean by the term Masonry, you have left us to conjecture. I suppose, however, you understand it as others do, to mean the objects of the Masonic society. When we speak of an Episcopal society, a Congregational society, a Methodist society, or a Catholic society, we mean the union of a number of individuals, associated for the purpose of maintaining religious worship in a particular form or a particular faith. By Episcopacy, Congregationalism, Methodism and Catholicism, we mean the distinctive sectarian objects of their different communities. Upon the same principle, the purposes of the Masonic union constitute Masonry. Now if the purposes and objects of these societies be unlawful, it is impossible to rescue their members from the imputation of guilt. If a combination should be formed to pillage a city, would not every member of that combination in the eye of morality be a robber? It is no answer that the crime has not been committed; the unlawful purpose was formed, and every conspirator is morally guilty. If, then, as you asserted, the very objects of the Masonic association are the perpetration of crimes and the protection of the guilty, every member has registered his unlawful purpose, and in the judgment of heaven is a malefactor.—There can be no exceptions. All who have voluntarily united with this association and approved of its objects, fall under the same sentence.

The unmeaning distinctions to which you have resorted, have neither changed nor modified your accusations.—When, therefore, in one of your addresses you aver that, 'Masonry enjoins fornication, adultery, slander, persecution, oppression, revenge and murder,' the world will understand that you accuse us of an unlawful combination for the avowed purpose of perpetrating these crimes.

Surely, then, the question in discussion involves our dearest interests. Your accusations have been industriously circulated and extensively believed. An institution, which has been deemed useful by many and harmless by all, has by you been held up as the object of terror. An extraordinary excitement has pervaded a portion of our community. The indignation excited by a supposed violation of public law in a sister state, has been converted into the wildest fanaticism, and an honest effort to vindicate the majesty of the law, has been superseded by the violence of a political faction. A crusade has been waged against thousands of our countrymen, unparalleled in the history of this republic. A monster has been let loose upon our land,—he has trampled with uncontrolled violence upon the happy institutions of our country, and invaded the sanctuary of the Most High. Harmony, virtue and patriotism, until now the flourishing productions of our soil, have been blasted by the noxious vapors of his breath. Churches which three years ago exhibited scenes of harmony and brotherly love, worthy the confidence of an approving angel, have become emphatically the 'waste places of Zion.' The friendship of neighborhoods, the domestic peace of families, have withered under the blighting influence of that persecuting and demoralizing spirit which your efforts have promoted.

The members of the Masonic society, many of whom are connected with the christian church, have, like other men, looked with pain upon this moral desolation. While a fiend has marched with a bold step through the community, poisoning the hearts of some, and taxing the credulity of others, we have solicitously inquired for the path of duty. If we have denied the ten thousand tales of scandal which have been circulated to our prejudice, our denial has been claimed to be evidence of our guilt. If amidst the crush of surrounding elements we have remained silent, even our silence is a crime, for which you have demanded our immolation. Like the tiger bent upon his prey, you have watched us as the victims of public vengeance, and demanded the relinquishment of every right which as freemen we enjoy.

We admire the beauty and the harmony of the Masonic institution, and cherish the purity of its principles. We believe that it is admirably calculated to relieve the distresses and promote the happiness of man. Yet we are willing to sacrifice it on the altar of patriotism, at the call of our country. We condemn not the opinions, nor even the honest prejudices of our fellow citizens on the subject of Masonry. They have the same right to their opinion which we have to ours. With this feeling we have sought the extent of your demands—an unconditional surrender of the rights of conscience and the freedom of opinion, has been your answer. We will make any reasonable sacrifice to extinguish the fire of discord which you have lighted up in society. We deplore the desolation which you have spread around us, but we cannot purchase peace at so dear a rate. We cannot consent to a disfranchisement, for no other crime than being members of a society which was patronised by Washington, and Franklin, and Lafayette, and which in our souls, as God is our judge, we believe to be not only harmless but useful. We cannot submit unheard to your demands. We meet you at the bar of the public. Our fellow men are our judges.

It is no part of my purpose to discuss the principles of Masonry. That is a task which I have neither leisure nor inclination to undertake. A Masonic society is involved in no mystery. Like a Bible society, a mechanics' society, or a christian church, it is composed of mer—plain men. They have no communion, as you seem to suppose, with ghosts, hobgoblins or devils; but they think, feel, and act like other men: and like other human societies, the Masonic institution will stand or fall upon its own merits and the influence of public opinion. If the society is useful, let it be continued; but if it is not, let it be dissolved. My business is with you. You have charged us with crimes in the face of the community. I demand the proof on which you rely.

Your ob't servant,

BENJ. FRANKLIN.

[New Haven, Conn. Herald.]

We are surprised that the Erie Gazette should, at this particular time, give its sanction to the slanderous and unfounded imputation against the Masonic fraternity, that they retain in fellowship the persons who were concerned in the outrage on Morgan. The printer of the Gazette has been furnished with proof that all who were implicated in that transaction were long ago, ay, even before the public mind had become much excited, suspended for an indefinite period; which, so long as the suspension exists, is virtually the same as expulsion.

Be the Masonic institution as bad as its worst enemies represent it, there is certainly, according to our creed, as much sin in bearing false witness against it, as though it stood fair to the world.—[Erie Obs.]

A. B. C.

We regret that we feel compelled to take any further notice of the A. B. C. plot. But the reckless individuals who contrived that imposition upon the public, having renewed an attempt at an explanation, and in doing so, having further exposed their own baseness, and their utter disregard of the consequences of their foul intrigues, we thought it due to the public and to ourselves, to offer the following statement and remarks.

The advertisement signed 'A. B. C.' was prepared in Boston, by DR. PHELPS and others, (as acknowledged by MR. BUFFUM, who afterwards stood god-father to it) and sent down to a knot of zealous antimasons in Lynn, who procured its insertion in the Register, Dec. 21. The purport of the advertisement is doubtless recollected by most of our readers. After an introduction about a 'confidential conversation between a dying man and his friend, overheard by the nurse,' which gave rise to 'apprehensions of a most nefarious transaction that took place in this vicinity,' the advertisers call upon any person who can give information of the 'strange disappearance of a man supposed to have belonged to the county of Essex, between the years 1810 and 1820, with the place of his abode, the description of his person, and any other particulars in relation to him,' &c. Such information, it was added, might 'bring to light an event of deep interest to many persons.' The notice, after directing how communications were to be made, concludes with a request that the Editor of the Register should give notice in his paper of any information left for 'A. B. C.' for the reason that the person who caused the advertisement to be published 'resides many miles distant.'

The advertisement brought reports of several cases of persons missing from Salem, which were communicated to persons who called at the office in behalf of 'A. B. C.'—The public curiosity was awakened by the advertisement, rumor with her thousand tongues was busy in reporting tales, some of which proved a serious injury to a worthy and industrious man in Salem, who felt it his duty to seek out the authors of the advertisement. He accordingly went to Lynn, in company with another gentleman whose family had been disturbed by the advertisement, and saw Mr. Jonathan Buffum, who acknowledged the whole to have proceeded from himself and the person in Boston referred to above. The Salem gentleman insisted on an acknowledgment from Mr. Buffum, in writing, that he was not implicated in any way whatever, in the transaction alluded to in the advertisement, to which Mr. Buffum readily assented. He accordingly wrote an exculpatory paragraph which was published in this paper.

Mr. Buffum was called upon to give an explanation of the nefarious transaction, which he had repeatedly promised to give us; and as he still insisted in his paper that the ground work of the notice was founded on fact, the public as well as ourselves were anxious for an explanation. To this call he responded in his paper of Jan. 12, by stating that a gentleman in Lynn had been informed 'that a person now living in the vicinity of Essex, had made a disclosure of certain facts which excited strong suspicions that a most nefarious transaction had taken place in this vicinity a few years since, the particulars of which, as related, would be improper, in the present stage of the investigation, to make public.' Thus the matter remained covered up in vague language, till Buffum, in his paper of April 27th, attempted to explain the whole affair—and he assures the public, that 'the delay had been solely occasioned by the difficulty of tracing the actors in what is now fully believed to be a most atrocious and guilty deed.'

In this pretended explanation of the affair, we are told that 'for a number of years past there had been intimations in Middlesex, of mysterious circumstances occurring at a tavern in Essex, and which were related to several persons confidentially, by the taverner and his wife, and that the tavern keeper had been heard to say, 'he would never let any part of his house again without knowing what use it was to be put to. This sort of gossip had been whispered round Middlesex for a period of sixteen years, according to Buffum's wonderful explanation, when, behold, last summer it got to the ears of the good people of 'Nahant, Saugus, Lynn, Reading,' &c.—who had been terribly frightened by the alarming transactions in Salem the last year, it became a subject of serious apprehension! The tavern—the secret room, hired for a night or two, and the money paid in advance; people arriving at the tavern at night, and two persons seen going out, with a 'third person borne between them in the manner resurrectionists bear off dead bodies!'—no body among the good people of Saugus, Lynn, Reading, or even the general rendezvous, Nahant, could tell who they were, or whither they went! Such things were indeed enough to make each particular hair stand on end!—especially as these circumstances had been in vogue for many years past, and no kind soul had condescended to explain the horrible mystery. These good people, it appears, had been haunted for 16 years, by the ghost of some murdered man—murdered at the tavern—who wandered about through Middlesex, Nahant, Saugus, Lynn and Reading, crying out 'sleep no more—the tavern hath murdered sleep.'

At last Mr. Jonathan Buffum undertook very kindly to lay the ghost! Alas, perturbed spirit!—he consulted various individuals at Boston and elsewhere, as to the most effectual mode of doing this feat, and the result of the consultation was, that it was best to issue an advertisement to learn if any person was missing, that would meet this mysterious case. Then comes the 'A. B. C.' notice, the dying man, his friend, and the listening, curious nurse.—What a group for a painter. But the advertisement would not do the thing. The ghost was not to be caught by such a flimsy net. The four cases which were reported to Messrs. Buffum & Co. would not 'fit the case' at the tavern;—and the ghost was still at large, at the very great annoyance of the coteries at Nahant, Saugus, Lynn, &c. But thanks to the indefatigable Mr. Buffum, and his Boston friends, they at last resolved to go to the very spot where the man was seen to have been carried out of the tavern between two persons, at the witching time of night, under circumstances of such fearful mystery. Why they did not go directly there at first, instead of publishing the advertisement about the missing man, is left in the dark; and why they should wait four or five months, in the state of anxiety, and leave the good people of Nahant, Saugus, Lynn, and Reading, to be tossed about with 'serious apprehensions,' we are not told.

But at last, 'on further investigation, it was found that circumstances accompanied with fearful mystery occurred at a tavern in Danvers, kept by Mr. Eben'r Berry, who related the following facts, (says Mr. Buffum) to one of his neighbors (Mr. B. does not say who) immediately subsequent to the transaction. A person came to Mr. Berry, with tears in his eyes, to hire a room in his house, telling him that he should be ruined if it were not granted him. The next night Mr. Berry discovered a Physician, now deceased, near his house, who entered with another person a stranger, being three in all, who went into the chamber. When they went away, (now mark Mr. Buffum's words) two persons appeared to be bearing a third between them, and who was hurried into a carriage and carried off.' Here then we seem to have caught the murderers in the very fact. Here we seem to have the missing man at last! Here is the dying man and his friend, and all that we want more is the nurse! But, mark Buffum's explanation of this dumb show, supposing it for a moment to be a fact, which it certainly is not; he goes on in his next paragraph as follows: After they had gone, Mr. Berry went into the chamber, and found a lady's silk glove, and the bed disturbed! And now mark how he puts the following words, invented by himself, into the mouth of Mr. Berry, as well as the word 'lady's silk glove!' 'He then believed that the third person was a female disguised in man's apparel, to evade public reproach—and that a murder was there committed, (other corroborating circumstances fully confirming this conclusion)!!' 'Mr. Berry, uneasy for what had happened, called on the Physician for explanation, who gave him a short answer, 'that it did not concern him.' Here Mr. Buffum stops, as a further investigation. He says, 'would probably affect an unfortunate female if living, and her wicked paramour.' (Thus, according to Buffum's explanation of the circumstance, no other murder could have taken place, than that of the infant which he supposes to have been born at the time!)

Such an extraordinary disclosure as this, coming from such a man as Buffum, led us to make inquiries of Mr. BERRY himself. We have had interviews with him, and learnt of him such facts as would have surprised us if they had not in some way or other been connected with Jona. Buffum. As this man has appealed to Mr. Berry, he can have no objections to hear him.

Mr. Berry says, that about the last of January, or first of February last, on a Sunday morning, two men came to his tavern in Danvers, in an old sleigh, drawn by an old red horse and wanted room. They were shown into one. They shut the shutters, and drew the curtain as though they were afraid of being seen. When Mr. B. came home from meeting at noon, he went to see who they were, and found them sitting quietly, and they said nothing. After tea, a little girl went into the room to carry wood, and these two strange gentlemen told her that they wished to speak with Mr. Berry. As soon as he went in, they began to express a solicitude about secrecy, closed the doors, looked at the window shutters, &c. One of them began to talk about Masonry, and asked Mr. Berry whether he was a Mason? He told them he was, and they continued their questions. At last they pretended to give some Masonic signs, upon which Mr. Berry suspected them to be impostors. They asked him if he was willing to take an oath that he was a Mason, and he told them he was. They then asked him if he had ever been expelled, he answered them no, and that he knew no cause why he should have been, and that he then stood a regular Mason. They then administered to him a sort of oath, such an one as he had never heard before.

One of the gentlemen remarked, that 'all the dark and mysterious transactions about this vicinity were to be ripped up, and laid open to public view.'

After this introduction, they began to tell, with great professions of friendship, of an unfavorable story which they had heard about what had taken place at his house, and desired to know of him all the particulars of the affair. Berry then told them, that about eighteen years ago, a respectable person, well known to him, had requested a room in the evening for the use of some young friends. Mr. Berry questioned him about the object, whether it was gambling, &c. He said it was not, that it was nothing which would be dishonorable to him or his house. Mr. Berry assented, and they accordingly came, and remained about an hour. About a week after, a Physician, well known to him, came there with two gentlemen, one of whom was also well known, and after staying about an hour, they all three left the house, got into their chaises, and rode off. The Physician came down the stairs first, and went away three or four minutes before the others.—That he did not know what they came there for, but having the utmost confidence in the gentlemen known to him, he was sure there was nothing improper. Nay, that he had been so near them all the time of their stay, that he could have heard any unusual noise. That he went into their chamber after they had retired, and found a large silk glove there, so large that he put it on his own hand. That the bed was deranged as though some one had sat on the side of it; and that this was about all he knew.

This account given by Mr. Berry did not at all satisfy the two inquisitive Gentlemen. They asked him whether he did not see blood about the room, and whether he did not hear groans? He replied he did not. They then asked about the third person being borne down between the two. Mr. Berry told them that no such circumstance was known to him; but on the contrary, he saw the physician go out, and then the two gentlemen followed, and all three got into their chaises and drove off. (Mr. Berry also saw them go away, in the manner de-advised by Mr. Berry, and was in a chamber so near to that which these persons occupied, all the time they remained in it, as to have heard any groans, or other noises, but heard none.]

Mr. Berry remarked to us, that the whole drift of their inquiries was to get the facts of the third person borne down, and a groaning heard. Mr. Berry told them that the notion of a person being borne out, was absolutely false, and that no groaning was heard by him or any of his family. They then told him they were glad the affair was no worse; that they felt satisfied at the promptness of his answer, and expressed a hope that the affair would stop where it was.

One of them inquired if any Mason was concerned in the transaction, and upon being told there were not, he added, 'You know Mr. Berry that the anties will not believe any thing a Mason says!'

After undergoing this catechising, Mr. Berry thought it his turn to ask a few questions. He requested their names. They refused to tell them, or where they came from, and would give no account of themselves.

Who these inquisitive characters were will appear in due time.* But for the information of our Lynn friends we will give them the following outlines.

One was about 45 or 50 years of age, dressed in a plaid cloak, boots, and India rubber shoes; flippant in his talk—at first pretended to be a stranger in this part of the country, but soon appeared to know all about names and things in Salem and Danvers.

The other was above the middle height, light complexion, sandy whiskers, large nose—had on a snuff colored outside garment, and sat with his hat and cloak on all day. He was the one that questioned Mr. Berry about Masonry.

They stayed at Berry's till night, and then drove off.—And now, about three months after this mysterious visit, we find Mr. Jonathan Buffum out in his paper with a gross misrepresentation of what passed between these men and Mr. Berry.

The story about the affair at Berry's tavern, was evidently an incident laid hold of by Buffum and his complotters to sustain themselves before the public, after their detection and exposure as intriguers and impostors, in the first attempts upon a gentleman of this town. The exposure of the A. B. C. intrigue placed Mr. Buffum before the public in a disgraceful light, and he resorted to the incidents at Mr. Berry's tavern, to give a plausible color to his defeated effort at getting up an excitement in Salem, whose inhabitants he had been for some time endeavoring to infect with the antimasonic mania. We have full proof from two credible witnesses, that about six weeks before the A. B. C. advertisement appeared, Mr. Buffum told them that an excitement should be got up in Salem; that he was prepared to do it, and was only waiting for a favorable opportunity. The A. B. C. advertisement was contrived for this purpose. The principal circumstance stated, was an artful fiction, and the conclusion that the publisher of the advertisement lived at a great distance, was a falsehood, designed to cover up the immediate source of the imposture. Buffum acknowledged to us, that the plot was contrived in Boston, and that he was only agent of the conspirators. All the persons concerned in the transaction are antimasons, and known to be leaders of the party either in Boston or Lynn. But, in order to screen themselves from the charge of getting up the A. B. C. imposture in this town, on the score of antimasonry, Mr. Buffum in his last version of the A. B. C. story says, 'it is but justice to state that no person concerned in this nefarious transaction is known to belong to the Masonic institution; and further, that there was no intention on the part of the individuals who instituted this inquiry to criminate them.' Why then ask the Salem gentlemen, whether they were Masons? Why put the same question to Mr. Berry? Why did Phelps, Buffum, and the other antimasons of Lynn,† commence this imposture, and prosecute it with so much zeal, and with such a series of falsehoods and misrepresentations? Why did one of the confederates, several weeks before Buffum's explanation, in supposing a case, agreeing with their version of the Berry tavern story, to a respectable gentleman in our town, in reply to an inquiry about the A. B. C. mystery, represent all concerned as being Masons?

Their design was to introduce the antimasonic excitement into Salem. The first attempt failed, and the actors were exposed as impostors. And now just upon the eve of bringing out their mummery here, an explanation of their conduct was attempted by a contemptible tissue of lies, which implicated a certain deceased physician of this town, a most benevolent and worthy man. He is not here to defend himself. The story Buffum had invented is full of the marvellous, and as he measured his intelligence and taste of the people of Salem by his own depraved mind, he has calculated upon its making an opening for the introduction of himself and his impostures into Salem. Allyn plays his mountebank tricks for money, and Jonathan Buffum is somehow or other concerned in the gains. He came here probably as his candle snuffer. But the people of Salem have heard of the bottle conjurer; and a trick of showing a horse with his tail where his head should be, had been too recently exhibited to attract any attention from the people of Salem.

The appearances are, that Mr. Berry was to be entrapped by the two men who went to his house. Mr. Berry is a Mason, and could have been caught off his guard, so as to have given the least pretence to have connected him with the story, he would probably have been made to throw disgrace on the Masonic fraternity. Whatever they had chosen to say, could not have been effectually contradicted by him so as to undeceive the deluded tools of that knot of impostors, because it is a part of their creed not to believe ANY thing a Mason says. Thus Mr. Berry, who is a respectable and worthy man, and a good citizen, is deprived of all means of vindicating himself before the community. And we may see what chance he has of success, when base and treacherous men enter his house, catechising him in secret, and then go away and publish a false account of his words: nay, put falsehoods into his mouth, threaten to substantiate them by witnesses; and then tell him that he cannot help himself because a Mason will not be believed! A faction actuated by such a diabolical spirit as this, must prove as sore a curse to a community as we can well conceive of. No man is safe who opposes them, and it seems to be criminal to remain idle spectators of such base designs. To join them, or countenance them, as we sincerely believe, is evincing a dereliction of duty to the best interests of society, to truth and to God.

[Salem Register.]

† The antimasons of Lynn, who are known to have been concerned in the transaction are, Jonathan Buffum, Isaac Bassett, John Allyn, jr. William B. Breed, Sylvanus Newhall, and a man by the name of Conner. It is probable that there were several others, whose names are not known to us.

RISE OF THE PEOPLE.

The antimasonic party in Mercer, called upon the people of that county, to meet at the court house on Tuesday evening of court, (19th inst.) to select a delegate to represent them in the state convention, to be held at Harrisburgh on the 25th day of May next, for the purpose of appointing delegates to represent Pennsylvania in the United States convention, to meet at the city of Baltimore on the 26 of September to nominate candidates for President and Vice President. The PEOPLE of Mercer county responded to the CALL, by assembling at the time and place appointed, when and where, the following just and patriotic resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That this meeting disapprove of the excitement which prevails at this time against Masonry, believing that the object of the antimasonic party is to divide the democratic party in the state and Union.

Resolved, That this meeting disapproves of the contemplated convention which is proposed to be held at Harrisburgh and Baltimore by the antimasonic party, and that we will not send a delegate from this county to meet such a party on that subject.

Resolved, That this meeting approves of the general policy of the administration of the general government.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be signed by the chairman and secretaries, and published in the papers of this borough.

BEVAN PEARSON, Chairman.

WM. SCOTT, }
J. B. CURTISS, } Secretaries.

It appears from this, that the democratic county of Mercer, is determined to listen no longer to the intolerant antirepublican doctrines of proscribing antimasonry, with its train of delusion and falsehoods—its fair pretensions and sinister designs. This open, magnanimous expression of sentiment, argues much for the intelligence and uprightness of the citizens of Mercer: it harmonizes with those principles of equal liberty which have ever been contended for by the republican party, and which form the basis of our free government. The implicable spirit that leads men onward to persecute their fellows for opinion's sake, or for supposed offences committed by others, seldom gains admittance into the bosom of staid, reflecting republicans. While such a spirit is, in itself odious and unbecoming, it stands directly opposite to justice and freedom.

While the democratic party predominates, and republican equality is sustained by our government, can any political reform be required? The citizens of Mercer have correctly assumed the negative, as the answer to this question, and have acted, and we hope will continue to act as becomes the liberal supporters of free principles, in sustaining a good government against the insidious attacks of faction. Let those who desire a reform in public measures, point out the errors complained of—let them convince the people that the policy adopted by those who administer the laws and constitution, is erroneous; and a reformation can be effected in a peaceable, consistent manner, by a change of public functionaries; by placing those in power who will pay a due regard to the will of the PEOPLE.—[Erie Observer.]

'A Douglas and a Hotspur joined,
Are confident against the world in arms.'
Shakspeare.

A distinguished Doctor was busy in circulating antimasonic pills in Ward 8, at the last election, aided, abetted and assisted by the amiable, and accomplished Mr. Allen, of pleasant and facetious memory. It was understood that the duet occasioned great hilarity, and was astonishing in effect. Seldom indeed is it that two such remarkable revolutionary heroes stand 'shoulder to shoulder' in so brave a contest. The apple women of Central and Long wharves, have named their choicest fruit 'Lecturer Greenings,' and 'Doctor Pippins.' It is said that the whole antimasonic ticket is elected, and that a funeral oration over the grave of Masonry is to be pronounced by orator Avery: the concluding hymn to be sung by the Doctor to the tune of 'Green Sleeves.' What a long tail, &c. WARD 8.

N. B. The above report is contradicted.

Probably not one voter in twenty is a Mason, and yet the anties insist that it is necessary for the NINETEEN to form themselves into a political party to put down the one who belongs to the fraternity. This really resembles

'Ocean into a tempest tost,
To waft a feather, or to drown a fly.'

BIOGRAPHY.

BIOGRAPHY OF ISAIAH THOMAS.

[CONCLUDED]

The labors of Mr. T. had not been confined to the Spy. He established the first newspaper in Newburyport as early as 1773, this he soon passed into other hands. In 1774, he published in Boston the Royal American Magazine, a monthly periodical. Besides the unusual variety of general literature, this work contains a faithful summary of the public transactions in Boston during that eventful year, and great value is added to the work from the public documents preserved in its pages, and which are not elsewhere to be found.

The small amount of property contained in the package sent across Charles river, upon the flight from Boston, was all that he rescued from five years unremitted toil in the cause of freedom; the residue fell a prey to the soldiery, or was carried off with the plunder of the army.

As soon as the enemy had evacuated Boston, his enterprising spirit was in pursuit of more extensive business than that of conducting a country newspaper. An attempt to form an establishment in Salem, terminated unsuccessfully. The Spy having been leased to two gentlemen of the bar in Worcester for one year, and again for another year to Anthony Haswell, was resumed by its former editor in 1778. In consequence of bad materials and unskilful workmanship, the paper appeared in a wretched dishabille during the continuance of the lease. The general depression of the times also affected the subscription list, which in '79, '80, did not much exceed 300.

In July, '76, he participated in the first celebration of American Independence in this place.—The great charter of Liberty was first publicly promulgated by him, standing upon the porch of the meetinghouse. It was received by the united acclamations of a vast number of citizens, who under the open canopy of heaven, superadded to that of Congress their solemn pledge to support it with fortune, honor and life.

After the war when the Government began to assume a more permanent form, he extended his business not only as a printer, but as a bookseller. The first paper mill and bookbinder's in this county was established by him. For several years he employed seven printing presses in this town, and with his partner in Boston, Mr. Andrews, furnished business for five in that city, and four in other towns. He established the first newspaper in Walpole, N. H. and in Brookfield in this county, at which places, as well as Albany and Baltimore, he was concerned in extensive book-stores. From these sources much of the literature of the country was supplied. The systematic manner in which the details of these extensive concerns were conducted gave him an elevated character for skill as a merchant. In 1802, the Spy, with a proportion of his other business was transferred to his son, who died a few years since in Boston. Leisure and opportunity were now given him to pursue his literary avocations. In 1810 he presented to the public his History of Printing, in two vols. 8vo. including a history of newspapers, with biographical sketches of the antirevolutionary printers and booksellers in New-England. This work manifested great research, untiring industry and no inconsiderable share of learning. It passed the ordeal of the reviewers both in this country and Great Britain, and is received as a standard work upon the subjects treated of in its pages. During the long period in which he contemplated the preparation of this work, he was continually laying aside for preservation, every book, pamphlet, and file of newspapers that came in his way, which might aid him in the undertaking. He likewise expended large sums in procuring from abroad valuable materials for the same purpose. His library now comprises the most valuable collection of American literature to be found in the hands of any individual in the country. Many of his works are rare, and no other copies were to be found. Such a library, he observed, if once dispersed could never again be gathered. Its importance to the future historian was inestimable. The want of it had been sensibly felt by himself in making his compilation and the inconvenience had been overcome by personal sacrifices that no other individual could make.—He therefore proposed to a number of his friends of American history, principally of his own neighborhood, the establishment of an association for collecting and preserving the materials of our history, in every form in which they may present themselves, and he offered to endow the institution with a donation of his collection. The proposition was readily acceded to and the American Antiquarian Society was incorporated in 1812. Upon its organization he was elected its President and has ever since held the office by the unanimous votes of the members in each successive year. The interest he manifested in its early success, suffered no diminution in its subsequent progress. Every year he has made liberal donations of books and rare curiosities, obtained both by solicitation from their possessors, and by purchases, at an amount not inconsiderable. In 1820 the Society published the first volume of their transactions, with the title of American Archaeologia; the work is enriched by a learned and minute account of the ancient mounds upon the Muskingum and Scioto rivers, with other vestiges of that mysterious race of men, who probably were the former possessors of this continent. The subjects were illustrated by diagrams made from actual surveys and expensive engravings.

These labors which had added to the general stock of human knowledge, and attracted the notice of many learned societies in Europe, were wholly at the expense of Mr. Thomas. In the same year he erected a spacious and permanent edifice, fitted with rooms for the accommodation of the Library and Cabinet, appropriated for the exclusive use of the members of the Society. The Library now exceeds 8000 volumes, more than 3000 of which consist of annual files of American newspapers, bound in regular series. Nearly all the papers printed before the revolution are to be found among them. The residue of the Library includes history, theology, and miscellaneous literature. One room is appropriated for a Cabinet of curiosities, illustrating the manners of the Fathers as well as the Aborigines of North America. For many very valuable donations of books as well as other articles, the Institution innumerate a long list of benefactors. But in whatever has given it character, energy and living principle, the Society is indebted to the untiring generosity of its founder. Nor has his paternal regard been bounded by the present generation, but his desire for bestowing the benefits of historical knowledge has extended to future time, and by his last will, he has provided for the exigencies of the Institution to an extent it is believed unparalleled in the history of any literary association in this country. Benevolence was a prominent trait in his character. And the community in which he resided will long cherish his memory as a public benefactor in other departments of life. The land upon which the present County Court House stands, was a donation from him, and the grounds around that building received their present convenient and beautiful form from his direction. For his personal services in this meritorious act, he received no compensation, but a vote of thanks upon the county records. To the town, he gave the street which bears his name, besides a grant of land which gives the Main street its peculiar beauty.—

The square near the jail, with the stone bridge that intersects it, were formed principally at his individual expense. The Parish of which he was a member had reason to recollect many acts of his munificence for their benefit. The public clock upon their brick meeting house, was his exclusive donation. To almost all the acts of public philanthropy which mark our age, he was a generous contributor, and this without discrimination of party or sect. The unfortunate children of want around him, in the gloom of sickness and distress, will lament his death, for his charities to them had ever been abundant and reasonable.—His estate, which amounted to a large sum for this part of the country, is distributed equally among his descendants and a great variety of public societies, whose objects he wished to promote.

MISCELLANY.

MAY-DAY.

The following will be read with pleasure by those who feel a veneration for the good old pious customs of our ancestors.

Now the bright morning star, day's harbinger,
Comes dancing from the east, and leads with her
The flowery May, who from her green lap throws
The yellow cowslip, and the pale primrose,
Hail, bounteous May! that dost inspire
Mirth and youth, and warm desire,
Woods and groves are of thy dressing,
Hill and dale doth boast thy blessing!
Thus we salute thee with our early song,
And welcome thee, and wish thee long.

May Day was the great rural festival of our forefathers. Their hearts responded merrily to the cheerfulness of the season. At the dawn of May morning, the lads and lasses left their towns and villages, and repairing to the woodlands by sound of music, they gathered the May, or blossomed branches of the trees, and bound them with wreaths of flowers; then returning to their homes by sunrise, they decorated the lattices and doors with the sweet-smelling spoil of their joyous journey, and spent the remaining hours in sports and pastimes. Spencer's 'Shepherd's Calendar' poetically records these customs, in a beautiful eclogue:—

Youths folke now flocken every where
To gather may-baskets, and smelling breere;
And home they hasten, the postes to dight,
And all the kirke pillars, ere daylight,
With hawthorne buds, and sweet eglantine,
And girlonds of roses, and soppes in wine.

Siker this morrow, no longer ago,
I saw a shole of shepherds outgo
With singing and showing, and jolly cheere;
Before them yode a lustie tablere,
That to the meynie a hornpipe plaid,
Whereto they dauncen eche one with his maide.
'To see these folkes make such jovisaunce,
Made my heart after the pipe to daunce,
Tho' to the green-wood they speeden them all,
To fetchen home May with their musicall:
And home they bringen, in a royall throne,
Crowned as king; and his queen attone
Was Ladie Flora, on whom did attend,
A faire flock of faeries, and a fresh bend
Of lovely nymphs. O, that I were there
To helpen the ladies, their May bush beare!

A gatherer of notices respecting our pastimes says, — 'The after part of May day is chiefly spent in dancing round a tall Poll, which is called a May Poll; which being placed in a convenient part of the village, stands there, as it were consecrated to the Goddess of Flowers, without the least violation offered to it, in the whole circle of the year.' One who was an implacable enemy to popular sports relates the fetching of 'the May' from the woods. 'But,' says he, 'their cheefest jewell they bring from thence is their Maie poole, which they bring home with greate veneration, as thus. They have twentie or fourtie yoke of oxen every oxe having a sweete nose-gaile of flowers tyed on the tippe of his hornes, and these oxen drawe home this Maie poole, which is covered all over with flowers and hearbes, bounde round about with stringes, from the top to the bottome, and sometyme painted with variable colours, with two or three hundred men, women, and children following it with great devotion. And thus beyng reared up, with handkerchieves and flagges streamyng on the toppe, they strawe the grounde aboute, binde greene boughes about it, sett up Sommer haules, Bowers, and Arbours hard by it. And then fall they to banquet and feast, to leape and daunce aboute it, as the Heathen people did at the dedication of their Idolles, whereof this is a perfect patternne, or rather the thyng itself.'

The May pole is up,
Now give me the cup,
I'll drink to the garlands around it;
But first unto those Whose hands did compose
The glory of the flowers that crown'd it.

[Herrick.]

A poet who has not versified, (Mr. Washington Irving) says 'I shall never forget the delight I felt on seeing a May-pole. It was on the banks of the Dee close by the the picturesque old bridge that stretches across the river from the quaint little city of Chester. I had already been carried back into former days by the antiquities of that venerable place; the examination of which is equal to turning over the pages of a black-letter volume or gazing on the pictures in Froissart. — The May pole on the margin of that poetic stream completed the illusion. My fancy adorned it with wreaths of flowers, and peopled the green bank with all the dancing revelry of May-day. The mere sight of this May-pole gave a glow to my feelings, and spread a charm over the country for the rest of the day; and as I traversed a part of the fair plains of Cheshire and the beautiful borders of Wales, and looking from among swelling hills down a long green valley, through which 'the Deva wound its wizard stream,' my imagination turned all into a perfect Arcadia.—One can readily imagine what a gay scene it must be in jolly old London, when the doors were decorated with flowering branches, when every hat was decked with hawthorn, and Robin Hood, friar Tuck, Maid Marian, the morris-dancers, and all the other fantastic masks and revellers were performing their antics about the May-pole in every part of the city. On this occasion we are told Robin Hood presided as Lord of the May:—

'With coat of Lincoln green, and mantle too,
And horn of ivory mouth, and buckle bright,
And arrows winged with peacock-feathers light,
And trusty bow well gathered on the yew;
'whilst near him crowned as Lady of the May maid Marian,

'With eyes of blue,
Shining through dusk hair, like the stars of night,
And habited in pretty forest plight—
His green-wood beauty sits, young as the dew;
'and there, too, in a subsequent stage of the pageant, were

'The archer-men in green, with belt and bow,
Feasting on pheasants, river-fowl and swan,
With Robin at their head, and Marian.

'I value every custom that tends to infuse poetical feeling into the common people, and to sweeten and soften the rudeness of rustic manners without destroying their simplicity. Indeed it is to the decline of this happy simplicity that the decline of this custom may be traced; and the rural dance on the green, and the homely May-day pageant, have gradually disappeared, in proportion as the peasantry have become expensive and artificial in their pleasures, and too knowing for simple enjoyment.

Some attempts, indeed, have been made of late years, by men of both taste and learning, to rally back the popular feeling to these standards of primitive simplicity; but the time has gone by, the feeling has become chilled by habits of gain and traffic; the country apes the manners and amusements of the town, and little is heard of May day at present, except from the lamentation of authors, who sigh after it from among the brick walls of the city.'—[Every-Day Book.]

CANINE SAGACITY.

At a Convent in France, where twenty paupers were served with dinner every day at a certain hour, a dog belonging to the convent, did not fail to be present at the repast, to receive outs and ends, which were now and then thrown to him.—The guests, however, were poor and hungry, and of course, not disposed to be wasteful; so that the dog did little more than scent the feast, of which he would have fain partaken. The portions were served by a person ringing the bell, and delivered out, by means of what is there called a Tour; which is a machine like the section of a cask, and by turning round upon a pivot, exhibits whatever is placed on the hollow side, without discovering the person who moves it.

One day this dog, who had received only a few scraps, waited till the paupers were all gone, then took the rope in his mouth, and rang the bell.—The stratagem succeeded. He repeated it the next day with the same good fortune. At length the cook finding that twenty-one portions were given out, instead of twenty, determined to discover the trick; in doing which he had no great difficulty, for placing himself where he could see, without being seen, and perceiving all the paupers, as they came in great regularity for their different portions, and that there was no intruder except the dog, he began to suspect the real truth, which he was presently confirmed in. The dog waited till the visitors were all gone, and then deliberately walked up and pulled the bell. The matter was related to the community, and to reward him for his ingenuity, he was permitted to ring the bell every day for his dinner, when a mess of broken victuals was served out to him.

THE CASKETS.

*Behold, alas! our days we spend:
How vain they be, how soon they end!*

BEHOLD

How short a span
Was long enough of old
To measure out the life of man;
In those well temper'd days, his time was then Survey'd, cast up, and found but threescore years and ten.

ALAS

And what is that?
They come and slide and pass
Before my pen could tell thee what.
The posts of time are swift, which having run,
Their seven short stages o'er, their short-lived task is done.

OUR DAYS

Begun we lend
To sleep, to antic plays
And toys, until the first stage end;
12 waning moons, twice 5 times told, we give
To unrecovered loss; we rather breathe than live.

WE SPEND

A ten year's breath
Before we apprehend
What 'tis to live in fear of death;
Our childish dreams are filled with painted joys
Which please each sense awhile, and waking prove but toys.

HOW VAIN

How wretched is
Poor man that doth remain
A slave to such a state as this!
His days are short at longest; few at most;
They are but bad at best; yet lavished out, or lost.

THEY BE

The secret springs
That make our minutes flee
On wings more swift than eagles' wings!
Our life 's a clock, and every gasp of breath
Breathes forth a warning grief, till time shall strike a death.

HOW SOON

Our new-born light
Attains to full aged noon!
And this how soon to grey-hair'd night!
We spring, we bud, we blossom, and we blast,
Ere we can count our days, our days they flee so fast.

THEY END

When scarce begun,
And ere we apprehend
That we begin to live, our life is done.
Man, count thy days; and if they fly too fast
For thy dull thoughts to count, count every day the last.

CIVIL ARCHITECTURE: or a Complete Theoretical and Practical System of Building. Containing the fundamental principles of the art, with five orders of Architecture. Also, a great variety of examples, selected from Vitruvius, Stuart, Chambers, and Nicholson; with many useful and elegant ornaments, and rules for projecting them. By Edward Shaw, Architect. Illustrated with ninety-five copperplate engravings. Boston: Published by Lincoln & Edmands. 1831.

[CONCLUDED.]

Succeeding in course, the orders of architecture, is a short chapter on PEDESTALS; which most writers have considered as a necessary part of the order, without which it is not esteemed complete: the work we are noticing regards it as a matter of small importance whether they be considered in that light, or as a distinct composition.—Vitruvius adheres to the former opinion. Pedestals, like columns, are distinguished by the names of Tuscan, Doric, Ionic, Composite and Corinthian. 'Some authors are very averse to pedestals, and compare a column raised on a pedestal, to a man mounted on stilts, imagining that they were first introduced merely through necessity, and for want of columns of a sufficient length.' It is very generally admitted, however, that there are many occasions on which they are not only necessary, but add much to the beautiful appearance of the order.

The next article is on PILASTERS; which are believed to be of Roman origin, and are considered in the light of an improvement. They differ from columns in their plan only, which is square, as the column is round. Like pedestals, they are designated by the terms applied to columns. In many instances they are considered preferable to columns, as at the angles of buildings; where they are necessary both for solidity and beauty.

The chapter on MOULDINGS, with its accompanying diagrams, will probably be regarded by the practical builder, as not the least important one in the book. From the definitions we learn that, if the mouldings are only composed of parts of a circle and straight lines, they are called Roman, because the Romans, in their buildings, seldom or never employed any other curve for mouldings than that of a circle; but if a moulding be made part of an ellipse, or a parabola, or an hyperbola, the mouldings are then in the Grecian taste. Hence it appears that mouldings in the Greek taste are of a much greater variety than those of the Roman, where only parts of circles are concerned. They have various names, according to the manner in which they are curved.

The articles immediately succeeding are on Bases; Chimney Pieces, of which a variety of examples are given; Doors, with several beautiful designs, and accompanying directions for their construction; Sliding Partitions; Construction of Windows; Fancy Pilasters, differing in their construction and use from the pilasters before adverted to; and Stair Building, with a great variety of examples; all of which we must pass over without more particular remark. Indeed, the room we have already devoted to this notice, must serve as an apology for the hasty manner in which we shall speak of the concluding portions of the work.

From the article on CARPENTRY, we extract the following introductory remarks: 'The designs of buildings being of such a variety, they not only require various methods of construction, but some require appendages which are unnecessary in others, and thus the order of proceeding will be varied. The order, however, of proceeding with any description of edifice, will easily be understood, when that of the usual manner is given. Lintelings very soon occur; their thickness ought never to be less than as many inches as the aperture has feet in width. Some recommend that lintels should be laid on templets; but when the mortar dries, this practice, though it may seem to bind a new building together, is injurious to the strength of the walls. The old authors say that bond timbers should be dove-tailed at the angles; but this method of joining timbers is not sufficient to prevent; in two return walls, the one from descending while the other keeps its place; halving and bolting is much more secure. Where bond timbers are carried all round apartments or rooms, or entirely round a building, the thickness of these timbers will depend upon the mass of the work over them; but where they are only partially inserted for finishings, their thickness must be the thickness of a brick. Some old authors think it would not be amiss to place bond timbers at the distance of six feet through the whole height of the building; but in our opinion they ought to be used with great caution: for as the moisture dries out of the timber, these ligatures will shrink and cause the walls to bulge, which will not only produce a very unpleasant effect to the eye, but will endanger the building, by weakening the walls, and make them liable to fall. Therefore, in good work bond timbers ought to be dispensed with; and, if necessary, other means ought to be resorted to, which will be equally effective in point of strength; but as neither stone nor iron will answer the purpose of fixing, we will recommend plugging, built in with the brick work.' The branches particularly treated of under this head are, Floors, Partitions, Roofs, Framing, (with scribe and square rules,) and Trusses: with excellent plates, representing joints, jaggles, mortices and tenons; trusses; floors, and designs for roofs. We doubt not that the carpenter will find this part of the work of great practical utility.

The next subject, and, with the exception of the remarks on Bridges, the last in the work we are noticing, is under the head of BUILDING; a general term, implying the 'construction of an edifice according to the rules laid down by the different artificers employed.' The art of building, or rather the art of constructing houses of a substantial and finished form, and all the refinements subsequently introduced into the architectural art, are said to owe their origin to that of agriculture. While men are engaged in the hunting or pastoral state; while wandering from place to place in their necessary employment, they will not attend to the building of very substantial habitations: a slight hut, which may serve to shelter them from the immediate inclemencies of the weather, is thought sufficient. The assiduous cares and constant attendance which agriculture requires, are inconsistent with emigration from one place to another, and oblige men to become stationary, by which they are induced to provide themselves with lasting and commodious habitations. Moses informs us that even after the flood, those nations who attended to agriculture, builded cities. Nimrod built five cities, the names of which have been preserved; and Ashur sometime afterwards founded Nineveh, Rehoboth, Caleb, and Resen. In Egypt, Palestine, and other eastern countries, there were cities from the most remote antiquity; though, probably, the houses were of ruder materials and workmanship.

It is well understood that solid buildings of hewn stone may be erected without the aid of that complicated machinery which is now employed, from the example of the people of Mexico and Peru. In Uuloo's account of New Spain, we find that the inhabitants, when visited by the Spaniards, had neither carts, sledges nor beasts of burthen, and that all their materials were transported by manual labor. They were unacquainted with the advantage to be derived from scaffolds, cranes and other machines proper for erecting buildings; and knew not the advantage to be derived from that most useful metal, iron. Notwithstanding this, they raised structures of stone, that are viewed with admiration at the present day. They broke the stones with a hard black flint, and then polished them by rubbing them against each other. This might have some analogy to that practiced in the primitive ages. The art of building with stone seems to have originated in Egypt, in a country almost entirely destitute of wood. It was thus necessary, and accordingly adopted in very early ages. In Upper Egypt there are quarries of fine marble, and the Egyptians invented methods of transporting it from one part of the country to another. The intersection of different canals, from the river Nile, afforded them an easy conveyance. And wheel carriages were in use before the time of Moses; chariots were common in the age of Joseph. The pyramids were erected before the era of authentic history, and the blocks of which they are constructed could only have been found in a country abounding in the finest marble, and where there was a ready conveyance by water. But, to return to the work before us. Under the general term building, the author treats of the respective business of the Mason, Bricklayer, Plasterer, Slater, Plumber, Painter, and Glazier; for the particulars of which we must refer the reader to the work itself. We did intend to notice this part of the work more at length, but having already occupied an undue proportion of our pages, and probably exhausted the patience of most of our readers, we are admonished to desist from carrying that intention into effect. The work concludes with a 'description of Ithiel Town's improvement in the construction of wood and iron Bridges: intended as a general system of bridge-building for rivers, creeks and harbors, of whatever kind of bottoms, and for any practicable width of span or opening, in every part of the country.' The glossary of architectural terms, and of terms used in masonry and building generally, adds much to the value and interest of the work.

In this rapid and cursory notice, we have glanced at the principal subjects of which the work treats, and endeavored, in some degree, to point out their use and importance to that class of the community for whom the publication has been compiled. In the course of our remarks, we have occasionally digressed from the work before us, for the purpose of introducing such historical facts and suggestions as we have thought would compensate the general reader, in some measure, for the space occupied by a subject concerning which he cannot be supposed to feel any particular interest: believing at the same time that they would not be unacceptable to that portion of our friends, (and we hope the number is not small,) who may become purchasers of the work. In the course of our examination, we have found nothing in the publication particularly obnoxious to censure, but on the contrary much to commend. Were we to venture a suggestion, it would be that in the future editions the compiler might throw additional interest into the pages of his work, by the introduction of concise historical sketches of the great branches of science to which it is devoted. It may be said that to the practitioner this would be of very little importance, and we shall not object to the general correctness of the remark; but whatever adds interest to any work adds also to its value, particularly in the view of the student. We think also that the arrangement and classification of the subjects will admit of improvement. Of this however, we do not profess to be competent judges. In regard to the general merits of the book, it is sufficient for us to say that it has received the approbation of such of our architects in this city, as have examined it. Some of them have certified that it is the 'best American work, as to theory and practical utility, they have met with,' and that it is 'well qualified in every way, to be useful for the purposes' for which it is designed.

☞ We would call the attention of our readers to the exposition of the infamous A. B. C. conspiracy, given in a preceding page. For villany it is only equalled by the Anderton imposition. Many of the same men who were engaged in that base transaction are also the actors in this. Among them is Doctor Abner Phelps, of this city, who has declared that in five years Masons will all be regarded as murderers, and accessories to murders, and held in no higher estimation than are the Knappe and Crowninshield, who were engaged in the murder at Salem! He probably calculated largely on the success of his A. B. C. plans.—Having been foiled in these, we presume he will be willing to extend the time set for the execution of these murderers!

FAMILY LIBRARY.—This work, published by the HARPER, New York, is gaining in popularity with a rapidity perhaps unparalleled in the annals of literature. It is but about a year since the series was commenced, and we are informed that it now has an extensive circulation in every state and territory in the Union! This fact is the best commentary on the merits of the work that can be offered. 'It embraces,' says a cotemporary, whose taste and discrimination are entitled to respect, 'the most rare and interesting biography, discoveries, travels, and natural history, in any Encyclopedia or Library extant; and has put in requisition the most eminent literary talent of the age.' Among the writers of eminence who have contributed to enrich its pages, are Sir Walter Scott, T. G. Lockhart, Southey, Galt, Prof. Jameson, Prof. Leslie, George Croly, Allan Cunningham, G. R. Gleig, Murray, and others equally distinguished in the world of letters. A work sustained by such an array of genius and talent, cannot be otherwise than popular; nor is it surprising that it should meet with the almost universal approbation and patronage of the intelligent citizens of our republic, who are emphatically a reading people. Indeed, we should be surprised if the fact were not so; for, we venture the assertion, that there is no publication in the country more suitably adapted to the taste and requirements of the great mass of community, or better calculated to raise the intellectual character of the middling classes of society, than HARPER'S FAMILY LIBRARY. The low price at which the No.'s are afforded, place them within the reach of almost every individual. And would the master put them into the hands of his apprentices, and the parent into the hands of his sons and daughters, to the exclusion of the more dazzling but less substantial works of fiction, which administer only to a vicious taste, without affording the least improvement to the mind, the one would find himself blessed with more virtuous and intelligent children, and the other with more skilful apprentices.

The seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth volumes have been received in this city. They comprise the 'Lives of the most eminent British PAINTERS and SCULPTORS,' by Allan Cunningham, the poet; a gentleman justly ranked among the most distinguished writers of the present time. It has been justly remarked that, 'to amateurs and artists, to men of science and to students generally, this collection of the remarkable events in the lives of upwards of twenty distinguished painters and sculptors, must possess peculiar interest.' Biography at all times possesses peculiar interest. There is perhaps no species of writing that operates with greater force as an incentive to genius. 'There is an eagerness among all of us to contemplate the illustrious, when his name was as yet 'written on the rolls of common men'—to behold the pride of inexperienced talent combatting with poverty and indifference, to watch the feats of Hercules in his cradle, and see him strangling his assailants with unpracticed hands. And this is the feeling that gives to biographical, a charm which it possesses over all other kinds of writings.'

The introductory to the work gives a concise, but peculiarly interesting, history of painting in England, up to the time of Hogarth, with whose life the biographical sketches commence. The author finds some difficulty in tracing the origin of painting and sculpture in that country. He concludes, however, that the early works of art in the island were from the hands of foreigners. 'It was the interest of Rome to supply us with painters as well as priests, whose mutual talents and mutual zeal might maintain, and extend, and embellish religion.' Art and knowledge were in considerable favor during the reign of Edward 3d. Poetry and learning were of his train; but painting partook of the warlike spirit of the king. Rude saints, and still ruder virgins and apostles, gave way for gilded armour, painted shields and emblazoned banners.—In the reign of Henry 5th, an English artist was curiously compounded; he was at once architect, sculptor, carpenter, goldsmith, armourer, jeweller, saddler, tailor, and painter! Think of that, Hal!—a tailor painting virgins, and a carpenter making breeches! In the Earl of Warwick's tailor's bill, 'gilded griffins mingle with Virgin Marys; painted streamers for battle or procession, with the twelve apostles; and "one coat of his grace's body, lute with gold," takes precedence of St. George and the Dragon!' The want of the taste and genius which enabled the Greeks to display their rich colourings and materials to advantage, was amply compensated for by the early admirers of the art in England, by giving to gilded kings golden crowns; and to gilded angels, golden halos! They also had gilded virgins sitting nursing golden children on golden clouds! the heaven above was golden, and so was the earth beneath! Hans Holbein was the first painter of eminence who went to England, and with him the art in which genius shines, may be said to have there commenced. 'His name had already been spread far and wide by the obvious and peculiar beauty of his productions, and by the eloquent praises of Erasmus.' He wrought at the court of Henry 8th, with a diligence and with a skill new to the country. His works are chiefly portraits, and are all distinguished by truth and by nature. Our author occupies a few pages with notices of his most distinguished works, and to several interesting incidents which marked the painter's life. We have room only for a single anecdote: Holbein knew how to practice the flattery of his profession—and lavished so much beauty on Anne of Cleves, that the king, who had fallen in love with the picture, when the original came to his arms, regarded her with aversion and disgust—exclaimed against the gross flattery of Hans—and declared she was not a woman but a Flander's mare! The principal artists who succeeded Holbein were Vandyke, Kneller, and Lely; the brief sketches of whom are executed with peculiar spirit and pleasantry. 'It is plain,' says the author, 'that up to this time no British artist had arisen capable of leading the way in painting—no one who possessed at once talent for original composition, and skill to render his conceptions permanent. The heart of the country had as yet been but little moved by this art; and all the splendid colouring, the academic forms, the fixed and approved attitudes and long established graces, went for nothing, when a man appeared who sought lasting fame—and found it—in moral sentiment, nervous satire, sarcastic humour, and actual English life.' That man was WILLIAM HOGARTH, born in London on the 10th December, 1697. At an early period we shall endeavor to furnish the reader with an abstract of the most prominent traits of his life and character. In conclusion, we would recommend these volumes as being replete with interesting incident and valuable historical matter. They are worthy of a prominent place in the library of the scholar, and are of that description of works which may be placed in the hands of the younger branches of society, with the assurance that they will impart both moral and intellectual improvement.

REPRESENTATIVE ELECTION.—The election on Wednesday resulted in the choice of fifty three gentlemen to represent the city in the next legislature. The antimasons set up a ticket, chiefly filched from the National Republican and other lists of candidates, and attempted to bully it into the ballot-boxes, by insulting and abusing all who treated it with the contempt it merited. We are told that a certain species of doctor were particularly officious and abusive in some of the lower Wards. A plaster of tar and feathers would have answered a very good purpose. At the Senatorial election, this faction claimed to have cast 800 votes; on Wednesday their most prominent candidates averaged about 600. The title of their ticket excited a good deal of mirth at the polls—'Equal Rights!' As well might the minions of the Spanish Inquisition talk of freedom of speech and liberty of conscience! Equal rights, with a vengeance!—a more prescriptive, persecuting, vilifying clan of unprincipled demagogues was never congregated together, in this or any other land.

THEATRICAL.

After the unceasing exertions of the Manager to render the Theatre attractive, it, with the exception of Benefits, is poorly attended. Among the Melo Dramas brought out, we notice one of native origin, entitled Rodino or Rondino, which was performed for the first time at Mr. Scott's Benefit and has been played several times since:—for what reason we know not. For notwithstanding its ostentatious display on the play-bills, it cannot without some very essential alterations prove successful. It is spun out to a tedious length without the smallest share of interest. If the author has drawn Thady Malone for an Irish valet he has left him as unfinished as the demon created by Frankenstein—he is the most impertinent and ridiculously behaved fellow that we ever met with. During the representation we noticed many flagrant instances of plagiarism. It is strange we cannot get a piece among us possessing at least, the merit of originality. Rondino was played to 'empty benches' on Tuesday evening for the author's benefit. This is a test of its 'great success' and 'popularity' with the public. E.

[We know nothing of the piece so severely censured by our correspondent.]—Ed.

The proposed amendment of the Constitution has probably been adopted by the people by a very large majority. The present Legislature therefore will have little else to do, than to organize and adjourn, sine die.

We understand that the antimasons have not succeeded so well in Norfolk county, as it was generally expected they would. Some towns where they had a majority at the Senatorial election, have refused to elect antimasonic representatives.

NEW MASONIC HALL.—On the 11th April the Corner stone of a new Masonic Hall was laid in due form, Mobile, Alabama.

Josiah Randall, of Franklin, Vt. on the 21st ult. killed his wife and son 14 years of age; and attempted to kill a daughter 12 years old, but she rescued herself after receiving several wounds, and fled. The murderer has heretofore been deranged, and this horrid act is attributed to a fit of insanity.

Miss Julia Hinman, aged 19, daughter of the Hon. Wm. Hinman, of Southbury, Ct. in attempting to cross Woodbury river on a piece of timber, on the 1st inst. fell in and was drowned. She is represented as a young lady of highly cultivated mind and amiable manners.

The Taunton Sun states that Charles Leonard, formerly of that town, was found dead on Wednesday morning in the street in Norton. It is supposed that he came to his death by the rupture of a blood vessel.

Fifty thousand dollars in counterfeit bills were recently destroyed in Montreal, by orders of the Police officers. Some of the bills were on banks in the United States.

A child of Mr Thomas Hoods, of Brooklyn, N. Y. aged one year, was recently burnt to death. The mother was absent a few minutes, leaving her infant in charge of another child 8 years old.

A young man in New York recently had his pockets picked of $28—in open day. The robbers threw snuff in his eyes. He was mightily astonished—couldn't see how they did it!

To Correspondents.—'Sulpicius' is received, but as the individual to whom it refers has already received as much attention as he has a right to claim at our hands, we have thought proper at least to defer its publication.

DIED.

In this city, April 27th, Calvin Augustus, son of the late Calvin Lane, aged 21 months.

THE WREATH.

[From the Dutchess Intelligencer.]

In no situation do we need to watch ourselves more narrowly than in the selection of a companion: I mean, a female companion—said my uncle with a shrug.—And first, my dear boy, never marry a flirt—never suffer yourself to be enamored of her—(here he cast his eyes over his memorandum book.) In those lines, he observed, handing me his book, you will read my conduct and feelings in such a situation.

I glanced my eyes over the lines. They were verses written in the peculiarly neat style for which my uncle was celebrated. Like most young men he scribbled rhyme when in love. They were as follows:

I could have loved her in her bright
And beautiful array,
Moving enshrined in angel light
That stole all hearts away—
She might have been, though others strove,
My first, my fond, my only love.

I could have loved her! Yes, I've gazed
For hours upon that face so fair;
And when her beaming brow was raised
'Neath flowing locks of auburn hair,
There was a brow, a lip, a smile,
To conquer care, and grief beguile.

And Fancy formed a sun-bright car,
And placed her blooming by my side,
To rove through lands of light afar,
My lovely friend, companion, bride—
Oh, then my throbbing heart beat high,
With strange and fearful ecstasy.

There came a youth of manly form,
And wordy tongue, and laughing eye,
His heart seemed ever kind and warm,
They met—I knew not why—
She loved—a strange and girlish part—
She knew another claimed his heart.

And he would sit and smile so gay,
So light and even carelessly;
He knew 't would steal her heart away,
But the rank scum of vanity
Cased up his feelings—'t is no hurt,
I hate with all my heart a flirt.

And they two flirted! Woman's fame,
When sullied once, what can retrieve!
The midew's bright hung o'er her name—
But this was not her hour to grieve;
Yet, oh! I knew in coming years
Each smile would cost a fount of tears.

And I was proud, and scorned to cast
One kindly look upon her now,
And grief and sorrow gathered fast,
To wring my heart and cloud my brow:
What! could I stoop ever to adorn
Myself with toys a fop had worn.

No! rather would I walk alone,
Down that lone vale of passing life,
Than take, what he had idly thrown,
A cast-off play thing, for a wife!—
I left her—pride and tears were blended,
And thus my first affections ended.

TURKISH HONESTY.

Tournesfort says, 'Children may be sent to market in Constantinople with perfect safety if they can only ask for what they want.' No one will impose upon them by taking too much.

[From the N. Y. Constellation.]

On a Lady, who, for the third time, prosecuted for a Breach of Marriage Promise.

The tender heart of Julia Ann
Has thrice been rent by cruel man,
And thrice took legal stitches,
But who can blame the tender maid,
That she should fly to legal aid
To help her mend the breeches?
For as the costly stuffs of old
Were stitched with threads of shining gold,
So here 't is only gold thread can Stitch up the heart of Julia Ann.

Near Rodosto, we saw a young soldier mounted on a handsome charger, the reins of which was held by an old Turk with a venerable white beard. They were father and son; the younger man was known to John. His family were rich and lived near the Asiatic castle of the Dardanelles. John asked him where he had been? He replied, 'Military ardour inspired me with a wish to join my brave comrades in arms; but God's providence put fear in my heart, and so I returned.'

AN ADDRESS.

NO. III.

To the Hon. NATHANIEL TERRY, Chairman of the Connecticut Antimasonic Convention, Delegate to the National Antimasonic Convention, Chairman of the Hartford Antimasonic Convention, &c.

SIR:—

In support of your charges you have adduced the testimony of 'seceding Masons,' and rely entirely upon their statements. You maintain that Masons of fair character, and having the means of knowledge, have borne unequivocal testimony against the Masonic society. But are you quite sure that men of candor will place implicit confidence in their statements? Of the whole number of Masons in Connecticut, ten or fifteen are said to have seceded from the society. But will you hazard the assertion, that these men are more respectable, more virtuous, or more intelligent than thousands of the fraternity? Nay, you know that there are hundreds and hundreds of Masons around you whose integrity and patriotism far surpass the aggregate virtue of the whole number of your 'seceding' witnesses. Grant for seceders all that you claim for them: admit that ten or fifteen credible witnesses unequivocally support your accusations, what credit can they gain with honest men, when they are contradicted by six thousand witnesses of equal intelligence and virtue, having equal means of knowledge? But you say that one or two hundred men have 'renounced Masonry' in the State of New-York. I am unable to see how the statements of a few men in New-York can support your accusations against the citizens of Connecticut. But, admitting their relevancy, I reply, that your cause will derive little support from their testimony until you can prove that one or two hundred apostates are entitled to higher credit than thirty thousand respectable freemen, with Abraham Van Vechten and Stephen Van Rensselaer at their head, who have maintained their integrity. Men gain credit in the community from their characters in life. Now what if apostates do testify to the truth of your charges, they are contradicted by five hundred times their number, and that too by men whose individual integrity you dare not assail. Suppose fifteen seceders from the churches in Paris should testify that the Parisian Christians were combined to commit treason and murder, and that six thousand communicants of those churches, of irreproachable character, should deny the charge, and state that like all other Christians their object was the promotion of love to God and good will to man. Whose testimony should we credit? Should we rely upon the statements of fifteen men when they are contradicted by six thousand witnesses of equal credibility? If we apply to this subject the rules which reason and common honesty dictate, we cannot fail to conclude that the balance of testimony is altogether against you.

But let us look a little at the character of your witnesses, and see if there are not some suspicious circumstances connected with their testimony. Here I shall not deny that some honest men may have imbibed prejudices against Masonry and left the society from conscientious scruples. Amidst the excitement which ambition and political intrigues have created on this subject, I have no doubt that some pious, good men have been persuaded to 'renounce Masonry' from an impression of its evil tendency. Some respectable clergymen have honestly embraced the opinion that their duty to the Christian Church required their separation from the Masonic fraternity. Of the principles of Masonry, its usages and requirements, these men have been entirely ignorant, but their honesty is an excuse for their error. With such men I have no controversy. If they were dissatisfied with the Masonic society they had an unquestionable right to withdraw from it, and their motives, or their conduct, no candid Mason will censure. 'Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not, and let not him which eateth not judge him that eateth.' But those men who have denounced the fraternity, and united in a political crusade against their brethren, we do not—we cannot believe to be honest men. They stand before the public with a lie in their right hand and the tongue of a slanderer in their mouth.—In my remarks upon 'seceders' I wish expressly to be understood that I except all those who have honestly renounced Masonry and withdrawn from the society in the spirit of the Apostle Paul, 'Let not him that eateth not judge him that eateth,' and towards all such men I will cherish the precept 'Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not.'

But the witnesses upon whose testimony you rely to convict your fellow men of crimes, do 'judge him that eateth.' These men voluntarily united with the Masonic society—they approved of its objects—they attended its assemblies—they joined in its processions—they defended its character—they eulogized its principles—they encouraged the introduction of members. In perfecting their membership they acted with great caution. They advanced from one degree to another, at different periods, with a full knowledge of the preceding degrees. They tell us that on their initiation they bound themselves with an oath never to disclose the transactions of the lodge, and at every future degree renewed the promise, and called Jehovah to witness the sincerity of their vow. These solemn promises they now deliberately break, and with the infamy of violated vows upon their heads, stand the solitary supporters of your cause: and you now rest a charge involving the characters of thousands of your fellow men upon the testimony of acknowledged liars.

Here I readily admit that a promise, the performance of which is inconsistent with our higher duties to God and our country, may be violated. Every promise which contravenes the precepts of the Bible and the laws of the land, is void. But it by no means follows from these premises that the whole doctrine of moral obligation is exploded. An exemption from the performance of an unlawful promise furnishes no excuse for the violation of one that is lawful. If the seceding Mason promised to blaspheme God, or to conceal crimes, that promise is not binding; but is he therefore at liberty to violate a promise to be charitable to his brethren? These men admit a promise not to disclose the transactions of the Masonic society; they now, in violation of that promise, profess to disclose its most unessential forms and usages. Their promise to these forms certainly was not unlawful; it imposed no violation of law, human or divine. Now I ask if, in the deliberate breach of this promise, they can be honest men? Is not the sin of a wicked falsehood upon their heads? What reliance can be placed upon men who, upon their own confessions, have broken over the restraints of morality and set at defiance the precepts of religion.

As you have specified some gentlemen in your 'State Reports' as worthy especial confidence, and claimed for them extraordinary credit, their testimony is a proper subject of remark. I shall in my next letter examine the statements of these men.

Your obt servant,

BENJ. FRANKLIN.

Mr. Editor:—

When the minds of men are laboring under any particular excitement, the effects of which can produce no possible good, and the termination of which can alone restore peace and happiness, I would be the last to add fuel to the flame by offering any remarks that might lead to controversy, or tend in the least degree to arouse animosity on either side; but when I see men of the lowest grades of society, rise as it were from the dust of the earth, and, clothed in the habiliments of the blackest falsehoods, mount the car of their own ambition, spreading its sails amidst the hurricane of an excitement, and directing their course to offices of honor and trust; as one possessing the rights of a free citizen, I cannot look upon such transactions with entire indifference. Not many weeks since I noticed in your paper some account of the proceedings at Bridgewater, in regard to the regulation of the jury list for that town, from which some of the first men in the town were removed upon the simple reason that they were Masons. What! has it come to this, that one part of the free citizens of our country shall rise and say to another, you are unfit, and, consequently, have no right to hold any office in this land of liberty? I say it is possible that such sentiments as these should be advanced and no reason whatever assigned except, merely, you belong to a society to which I do not? Yet such is the fact. I will not inquire if the gentlemen of Bridgewater, who voted for a revival of the jury list, were actuated by honest and honorable feelings towards their fellow citizens; but I do ask, what the Masons of Bridgewater have done to merit such treatment? Are they suspected of crime? The law is open and plain. Let them be arraigned, and if found guilty, suffer the penalties that the law may inflict; but if not, then let them be restored to the full enjoyment of their citizenship. But we are told that it is not for crimes that they are thus denounced as unworthy the enjoyment of civil rights, but for the simple fact that they belong to a particular institution, called the Masonic. And can any person, possessing in any common degree honesty, impartiality, and common sense suppose that such a dangerous institution, and such wicked and unprincipled men as Masons are represented to be, could have existed from time immemorial, and the important fact remain for such men as Southwick, Giddings and Thacher to discover to the world? Impossible. Let us suppose for one moment, that these men, who now pretend so much love for their country, had existed fifty-five years ago, clothed in all their powers of wisdom and keen discernment, and had possessed (as they now desire to) the power of prohibiting every Mason from holding any office, civil or military. Nearly or quite all the most distinguished officers in the revolution, instead of having commanded on the field of battle as they did, would only have been found mingled in the ranks with common soldiers, or, what is quite as probable, engaged in their own domestic concerns. The result of the revolution under such circumstances, I will not attempt to describe, but leave for the conscience of every persecutor of Masons to paint in his own breast. And are the Masons of the present day worse than they were then? Would they not as willingly and as cheerfully lay down their lives in defence of their country's rights, as any other class of citizens? Most certainly they would. Then why attempt to wrest from them those rights which they purchased with their blood, and which they now feel as strongly bound to defend, as any other class of men in our free country?—These are serious questions and they require serious and candid answers. Let every person who feels himself under the least obligations to his God, his Country and himself, view in its true light the course which antimasons are pursuing, and a few years will have placed that odious name of party distinction in its well deserving shades of oblivion. POLITICAL MASONRY.

MR. FOWLER:—The result of the recent election of a Representative in Pawtucket, Mass. will doubtless be seized on, and trumpeted forth by the heralds of ant Masonry, as another specimen of the proscriptive spirit of Political Masonry. And after the whining and carping of Doct. Cantwell, it would not be surprising to see a certain paper called the American, a palpable misnomer, by the by, arrayed in all the sable pomp of mourning for the signal defeat of its party; and opening its flood gates of scurrility and abuse on the Fraternity, for its political management. But let it be recollected that the same veracious and high minded editor, utters no dolorous complaints, and chaunts no sad solemn strains, for the political management of his friends, the antimasons, in the towns of Randolph, Stoughton, and Belchertown, in excluding from lists of jurors, men more honorable than themselves, for no other fault than the damning sin of being Masons! This is all as it should be; according to the political text book of Antimasons. To disfranchise a fellow citizen, to proscribe him as an enemy to human rights, to wrest from him one of the highest privileges of a freeman, to hold him up to the world, as a man incapable of doing justice, and not to be believed or trusted under the solemn responsibility of a judicial oath—without a legal trial by his peers, without a hearing, and without evidence of a fault, is the leading principle of ant Masonry, and the legitimate fruit of its pretended charity. Such are the doings of the party; and with all their pretensions to patriotism and honest integrity, let the public judge from their acts; and then decide if a baser conspiracy against the unalienable rights of man has ever existed, that stands recorded in the annals of the world.

Political Masonry!—Yes—this is the war cry of the party—Well, if Masonry assumes a political aspect, whose fault is that? Has it ever done so before?—Never. Have Masons now sought to give their profession a political character? Never. How then came it to assume such a cast? The query is easily solved:—Antimasons have themselves produced the change. By their high handed measures of proscription and disfranchisement, wherever chance has thrown into their hands, 'a little brief authority,' Masons have learned by dear bought experience, that to be passive and submit quietly, must result in the absolute privation of all the rights and privileges of American Freemen. As antimasons identify Masons with Masonry, and wage an indiscriminate warfare of extermination against both, they cannot do otherwise, than either tamely to submit to be made slaves to an unprincipled faction, or boldly contend for their rights. This every body of men has a perfect right to do—And the Mason that would not thus act on the defensive, is unworthy the name of man.

The political management of Masonry no doubt had a share in the election of Mr. Ingraham. I rejoice that it was so, all things considered. But why was this management necessary? Ask the opposite party—with a pious Deacon, at its head, whose profession is, 'As ye would that others should do unto you, do ye even so unto them'—Ask that party—ask that Deacon, who determined that the election should turn on the question of ant Masonry versus Masonry? Was it the Masons that established this rule? No—it was their enemies that waged the battle, and compelled them to fight. Did the Masons agree, if triumphant, to erase the names of all antimasons from the list of jurors? No—it was their opponents that resolved thus to treat the Masons; and who were thus put to the necessity of contesting the ground, on the principle laid down by their enemies; that they might prevent the consequences that had resulted from ant Masonry, so derogatory to the spirit of American Independence, and hostile to the best interests of our common country. The foe appeared in order of battle—they were met and routed by an overwhelming force—right and justice prevailed—and, assisted by Masons, a gentleman has been elected, with whom, the people are willing to entrust their concerns. The opposing party and their candidate will, no doubt, long remember their signal defeat.

By the proceedings of an ant Masonic meeting at Potsdam in the County of St. Lawrence, N. Y. published in the North Star of the 5th instant, it might seem as though ant Masonry in that region was strong and waxing stronger and stronger, and as though the church was about to unite her whole strength with this new-fangled political party. It would further seem as though the congregational or Presbyterian churches were among those actively engaged to unite church and state. The editor of the Star in his introductory paragraph says, 'It [the intelligence] is calculated to strengthen the Congregational church in Danville in the efficient measures they have adopted respecting the existence of Masonry in the church and to stimulate them to unabating perseverance until it is utterly extirpated therefrom.' We have no doubt but the perseverance of the leaders in ant Masonry in Danville, both in and out of the church, will continue unabated at least till after the next Freeman's meeting. But with deep solicitude for their spiritual welfare, we would humbly suggest, that a persevering recourse to their Bibles, to their closets and to united prayer, may be as effectual means of leading them in the path of duty as the doings of an assembly of men of like passions with themselves. We hope they will keep constantly in view that solemn day, when the accusers and the accused must stand before the same heart-searching Judge. With respect to St. Lawrence County, we believe the fact to be that the Presbyterian churches are but little affected by all the efforts which office seekers have made to divide them. We believe that very few of that order had anything to do with the meeting alluded to. We further believe that since that meeting ant Masonry has been on the decline. We, of course, cannot personally know the state of things there; but the evidence we have is to us conclusive. One item of this evidence is contained in a letter from a Presbyterian minister in that County. We give the following Extract:

St. Lawrence Co. N. Y. March 21, 1831.

I hope the multiplied evils and outrageous abominations of ant Masonry are diminishing in your State. I do and must regard the political excitement termed ant Masonry as a curse sent from God to scourge ministers and churches. Its effects have been tremendous. It is my hearty desire and prayer to God that it may prove a beneficial chastisement. I do not know of a Presbyterian church in this County that has been much disturbed by it. In this particular, we have not been dealt with according to our iniquities. Our ministers and most efficient christians have made it a business to keep ant Masonry out of the churches: as yet the effort has been successful.

Accounts, also, which have every appearance of being correct, represent, that at the late town meetings in that county, the ant Masonic strength fell far below what it was in March 1830.—[St. Johnsbury Herald.]

We find the following receipt for making antimasons, in a New York paper. Some of our neighbors are made after it: but in the manufacture of a majority of them, double the quantity of the two first ingredients were used, and instead of being fit for immediate use, they were layed upon the fence, until a vacant office tolled them off.

[Tolland Advocate.]

'TO MAKE AN ANTIMASON. Take half a pound of ignorance, five pounds of credulity, half a pound of superstition, a double-handful of malice, ten pounds each of calumny and detraction, with a suitable quantity of impudence and inconsistency, and a little of the leaven of hypocrisy—mix them together in a very thick brain pan, and the composition will be fit for immediate use.'

From the parade made by the ant Masonic papers, about the renunciation of Parley Hall, of Vt. we were almost persuaded to believe that some honest man, in a moment of mental aberration, had fallen in bad company, and been enlisted in that band of perjured recreants, who proclaim to the world, the damning evidence of their own infamy—but it appears from a recent publication in the Vt. Repertory, that he is of the same kidney with Stro ng and Whittlesey, and therefore not entitled to any credit.—Well may ant Masonry exclaim, 'spare me from my friends.'—[Tolland Adv.]

The result of our Representative election; though not just what we could have wished it, is on the whole highly gratifying to the friends of equal rights. We do not mean to say that the election of seven proscriptive antimasons is acceptable to the town, but that the large vote given against the prevailing ticket exceeded the expectations of the most sanguine of our friends; and has furnished the strongest inducements for future exertions. We have cautiously abstained from introducing the subject of Masonry and ant Masonry into our paper, from the most entire willingness that both Masons and antimasons should enjoy their respective opinions. We have never seen the necessity of making a political question of the matter. But when we see the organ of the ant Masonic party avowing such unrighteous principles and advertising such diabolical measures as it has of late, we think silence would be unpardonable. Look at the last Record, ye friends of christian harmony, and read this disgusting paragraph:—viz.

'Would you have all Masons expelled from your churches, and all Masonic ministers dismissed from their societies? Yes, just so. We would have all that done, without any hesitation or mental reservation whatever.'

What a total disregard for the comfort and harmony of society these blood-hounds must have! What havoc and confusion would they willingly cause, merely to gratify their own unhallowed ambition! We ask not the ring-leaders of ant Masonry to listen to the voice of reason—Useless would be the request—But we do earnestly entreat the honest men of that party to stop short in their proscriptive career. We call upon all christians of all denominations to set their faces against a plot which if carried into operation, would bring quick and fearful destruction upon the Church, and produce the most baneful consequences on society at large—a plot of which all others are but the A. B. C. [Lynn Democrat.]

Ant Masonry, we suspect, is going down in the state of New-York. The Franklin Telegraph, an ant Masonic paper, and the Journal of Potsdam, also an ant Masonic paper, have recently been discontinued. Besides the above, three ant Masonic Editors have, within the last fortnight, relinquished their situations, on account of 'ill-health.'

STRUCTURE OF THE EYE.

The Cornea.—Anteriorly, that clear, shining wall, resembling a watch crystal, which finishes the membranous box, is called the cornea. Simple as this crystal appears, it is infinitely curious in structure. It is made of thin, pellucid plates, one over another, held together by a spongy elastic substance. By maceration in water, a few hours, the sponge will absorb it, to such a degree, that the plates may be distinctly felt to slide upon each other between the thumb and finger.

Like glands, like bags of oil, only to be seen by the most powerful microscope, are lodged under the first plate, which continually oozing out its contents upon the surface, which gives the sparkling brilliancy to this part of the eye. As death approaches, this fluid forms a pellicle, like a dark cloud over the lower portion of the cornea. This formation is taken to be a sure indication of approaching dissolution. Many diseases are peculiar to the cornea; such, for example, as a milky colored effusion of matter under the external plate, preventing a free transmission of light to the interior.

Iris.—By looking into a persons eye there seems to be a vertical partition, either black, blue, or hazel, as the case may be, which prevents us from looking into the concealed regions beyond,—having a round hole in its centre. Scientifically, this partition is called the iris, while its central orifice is denominated the pupil. How the diameter of this hole is enlarged or diminished, anatomists have never been fortunate enough to explain, satisfactorily, the apparatus is so minute, that they cannot decide upon its true character. One fact however, is certain, that the pupil is large or small, according to the quantity of light that may be necessary for the formation of a distinct picture of the object seen,—and this change is effected without our being conscious of the action.—Resembling other delicate membranes, in many respects, we are unwilling to confuse the subject with a description that would distract the mind of a new beginner.

From the reflection of such rays as are not admitted through the pupil, or central hole, we account for much of the lively brilliancy of the iris. On its back side it is rather fleecy, like the tapetum, but dissimilar in other respects. Over this is covered a black, blue, hazel, or tea colored paint, which gives a permanent color to the eye. It has been often remarked, that the eyes and hair commonly correspond in color. Whenever the iris acts, as for instance it does, in going from a dark into a light room the pupil is made smaller,—acting uniformly in its fibres, to keep it circular. On returning to the dark apartment, the pupil enlarges again. A knowledge of this fact will explain the reason of a painful sensation in the eye caused by a strong and sudden light. As soon as the iris has had time to diminish the size of the pupil, we can endure the same luminous object with perfect comfort. When we leave a well lighted room, on first going into a dark street, everything appears lurid and indistinct. The iris soon begins to enlarge, the pupil to admit more light, and when that has been accomplished, although in comparative darkness, we recognise objects without an effort. Acting independently of the will, its duties are like those of a faithful sentinel, always consulting the safety of the splendid optical instrument confided to its care, with reference to its subserviency to the being for whose use it was exclusively constructed. Were it otherwise,—were it left to our own care, how often would it be neglected, and indeed totally ruined, solely for the want of undivided attention. All that complex system of machinery, of which life and existence are constantly depending, (the vital organs,) are wisely placed beyond the reach of the laws of volition. If the pulsation of the heart, the functions of lungs, or the circulation of blood in the brain, depended upon our attention, our recollection of the fact, that they must be kept in motion, or we should not live, we should be in great danger of forgetting it, and therefore die in our first slumber.

PRESSURE OF THE AIR.

We are quite insensible to what principles of philosophy we are indebted for our comforts, and how much has been made subservient to our use by the great artificer of nature. The first act performed by a human being, the process by which the vital current from his mother's breast is made to supply his wants, depends on the pressure of the air.—How few have any idea of the philosophical aid in what appears to be so simple. But the same may be remarked of innumerable circumstances, which appear to be produced with as little design. Since the attention of philosophers has been directed to these mechanical peculiarities, several phenomena have been explained, which had depended for their solution solely on conjecture. The awful thunder found an explanation in the theory that the lightning in leaping from cloud to cloud, or from a cloud to the earth, drove back the air which opposed its progress, while the atmosphere, rushing in from behind to fill the vacancy, produced the sound which always succeeds the flash.

To Sir Edward Home we are obliged for the explanation of the cause by which flies are enabled to walk on the lower side of a horizontal plane, or the perpendicular surface of glass. He ascertained that their feet have flat skins or flaps, like the feet of webfooted animals, and that they have the power of drawing down this web so closely upon the surface whereon they walk, as effectually to exclude the air. The consequence of which is, their feet are pressed down upon that surface by the external atmosphere. On this principle, other insects possess the power of locomotion on similar situations. The same law applies to the sea-horse, who is thus enabled to climb perpendicular hills of ice; and to some kinds of lizards, who ascend vertical walls at pleasure. Many seashells depend on this law for their tenacity to rocks. The animal has the power of expelling the air between himself and the rock, whereby he is pressed there with a force proportioned to his size. Cupping, whether affected by a syringe, or by the removal of the air by burning anything in the cup, belongs to the same law. And until within a few years, the steam-engine, the mightiest of all the inventions of man, depended for its power on the pressure of the air.

A beautiful illustration of the removal of pressure from the surface of water, may be exhibited by boiling it in a common oil flask: and corking it tightly during the ebullition. The glass being removed from the fire, shows the continuance of the commotion, which may be easily checked by holding it near the fire or dipping it into hot water. This very curious experiment may be easily explained. The addition of heat checks the commotion by expanding the vapor on the surface, and thereby increasing its pressure. The application of cold condenses the vapor; and as the air has been previously driven out by boiling, the pressure is so much diminished, as to offer but little resistance to the escape of vapor from the bottom of the fluid in the form of bubbles.

STUDY OF ENTOMOLOGY.

Many an individual has in childhood imbibed an aversion for insects, from the circumstance of having met with them in his articles of his food; or having observed them in situations, little to be desired either for their cleanliness or comfort; an aversion, which, like other early impressions, is extremely difficult to be removed; increasing, unless an effort is made to destroy it, in proportion to the frequency of the exposure. Who does, not if in his boyish days he has often noticed an insect hovering over a stagnant pool, or glutting itself with putrefying matter, particularly if he has seized that insect and found it not only overrun with parasites, but emitting a most offensive odor, even more unpleasant than that arising from its repast—who does not remember, that the mere presence of that insect, preserved perhaps by some zealous companion, did for a time recall the prejudices which were so early formed, and all the trifling circumstances which existed to fix them?—

This disgust, occasioned by an individual, involuntarily leads many to avoid the whole class.

The inconveniences suffered from insects, and the injuries produced by them, cause many superficial observers to turn from these to other objects, more worthy their interest. The musquito, and flea, and bug, leave impressions not easily to be effaced. The acute sufferings of a night are not forgotten for years. But when in addition to these annoyances, our clothes, and furniture, and books—the dearly collected specimens of the naturalist, and the cheaply purchased works of art are all ruined by various species of this class, no slight degree of philosophy is required, to revert to these animals without awakening unpleasant associations. And if besides these, we perceive the merciless destroyers blasting our forests and fruit trees, our most valuable vegetables and choicest plants, depriving us of our grain when it is carefully gathered into store houses, and thus adding to the distresses of the poor, when they are the least able to bear them, it is not surprising that a feeling of uneasiness should often be awakened; nor that the mind which dwells upon the clouds only in the horizon, should forget that they are sometimes dispelled. The entomologist, even, cannot read the histories of some particular species, without agitation. The locust, for example, must ever excite a degree of terror in the minds of the most enthusiastic. Although Arabia appears to be the favorite resort of these dreaded intruders they have visited the other countries of Asia, and not only these, but Africa and Europe also have felt their unrelenting havoc. From the earliest times we have been taught to shudder at their devastations. And removed as far as we may be from the countries of this genus, we cannot carefully read of the ruin produced by them without a sensation of horror. Not only do they destroy every part of plants, and trees, and grasses, the root, trunk, leaf, bud, fruit, with merciless voracity, but every green thing is swept off without distinction; thus depopulating nations, and carrying more dread with them than the most powerful armies. Nothing but desolation can be connected with a host of these, extending five hundred miles, and so dense that when on wing, like an eclipse, they completely hide the sun. But this is not all. The immense multitudes, when they have destroyed everything about them, die; and their decomposing carcasses often produce the plague. One hundred thousand men have been swept off in Africa in one season, and nearly a million of men and beasts in Italy, by this cause.

The insignificance of the animals belonging to this class, prevents many from engaging in the study. A senseless worm, say some, is unworthy the attention of man. Other objects should occupy his thoughts. Nobler pursuits should claim his precious time.

Others, alive to sensibility, at once shrink from a pursuit which to them appears cruel in the extreme, and thus suppress an inclination which might prompt them to become benefactors to their fellow men.

METALLIC HONES.

We have recently tested a very superior article for sharpening razors, surgical instruments, penknives, &c. invented by Mr. Luke Rodgers of this place, called the Metallic hone, and recommend it to the curious in these matters, as excelling all inventions for similar purposes, now in use. It is well known that most of the common Dutch hones are subject to hard spots and flinty intermixtures, which more or less resist the equal action of the razor blade; consequently, upon such surfaces, the operation must be uneven, so that a uniform regular edge cannot be obtained. The best of Dutch hones, by use, will lose their perfect level; and when this is the case, as is well known to all experimentalists—the blade cannot be accurately set, and is frequently injured in the attempt.—The Metallic Hone, by maintaining an equal friction, obviates this objection; is exact, flat surface, composed of prepared iron, forms the bed which receives the Paste, a composition which acts with singular force upon the razor; imparting a perfect edge in half the time employed on other substances in common use. A very convenient Strap, is, with the Metallic Hone, inserted in a neat morocco case, forming together a light and compact appendage to the gentleman's dressing apparatus. [Trav.]

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

[From the Western Courier.]

TO THE METHODISTS OF PORTAGE COUNTY.

Dear Brethren:—Since my communications of October, and November last, I have had a more favorable opportunity of watching the spirit, and fruits of antimasonry—Since that time I have spent near three months in the State of New York, and have seen it in all its stages of combustion from the first volume of smoke, to its expiring embers. In all those stages I have examined it, and in all I am satisfied it is but a branch of that devouring fire, which it is the business of evil spirits to enkindle, and nourish. Many, I doubt not, are led into it by its false, and delusive glare, who are honestly striving to arrive at the cause of truth.—They judge of the Institution of Masonry by the character of its apostate members, who went out from it because they were not of it. If the Institution was identified with the character of its apostates, no one, who holds the truth in righteousness, could for a moment justify it, or respect it. The day, I hope, however, is past when this is the rule of judgment. If it were, we, my Brethren, as a church, would have fallen long ago. Apostates have left us, and spoken all manner of evil against us—but what does this prove? Does all the evil report against the methodists, and all the evil conduct of Apostate Methodists prove that Methodism is bad? If the world should judge of the cause of Christ by the same rule that we are called on to judge of Masonry, they would deem it fit for devils only. Many Methodists, as well as Masons have proved apostates, and in both instances these apostates have traduced the Institutions of which they were unworthy members. Among the former we may place EVANGELOS, better known by the name of Rev. Ezra Booth, who so feelingly depicted to the Methodists the evils of Masonry on the church—even saying that the support of the Preachers should be withdrawn from those who were Masons, and would not renounce! Under the garb of a Methodist Preacher he undoubtedly had his influence in deceiving, and deluding those who looked to him as their spiritual teacher. His taper, for awhile, glimmered beside the Star of antimasonry, and rendered it luminous. The Methodists were the special objects of his care—to save them from the evils of Masonry was his professed object. But how fallen! this friend of the Methodists—this religious instructor—this false traducer of the Masons—is now a MORMONITE!! If I pitied his blind zeal in the cause of persecution then, I now detest the hypocrisy that led him to keep on the profession of a Methodist the better to draw them into the snare. I speak it not in triumph, but in sorrow, where I say his course has ended in character with the persecuting, and uncharitable doctrines he avowed. No, I then, believed his error was an error of the head, and not of the heart. I am now forced to believe it was a political project, in which neither the head nor the heart were concerned, except so far as he thought necessary to promote his favorite political schemes, and the schemes of the party to which he had attached himself. I would still fain believe he was but a tool in the hands of intriguing demagogues, who bid him to prostitute his religious influence to promote a political party. His standing gave him influence, and made him an object desirable for acquisition to the antimasonic leaders—and too well did they succeed in persuading him to bend his principles to the popularity of the times. Oft has he been called, by the request of those who are now in the world of spirits, to address the Masonic brethren who assembled in that character to pay the last tribute of respect to the memory of a departed brother—as oft has he depicted their Christian, and Masonic virtues, and in apparent ardor commended them to the Architect of the Universe as their Creator. From a friend he became an enemy, from blessing he turned to cursing—and under the garb of Methodism led the way to political persecution. Behold the end of that man! he is now a MORMONITE! The Methodists, for whom he had such special care, and concern, are now like the Masons, radically wrong, and under the curse of this once pretended friend. By the 'light' of Bernard he first denounced all who were Masons—then by the light of Jo Smith he denounces all the Methodists.

His first object was to destroy the Methodists by dividing them in political affairs—in this he partially succeeded—how many he will now induce to adopt the new system of religion is unknown. What evil spirit will next be presented to him is beyond the reach of mortals to tell. If on account of his prostitution of Religion to advance a political party he is not given over to hardness of heart so that the spirit of truth can have no operation upon his mind, that truth will tell him of his wickedness, and that he must do his first work over, and repent himself of his wickedness. Satan will undoubtedly present him with the armor of self-will, and tell him it is too humiliating to acknowledge to the bloody Masons, that he wronged them without a cause, or to the foolish Methodists that he first tried to betray them, and then basely forsook them—and became a Mormonite. No; probably we shall never see his recantation of his errors—but the Methodists, like the Masons will now be the target for his malevolent shafts.

Dear Brethren—Much he has told you about the Bible—he gave you warnings against the Masons because they, as he said, abused and perverted the truth of God. With what sincerity, his conduct in adopting the imposition of Jo Smith now proves. But I venture to say he did it with as much sincerity as most do who are endeavoring to draw the Methodists as blindly into a course of persecution as Satan did Paul of Tarsus.

Brethren would you be willing that our church should be judged by the conduct of this Apostate Methodist? Because he says the good old Bible is not as good as Jo Smith's, would you be willing to have the world believe that was the sentiment of the Methodists? Because he says the Methodists are wrong, and the Mormonites right! are you willing to acknowledge the truth of it?

Such judgment you are called on to give against the Masons—you are told that you must believe what apostate Masons tell you respecting them—you must by this rule say that Mr. Booth's report of us is correct—that we are wrong, that the old Bible is not sufficient for our direction in the way of salvation, and that the anathema is false that says 'whosoever adds to the prophecy of this Book the plagues therein written shall be added to him'—for this new Bible does add much to the former, and Mr. Booth says it is true.

Dear Brethren, weigh these things well—and give no more credit to the apostate members of other societies, than you are willing should be given to ours—and until you are willing the world should receive as truth the report of apostate Methodists respecting our Church, do not go blindly into the cause of persecution against a whole order of men for crimes which exist only in the acts, and reports of apostate members.

BIOGRAPHY.

JOHN M'LEAN, OF OHIO.

John M'Lean was born in Somerset county, in the state of New Jersey, on the 11th March, 1785. During his childhood, his father removed to the vicinity of Lexington, where he remained until he purchased a track of land in Miami country, which he first occupied in 1797. He continues to reside on the same farm, now, by the rapid progress of improvement, brought within the limits of the noble state of Ohio. The respectable and adventurous pioneer on the verge of civilization, who encountered so long since the perils of the western wilderness was far from being affluent, and his restricted pecuniary means prevented him from conferring upon his sons a classical education, even if there had been seminaries for imparting such instruction in those remote settlements. They could only partake of rudimental education to be derived from the common schools in the country, in which, however, JOHN distinguished himself for proficiency from the earliest period of his career. He always occupied the first place in his class, and as a pupil was noticed for steadiness of purpose which has so strongly marked his subsequent life.

He continued on his father's farm, engaged in the invigorating and interesting labors of a husbandman, until 1802, when animated by a laudable desire of enlarging the store of his knowledge, he left his paternal roof and fields, and commenced the study of the Latin language, and other branches of liberal learning under the protection of two gentlemen of the neighborhood, well qualified to superintend his literary inquiries.

In 1804 he entered the office of Gen. Gano, the clerk of the courts held in Cincinnati; and during three years in that capacity, he availed himself of every opportunity of improvement. It was then, too, that he began the study of the law, under the guidance of the late Arthur St. Clair, son of the honorable, though unfortunate General of the same name, a gentleman of great legal attainments and eminent for the possession of those qualities of the heart which adorn human nature. Sensible that the means of acquiring knowledge had been restricted in the first part of his life, and that uncontrollable circumstances had embarrassed his advancement, young M'Lean now resolved to achieve all that untiring diligence could accomplish, to place himself on an equality in point of information with those whose previous opportunities had been superior to his own. He consequently imposed upon himself very rigid tasks of mental application, even limiting his hours of sleep to the smallest demands of nature, that no time might be needlessly abstracted from the primary effort to fit himself for all the duties of life. His assiduity was well rewarded, for in 1807 he began the practice of the law. At that time several gentlemen of much reputation was at the bar to which he was admitted, and Mr. M'Lean soon gained a high standing, and with it, extensive business, both which he maintained amidst powerful competitors.

Public attention and popular regard could not fail to be directed towards the unusually rapid advancement by a man who by his own unassisted powers rose every day in their view with solid strength, and was as they say, thus preparing for usefulness in his country.

In 1812, at the age of 27 years, he was elected to Congress in the district where he lived, which included Cincinnati, and was elected by a majority of more than double the number of votes given to two other citizens, who were supported against him. He took his seat in the great council of the nation, in the summer session succeeding the declaration of war. It was the era of deep interest, demanding great wisdom and energy in the conduct of public affairs. A system of revenue was adopted and various other subjects of much moment were acted upon at that crisis. Mr. M'Lean was young and comparatively inexperienced, and manifested his prudence and good sense by avoiding debate, preferring to improve himself by listening to the arguments of mature statesmen, whilst he uniformly gave a firm support to the war by his vote, among the tried republicans of that eventful day. He was not, however, long, a silent observer of the concerns of Congress; his active and patriotic mind soon entered into the efficient service of the representative station. He brought forward and supported with success, a bill to compensate those who lost their property which was employed in the public service of Detroit. This gave additional force to his already well earned popularity in his own district. He was the author of the measure which placed the widows of officers and soldiers who fell in their country's battles, on the half-pay pension list five years. The benefits of this humane act were extensively felt by a class of persons whose bereaved condition deeply excited the public sympathies; and the zeal with which he urged the adoption, shed new lustre over the character of its projector. Such offices of mercy win the heart of a generous people, for it will be an enduring truth that

'No radiant pearl which crested fortune wears,
Nor gem that twinkling hangs from beauty's ears,
Nor the bright stars which night's blue arch adorn,
Nor rising suns that gild the vernal morn,
Shine with so much lustre as the tear that breaks
For others' woe, down virtue's manly cheeks.'

He now began to feel the responsibility of his calling, and now perceived with modest pleasure the considerations which were awarded to his opinions, and Mr. M'Lean thence forward took a prominent position in the discussion on the policy of the war, and in favor of its vigorous prosecution, supporting the administration with great firmness and eloquence. He was a member of the committee on 'foreign relations,' and also of that on 'public lands,' and having much more local business of his constituents to transact, which was incident to the state of the conflict with Great Britain, his whole time and the powers of his mind were given to the public service at Washington.

His first period of duty in the House of Representatives having closed, he was re-elected by the unanimous vote of his district, and such was his popularity, that no one was named as his opponent. It is, moreover, a strong and honorable fact, and one that can seldom be adduced in reference to objects of elective favor, that against Mr. M'Lean, not the slightest censure ever appeared, either concerning his public or private conduct. Returned again, he was actually engaged in the business of the House, and was justly ranked among the ablest members of that body. During the session of the legislature of Ohio, in 1814-15, he was strongly solicited to become a candidate for the Senate of the Union, but he declined the honor intended him, partly on account of his age, but mainly because he much preferred the House of Representatives. At the next session of the Ohio Legislature, he yielded to the wishes of his friends, and was unanimously elected Judge of the Supreme Court of that State. He left Congress with regret, but the wants of an increasing family imposed duties which he could not forego; the most exemplary economy did not enable him to meet their wants, with the pay which he received as Federal Representative.

During six years he discharged the arduous and responsible office of Supreme Judge, in such a manner as to add to his already rich and honest fame.

In the autumn of 1822, Judge M'Lean without his solicitation or knowledge, was appointed by President Munroe, Commissioner of the Land Office.

On the first of July following, by the same discerning Chief Magistrate, he was selected for the difficult place of Postmaster General, a department, which, at that time, was overwhelmed with debt, and destitute of the least inducement, short of a sense of duty, and a confidence in the patriotism of the people, for any to encounter the herculean task of re-organization, or attempt to render it solvent. Judge M'Lean, however, did not rely in vain upon the hope that if he endeavored to sustain himself, the people would yield him their support. Neither were they disappointed. He entered at once upon his task, with the unfailing stock of moral courage and industry, that were his best aids, superadded to the confidence of his fellow citizens, and the nation need not be told to detail what were the results of his vast labors.

The three years preceding his appointment the receipts of the department fell short of the expenditures $262,821, and for the year immediately preceding, 55,540. He remained in office until 1829, during which period he increased the annual revenue more than half a million of dollars, and nearly doubled the stage transportation of the mail throughout the United States. No officer of our government ever devoted himself more faithfully to his duties, and very few individuals are capable of undergoing the amount of labor to which he subjected himself. His maxim was, that nothing should be considered finished, whilst anything remained undone. A deep and lasting impression was made upon the whole country by his renovation of this vitally important branch of the government. He continued to exercise the functions of Post Master General, during the administration of Mr. Adams, whose election he did not promote. On the choice of Gen. Jackson, he was appointed one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, a station which he now fills with equal dignity, ability and purity.

A review of Judge M'Lean's career and public services, must lead irresistibly to the conclusion, that he is endowed with qualities of mind, of a high order, such as render him fit for the most elevated post in the gift of this happy Union.—

He is a republican by nature, and by education. He acts under no disguise. Frank and courteous in his manner, no one who approaches him can withhold from him his confidence; and his lofty moral tone, and unyielding firmness, will not fail to fix the most favorable impression of his character. His information is extensive and varied. He has studied human nature in the school of experience. Never having been separated from the people by his condition in life, his sympathies mingle with theirs. In this respect he is in practice, what many are only by profession. No man was ever influenced less by selfish considerations; in every relation, public and private, to do that which is right, regardless of consequences, appear to have been his grand aim. Many facts might be adduced to illustrate this fine trait of his character, but such minutia need not be resorted to. In a letter to one of his friends, written many years ago, Judge M'Lean thus speaks of the means of the then existing cabinet to maintain the good will of the people, 'Patronage,' says he, 'yields a powerful influence only when it is properly used. The moral force arising from a deep conviction in the public mind, that patronage is employed with a single eye to the public interest, will be overwhelming. It will enlist on the side of the administration the feelings of every good man. To embody such a power, time is requisite. Its growth may be slow, but it will be sure. The administration must lay the foundation upon its acts, and then build the superstructure. It must win its way to the public confidence, not by blazoning the characters and high qualifications of the incumbents, but by the series of public measures, which shall afford convincing evidence, that the powers conferred, are faithfully exercised for the common benefit. If, in such a course, there be a failure, nothing but office is lost—character, honor, and everything which a high minded man can value are preserved.'

Judge M'Lean's sentiments on the great questions which have arisen in the progress of our government, have never been concealed, though, excepting when his congressional duty required the development of his opinions, he has not sought intrusively to volunteer either political doctrines, or arguments in defence of them, before the people. It is due to him here to remark that his attachment to the Union has ever been ardent—that whilst he approves of the judicious protection of our manufactures, he by no means regards as wise or just, any measures which shall sacrifice the other great interests of commerce and agriculture.—He is a great friend of internal improvement, and contemplates an independent judiciary as a mighty bulwark of protection, alike for the rights of the States, the integrity of the federal system, and for the preservation of the property and liberties of the people.

Such is an imperfect portrait of JOHN M'LEAN, in a public aspect. Let us for a moment approach near enough to examine his more private character, for it will bear the test of the severest scrutiny. How then does he appear in his domestic relations? The faithful husband, the affectionate father, the kind neighbor, the generous friend, the unostentatious benefactor of the poor; the just man—all the fruits of those principles which establish his claim without austerity or pretension, to the ennobling designation of a CHRISTIAN. The people of this nation have it in their power to call the citizen whom we have thus attempted briefly to describe, to the highest office in their gift, an honor and a trust, which never should be conferred, but upon him of whom, in every respect, it may be said, as it can of this excellent individual, that he is capable, independent, and irreproachable.

ONE OF THE PEOPLE.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, MAY 21, 1831.

RICHARD RUSH.

We perceive by the antimasonic papers that the Ex-Secretary of the Treasury,—John Randolph's 'master Slender,' al. Shakespeare's 'Branbury cheese,'—has sold himself to antimasonry. We have not learned the conditions of sale; but probably a nomination for the Presidency, by the Convention to be held at Baltimore in September next, will be the reward of his treachery. He says he has had 'matter in his head against us' for some years: that is, ever since he was turned out of office, by a Mason. We doubt him not; for he has disgorged not less than five columns of the most filthy, gangrenous bile that was ever thrown from the stomach of a sickly politician! His antimasonic attendants administered a powerful dose, and it has operated to admiration. Among the ingredients which he has thus disgorged, we perceive there is about one dram of moral honesty, which has the appearance of having lain dormant and heavily on the stomach for many years. This being removed, the gentleman is presumed to be ripe for 'treason, stratagem and strife.' And, consequently, qualified to be placed at the head of the antimasonic or any other faction, whose aim is the prostitution of the civil and political institutions of the country. He now stands before his fellow citizens in the triple character of traitor to his friends, his principles, and his God: he has become an antimason! He has basely deserted the party to whom he is indebted for all the notoriety he does possess, and sold himself to a faction the most proscriptive and intolerant that ever cursed this or any other country. He has seized upon the offer of the antimasons as a dernier resort; the last stay of his political existence. The result will be to send him down to the grave covered with infamy and disgrace. His political ambition has accomplished all that his worst enemies could wish him. The party to which he is now affiliated, has tried to induce nearly every public man in the country to consent to become their candidate for the Presidency. They have offered their bribes to Henry Clay, to Judge M'Lean, and a host of others, equally distinguished in the political world; but none of them are knaves enough to betray their party and friends. They are honest men, and had rather sink into everlasting oblivion, than rise into disgraceful notoriety, by the aid of a faction so infamous as the antimasonic. Richard Rush is made of more flexible materials. And had we been called upon to point out the man whom we thought most likely to betray his friends, and to accept a nomination for the Presidency at the hands of the antimasonic party, that man would have been the recreant apostate, who now stands before the public stripped of the hypocritical garb that has so long concealed his moral and political depravity. The motive which has induced him to take this step, is sufficiently obvious. The people of this country are not so blind that they cannot see through a political manoeuvre so unskillfully and clumsily managed. Nor are they so dishonest, so totally reckless of the morals, political honesty and integrity of their public functionaries, that they will support, by their suffrages, the political murderer and the moral traitor. The man who like Richard Rush, with sacrilegious hands, severs at one blow the ties of social and political friendships, and, demon-like, sacrifices his friends and his party on the altar of unhallowed ambition, merits no more, nor can he expect to receive less, than the execrations of honest men and the maledictions of those whom he has betrayed, abused and calumniated.

This man's presumption in denouncing the Masonic Institution, is equalled only by his ignorance of its principles. By his own acknowledgment he has taken but one degree, and was never in a Lodge but on one occasion. Are we then to attribute his folly to the inherent depravity of his heart, or to the imbecility of a decayed mind?—No honest man, of sane mind, would dare to denounce and reprobate principles which have stood the test of ages, and been approbated and fostered by the wisest and purest of patriots of all countries and of all times. No man but a corrupt, reckless political gambler would hazard his reputation in proscribing the members of an institution, and denouncing as traitorous and repugnant to the best interests of our government, principles which were cherished and inculcated by the immortal Washington, the venerable Lafayette; by Warren, Franklin, and a host of heroes who poured out their best blood, and wasted their best energies, in the achievement of our civil and political rights: those sacred rights which a banditti of antimasonic panders, with Richard Rush at their head, are straining every nerve, and practising every base artifice, to prostrate and banish from the face of the earth. They may effect this. A portion of the people of this country may be compelled to surrender their liberties; but they will be surrendered at a dearer rate than that at which they were purchased. Masons are like other men. They are Americans,—are freemen. They will not basely and passively surrender their freedom: they will not wear the chains of slavery. They ask only to be permitted peaceably to enjoy the rights and privileges secured to them, and to all other citizens, by the constitution and laws of their country. The request is just—it is holy; and they will not withdraw it to favor the advancement of any political knave under heaven. No! not even to make Richard Rush President of these United States. If Masons are traitors; if they are plotting treason against the government of the country, let them be tried by their peers and, if found guilty, execute them: if they are murderers, produce the evidence, and hang them; if they violate the laws, let the laws be avenged. But they will not quietly submit to be punished for crimes of which they are not guilty: they will not servilely permit themselves to be sacrificed to the demoniac spirit of a clan of political miscreants, who set themselves up as their accusers, witnesses, jurors, judges, and executioners! Masons have already borne more than was ever before required of flesh and blood. Even the viper when trod upon will turn and sting his oppressor. How have Masons acted? They have relied, and still rely on the virtue, intelligence, and patriotism of their fellow-citizens, to protect them in the peaceable enjoyment of their civil and political rights.—And we are not prepared to admit that their confidence is misplaced. We cannot believe that the majority of the people of this republic will give their countenance and support to a political faction whose object is the proscription and disfranchisement of a patriotic, reputable and intelligent class of citizens as any of which our country is possessed. Masons are charged with exercising an improper influence on the political concerns of the country. The charge is not true. Masons are found in the political ranks of every party: they are arrayed against each other in politics, in religion, in law. But by continued persecution they may be driven to the necessity of taking a political stand: they may be compelled to side with that portion of their fellow-citizens, of whatever political sentiments, who will shield them from the shafts of malignant proscription. But in that case, they will be found on the side of right and justice: they will be found manfully contending for the preservation of the liberty and free institutions of their country.

We have not space this week for an analysis of the incongruous mass of philogistic eloquence with which the 'Honorable Richard Rush,' under his own proper signature, has thought proper to favor the benighted people of this country. And if we had we should hardly know where to make a beginning. As for anything there is in his argument, we may as well begin at the conclusion, or in the middle, as with 'gentlemen, I have,' &c. He abuses the Masonic Institution to the full extent of his abilities, and scandalizes and libels the Press, and the whole fraternity of editors, with a malignity almost fiendish. If the editors in this country have not lost their independence, he will be made to feel the full force of his own remark, that the press 'smites like inward fire upon the fears and pantlegs of the skulking felon.'

REV. ARTEMAS ARNOLD.

This Reverend Seceder has figured somewhat conspicuously in the antimasonic ranks, in the State of Vermont. He has often appeared before the public as a witness against the Masonic institution. The following affidavit will exhibit his claims to credibility and consistency in their proper light.

AFFIDAVIT.

'I, THERON STORRS, of Moriah, in the County of Essex and State of New York, of lawful age, after being duly sworn, do depose and say—that in 1828, the spring of the year, I was frequently solicited by Elder Artemas Arnold, then of this place, to join the Masonic fraternity, as he had not long before joined; and he solicited me to join when he did; but I being not then of age did not, neither have I since. In the spring of 1828, he said if I should join, I should not be sorry; that the institution far exceeded his expectations when he joined; that he was satisfied the institution was a good one, and frequently said that some had renounced the Institution, but they were bad men; that he did not see how any person could renounce the Institution, while in the use of his reason; that he never should; that he should renounce his religion first; and on the day he left this town for Ira, Vt. he said to me that he did not know that he should ever see me again, but if he did, he hoped he could call me Brother Mason; that he never should renounce the Institution; that he should burn his Bible first.

THERON STORRS.

State of New York, } Town of Moriah, this 4th
County of Essex. } day of February, 1830, then Theron Storrs, of Moriah, in the County of Essex and State of New York, personally appeared and after being carefully examined and duly cautioned made solemn oath that the foregoing deposition by him subscribed, contains the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

Before me, N. S. STORRS,
Justice Peace.

The above deposition, taken at the request of Jason Newton, to be used in a cause to be heard and tried before the first Baptist Church in Ira, in the State of Vermont, in which cause the said Jason Newton is of the one part and Artemas Arnold of the other part—the deponent living more than thirty miles from the place of trial, and the adverse party more than thirty miles from the place of caption, was not notified and did not attend.

Certified by N. S. STORRS,
Justice Peace.

It is quite unnecessary that we should offer any comment on the above. Our object is simply to place the facts disclosed in the affidavit before the people of Vermont; and having done so, we leave them to apply the rod of correction in such manner as they may deem most proper. We presume the Reverend gentleman has 'renounced his religion' and 'burned his Bible.'

ANTIMASONIC SENATORIAL CANDIDATES.—We give below the names of the antimasons who will be returned to the House, as candidates for the Senate; together with the gentlemen of the National Republican party who are the opposing candidates, from the same counties:

PLYMOUTH.

Antimasonic.	National Republican.
John B. Turner.	Solomon Lincoln, jr.
Nathan Lazell, jr.	Samuel A. Turner.

NORFOLK.

Moses Thacher.	John Endicott.

FRANKLIN.

Ellis Hoyt.	Rufus Saxton.
-------------	---------------

There are several other vacancies to be filled. But we believe the above are the only cases where antimasonry can be presumed to have any particular bearing.

Trouble among the Antimasons—persecuting each other, &c.—The charge of Masonic abductions and persecutions, says the New York Enquirer, which has kept political antimasonry alive, and made this great State the scene of excitement, asperity and ill will beyond measure, is now coming home to the right source. The following shows that antimasons have arrested and imprisoned upon a pretence of debt one of their most active and talented Editors, W. W. Phelps of the Ontario Phoenix. It seems that Mr. Phelps took a trip to Palmyra from a curiosity to compare 'the Book of Mormon,' a new discovery, with the Bible, and while there was arrested by certain persons living in Canandaigua and thrown into jail where he must remain thirty days, leaving a sick family at home. This is something like the original arrest of Morgan for a small debt at Canandaigua, but let us hear what he says which is curious.

'Is this one of the principles of antimasonry? If it is save me from its ransacking scourge, for it is cruel as the grave,* parting man and wife, and vaunting in the dregs of Imprisonment for Debt!

Three years have I labored for the public good,† and three times have I led the freemen of Old Ontario to victory. I have always meant good, and have had the name of so doing—then for what act have I been cast into prison? Let public opinion declare! I have risked all and spent all in the cause of antimasonry—my just dues are somewhat more than my debts:—therefore, if those concerned, and who have had the benefit of my services, will take the whole and square all, by giving me $150, which is only fifty dollars a year for three years hard labor,‡ they are welcome to it; otherwise I shall send a firebrand abroad, which may light an unquenchable flame! I shall not be severed from the Ontario Phoenix by Lord —, for nothing, nor go into it again disgraced. The people of Ontario will not suffer 'CHURCH AND STATE' to mix and eat federalism.§ They will glory in seeing what has been divided in April, scattered in November, unless I receive the meed of my merit.'

* The fellow ought to have discovered this fact long before he got into limbo. It would have saved him from his present unpleasant predicament.

† Here he is entirely wrong. He has been laboring for the good of a base political faction; and to the detriment of the public peace and private happiness. He has been laboring in the interests of the 'ransacking scourge,' whose relentless power he now feels.

‡ This is cheap enough, and will probably be paid, lest the threatened firebrand occasion a general conflagration.

§ We don't understand this. Will some of our New York friends explain; if the matter be not involved in too much mystery?

A correspondent of the Newport Herald of the Times, who signs himself 'No Mason—No Political Antimason,' makes the following remarks. Though he be not a political antimason, the tenor of his article shows him to be opposed to the Masonic Institution. We like his candor:

'The present ruling party in this State, I trust will endeavor to elect to office the best men without regard either to their Masonry or antimasonry. If they yield more than this to antimasonry, their career will be short. I call on all good National Republicans who are at the same time antimasons, to leave their antimasonry at home, and not bring it into the Legislature with them. Let them make use of it as much as they please in keeping down the growth and extension of this society, in dissuading men from joining it, in lessening its influence and exposing its follies, but not in persecuting its members. I warn them that for every drop of Masonic blood which they shall shed, some one else will shed two drops of theirs. All good men of both parties will unite to prevent persecution and oppression. If you have the power to induce the National Republican party to exclude from office a single

Mason, for no other reason than because he is a Mason, the people will avenge his cause. On the other hand, if the Masonic part of our friends [of whom I know we have a great many,] should be the cause of injury to one of you, because of your opposition to Masonic principles, the people, their masters, as well as yours, will cause them to rue it. Persecution is no part of the object of a government where the sovereignty rests in the people.'

MASONIC ITEMS.

The late venerable ISAIAH THOMAS, with the same liberality and public spirit which characterized his long and useful life, has bequeathed, among other legacies to a large amount, the generous sum of five hundred dollars to the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts; three hundred and fifty dollars to the Morning Star Lodge; one hundred dollars to Thomas Lodge in Monson, and one hundred dollars to Thomas Royal Arch Chapter in Princeton.

The New York Enquirer says, 'it appears that Massachusetts has just caught the disorder of antimasonry.—Where it originated the people are rapidly recovering.'—Massachusetts caught the disorder some time since. She is now convalescent.

It is said that Dr. Phelps has recently publicly re-endorsed the character of Anderton, for truth and sobriety, and proclaimed, for the hundred and ninety-ninth time, the truth of the Irish murder story! He says it has been substantiated by evidence from Belfast! The Doctor is not wanting in perseverance; however great his wants may be in other respects.

The following toast was given by an antimasonic office holder in Thompkins county, N. Y. on a recent occasion. The moral sentiment it breathes is highly commendable: 'Masonry—May Hell be boiled down to half a pint, and every Mason be obliged to take a portion.' The name of the author should be handed down to posterity. He is a worthy representative of the cause he advocates.

We are requested to state that David Townsend, Esq. nominated and supported by the antimasonic party for Representative for the town of Waltham, has no sympathies or political feelings in connexion with that faction.—This is the fact in relation to several other gentlemen claimed to be antimasons.

A writer in an antimasonic paper in this city, thinks the members of the Convention advertised to be held in this city the present week, may be denounced as 'hypocritical knaves, abandoned miscreants and the very offals of humanity'!!! It would be unfair to presume that he did not know the character of his own friends.

At an antimasonic convention held at Alleghany, Pa. a resolution was adopted, declaring 'it to be the sense of the party, that neither Jackson nor Clay could receive their support for Presidency.'

Several suspicious looking persons were seen lurking about in the by-lanes of this city yesterday and the day before; It is observed that the police are unusually active at this time. Some timid individuals think the city is infested by a gang of knaves.

An Antimasonic Convention was holden at Newfane, Vt. on the 12th ult. John Phelps, Esq. called the convention to order, and was chairman of the committee of arrangement, who reported a resolution comprising seven topics of inquiry. Mr. Phelps was also chairman of the committee, and is supposed the draftsman of a very long and pungent report, which concluded that 'Mason or no Mason should be the rallying point and watch word of public liberty.'

Report says the purity of old Faneuil Hall has been again defiled by the contaminating atmosphere of antimasonry.

A writer in an antimasonic paper in this city boasts that he has discovered one antimason who was too honest to cheat another out of a dozen skins! We are glad that there is one honest man in the party.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

The accounts from France since our last leave the question of peace or war between that country and Austria as much in suspense as ever. In the Chamber of Deputies, General Lamarque remonstrated with considerable warmth against the pacific bearing of France towards Russia concerning the affairs of Poland, and towards Austria in reference to those of Italy. The answer of the minister for foreign affairs spoke of the latter as still likely to be cleared up by explanations which had been demanded from Vienna.

Belgium still remains a subject of doubt and disquiet to all who feel an interest in the spread of free governments and liberal institutions. Agitated by contending factions and a distressed population within, and, from without, bullied by one hostile power, threatened by another, frowned on by mediators and coldly encouraged by friends, it is scarcely possible that she can much longer escape both the perils of war on the one hand and the trammels of diplomatic intrigue on the other.

A battle has been fought between the Poles and Russians, at Grodno, in which the former were completely successful. The Liverpool Chronicle remarks that the cause of the Poles is advancing gloriously, and hopes are entertained of ultimate success.

Several letters from the frontier of Poland state that the Sultan has declared war against Russia, and that the Manifesto has already reached Vienna.

THE WREATH.

EVE'S BANISHMENT.

She knelt—the ever glorious sky
Spread its blue wing above;
And angel harps were ever breathing songs
Of never dying love;
The stainless moon was glancing bright
Upon the glittering robes of Night.

She knelt—the myriad stars looked down,
In their intiring gaze,
Upon the bright and sinless bower,
Her home in happier days;
The sapphire wall of heaven unfurled
Their banners to the Eden-world.

She knelt—the earth lay calm beneath
The Holy Spirit's smile;
And strains of seraph melody
Stole on the ears the while;
And whispering winds, and zephyrs bland,
Her pale and feverish temples fann'd.

She knelt—in its untroubled pride
The waveless stream rolled by,
And glittering in the beamy light
Of the unclouded sky—
And onward passed, in murmuring sweep,
Unto the vast and watery deep.

She wept—to leave the sunny flowers
That gemmed the sylvan scene,
And danced like fairy revellers,
Upon the glittering green;
Which almost offered rivalry
Upon the bright and glorious sky.

She wept—that all the shining host
That gazed upon her then,
Should never light her steps unto
That sinless bower again,
But hence her heritage should be,
To toss on Life's wild billowy sea!

LOVE.

I down a bide to see the moon
Blink o'er the hill sae dearly,
Late on a bonny face she shone,
A face that I loe dearly.
An' when down by the water clear
At e'en I'm lonely roaming,
I sigh, an' think if aye were here,
How sweet would fa' the gloaming.

MISCELLANY.

ORIGIN OF THE CORONER'S INQUEST.—A gentlewoman in London, after burying six husbands, found a gentleman hardy enough to make her a wife once more. For several months their happiness was mutual, a circumstance which seemed to pay no great compliment to the former partners of her bed, who, as she said, had disgusted her by their sottishness and infidelity. In the view of knowing the real character of his amorous mate, the gentleman began frequently to absent himself, to return at late hours, and, when he did return, to appear as if intoxicated. At first reproaches, but afterwards menaces, were the consequence of this conduct. The gentleman persisted, and seemed every day to become attached to his bottle; once when she imagined him dead drunk, she undersewed a leaden weight from one of the sleeves of her gown, and, having melted it she approached her husband, who pretended still to be sound asleep, in order to put it in his ear through a pipe; convinced of her wickedness the gentleman started up and seized her, when, having procured assistance, he secured her till morning, and conducted her before a magistrate, who sent her to prison.—The bodies of her six husbands were dug up, and, as marks of violence were still discernible upon each of them, the proof of her guilt appeared so strong upon her trial, that she was condemned and executed. To this circumstance are we indebted for that useful regulation, by which no corpse can be interred without a legal inspection.

HISTORY OF A DIAMOND.—There is a diamond at present we believe forming a part of the Crown Jewels of England, which has a singular history appertaining to it. It formerly belonged to Charles the Bold, the last Duke of Burgundy, who wore it in his cap at the Battle of Nancy, where his army was routed and he himself killed. This was in the year 1477. The diamond was found among the spoils of battle by a Swiss soldier, and by him sold to a French gentleman named Sancy. The family of this gentleman preserved this diamond for nearly a century, and till the period when Henry III. of France, after having lost his throne, employed a descendant of his family who was commander of the Swiss troops in his service, to proceed to Switzerland for the purpose of recruiting his forces from that country; and having no pecuniary service to command, he persuaded the same gentleman to borrow of his family the Sancy diamond, in order to deposit with the Swiss government as security for the payment of the troops. Accordingly the diamond was despatched for this purpose by a confidential domestic, who disappeared and could nowhere be heard of for a great length of time. At last, however, it was ascertained that he had been stopped by robbers and assassinated, and his body buried in a forest. And such confidence had his master in the prudence and probity of his servant, that he searched and at last discovered the place of his burial, and had the corpse disinterred, when the diamond was found in his stomach; he having swallowed it when attacked by the robbers.

A DAUGHTERS' PRAYER.—Written by one of the most distinguished authors now living, for the use of his own little daughter. Its beautiful simplicity will recommend it at once to every parent.

Ere on my bed my limbs I lay,
God grant me grace my prayers to say!
Oh, God preserve my mother dear,
In health, and strength, for many a year,
But oh, preserve my father too,
And may I pay him reverence due!
And may I my best thoughts employ
To be my parents' hope and joy!
Oh! likewise keep my brothers both
From evil doings and from sloth,
And may we always love each other,
Our friends, our father, and our mother,
And still, oh Lord, to me impart
An innocent and grateful heart,
Till after my last sleep, I may
Awake to thy eternal day.

'I believe that if Christianity should be compelled to flee from the mansions of the great the academies of the philosopher, the halls of legislators, or the throng of busy men, we should find her last and purest retreat with women at the fire-side; her last altar would be the female heart; her last audience would be the children gathered around the knee of a mother; her last sacrifice, the secret prayer, escaping in silence from the lips, and heard, perhaps, only at the throne of God.'

'How old are you, Pat?' said a Clerk of Indictment at a late assizes in Ireland; 'Faith, sir,' replied Pat, 'I believe I am pretty near as owd as ever I'll be;' and in good truth he was—for he stretched the hemp the day after.

AN ADDRESS.

NO. IV.

To the Hon. NATHANIEL TERRY, Chairman of the Connecticut Antimasonic Convention, Delegate to the National Antimasonic Convention, Chairman of the Hartford Antimasonic Convention, &c.

SIR—

The first gentleman for whom you claim distinguished credit is Pliny Merrick. This man is a young lawyer, who, by virtue of his having been aid-de-camp to a militia general in Massachusetts, is introduced to the public as Col. Merrick. He says that he united with the Masonic society several years since, and continued a devoted and zealous member until he was exalted to the station of High Priest of the order. During their prosperity he remained an ardent eulogist of the society; but when the waves of adversity beat against it, he became its most malignant reviler.

In 1829 Pliny Merrick publicly denounced his Masonic brethren, and declared Freemasonry to be the bane of every government. He said that 'it strikes at the root of everything good, breaks up the cause of virtue and the still greater cause of our own country.' 'Baseness,' 'treachery,' 'foul conspiracy,' 'deeds of darkness,' 'assassination,' are boldly represented as the legitimate fruits of the Masonic society. But this same Pliny Merrick has furnished us evidence under his own hand which stamps these statements with unblushing falsehood. In 1825 this gentleman delivered an address at the dedication of a Masonic Hall in Worcester. On that occasion he pronounced the Masonic society 'a great benefaction to the world,' and founded on principles of high morality and pure benevolence. He boldly affirmed that, 'the fraternity have never done nor meditated aught of evil,' and solemnly denied that they had in any instance 'ever discussed a political topic within their hall.' He asserted it to be the 'universal principle of the craft to be strict in their loyalty and obedience' to the government of their country; and of the society he uses this unequivocal language, 'they are guiltless of everything like offence,' and amidst these solemn declarations he uttered a prayer to Almighty God for a continuance of the blessings and privileges of the Masonic society.

Now it is evident that both these statements cannot be true. Pliny Merrick has either borne false witness against his neighbor, or, in a public address deliberately composed and published in 1825, he was guilty of gross deception and falsehood. If he has now told the truth, then in 1825 he publicly called upon Jehovah, with a lie in his mouth to perpetuate a society which he knew to be the nursery of corruption, infamy and crime.

His statements in 1825 are true or false; if true, we stand acquitted of everything like offence, if they are false, then he stands impeached upon his own confessions, and his statements in 1829 are entitled to no credit.

Here let it be remembered that this man pretends to have obtained no information on this subject since 1825, nor does he pretend to any change of character since that period. At the publication of his first address he was well acquainted with the institution and all the facts, were before him. The presumption, therefore, is irresistibly strong that the statements of Merrick in 1825 corresponded with his views of truth. If he is a man of intelligence, I know not why that statement is not entitled to credit, especially as it was confirmed by his conduct for many years.

But in 1829, circumstances had changed—the Masonic society became unpopular—Merrick had received its honors, and it had nothing more to confer; the political waters were troubled—the friends of Jackson in Massachusetts were few, and with that few he had no influence, and among the friends of Clay, there were hundreds of better men. The western breezes had borne to his ears the triumphs of antimasonry in New York. In an effort to organize an antimasonic party in Massachusetts, which should recognize him as a leader, he saw some prospects of rescuing himself from the obscurity which he dreaded. An ambitious young lawyer, preferring an infamous notoriety to none at all, with little thought and with less discretion, he rashly mounted this unbridled hobby, riding roughshod over his former brethren and gathering followers in his train, without reflecting that 'the race is not always to the swift nor the battle to the strong.'

As a traitor always pursues his old friends with the most malignity, lest he should be distrusted by his new ones, it is not difficult to discover a motive for the infamous falsehoods of this man.

But will you say what this man has said, that he has changed his opinion since 1825? I answer, we are inquiring after facts. If Masons have sworn to support each other 'right or wrong'—if they have combined to resist the laws and protect the guilty—these are facts which Pliny Merrick knew in 1825, and facts are not changed by the vibrations of his mind. Whether or not we are guilty of the offences imputed to us, is a question of fact and not a matter of opinion. You have asserted that we are guilty of certain crimes, and you attempt to prove our guilt by the testimony of this witness. It is proved that in 1825, with all the means of knowledge which he now has, and with less inducement to speak falsely, he solemnly states facts inconsistent with his present statements.—You now attempt to rescue your witness from the charge of falsehood, by an assertion that he has changed his opinion. A witness to day asserts a fact, as that a deed was delivered in his presence. To-morrow he asserts that the deed was destroyed in his presence. His testimony of to-morrow is impeached by his inconsistent declaration of to-day. You now say in his defence that he has changed his opinion on the subject of deeds. But what bearing has his opinion on this fact. The falsehood is fixed upon him, and it must be removed by other means than a pretended change of opinion. I trust therefore that you will not seriously urge our condemnation upon the testimony of Pliny Merrick.

Another gentleman whose name you have brought before the public as worthy of credit, is Noble D. Strong.—This man introduced himself to our citizens, some months since, as the Rev. Mr. Strong, and produced sundry certificates of his clerical character. Of late, for causes to me unknown, he has changed his address from the Rev. Mr. Strong to Noble D. Strong, Esq. I believe, however, that the pious and respectable part of the community regard his present title full as appropriate to his character as the one which he at first assumed. He says that he became a Mason some ten years ago, and continued an active and zealous member of a Lodge in New York until about a year after the abduction of William Morgan. He now represents the fundamental purposes of the society to be 'slander, oppression, revenge, adultery,' and 'murder treason and perjury,' are enjoined as Masonic obligations. In one of your Conventions this Esq. Strong was your right hand man, and united with you in the resolution, 'We solemnly impeach the Masonic principalities of the State of New York with the guilt of this violence'—the murder of Morgan. According to your charges and testimony of your witness, who is in partnership with you in making the charges, not only the whole fraternity of New York, but all the Masons in Connecticut are guilty of murder. Now if the Rev. Mr. Strong, (I beg his pardon) if Noble D. Strong, Esq. now tells the truth, then he is guilty of the same crimes of which you accuse us; for at the time of the 'Morgan outrage,' and for a long time after, he was a devoted member of the fraternity, and of course, according to your claim, a partaker in all its guilt. Besides, the purposes and objects of the Masonic society, whatever they are, this man for many years approved.—Having long been a frequent attendant upon the meetings of a lodge, and with a full knowledge of its principles, obligations and usages, he voluntarily applied for admission to a Chapter. Now by the very terms of this application he avowed his attachment to the Masonic fraternity, and expressed his cordial approbation of its objects.—When after having attended lodges for years, he voluntarily signed a petition for admission to a Chapter, and called God to witness the honesty of his motives, it is impossible for the mind to doubt that Noble D. Strong, Esq. did approve of Masonry, as disclosed in the three first degrees.

Now I ask if you will seriously maintain that this man has upheld for ten years a combination whose object has been the commission of 'murder, treason and perjury?' Has he, while a preacher of the everlasting gospel, lived for ten years in the cordial approbation of crimes of the most daring character? If he has not, his present statements are stamped with falsehood, and we stand acquitted of his charges. But if he now tells the truth, then he has added infamy to hypocrisy, and while clothed with the sacred office of an ambassador of the Prince of Peace, he has lived an acknowledged murderer, a traitor and a perjurer, and he has cherished in his bosom, principles which enjoin 'slander, oppression, revenge, and adultery.'—There is no resisting this inference. He is now a false witness, or upon his own confession he is guilty, according to your reasoning, of the most horrid crimes.

But shall a man who, for ten years, has been a murderer by profession, and committed perjury as a duty, be admitted as a witness against freemen? A man who will voluntarily uphold for years a society formed for the express purpose of committing crimes is too infamous to be the subject of an objection. If we are guilty of the crimes of which you accuse us, this man, upon your own showing, is a particeps criminis. Now it is an invariable rule never to convict upon the testimony of a witness who admits his infamy, unless he is supported from some unpoluted source. Shall, then, the present statements of this man be received with credence, when they are contradicted by the whole tenor of his life for years?

I cannot believe that the Rev. Noble D. Strong has lived so many years covered with such infamy; I cannot believe that the society which he so long supported, and whose assemblies he so long attended, inculcated principles unlawful or immoral. I must believe that the principles of Masonry, as they were understood by the Rev. Mr. Strong for ten years, and as they are now understood by the fraternity, are consistent with morality and religion. If I believe this, I must of course believe that the present statements of Noble D. Strong, Esq. are false,—false in the whole, false in all their parts, false in general, and false in detail.

During the period in which this gentleman upheld the Masonic society, it is difficult to discover any inducement which he could have had to impose upon the community, and to support an institution so alarmingly infamous as he now represents this to be. But a motive for his present conduct is apparent. Having been equally unsuccessful in the clerical profession, and in the business of academic instruction, he found himself without employment and without friends. A resident of the State of New York, he was surrounded by the choicest spirits of antimasonry, and flattered by their solicitations to fan the flame of an excitement by a public renunciation. In the political commotions which antimasonry had created he saw some hope of employment. He renounced Masonry at a time when he had nothing else to do, threw off the title of Reverend and assumed that of Esquire, and soon found himself in a new sphere of life, as the political antimasonic editor of a political antimasonic print.

Such are the witnesses for whom you have claimed special credit. You have brought them before the public, and let the public judge of their characters. Will you call upon the honest citizens of Connecticut to condemn their fellow men, their fellow christians, their neighbors, their friends, upon the testimony of such witnesses? Shall the reputation and lives of freemen be sacrificed by the polluted and polluting breath of the false witness and the slanderer? In truth and soberness, let the people answer.

Your ob't servant,

BENJ. FRANKLIN.

[Original.]

TO RICHARD RUSH, ESQ.

Sir:—When a citizen presents himself before the public in the premeditated and formal manner in which you appear, in your late letter to the Antimasonic Committee of York County, with the obvious design of affecting public opinion, it is not only the right but it becomes the duty of those interested to examine his principles and probe his motives. This right I shall proceed to exercise—this duty I shall endeavor to perform, with all the frankness befitting the subject, and with the candor which truth and justice demand.

Preparatory to a right understanding of your testimony, it is proper to analyze your motives, for I hold it to be a sound axiom in weighing evidence to place the credibility of the witness upon the means of his intelligence and the motives of interest which may bias him. Your means of information regarding the principles of an institution against which you have volunteered your testimony, according to your own showing, are of the most limited kind. You have been to a lodge but once and have taken but one degree in the Institution. These are your means of information, and with a knowledge thus circumscribed, you have undertaken to denounce the collective fraternity of Masons as murderers. 'Its spirit inexorable as death, destroyed the life of this citizen.' Now for your motives. You are, Sir, a politician by trade, an office seeker from necessity. Ever since the country put upon you and your master and co-laborer in the vineyard of politics and antimasonry, its seal of reprobation; ever since you was consigned to the station of a 'private individual' by the votes of more than fifty thousand majority of your neighbors, citizens of your own State who knew, and doubtless justly appreciated, your talents and principles, you have been aching to rise again into note and fatten once more at the public crib. Your ambition has thriven by abstinence. Your vanity has become cormorant in retirement. And you now come forth the antimasonic gladiator, the unprovided and unprincipled accuser of a large and virtuous class of your fellow citizens, with the antimasonic Diadem sparkling before you. You are already hailed in yells of exultation by this intolerant and unprincipled faction as their chief—and they are the body and pillars of the opposition party.

The antimasonic party is a political party—if not so in the origin it has become so in its progress—it combines in its promotion the worst elements of society—moral depravity—political corruption—religious hypocrisy—fanatical intolerance, with a portion of honest ignorance. You aspire to become the head of this social monster, and candor compels me to admit your ample claims to the distinction. These are the circumstances under which your testimony is given, not only against the whole body of the Masonic Institution, but against a large portion of the press of the Country. How far these temptations may be likely to bias a man of your principles, and your knowledge of Masonry, the public will judge for themselves.

You profess a dislike to secret societies generally, and are against Masonry on account of the recent disclosures. The Morgan affair with you, as with the rest of your sect, is made the foundation of your invective. You profess to be governed by facts. These are your words, 'I desire to be guided by facts, and to look at them rigorously.' * * * But facts shall be my basis and I wish to deal with them practically as I have really beheld them.' But what facts have you exhibited relative to the principles or practices of Masonry? Not a single one. You have indeed repeated the stale antimasonic fictions and libels about the abduction and probable murder of Morgan. You have detailed anew the slanders against the American press;—but you have not given us a single new fact. Though you profess to adhere to them rigorously, your letter consists entirely of assertions and declamation, evincing alike your unprincipled love of office and your consummate folly. Let me present you with some of your 'facts.'

'Let the law, that sheet anchor of society, come to miss its grapple upon public felons, banded in league together by a principle that exalts their crimes into achievements of merit, and everything is exposed to wreck and dissolution.'

Do you pretend for this a higher grade of merit than a cowardly insinuation of what you have not the hardihood directly to assert, that MASONRY ARE PUBLIC FELONS, BANNED IN LEAGUE TOGETHER TO EXALT THEIR CRIMES INTO ACHIEVEMENTS OF MERIT?

Do you claim for your groundless charge against the American press the merit of a fact—of a 'rigorous fact'? Here it is, let it speak for itself:

'But, in the case we are considering, with the exception of the comparatively few newspapers, antimasonic in special name and object, the press, as far as I have had opportunities of observing, has been shamefully silent. This best guard of a free state, better than legions of bayonets, this Lion at its portals, whose noble nature for the most part it is to spring forward, enraged and uncompromising, upon crime, has been lulled to sleep; has been chained and muzzled: has been faithless; has been criminal. I say criminal. Silence in such a cause is participation. It shows, in effect, companionship with the murderers, had there been nothing more than silence. It is keeping bands with blood, when a voice loud, simultaneous and incensed, should have rung through the land.'

This charge is as unprovoked as it is untrue. The American press has not been silent upon the Morgan affair. So long as the efforts of those who first commenced the investigation of that outrage, were confined to detecting and punishing crime, the press lent its aid to the object, as it has done in other cases of crime; but when the infamous measures of persecution were adopted against innocent men, when it was found that Morgan's ghost was to be a stalking horse to raise political miscreants, now your worthy associates and sufferers, to power—that innocent men were to be immolated—convicted of crimes they had never committed, by perjured hirelings of your political faith, the press, the discreet and respectable portion of the press, refused to debase itself to such work,

But, Sir, what right have you to take the Press to task? Was it any more the duty of the Press than of citizens to speak out? You held at that time a high public trust, placed as all men in office are, as a sentinel to guard the rights and watch over the morals of the citizens. You 'many years ago' belonged, as you tell us, to the fraternity. You never withdrew until the murder of Morgan was known to you, not the abduction, but the murder. Why did you then withdraw silently? Why have you since remained silent? Why for nearly five years have you been a quiet spectator, when the murder of Morgan was known to you, the only man to whom we have any evidence that it was known, and now come out with your renunciation and denunciations for the bribe of an anticipated nomination?

Before denouncing the press, an engine, notwithstanding its often perverted uses, is yet the great palladium of our rights against the deceits of treacherous friends and the assaults of open foes; it would be well to clear your own character from suspicion.

Your secret renunciation of Masonry, when the murder of Morgan was known to you—your association with Mr. Adams, and his correspondence with the vilest of the antimasonic tribe, raise some suspicions that your connexion with antimasonry dates even earlier than you are disposed to acknowledge; and that the original seat of the plot may yet be found to have been in Washington and not in Batavia. If you wish to escape from such a suspicion, you can only take shelter under the weakness of your intellect, not in the strength of your morals.

I proceed to give you a few more extracts from your 'rigorous facts,' to which you confine yourself:

'The iron clamps that were probably prepared for the feet and hands of Morgan, aptly compare with the chains in which the victim of the inquisition was habited, when trembling on the verge of eternity; whilst the pictures of devouring dogs and serpents that were hung round his neck, completely prefigure the horrid gang of murdering conspirators who plunged their hands in the blood of Morgan.'

Where do you get these 'facts'?

'I believe that Morgan was seized, carried far from his home by Masons, and by Masons murdered. I believe that this was the result of a conspiracy, engendered and carried through, under circumstances of peculiar deliberation, malignity, and terror. Yet, to this very hour, the infamous deed remains unpunished. I have watched the pursuit of justice. I see how she is disheartened, fatigued, worn down, by efforts, continued throughout years, to clutch these worse than Calabrian banditti. I see her fault; I see her countenance in despair. Masons know the whole tale of blood. Who can deny this? Masons conceal it. Who can deny this? Can then any sentient reasonable being say 'that Masonry is not at the bottom of the evil.'

'They are wicked through principle. They confound crime with virtue; murder with Masonic merit. Like imps of Pandemonium, they rejoice and dance in their sin. Like the crew in the Mask of Comus, they are unconscious of their 'foul disfigurement.' The deeper their guilt, the more they make themselves invulnerable. You can no more grasp them, than if they sink into the earth, or mount into the air. Its spirit inexorable as death, destroyed the life of this citizen; and, like a spirit, it became invisible. It is here—it is there—it is gone; no body can see it; but society feels it. It is the spirit of night. The magistrate strikes, but it is into vacuity. He follows up the blow, again and again, but it falls upon a shadow. Is all this nothing? Is it to be forgotten; to be mentioned with indifference; to be sneered at, as fanfare? If the Press has turned deserter and gone over to the enemy, whose profligate cohorts have overthrown the laws, is that a reason why the people should not be true to themselves? Is the whole army to be given up, because the sentinels have skulked?'

'But after the developments I have given, I must, I do believe, the evils of Masonry to be stupendous; I must, I do believe, that they counterbalance a thousand-fold any good that it can achieve.'

All these sweeping assertions and denunciations; all this school-boy declamation, which you call 'facts,' made against Masons, are bottomed upon the Morgan outrage.—You have made no other developments. You knew nothing yourself, of your own personal knowledge, against the Institution. You pretend to know nothing. You never withdrew from the institution until after YOU KNEW OF THE MURDER OF MORGAN. You never proclaimed your withdrawal until you hoped to gain a presidential nomination by the act.

The numerous impositions attempted to be practised upon the public in the Morgan business by the leaders of antimasonry, shocked the public feeling, impaired the credibility of their witnesses and did more than anything else to prevent the discovery of the facts in the case.

The efforts to palm upon the citizens of Batavia the body of Timothy Munro, an Irish emigrant, known to have been drowned more than a year after Morgan disappeared; the arts practised to make his corpse resemble Morgan by pulling his hair off, and extracting his front teeth, with the hypocritical prayers and processions performed to excite and impose upon a people, become frantic, and bereft of reason; the subsequent boast of the antimasonic juggler, that 'it made a good enough Morgan until after election,' all went to stamp upon the antimasonic party, in the eyes of every discreet, cool and intelligent man, the character of fraud, hypocrisy and fanaticism.

The subsequent infamous means contrived in various parts of the country—the perjury of a miscreant by the name of Anderton, charging a murder never committed; the conspiracy of the Rev. Mr. Witherell against himself, which he tried to charge upon the Masons—the abominable attempt of the antimasons in this neighborhood to convert the accidental drowning of one of their worthy, but drunken associates, at Milton, into a premeditated Masonic murder; and the atrocious plot contrived by an unprincipled scoundrel, known as the A. B. C. affair, all go to confirm the public impression that antimasonry is governed by the spirit of evil. From these well known instances of atrocious frauds, of conspiracies formed against the characters and lives of innocent men, people are almost compelled to believe that antimasonry, in its origin, was a political plot, of which you and your associates were then privy.

Masons have done all they could, to detect the perpetrators of the Morgan outrage, and so has the press. No sooner was his abduction known than it was trumpeted forth by the press. The people were awake to detect the offenders. The authorities of New York took unusual and unwearied pains to ferret out and punish the guilty. That they have not all been discovered and punished is not owing to Masons, but to the antimasons. To those who, like yourself, denounced the whole body of Masons as murderers, because some unworthy Masons may have committed murder. Masons do not justify the crime as a body or an institution; they did not participate in it, and can no more be held responsible for the offence, in justice, than the whole christian church could be held to be murderers because some christians have committed murder. In the incipient stage of the Morgan affair it assumed a political aspect. It was then brought to bear against Gen. Jackson and Gov. Clinton, Masons, opposed in the presidential canvass to Mr. Adams and yourself. Whether planned for this purpose or not, it was in its progress thus used. The excitement was kept up, that your party might profit by it. The very men, who according to their own accounts in the recent trials at Lockport, last had Morgan in charge, are the chief witnesses of the antimasons. They are like yourself, seceders, and Morgan's murder, if known to any other than yourself, is probably known to them. Giddens and Adams are the witnesses alluded to. Adams is the person whom the late Special Council, a political friend of yours, desired to reward with $2000 and a pardon in advance, if he would testify so as to convict some one. With the unparalleled excitement which raged in N. York upon the Morgan subject, increased and fomented by the most abandoned and unprincipled members of the community, it is not improbable that more innocent men have been convicted, than guilty, escaped.

Justice was not the object of your party, it was then, as it is now, power—and they appeared as unscrupulous as yourself in obtaining it. Whole classes of innocent men were to be made victims to the insatiate ambition of unprincipled politicians. When Masons saw seceders from the fraternity, who had for years been members, embrace the new political party and denounce the fraternity falsely, as imposing upon its members obligations which they, or any one else, never took, they could have no faith in the goodness of their motives or the lawfulness of their objects. I am myself a Mason. I know its obligations and its duties. I am many degrees farther advanced than you were, and I never took any obligation to screen a Mason from punishment for his crimes, murder and treason not excepted. No other Mason ever took such upon him, and those who assert such to be the fact, UTTER THAT WHICH THEY KNOW IN THEIR OWN SOULS TO BE FALSE.

It was no object of the first instigators of this political party, to punish the guilty. They purposely sought to confound the innocent and guilty; if indeed guilty there were, and by overwhelming Masons to make it bear upon the Presidential election. They pretend, as you do, to make war, not upon Masons, but upon Masonry. This is false. The Lodges in some counties of New York have surrendered their Charters, ceased to meet and act as Masons; and yet the persecution does not cease, in those counties.

Antimasonry is bottomed upon rank political hatred and bigotted intolerant sectarianism! With all your dread of secret associations, you hug to yourself those whose secret acts have never yet met the light. And were the leaders of your party to expose the secret acts of their lives, the gallows might stare them in the face! Your party is imbued with the worst spirit of Hopkinsonism, and would carry into their politics the feelings that induced that patron Saint of thine, to burn at the stake, Servetus. It is founded upon ultra-orthodoxy, the most intolerant of the Hopkinsonian sect; the more liberal part of them revolt at the enormities of their ultra-brethren. It is an attempt to introduce a political religion; an union of Church and State, and some of the leaders in this city united with the pious, are among the unprincipled and abandoned in their private character. It is a combination of knaves and fanatics, to seize by a simultaneous effort upon the reigns of power, that they may plunder the people of their wealth, and despoil them of their rights.

From its commencement, antimasonry has hesitated at no means, however atrocious, to accomplish its objects.—It allies itself to the most profligate: it takes to its bosom the most abandoned; it selects for leaders the most unprincipled; it contrives conspiracies the most villainous, charging through its perjured witnesses, crimes upon innocent men, that, if true, would forfeit their lives. It assails when it cannot corrupt the press. It pollutes the fountains of Justice, and in defiance of law and decency proscribes men from the jury box, for political opinions.—It repudiates no association, but intelligent honesty and tolerant piety.

Such a party cannot prevail in this country. The American people prize integrity as much as they detest dishonesty. Integrity stands before talent in their estimation. It is a firm belief in the spotless integrity of President Jackson, that forms the foundation of his popularity.—Your renunciation bears upon its front anything but the mark of honesty. It shows you faithless, alike to your political associates and your Masonic brethren, and with any but a party unprincipled as yourself, it would seal your destruction. You owe your fame, such as it has been, to the minority Mr. Clay has claims upon the members of that party and upon you as one of them. He was the father, life and soul of it. To him then you were under the strongest obligations. He had been counting upon the support of the antimasons, and would have brought them to his terms, but for your untimely, and must I say, unmanly intrusion. It shew ingratitude thus to supplant your benefactor, and to disregard the wishes of those with whom you have acted. It was base to put Mr. Clay and his Masonic supporters in such a position. The movement however will not avail you—it will divide a party that with its united force, could hardly cope with its opponent. No high minded and honorable man can support you; nor can any man of honor confide in you—the unprincipled may use you, but not trust you. Under the expectation, and for the purpose of procuring a nomination to office, you have shown yourself ready to break from your former political associates, to denounce the whole body of Freemasons as 'public felons,'—and the public press as conniving at crime.

This has been, as it were, for hire. If from principle, it should have been performed more than four years ago, when you first knew that Morgan was murdered. You yourself, shameless as you are, would not dare deny that your last letter, denouncing a class of men as 'public felons,' among whom are devout christians, eminent Statesmen, brave patriots, was not called forth in the hope of gaining an office by it. And if you were to deny it, the fact is so palpable that not a dozen intelligent men would believe you. You have shown that your love of truth and honor can be trafficked off for even the hope of office. You have voluntarily placed yourself upon a level with those who would gain power by perjury, who bear false witness against their fellow men for hire, and you will never be able to rise from the position which instinct and habit have led you to occupy.

A MASON.

[Original.]

HON HENRY CLAY.

It is reported that Mr. Adams, while attending the late Convention in this city, assured the leading members of that party, that it was in vain longer to hope to effect any compromise with Mr. Clay; that the party had tried him long enough, and that it was now time to look somewhere else for a candidate in whom they could all unite. The friends of Mr. Clay in this section of the country never doubted that this would be the result; they knew his splendid talents, and they reposed with confidence in his integrity. His friends in New York may have wished to bring the antimasonic party to his support, but they could have no wish to see Mr. Clay sacrifice his principles, his integrity and honor, even to effect so desirable an object. He has not disappointed them. The bait has been held out to him, and like an honest man he has rejected it. He has generously sacrificed his interests to his principles.

DR. THOMAS'S WILL.

The Worcester Spy furnishes the following extracts from the Will and Codicils of the late Isaiah Thomas, embracing the donations of a public nature.

As I think it the duty of every man, who is a member of any institution established for public good, to contribute something in time and attention, or property, during his life, or otherwise by legacy, for the promotion of its objects, and as there are several institutions of which I have received the honor of membership, and for which I have done but little, and for some, nothing, I do, therefore, will and bequeath as follows.

I give Five Hundred Dollars towards building of permanent materials, in Boston, a commodious Hall, respectable in its appearance, for the use of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts—and, if the same should not be accepted, and appropriated accordingly, within three years after my decease, then said sum shall revert and go to my residuary legacy.

Whereas, I have been particularly instrumental in the establishment of the American Antiquarian Society, and I believe it may be highly beneficial to our country, if its members are attentive to the purpose of its institution; and as no Society for benevolent and patriotic purposes can be really useful without funds, and I am persuaded that there is no institution with which I am acquainted more in need of support of this kind than the one named—therefore,

I give to the American Antiquarian Society Thirty Thousand Dollars, in the manner following:

I devise to said society, (provided I shall not before my death execute a deed thereof,) and their successors, forever, that tract of land in Worcester, whereon is now erected a building for the use of said society, which land I purchased of Samuel Chandler's heirs, containing about one acre, near the Second Parish Meetinghouse, bounded north by the Turnpike Road to Boston, westwardly by a Country Road, southwardly by land of said second Parish, and eastwardly by land late of the Hon. Francis Blake, now of William Eaton, together with the said building now erected thereon, and all its appurtenances; which building is forever to be sacredly appropriated, as long as the said society shall exist, for a Library Cabinet, &c. of said Society, and the house and land are accordingly devised upon this express condition; and, in case said Society shall, at any time, cease to use said building for said purpose, then, the whole of this estate is to revert to my grand-children generally and to their heirs. This estate, consisting of the land, the building, and its appendages, I value at eight thousand dollars, and is to be considered as so much towards the legacy of thirty thousand dollars.

I give to said American Antiquarian Society, ten thousand dollars in Books, including what I have already presented to the Society; and whatever donations in books have been already made or may be hereafter made, by me, (which may be ascertained by recurring to my books and the donation book of the Society, are to be deducted from this legacy. But, if it shall be found, that, during my life time, I shall have presented to the Society a greater amount of books than ten thousand dollars, there shall not, on this account, be any deduction from any other part of my legacy of thirty thousand dollars; but, whatever I shall have so presented, shall be considered a part of this last sum of ten thousand dollars, and no charge shall be made to the society for any overplus.

I give to the said American Antiquary Society, twelve thousand dollars, to be a part of the funds of said Society, and, to be kept at interest appropriated in part for the payment of the salary to a Librarian and a Cabinet Keeper, whose business it shall be, constantly to attend to the Library and Cabinet, and to keep the articles in good order, and in the best manner for preservation; and in part towards the purchase of Antiquities and Books, and for other necessary purposes of the institution.

Whatever part of this sum of twelve thousand dollars, I may have advanced before my death to the Society and charge them therewith, is to be deducted by executors.

I also give to said American Antiquarian Society, two large prints, framed, which is now in my possession, one of which is a representation of the eruption of Mount Etna in 1776; and the other of the eruption of Mount Vesuvius in 1779; and I also give to said Society, a well engraved print, framed, of the late Rev. George Whitefield, which print exhibits a striking likeness of that celebrated person a short time before his death.

I also give to the Society a portrait of myself, lately done by Mr. Greenwood of Boston; also a print of Mr. Garrick in the character of King Lear, and Presidents Washington and Munroe all of which are framed.

I have already presented to said Society such coins, medals, &c. as I had collected and preserved for their antiquity or for curiosity.

The American Antiquarian Society is, in some respects very different from other Societies established in the United States. Membership is restricted to no state or party; there are no members merely honorary; but, all have an equal interest and concern in the affairs and objects of the Institution, whatever part of the United States they may reside in. It is truly a National Institution. It has no local views or private concerns.—Its objects to (collect and preserve) embrace all time, past, present, and future. Age will increase its utility. Its property, it is intended, shall not, at anytime hereafter, be divided amongst its members, but, it is to remain, to be increased and ever to be preserved for public benefit. The benefits arising from other benevolent societies are generally local and designed for the use of the present generation. Their members, therefore have a nearer interest. But, the benefits, resulting from the American Antiquarian Society, will increase with time, and will chiefly be received by a remote posterity. It must therefore be acknowledged, that, it is necessary that the members should entertain a more disinterested, generous and enlarged benevolence. As it is possible, on account of the members living remote from each other, and the inconvenience of assembling any considerable number of them together, and, perhaps, from other causes, that this Society may, at some future time, be dissolved, or may neglect to keep themselves in a state of organization by a regular choice of officers, and that, in this, or some other manner, their charter of incorporation may become forfeited; then, in that case, I give the same, in all its parts, in trust to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, earnestly requesting the Government of said Commonwealth, if such a case as I have suggested should occur, that they will take whatever I have given to said Institution, and all its property, (if they should have the power; and see fit so to do,) and preserve it in trust for said Society, should it be reorganized; otherwise, that they will give to the first other American Antiquarian Society, which shall petition to them and obtain a charter of incorporation, or to such other new institution bearing the same name, and established for the same purposes, as the present Society which may obtain the privilege of incorporation in any other of the United States. For although this is designed as a national institution, yet the Congress of the United States, not having constitutional power to grant incorporation, application for this purpose must, of course, be made to some one of the States.

One fourth part of the residuum of the Estate, I give and devise to the American Antiquarian Society forever, they to draw the third lot for their share, and to receive it in the kind of property which it may happen to consist. But this legacy is upon the express condition that if their fourth part of the residuum shall by the before mentioned appraisement amount to the sum of seven thousand dollars they shall put five thousand dollars at interest, (it being probable that seven thousand dollars in various articles of property may not produce more than five thousand dollars in cash) and shall constantly keep said sum at interest, and the interest shall be applied annually in part to the purchasing of books and other articles for preservation in the Library and Cabinet of the Institution, and in part to defraying the expense of employing a proper person to explore the ancient fortifications, mounds, &c., in the western States or other parts of America, and in taking plans views, &c. and giving descriptions, &c. of said fortifications, mounds, &c. for the American Antiquarian Society, proper contracts to be made for this purpose, and the agent or agents employed to be prohibited from giving copies of said plans, views, descriptions, &c. or any of them to any person or society not authorised by the Government of this Institution to receive the same in order that they may be first published by said Society if they should judge it to be expedient.

I give and devise to the Massachusetts General Hospital forever one eighth part of said residuum, said corporation to draw lot therefor, and to receive it in the kind of property of which it may happen to consist.

I give and devise the remaining eighth part of said residuum in whatever kind of property it may consist of, to the corporation of Leicester Academy forever.

I give one hundred dollars to Thomas Lodge, the members of which some time since usually assembled in Monson.

I give to the Philadelphia Typographical Society the sum of one hundred dollars to be added to their funds or otherwise disposed of as this Society may determine to be expedient.

I give to the Franklin Typographical Society in Boston one hundred dollars.

I give to the American Philosophical Society in Philadelphia the sum of five hundred dollars to be added to their funds or otherwise to be disposed of as the Society may direct.

To the American Academy of Arts and Sciences in Massachusetts, I give three hundred dollars in Books.

To Harvard University I give three hundred dollars in Books.

To the Historical Society in this Commonwealth, I give three hundred dollars to add to its funds.—Without funds no society can well support the purposes of its institution.

To the Historical Society in New York I give three hundred dollars to add to its funds.

To the Humane Society in this Commonwealth I give three hundred dollars to promote the purposes of this Institution which is established in Boston.

To the Massachusetts Charitable Fire Society established in Boston, I give three hundred dollars to aid the purposes intended by this corporation.

To the Massachusetts Society for promoting Agriculture I give two hundred dollars to aid said Society in giving encouragement to Agricultural improvements.

To the Worcester Agricultural Society I give one hundred dollars to aid the purposes of the Institution.

To the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association in Boston, I give one hundred dollars.

To the Apprentice's Library in Boston I give one hundred dollars in Books.

Whereas about fifteen or twenty years ago I gave to the Historical Society of Massachusetts and to the Academy of Arts and Sciences of said State, also to the Historical Society of New York and to the American Philosophical Society in Philadelphia, to each Society a number of volumes of the 'Massachusetts Spy' for preceding years, and whereas I have, from the time of presenting the same to the present time, kept four complete copies of the said 'Massachusetts Spy' which have been tied up in files annually (each file containing a copy of said Spy for a year) all of which may be found in the small building north of my dwelling house on shelves or in trunks or boxes, I give one complete set of said four sets of said 'Massachusetts Spy' which I have kept as aforesaid from the time aforesaid, after the same shall be bound in boards, to each of the said four Societies above mentioned.

I give to the American Antiquarian Society six prints uniformly framed, &c., of the six past Presidents of the United States, now in my room, and if I should procure a print of the seventh President, I give that also to said society.

I give to the Essex Historical Society one hundred dollars in Books, to be paid from my Book stock in manner directed in my will after other legacies in books therein mentioned shall be satisfied, and provided that I do not give said amount in Books to said Society before my decease.

I give to the Boston Female Asylum the sum of five hundred dollars, and to the Boston Asylum for Boys the sum of three hundred dollars, in one year after my decease, to be added to the funds of these Institutions.

In pages 20, 21, and 22 of my said Will I devised to the town of Worcester two certain lots of land bounding on Thomas street and Back street on certain conditions for a Charity House as is there mentioned, which devise I hereby annul, and in lieu thereof I give and devise to the said town of Worcester, on the same conditions and for the same purposes as mentioned in my said Will, all the lots lying as aforesaid on said Streets not otherwise particularly devised, and which may remain unsold at the time of my decease, (on condition that the said town within three years after my decease erect on one of them a Charity House facing the street, the basement story of which shall be faced with hewn stone, with at least two stories thereupon, permanently built of brick; and on the farther condition that said town pay annually to the overseers of the poor, twenty dollars, which sum shall be appropriated annually towards providing for the poor persons maintained by the town in said Charity house, on Thanksgiving days, a good and liberal dinner suitable for the occasion, also on that day half a pint of common but good wine for each person, or a reasonable quantity of such other liquors as any of them may prefer, that they may have the means of participating on the days aforesaid like their more affluent neighbors in some of the essential good things of this life bestowed by a bountiful Providence, and be enabled to unite in grateful orisons for the peace and felicity of our country. And if the whole of the said sum of twenty dollars should not be necessary in any year for the purpose aforesaid, the residue may be laid out in the purchase of books for the children of poor parents or otherwise appropriated for the benefit of the Poor as the Overseers or Trustees of the Charity house shall think best. If not accepted by said town for the purpose aforesaid, then I give and devise to said town the lot lying on the north side of said Thomas Street and making the corner of said Street and Back street to erect thereon a large and handsome brick School house or Academy. (Said lot is sufficiently large to build also thereon a dwelling house for a stationary schoolmaster or Tutor.) If said town should not accept said lots for the purpose of building thereon a Charity House nor said lot for building thereon a School House or Academy within two years after my decease, then I give and devise said lots to my grandchildren.

Whereas I devised by my said last Will to Morning Star Lodge, a lot of land on the south side of Thomas street in the town of Worcester, bounded on said street, which land I have sold, the said devise is therefore void, I now give and devise to said Lodge the sum of three hundred and fifty dollars for the purpose of purchasing a lot of land in said town of Worcester, on condition said Lodge shall build thereon a suitable brick building for the use of said Lodge within two years after my decease of the description and for the purposes mentioned in said devise on the 25th page of said Will said building to be at least two stories in height and to contain a handsome Hall for the members of said Lodge to assemble in, and all other accommodations, and shall always preserve and appropriate the same to their use. If this legacy should not be applied for, by said Lodge, for the purpose mentioned within two years after my decease and the conditions not performed within that time, then I give and bequeath said three hundred and fifty dollars to my grand daughters, the daughters of my daughter.

I give and bequeath to Thomas Royal Arch Chapter in Princeton, County of Worcester, Massachusetts, to be added to the funds of said Chapter, one hundred dollars.

Whereas in my Will I have bequeathed to the Massachusetts Grand Lodge and to other Masonic Lodges, certain legacies, it is now my will that if the officers and members of either of said Lodges to whom I have given legacies, should (from the unjust and wicked excitement raised against Freemasons, evidently for political purposes, by self created Inquisitions formed of persons styling themselves antimasons, aided by a few, some of whom I must believe to be unworthy and unprincipled members of the Fraternity of Freemasons) determine it to be prudent wholly to cease to meet as a Lodge, and to give up their Charter in order to preserve peace in the community, or for any other cause to meet as a Lodge, then the legacy I have bequeathed to such Lodge or Chapter mentioned in my said Will or in this Codicil, I now give the same to the American Antiquarian Society to be added to the funds of said society, to aid in supporting a Librarian who shall devote his whole time to the Institution—and also to aid the expenditure of sending a Missionary to the Western States to collect antiquities for preservation in the cabinet of said Society.

I give to the American Antiquarian Society, (what I esteem a most precious relic) a small lock of hair from the head of the Saviour of his country, General George Washington, at the time of his decease.

If said American Antiquarian Society, or another to bear the same name, from the causes mentioned in my said Will should be incorporated for the same purposes and as successor to the present institution, should cease to occupy said building for a library and cabinet for the space of three years, then the said building and the land belonging there to is to revert to my grandchildren.

In addition to what I have bequeathed to the American Antiquarian Society, mentioned in my Will and in this Codicil, I also bequeath to said Society one thousand dollars towards erecting a wing or wings (of bricks, &c., to be fire proof) as an addition to the building which now contains the library and cabinet of said Society. I also bequeath to said Society one hundred dollars towards paying the expenses of making a complete catalogue of their library and cabinet. Likewise I give to said Society one hundred dollars towards publishing a second volume of collections and transactions of the Society—provided I do not give either of said sums for the purpose mentioned before my decease. Either of the sums so given and paid is to annul that part of these bequests which mention the sum so given and paid. Those of the sums which may remain unpaid at my decease, are to be discharged whenever the Society shall have completed the works which those bequests are intended to aid in the accomplishment of and shall call for payment.

HOPE.

[BY DR. DRAKE.]

See through the cloud that rolls in wrath,
Yon little star benignant, peep,
To light along their trackless path
The wanderers of the stormy deep.

And thus, oh, Hope! thy lively form
In sorrow's gloomy night, shall be
The star that looks through cloud and storm
Upon a dark and moonless sea.

When heaven is all serene and fair,
Full many a brighter gem we meet;
'T is when the tempest hovers there,
Thy beam is most divinely sweet.

The rainbow, with the sun's decline,
Like faithless friends, will disappear:
Thy lights, dear star, more brightly shine,
When all is wail and sorrow here.

And thou Aurora's stealing gleam
May wake a morning of delight,
'T is only thy enchanting beam
Will smile amid affliction's night.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, MAY 28, 1831.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

This gentleman is now fairly astride the antimasonic hobby-horse—booted and spurred. The Gazette tells us that 'Mr. Sheriff Sumner of Suffolk, with his usual affability, conducted the Ex-President to one of the highest places in the Convention. He was regaled, in the course of the forenoon, by rare specimens of eloquence from the lips of Mr. Clough, of Boston,' and other distinguished orators. We were not present, at any time during the sitting of this august body, and are therefore unable to say what part, if any, the great political weather-cock enacted. Like all other political intriguers, after having been rejected and cast off by all parties, he has thrown himself into the ranks of a disorganizing faction, in the futile hope of being able to retrieve by the basest of means, the political distinctions and honors which an intelligent and free people adjudged him unworthy to retain. A distinguished and talented statesman of a neighboring town, now deceased, who was perhaps as well acquainted with Mr. Adams and his principles as any other public man in the country, declared, while this corrupt faction was yet in its infancy, that it was the bantling of John Quincy Adams, and that he would one day reap the full benefit of it. The prophecy is about to be fulfilled. If the faction be not the legitimate bantling of Adams, it is his by adoption. He stands god-father to the monster. It is said he is somewhat chagrined at the part his friend Rush is playing; deeming his letter an 'impertinent interference.' However this may be, Mr. Adams's claims to priority, on the score of letter-writing, are incontestible. Everybody recollects his 'I am, never was, and never shall be' epistle. Mr. Rush was not known in the ranks of antimasonry at that time. We learn further that Mr. Adams a short time since addressed a letter, 'full of fire and fury,' to a certain antimasonic committee in Plymouth County. But as in the case of his New York correspondence, he took the precaution to add the request that it might not be given to the public. The precious document will therefore be lost, unless chance should enable us to rescue it from oblivion. We understand also, that Mr. Adams attributes his defeat, or in more courtly language, his dethronement, to the influence of Masonry. He should rather look for the cause in his own political treachery—to his own unpopularity.—The people had become dissatisfied with his public measures, and disgusted with his jesuitical trickery. What party has he not betrayed? Where are the political friends that he has not sacrificed? From his youth, he has been in the market, subject to the highest bidder. His apostacy is coeval with the commencement of his public career. He has been alternately the friend and the foe of the two great parties which have existed in this country for the last half century: the tool of either or both, as circumstances dictated. And now that neither will accept of him; neither think him worth the having—he has thrown himself among the rubbish, the scum of both. We congratulate him on the liberality and kindness that has been shown him, even by that party, corrupt as it is, in admitting him into their ranks. As we are probably as friendly to him as any of his former political friends, it may not be impertinent in us to advise him to adhere permanently to the new principles he has espoused, and to continue faithful to the party that has snatched him from obscurity. We give this advice freely, and out of the great interest we feel in his future welfare; for if he prove recreant and turn traitor now, the great Arch-Magician himself will not trust him afterwards!

We subjoin an extract from the answer of his venerable father, JOHN ADAMS, then President of the United States, to an address from the Grand Lodge of this Commonwealth, in 1799, respecting the aspersions of Professor Robison:

'Many of my best friends have been Masons, and two of them, my professional patrons, the learned GRIDLEY, and my intimate friend, your immortal WARREN, whose life and death were lessons and examples of patriotism and philanthropy, were Grand Masters; yet so it happened, that I had never the felicity to be initiated. Such examples as these, and a greater still in my venerable predecessor, [Washington,] would have been sufficient to induce me to hold the institution in esteem and honor, as favorable to the support of civil authority, if I had not known their love of fine arts, their delight in hospitality and devotion to humanity.'

The candid and liberal sentiments exhibited in this short extract, should 'strike like inward fire' upon the soul of the ambitious son of the venerable author.

[As our antimasonic neighbors have thought our portrait of 'Master Slender's' political virtues, sufficiently true to the original to warrant its republication, they will probably consider the above worthy of the same distinction.—We assure them it is not less faithfully drawn; and as their readers are not often favored with the truth, we doubt not they would esteem the republication of this, a great kindness. If we be right in our conjecture, we will furnish gratuitously, the portraits of such prominent members of the party as may desire to see themselves faithfully executed. We will not flatter Neptune for his trident, nor Jove for his thunder.]

THREATS.—We learn that some one of the noisy purveyors of the antimasonic clan in this city, declares his intention to 'watch us as closely as a cat watches a mouse,' and if we libel him, we are forthwith to be visited with the vengeance of the law! Whew! what a long tail our cat's got! We wot not who this sensitive gentleman is; but our word on 't we shall never libel him; for the very sufficient reason that the worst thing we can think, say or write of him, cannot exceed the truth. The mind cannot conceive, nor the imagination paint, a more loathesome object than a rank, thorough-going antimasonic office-hunter. Where then is the necessity of calling in the aid of fiction, or libel? As for the truth, in the classical diction of 'Master Slender,' we will tell that, 'though the devil be before us;' and we doubt not that one of his favorite emissaries will be, should we ever have occasion to speak of the gent. incog. who says he has his eye upon us. But we should really like to know what description of animal has been set to watch over us, and from whom he receives his appointment; whether from the 'great Convention,' or from that small but very patriotic band, the 'Suffolk Committee.' If he be no cannibal, we think we could tickle him into a pleasant humor with us. At all events, we would try. Libel, indeed! We know of but one way in which it is possible to libel one of these fellows: that is to call him an honest man; and by hokey, we'll not tell such a confounded lie to please any on 'em. No! not even for the sake of being prosecuted for a libel! Therefore, Mr. gentleman Spy may rest assured that we shall never libel him. Since Master Slender has sent forth his epistle to astonish the intelligent and to make the ignorant wonder, and Johnny Q. has lifted up the light of his fallen countenance upon them, these fellows have grown excessively impudent, and begin to think themselves decent people! But it won't do—the citizens can't be cheated by such shallow tricks.

MR. RUSH'S LETTER.—On a preceding page we have placed some remarks in reply to the letter of the Ex-Secretary of the Treasury, to which we refer our readers. It is possible some sentiments may have been advanced, to which all of our readers cannot, at present, fully subscribe; but as the reader can judge if they be warranted by existing facts, we did not feel ourselves at liberty to reject them. The following extract from the Courier of Tuesday, is to the point: We have italicised a single sentence, to which the reader may if he pleases, give a moment's reflection.

'There is one part of Mr. Rush's Letter, which deserves the severest reprehension. It is his unmanly and unjustifiable attack on the Press—an assault which partakes more of the ferocity of a tiger and the malignity of a demon, than of the candor of a gentleman, or the wisdom of a statesman. It has neither dignity nor truth to entitle it to respect. Every reader will perceive that many of the writer's assertions are false. We do not say that Mr. Rush knew they were false, but unless he sees daily many more of the newspapers than we imagine he does, he could not know that they were true. The charges, we know, have been often made before, but the repetition of a lie, even from the pen of so respectable a man as Mr. Rush, does not impart to it the attribute of truth. His charges against the Press, of corruption and fear, of a disposition to concealment in reference to the progress and result of the trials in New York, are utterly groundless, and his enlisting as a volunteer to endorse the slander indiscriminately hurled at the conductors of the public press, should meet the prompt and decided reprobation of an insulted and indignant community.'

But let us inquire into the motive which could influence Mr. Rush to write this letter. It can hardly be contended that such a phillipic was called for by the note addressed to him by the antimasonic committee of York county. A very simple and a very brief reply would have answered the inquiries of those gentlemen. He might have given them all the information they requested in a much shorter space and in a much milder tone. He might have told them all he knew of Freemasonry and all that he feared of its effects, without arming himself with 'ratsbane, pistol, rope, and dagger, to commence a war of extermination upon a class of men, who, as a professional body, are as free, as liberal, as independent, as those of any other profession, and, we hope we may say it, without incurring the guilt of uttering a libel, so more obnoxious to the charges of profligacy and corruption, than some gentlemen, who appear to be aiming at political promotion at the expense of their friends. We have no wish to do an act of injustice to Mr. Rush. If he should receive no more than his fair deserts, our indignation might be appeased, and, perhaps, converted into compassion. He has been prompted to this act by political ambition. He expects, and not without reason, to be set-up as a candidate for the Presidency, in opposition to his friend, Henry Clay; or, failing in that, to be used as a candidate for the Vice Presidency, in company with some other aspiring demagogue, equally honest, but whose name might be deemed more potential in such an honorable contest. This, we undertake to say, and we are well advised of the extent of what we are saying, is the true secret of Mr. Rush's sudden conversion to antimasonry—or rather, if we admit his own declarations, his reluctant exposition of facts and opinions long known and cherished, but which all the obligations of honor, religion and patriotism, were too weak to draw from him till now,—just as the antimasonic party in New York had resolved to oppose the election of Mr. Clay and nominate a candidate for themselves. What a glorious illustration of the permanency and sincerity of political friendships! What a touching commentary on the honor, patriotism and morality of a gentleman, who marching under 'the broad banner of right reason and right feeling,' shrinks with horror from the bare possibility that Masonic Lodges may be made subservient to the purposes of ambitious politicians!

JURORS.—We learn that in the towns of Hanson and Norton the antimasonic proscriptionists have not only stricken the names of Masons from the lists of Jurors, but have proscribed all who are friendly to Masonry! that is, all who are not rank antimasons!—We would not give a fig for our neck, were it committed to the keeping of such a jury!

ANTIMASONIC 'MODERATION.'—We make the following extracts from the Gazette of Saturday: At the antimasonic Convention in 'Faneuil Hall, a committee, of which the Rev. Mr. Goff, (so called) of Millbury, was Chairman, submitted a report on the subject of Freemasonry, as connected with the christian church, in which it is boldly avowed to be the duty of any church having within the pale of its communion any person who is a member of the fraternity, to EXCOMMUNICATE SUCH MEMBER, if, after being admonished of his guilt in adhering to the institution, he shall not come out and renounce and denounce what the REVEREND GENTLEMAN pleases to denominate a 'blood stained institution.' Is our community prepared for this? Are our citizens ready to see men of pure morals and unquestioned piety cut off from the church for the only reason that they are connected with a society which even at the present day can boast the names of as pure patriots and devoted christians as the world ever saw? I trust not. And it would seem that the convention thought that this Rev. Gentleman was going rather too fast.

Mr. Amasa Walker, of Boston, admired the spirit and independence of the report; perhaps it was in advance of the spirit of the age, but the time would come, sooner or later, and he cared not how soon, he was prepared for it, when the principles of that report would command universal approbation. Mr. Eben. Clough, of Boston, liked the report, he had no eye-dee of having the subject winked out of sight. The report was fully submitted to the committee of revision and publication, who, perhaps, will have discretion sufficient to strangle the monster in its birth.

The following resolution was proposed by one of the city delegates in the antimasonic Convention, yesterday afternoon, and, after discussion adopted. The individual who proposed it, we will venture to assert, never extended three cents' worth of 'patronage' to any periodical in the country, Masonic or antimasonic.

Resolved, That it be recommended to the antimasonic party to withdraw all patronage and support from newspapers and publications, whose avowed or secret object is to disseminate Masonic Principles; and which refuse to publish antimasonic notices and communications.

The Convention was called to order by Mr. George Odiorno, of this city—a veteran in the cause. Mr. Timothy Fuller of Cambridge was chosen President.

The Gazette of Friday says: Among the delegates from Boston we notice many youthful politicians,—'alike to fortune and to fame unknown,'—as well as some who were considered hacks in the democratic ranks a dozen or fifteen years since. Taken as a whole the Convention will not compare very successfully with that which assembled in the State House, in November, 1820, to amend the constitution of the commonwealth. It is, nevertheless, quite a respectable body of citizens, and we advise every one who has a taste for the picturesque, or the wild and wonderful, to take a peep into Faneuil Hall before Saturday.

The Convention adjourned sine die on Friday—having worked up the materials one day earlier than was anticipated.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS says he lost his election through the opposition of Masons to him. It is capable of proof that every officer of the Grand Lodge of this Commonwealth voted for him, notwithstanding his 'I am not, never was, and never shall be a Mason.' And it is unquestionably true that 99 in a 100 of the Masons in New-England gave him their support. Times have changed since then.

REV. MOSES THACHER

Our readers will be pleased to learn that the Legislature of this Commonwealth have given the Reverend MOSES THACHER leave to stay at home.—The vote stood as follows: Mr. Endicott had 313, and Mr. Thacher 105.

MODERATION. We looked into Faneuil Hall yesterday, (Thursday,) and found the Antimasonic Convention, a pretty numerous and respectable assemblage, listening to 'a long talk' from our ancient friend and neighbor Dr. Phelps, the Grand Sachem of the antimasonic tribe in New England. The Doctor was unusually eloquent and impressive. He enjoined upon his brethren the importance of moderation, in their patriotic crusade against the nine and forty 'holy empires' of Masonry. The sentiment pleased us amazingly. We returned home amid the rain and opened the Northampton Courier of Wednesday, in which paper we found the following paragraph. It furnishes a striking commentary upon the professions of the Doctor and his antimasonic friends.—[Gazette.]

Jury box at Belchertown.—We stated in our last that the Masons had been proscribed in Belchertown, and thrust from the jury box; the adjourned meeting for the reconsideration of the subject was held last Wednesday; Mr. Lawrence continued his remarks from the first meeting, and spoke powerfully and at much length against the injustice, persecution and illiberality of the measure; he was replied to by Justus Forward, Esq.; Mark Doolittle, Esq. followed Mr. Forward in reply, and eloquently enforced the subject of individual rights and the protection offered by the constitution. At a late hour, the vote for reconsideration was taken, and it was rejected, one hundred and eleven voting for it and one hundred and thirty-three against it. A Protest was then offered by Mr. Doolittle, which was opposed, but finally received and recorded; it was signed by a large number of citizens.

CAPITAL TRIAL.—The trial of Joseph Gadett before the District Court, Judges Story and Davis presiding, for the murder of Capt. Samuel M. Woodbury, and piracy on board the brig Orbit, was concluded on Wednesday evening. The testimony was full and conclusive and the Jury after brief deliberation, returned a verdict of guilty.

A. H. Fisk and E. G. Prescott, Esqrs. were assigned as counsel for the prisoner. The indictment charged Gadett, in connexion with Thomas Collonet and a Portuguese, with the murder of Capt. Woodbury, and the capture of the vessel. The principal witnesses, Wm. Bowen and James Strike, underwent a thorough examination, whose testimony varied little from that published in this paper three or four weeks since, and which is unnecessary to repeat. From some additional evidence, it appeared that there had been several symptoms of insubordination among the crew previous to the final catastrophe. Capt. W. was a man of very unequal temper—at times, he would be quite unreserved and social to his men, and at others, extremely harsh and irascible. On the night of the murder, the Captain, about 12 o'clock resigned the helm to Bowen and threw himself on one of the hen-coops: having previously told Bowen, in case that the wind should blow fresh, to wake him if he should fall asleep, and ordered the other watch to retire to rest. The Portuguese soon came ast, and after some conversation with Bowen, went below, when Bowen heard earnest talking between him and a person unknown. He returned in a few minutes, and made directly for that part of the quarter deck where the Captain lay asleep, and struck him several blows with an axe, the latter making no struggle, or scarcely any noise. The Portuguese then inflicted several stabs with a knife.

At the first blows given by the Portuguese, Bowen was startled and cried out, 'In the name of God, what are you about?' The only answer was 'Hush.' About this time Bowen observed Gadett standing with a barpoon in his hand, on the larboard side of the companion way. The watch who had gone below were now called up by the Portuguese, or by Collonet, (one or both of whom used some ambiguous expressions, about the death of the captain,) and arrangements were made for the management of the vessel till morning. A division of the money and gold dust was then made among all on board.

The trial of Collonet commenced yesterday and will probably be terminated to-day. Jonathan Chapman and R. S. Fay, Esqrs., are his Counsel.—[Traveller.]

The Providence Daily Advertiser contains the names of the gentlemen who were appointed, by the Convention sitting in this city last week, delegates to the National Antimasonic Convention, to be held in Baltimore the 26th of September next. 'It has been reported in this city for the last three days, that at the opening of the Supreme Court, now sitting at Plymouth, the Jurors from Bridgewater were rejected, on the ground that they were not legally selected. Bridgewater is one of the towns where the names of all Masons were excluded.'

THE WREATH.

THE AFRICAN CHIEF.

[BY W. C. BRYANT.]

Chained in the market-place he stood,
A man of giant frame,
Amid the gathering multitude,
That shrunk to hear his name.
All stern of look and strong of limb,
His dark eye on the ground;
And silently they gazed on him
As on a lion bound.

Vainly, but well, that chief had fought,
He was a captive now;
Yet pride, that fortune humbles not,
Was written on his brow.
The scars his dark broad bosom wore,
Showed a warrior true and brave:
A prince among his tribes before,
He could not be a slave.

Then to his conqueror he spake—
'My brother is a king;
Undo this necklace from my neck,
And take the bracelet ring;
And send me where my brother reigns,
And I will fill thy hands
With store of ivory from the plains,
And gold-dust from the sands.'

'Not for thy ivory nor thy gold
Will I unbind thy chain;
That bloody hand shall never hold
The battle spear again.
A price thy nation never gave,
Shall yet be paid for thee;
For thou shalt be the Christian's slave,
In lands beyond the sea.'

Then spoke the warrior chief, and bade
To shred his locks away:
And one by one, each heavy braid
Before the victor lay.
Thick were the plaited locks and long,
And deftly hidden there,
Shone many a wedge of gold among
The dark and crisped hair.

'Look! feast thy greedy eye with gold,
Long kept for sorest need;
Take it, thou askest sums untold,
And say that I am freed.
Take it—my wife the live long day,
Weeps by the cocoa tree,
And my young children leave their play,
And ask in vain for me.'

'I take thy gold, but I have made
Thy fetters fast and strong;
And ween that by the cocoa shade
Thy wife shall wait thee long.'
Strong was the agony that shook
The captive's frame to hear,
And the proud meaning of his look
Was changed to mortal fear.

His heart was broken—crazed his brain,
At once his eye grew wild;
He struggled fiercely with his chain,
Whispered, and wept, and smiled!
Yet wore not long those fatal bands;
And once at shut of day,
They drew him forth upon the sand,
The foul hyæna's prey.

MUSCULANY.

THE KENTUCKY CAVERN.

MR. EDITOR—The following is a description of a remarkable natural curiosity, situated in the county of Edmonson, Kentucky, which, if you think it will be interesting to your readers, you are at liberty to publish. It is the cavern known generally as the 'Mammoth cave.'

In the month of December, 1826, the writer of this sketch in company with another gentleman, being on his way from Louisville to Nashville, took occasion to visit this cave. We found it indeed to be a rare specimen of nature's work. Its entrance was a steep declivity of a hill. The dimensions of the mouth are about forty feet in height by fifty in breadth, decreasing gradually for the first half mile, till the cavern is no more than ten feet in height and as many in breadth; at which place a partition has been erected, with a door of convenient dimensions, for the purpose of protecting the lights of visitors. There is at this place a current of air passing inwardly for six months, and outwardly for the remainder of the year. Sufficiently strong is it, that, were it not for the door that has been made, it would be impossible to preserve an open light. It is called the mouth as far as this place, on account of its being the extent of the influence of daylight, which here appears like a small star. Formerly, when this cavern was first discovered, this part of it was nearly filled with earth, which has been recently manufactured into Saltpetre.

Having prepared ourselves with a sufficient quantity of provision, oil and candles, and taking two persons as guides, we took our last view of daylight, and proceeded forward, closing the door behind us. Immediately we found ourselves in thick and almost palpable darkness, the whole of four lights spread but a feeble radiance about us. Such is the height at this place, that we were scarcely able to discover the top, and to see from one side to the other, was utterly impossible. From this place, extends several caverns, or, as travellers have named them, rooms, in different directions. This part of the cave is called the 'First Hopper.' The soil at the bottom of the cave is very light and strongly impregnated with salt. The sides and top are formed of rock. We proceeded forward, passing several rooms on our right, and one on our left, until we arrived at the second Hopper a distance of four miles from the mouth. About one mile in the rear of this, was pointed out to us by our guide, the place where the celebrated mummy was found, which is now exhibiting in the American Museum, at New York. It was found, in a sitting posture, by the side of the cavern, enveloped in a mat, and in a complete state of preservation.

We next entered the room denominated the Haunted Chamber. It is nearly two miles in length, twenty feet in height, and ten in breadth, extending nearly the whole length, in a right line. The top is formed of smooth white stone, soft, and very much resembling the plastering of a room. There is a small quantity of water, constantly, although almost imperceptibly falling from above, which, in the course of ages, has worn from the stone at the top, some beautiful pillars, which extend to the bottom of the room. They have the appearance of being the work of art. In one of them, there is formed a complete chair, with arms, which has received the name of the 'Arm Chair.' By the side of this, is a clear pool of water; strongly impregnated with sulphur. The sides of the room are likewise elegantly adorned with a variety of figures formed from the stone at the top, and coming down upon the side of the cavern, like icicles in the winter, from the eaves of buildings—the reflections of our lights upon them forming a most brilliant appearance. At the end of this room, we descended by a kind of natural stair case, to the depth of near three hundred feet, in many places affording only room for one person to proceed.—Here we found a beautiful stream of pure water, winding its way along between the rocks. The situation of this part of the cavern is rendered really awful, from its being associated with a variety of names that travellers have given it. The portrait of his Satanic Majesty is painted here upon the rocks, and a large flat stone, resting its corners upon four others, is called his Dining Table. A short distance from this, is said to be his Forging Shop.

On the whole they are admirably calculated to frighten the cowardly. We returned to the main cavern, and resumed our course, climbing over rocks that had evidently fallen from above, and passing a number of rooms on our right and left. With much exertion we reached the place denominated the 'six corners,' in consequence of six rooms (or caverns) here taking different directions. Not having time to examine these, we proceeded forward to the first water fall, about two miles further, over a level plain. The tracks of persons who might have preceded us for ages, were as visible in the sand as when first made. There is no air stirring that would move the slightest feather, or prevent the impression of a footstep from remaining for centuries.

We now directed our course to the chief City, about one mile further. A large hill situated in the centre of the cave would have exhibited a most commanding prospect, if the darkness had not obstructed our vision. One of us, however, standing upon the top, with the lights stationed at different parts of its base, obtained a novel and interesting view of the cavern. There is an echo here that is powerful, and we improved it with a song, much to our gratification. We started forward again, travelling over a plain of two miles extent, and about the same distance over rocks and hills, when we arrived at the second waterfall. The water here washed into a pit below, of immense depth. A circumstance occurred here, that liked to have proved fatal to one of us. The sides of the pit are formed of loose rocks, and we amused ourselves by rolling them down, in order to hear them strike the bottom. Such is the depth of it, that nearly a minute would elapse before we could hear them strike, and the sound of it is but very faint. One of our party venturing too near for the purpose of rolling a large stone, started the foundation on which he stood, and was precipitated down about twenty feet, with the stumbling stones, but fortunately, a projecting rock saved him from destruction. This put an end to all our amusements, and being much fatigued with a travel of twenty four hours on foot, and seeing no fairer prospect of finding the end, than when we commenced, we concluded to return. We accordingly took up our line of march, returning the same way we came.

After being forty two hours absent from the light of day, we again found ourselves at the mouth of the cavern, and gave ourselves up to a refreshing sleep.

TO HON. RICHARD RUSH.

Your character and standing, which have been sustained by the people of this country, and to whom you are indebted for all the influence you possess, constitute no shield to protect you from the strictest scrutiny of your fellow-citizens. On the contrary, it becomes doubly their duty to investigate motives when there is reason to believe that you possess a disposition to abuse the power which you have gradually gained through the favor of the people, and to adopt a policy of selfishness altogether incompatible to the proper course of a true patriot. If you have become an influential member of society, an improper course of conduct is of more serious injury than the bad examples of private citizens. Whatever is sanctioned by you, partakes in a certain degree of your former character, and, therefore, its effects are more pernicious, inasmuch as they have an influence not their own. With the merchant, the greater the sum intrusted to another, the greater the risk to himself; and in case of fraud or misfortune, the more destructive to his own interest. So it is with the people. A man of influence, and favored with the confidence of his fellow-men, if disposed, becomes a more dangerous traitor to their true interests, ten-fold, than an unheard of and unknown citizen, although there may be not the least difference in the degree of wickedness.—A wicked friend is a dangerous foe. Therefore, if you possess an influence over the opinions of others, it is of more importance that your motives should be analyzed and made known, your statements examined, and your arguments weighed. That your positions are assailable on every point, is perfectly plain. To be satisfied of this let every one possess the proper knowledge and judge for himself. With the full consciousness of my own responsibility to Almighty God for the character of my deeds and thoughts, I shall fearlessly deal with your reasoning and motives. What I shall deny, will not proceed from conjecture, but actual knowledge. I shall consult nothing but FACT, COMMON SENSE AND CHARITY. All the charity that truth will permit; all the intelligence, of the most common experience; and all the facts which certainty can claim.

I am invested with the authority of a citizen of the United States; and by that authority do now proceed to analyze the compound of your character, and lay the ingredients and their nature before your former friends and the world. Whoever has power, and has become bad, must be divested of his authority. This is the spirit and design of law and sound reason. Strong language needs no apology on my part. Its origin is with you.

In the first place what induced Messrs. Wm. M'Ilvaine, John Kauffelt, Hugh M'Donald, and Thos. C. Hambley, to address Mr. Rush? Here is their letter—

'York, April 26th, 1831.

HON. RICHARD RUSH.

Dear Sir—The undersigned acting as the Antimasonic Committee of Correspondence for York County, beg leave to address you. They, in general with the party to which they all belong, view the present, as a period of great importance in the history of this country. A large body of the Freemen of these United States, deem the Institution of Freemasonry dangerous to our political and moral welfare, and have united themselves in a determination to put it down.—In this attempt, they have been vigorously and systematically opposed by another portion, who are attached to it, and it has thus become, a matter of vast importance, for those who entertain the opinions which we profess, to know, who are for, and who against us. Therefore, as it has on the one hand, been stated in a public newspaper that you are a member of the Institution, which has again by others been denied; we, together with many other of our fellow-citizens, will feel thankful to you, for such information upon the subject as you may think proper to communicate; and likewise your views with respect to the question between Masonry and its opponents. Addressing you as we do, in the character of a public body, it is of course our desire that the reply should be public also.

With sentiments of high respect and esteem, we remain, sir, your obedient servants.

WILLIAM M'ILVAINE,

JOHN KAUFFELT,

HUGH M'DONALD,

THOS. C. HAMBLEY,

Antimasonic Committee of Correspondence for York County.

This letter was not written, and I assert it without fear of contradiction, without a previous understanding between this Committee and Mr. Rush himself.—The Committee had either directly or indirectly sounded Mr. Rush with regard to his views of the institution, and were made to believe that he would if required in a formal way, write a most excellent article for the promotion of their cause. They knew enough of the man to see that his ambition would not scruple to bend to the vilest means for the sake of self promotion. They wanted some prominent man to head their party who had been in some standing with the community; and Richard Rush for the sake of being this man, for the sake of standing a chance of being first in this righteous party, consented that they should address him that he might consistently appear before this public in a new attitude. The first part of the letter is of no account; we quote the following as being the key of their design.

Therefore, as it has on the one hand, been stated in a public newspaper that you are a member of the institution, which has again by others been denied; we, together with many other of our fellow-citizens, will feel thankful to you, for such information upon the subject as you may think proper to communicate, and likewise your views with respect to the question between Masonry and its opponents. Addressing you as we do, in the character of a public body, it is of course our desire that the reply should be public also.

Their ostensible object for writing this letter was to find out whether Mr. Rush was a member of the institution; but their real design was to receive from him what they had previously been told would be given them if asked for—viz. his views with respect to the question between Masonry and its opponents. And of these views they were as perfectly informed before as after he wrote the answer to their questions. This is obvious at first sight; for they avow it as their firm and settled conviction, 'that the institution of Freemasonry is dangerous to our political and moral welfare, and have united themselves in a determination to put it down.' Now observe the close:—'Addressing you as we do in the character of a public body, it is of course our desire that the reply should be public also.'

The Committee state in the most decided manner their determination to put down Masonry. They next ask Mr. Rush's opinion of the institution and of its opponents; and in the same letter request that his answer shall be made public, before they had received it! Is there a man in his sober senses who is willing to suppose for a single moment, that such a request would have been made, if they did not know what the answer was to be? Supposing he had been point blank against them, would they consider it as a favor, and even as 'A MATTER OF COURSE' that the answer should be made public? No! they would have cursed the man and sent him to some wicked and deluded Masonic printer for the privilege of ushering into the world his views and speculations. How does it happen that these letters from antimasonic committees to individuals always produce the effect their writers desire?

How does it happen that in all their IMPARTIAL correspondence they have not received a dissenting word in those letters, which, 'as a MATTER OF COURSE, should be published?' These questions need not to be answered, for they answer themselves.

Unquestionably, Mr. Rush had long been actively engaged with this very Committee, by whom he was addressed, in planning the movement which he has made. In fact, we are told, that he has written antimasonic communications under the signature of Templeton, for the same paper in which appeared this elaborate and studied letter. If he has not, let him deny it. If his object was not selfish, if his motives were patriotic, and his activity directed by honesty, why did he come out with his name at this time instead of his fictitious signature? It was a mere political trick for these men to address him in the capacity of a Committee, as facts give the lie to their professed intentions! There can be no question but that every member of this Committee had had the privilege of reading his letter long before they addressed him formally for the possession of it! Is it to be supposed that tricks 'cut and dried' so hard as this, can be swallowed!—But, hear him.

'I have received the communication of the 26th April, which as a committee of correspondence of antimasons for this county, you have done me the honor to address to me on the general subject of Masonry and antimasonry, and making some inquiries of me in relation to it. I do not know, that the views that I entertain upon either topic, can be of more importance, than those of any other private individual, who may have taken the trouble to inform himself on the passing events of the day, and to reflect upon them. But as you are pleased to invite an expression of those views, I will not withhold them. When a citizen may have adopted, on sufficient deliberation, opinions upon any public question, they seem of right, to belong to whosoever may think them worth asking. My opinions having been made up neither hastily nor very recently on those which your letter embraces, I willingly proceed, without occupying time for any further introduction, to present them to you, with the grounds on which they are founded.'

He feigns a humility of character that does but ill compare with his impetuosity of feeling. He does 'not know that the views he entertains upon either topic, can be of more importance than those of any other private individual, who may have taken the trouble to inform himself on the passing events of the day, and to reflect upon them.'

Here is heartless ambition with an impudent pretence to honesty in the very outset.

The reader is made to infer that he, Mr. Rush, has taken the trouble to inform himself on this topic, and has had the wisdom to reflect, and the impartiality to decide the question between the two parties, uninfluenced by prejudice or selfishness! Such an inference, no doubt is logical, considered in relation to the premises, but I discard the premises as untrue.

HIS wisdom and impartiality are diametrically opposed to every Christian principle, and to facts, as they exist in every possible shape and within the reach of every man of unbiased reason. But of this in another place.

I see objections to secret societies, because, pursuing objects not known to the public, through means not known to the public, they act under diminished responsibilities to the public. If the objects be good, why not state them; if bad, they ought to be known. Our legislative halls are all open, and our courts; so are all the acts of our people, that may come to effect the interests of the body political, or social. Not a bridge company, not a turnpike company, no bank; scarcely an association of any kind, for whatever purpose existing, whether for the advancement of charity, or learning, or religion, or any of the common business of life, and whether incorporated by the laws or not, but renders its statements to the public, either voluntarily, or by command of the laws. If the latter do not positively enjoin publicity, a competent share of information regarding the objects of any such associations, is rarely or ever withheld, on proper inquiry being made.

What school-boy does not know all this? But here follows the learned application:

'Societies, then, profoundly secret, by the first element of their constitution, whatever their ostensible ends, cannot be too closely watched, in a country whose primary principles of political and social action, are all in the face of day. The mystery should appear to have good cause, and be free from all suspicion of abuse. If such societies guard their secrets by strong penalties; if they have numbers and antiquity on their side; if their visible outputs are but links of a chain stretching from nation to nation; if the sense of affiliated attachment and union among them is perceived to be exceedingly energetic and zealous; if their whole scheme of discipline, improved throughout ages, has become in a high degree imposing, even terrifying, their operations, will naturally have the more scope, and should be watched with the more care. Freemasonry is such a society.'

These are of great importance to the wilfully ignorant as their use altogether supercedes the necessity of searching out facts. You assert that 'profound secrecy is the first element of the Masonic Institution,' and by what authority! By none. To lessen your 'trouble' in gathering information, let me tell you that VIRTUE, BROTHERLY LOVE, UNIVERSAL BENEVOLENCE and CHARITY, constitute the primary elements of the institution.—That in these you will find the root and branch of Masonry. That the Masonic charges, enumerating the duties of Masons, and which have been before the world in black and white for centuries, contain the real object and end of the order. That the holy writ is the guide for Masons, and by it they are bound to act. That Masons are obligated to reverence and fear God, love man and be true to liberty and equal rights. These are Masonic principles, and as such have been published in every language. And yet, you have the arrogant impudence to come before the public with your eyes put out, and attempt to explain the colour and shades of principles, which, by your silence in relation to them, we are bound to believe you never took the trouble to even glance at, much less to investigate.

You indulge in the basest depravity of human suspicion, and imagine Masons all rascals, and as having some object in view altogether foreign from what they profess.—Because they are numerous, they must be united! Because they are united they must be dangerous! as if it were good reasoning to infer a more perfect unanimity in a larger than in a smaller number of men! a position contrary to all experience. And do you not know that every religious sect in the world, every political party of a nation, is represented in the Masonic Institution? A wonderful chance for agreement in questions of a national character! Indeed, such an 'Institution should be watched!' But let no man wear glasses on 'the watch' magnifying more than a thousand times, or capable of more than a simple inversion of the objects seen. For there is a prevailing principle in the minds of some of your party, that not only inverts the objects seen, but deforms them. It might be called the compound principle of inversion, or compound depravity.

Do you wish to know the character of the secrets of Masonry? They are but the keys which keep sacred and safe the treasures of the Institution! They constitute no part of the principles of the order—they are designed to protect Masons from imposition, and to give efficiency to every measure which benevolence may dictate. The secrets of Masonry of themselves are of no importance, any more than a key to a door; but considered in their relative character, they form the most efficient means for the accomplishment of benevolent objects that ever the philanthropy of man originated. You say that 'mystery should appear to have good cause, and be free from all suspicion of abuse.'

What cause more worthy than charity, benevolence and virtue? But do you say that the ostensible objects of Masonry are not the real? If so, then let the blood of shame flow full in your cheeks; for you assert what belongs to no stock of your own knowledge, or to the truth of others. You have the insolent wickedness to insult the memory of Washington, and give the lie direct to his words.

Who invested you with an honesty above your neighbors, that you are privileged to dispute their veracity, when facts oppose your measures and detect your motives?

Next comes the whining argument which ought to disgrace the theme of the greatest blockhead of a primary school, that the abuses of the Institution are necessarily chargeable to its principles. With a teacher's condescension let me ask what ever existed in this world, under the government of man, that did not in some degree meet with abuses? Have not our most holy and sacred Institutions met with more trials and difficulties than societies of profane character? Have not the exertions of good men been rewarded with ridicule and destruction? Has not religion been persecuted in every possible form?—Coming down even to the milk of the babe, and the harmless honey of the bee, they are poisons of the roughest nature if their use is perverted and abused? Would you discard them as poisonous for this reason? And yet, you, with grey-headed experience, are ready to denounce an Institution as perversive of every good, if it cannot surpass all others in perfection? And not only be perfect in every respect, but as Cæsar wished his wife, to be even above suspicion! What an adept in the knowledge of human nature! If Masons cannot be perfect, they must not be better than their neighbors!! Why not strike Reason from her throne at once, and sweep all from the face of the earth, and then while sinking in the ocean of your liquid and unhinged arguments of absurdity, you will have a straw of consistency to catch at. But until you are ready to do this—rest, for your own sake, for the credit of human nature, and not conjure up that fiendish spirit which points slander to an honest neighbor's face, but never turns in to view its horrid self.

'Great and good men have belonged to it, I know; and do belong to it, at this moment; yet, recent disclosures in the United States, have, I think, shown the dangers of which the society may become the parent, through the agency of bad men. Of all governments existing, ours is the one which would be most justified in watching, with constant and scrupulous care, the conduct of societies profoundly secret. Most, or all, other governments, admit the principle of secrecy, and themselves practise it, at least to some extent. Ours, never. All its operations are, sooner or later, laid before the grand, original, constituent body—the people; the only fountain, with us, of all influence and sovereignty and power. These are obvious principles of our system. Freemasonry puts forth an exception to them. It is hence, the right and duty of the people, to exercise strict censorship over a body, which moves in an element so contrary to their own.—They are the higher power, and entitled to the undisputed control. It is as much a general truth in morals as in government, that it is vice, not virtue, which needs a veil.'

Decency in ordinary cases, even in a hardened pirate's bosom, admonishes a degree of respect for the opinions of great and good men. 'Great and good men,' you say, 'have belonged to it, (the Institution) I know; and do belong to it, at this moment; yet, recent disclosures in the United States, have, I think, shown the dangers of which the society may become the parent, through the agency of bad men.' But here you disgrace logic and common sense, and hinge an ergo, which if adopted in relation to other subjects, would prostrate the world! Ay, more; in order to give a true and proper existence, all things would have to be resolved into one common mass, homogenous in element, nature and design, one simple substance of one shape and quality, being only one, yet all. Two things of a different nature could not exist, for the difference of character would give rise to the law of dependant relations; and this implies a lesser and a greater power which leaves room for the degrees from good to bad. This would not answer to your sublime notions of nature. For where bad has existence, good must give way! This is a remarkable position, and should be furnished gratis to all the Colleges for solution. It would make a Locke or a Stewart proud. It is a syllogism which neither the sophistry or wisdom of man can upturn! Look at it!!

Good of itself in this world cannot exist, without evil; for both are relative terms;

Evil cannot exist, in this world, without good, for it is its proper correlative,

Therefore, Good must not be, as it becomes the immediate parent of Evil!!

Genius of Philosophy!! look at this and weep! Thou that dost control the investigations of nature, hast been even ignorant of the great secret of secrets—the key to the laws of the world! Weep, celestial science, mortality, stinking mortality, now maketh and ruleth universal nature! The laws of God are but impositions upon our credulity, and the sense of man but the spirit of an all pervading deception! Good men are mere nonentities, where bad men exist! Great men vanish, when little ones step forth! The spirit of demons reigneth; for the ship swallow up the ocean, the birds fly into nonentity with the vast expanse of space and air; the body of man, satiates upon the planets of Creation, and the mind steps forth in the sight of God and wrenches down the authority of High Heaven! Perversion is the order and end of things!

Sacrilegious man! how dare you connect facts with falsehood! Quote knowledge of great and good men, and then disgrace it by puddling in the infamous waters of slander and depravity! You state next in relation to its governments, what no one disputes. We all know that the 'operations of ours, are, sooner or later, laid before the grand, original, constituent body—the people; the only fountain, with us, of all influence and sovereignty and power.' That every act is destined to meet the scrutiny of the people and by whom it is to be shaped and accepted.

But 'Masonry,' say you, 'puts forth an exception to these principles.' This is another wilful or blundering departure from the truth. Freemasons constitute a part of the people, and are not only bound by the laws of citizenship to support good order and sustain government, but by the laws of their institution! Masons are doubly bound to do well and doubly damned if they violate confidence and become the workers and co-workers of iniquity.—Masonry is bound to support the government under which it is its lot to dwell. A traitor to his country can be no Mason, for man, as a Mason, is taught to study, love, practice and venerate true patriotism.

Freemasons do not move in an element contrary to the principles of government. Their studies are all of a nature eminently calculated to promote the prosperity of a government like ours? On this point hear the evidence of Lafayette, who said when in Boston, with great earnestness,

‘Brethren, go on, go on in your good cause; it is a cause friendly to the improvement of man and the world, for where Masonry is, there are liberty and benevolence.’

You say, ‘It is as much a general truth in morals as in government, that it is vice, not virtue, which needs a veil.’

What do you mean by this?

That whatever is virtuous should be exposed to the gaze of the world? and that whatever is not seen in all its private operations must needs be vicious?

Hast thou a wife? expose her naked to the world, for the fact of a covering begets suspicion in the vulgar minds of the people, of your motives! Hast thou a family? Break down your doors, and thrust through your windows, and permit a free ingress and egress, that no suspicion may be lurking about your house, of those within! Pish, upon modesty! it is a mere nickname for secrecy! Act without a veil, for virtue requires ‘NO VEIL,’ but implies ‘vice,’ therefore let your actions be above even ‘suspicion,’ and whatever you do let it be done before men! Hast thou secrets confided to thy care? tell them to the world, and rejoice in your liberation from this slavish thralldom of society! The world will certainly know more, and the world has a right to know all, or it is in duty bound to cry treason, to the motives of those who are obstinately opposed to this open policy. Dost thou walk in the high-ways with thy neighbor’s wife? Stop and explain the circumstance to every understrapper of the city as you meet him, and swear ‘t was altogether accidental! Call witnesses to prove you met ten minutes before in such a street, and by chance you were both destined to walk one way! For remember, ‘that vice needs a veil, not virtue,’ and whatever may be plain to you is not plain to an observer.

Do you say that these cases do not touch the principle? More than that, they establish it. Do you say that the secrets of families and of persons do not concern the welfare of the community? Neither do the secrets of Masonry. Their objects you always have known, their peculiarities you never can know, without evidence of your honesty. If you are to be my judge, I must be yours; if you cannot believe me in one thing, you must doubt me in all. The base principle of suspicion does not halve its possessions, when it taints a particle, the whole lump is affected; and from lump to lump whole society becomes diseased with its pernicious influence. If you cannot trust me as a Mason, I will not trust you as a man. If you cannot trust me in a lodge, neither can I trust you in your private circle, or club of associates. I have the rights and privileges of a man and citizen, and what have you more? O fie, fie upon you! adopt first this principle yourself and set an example to the world.

Secrecy has no communion with thy spirit; thou art so open, so exposed, so accessible from all points to all points, that even Adam himself was no more known to his Maker than thou art to the world!

But to return to the legitimate rights of government. Do not all our Grand Lodges and Grand Chapters, which control every subordinate one, get their charters from the representatives of the people?—And have not the representatives a right to call them to an account, at any time, for their movements? You know it to be so. You probably know, too, as you pretend to be fully-informed on the subject, that the Grand Chapter of New York state, was called to an account by the Legislature, and that the enemies failed to substantiate their vile accusations. Do you say that the influence of Masons prevented a fair decision? Let me tell you that the Masons voted for the investigation, and fearlessly challenged the scrutiny of the prying eyes of malignity. A Mason violates a solemn obligation when he becomes an enemy to the liberties of his country. Can this be said of a citizen? Which than is the most likely to turn traitor?

MR. BURCHELL'S LAST LETTER TO MOSES THACHER.

FRIEND MOSES:

It is the privilege of an old man that he is allowed to take his own time, and when we reflect that in proportion as age creeps upon us, our muscles and tendons acquire a tension and rigidity, every principle of nature sanctions the indulgence. Though the days of quick perception are over and gone, yet, the judgment of age may not only be unimpaired, but it may have grown into a surprising accuracy. But old Mr. Burchell makes no pretensions to a superior intellectual attainment. He is a plain, good natured sort of a man, that never made much stir and bustle in the world, and, if he knows himself, would have all men love one another. As to flattery, he is happy to say that his fellow men never saw fit to bestow much of it upon him; hence an impartial judgment is never the worse on that account.

Friend Moses, I have lately been living my boyhood over again, by reading Æsop's fables and looking at the pictures. Somewhere I have seen a notice of this celebrated fabulist, which tells me that he was not only a poor Grecian slave, but wretchedly deformed, having a hump upon his shoulders as big as a Scotchman's wallet. Under all these disadvantages, he understood human nature far better than you and I do, Moses. He was, moreover, a very honest man; for he never spoke a fable and then palmed it upon the credulity of his audience as a sober reality. Moral:—When we speak a fable, we should always let mankind know that it is such. For our mutual instruction, let us listen to one of his fictions, entitled ‘the Sorceress.’

‘The whole world,’ says he, ‘was in a state of silence and repose, when an old, ill-natured Sorceress, in order to exercise her mischievous arts, entered into a gloomy wood that trembled at her approach. The scene of her action was within the circumference of a large circle, where she pronounced the deceitful words, which bound her deluded votaries in obedience to her charms. She blows a raging pestilence from her lips into the neighboring folds, the innocent cattle die, to afford a fit sacrifice for a favorite deity. The moon, by powerful spells drawn down from her orb, enters the wood, legions, in a state of frantic lunacy, appear before the altar and demand her pleasure. Tell me, said she, where I shall find what I have lost, my favorite little Dog. How! cried they all, enraged—(as reason resumed her long lost empire) Impertinent Beldame! must the order of nature be inverted, and the repose of every creature disturbed, for the sake of thy little Dog?’ Moral:—There are a few people who would unhinge the world, if it would promote their own convenience, or aggrandizement.

What a droll fellow was Æsop! Had he lived and conversed at the present day, he could not have said anything more to the point. But human nature is the same in every age, and the sayings of this wise philosopher will apply now, as well as they did two thousand years ago.

Many weeks have elapsed since you have heard from Mr. Burchell, and during this interval of silence he has looked around him and pondered, seeing some sights and hearing more noises. Moral:—Every man ought sometimes to see and hear, as there is not good sense enough in the world to keep him always talking.

What is the matter, Moses, with the folks in North Wrentham, for it is a great noise that I hear? This people, once so proverbially mild, peaceful and happy, have latterly become rough and sonorous, and their countenances, which so proverbially beamed with love and good will towards one another, have latterly borne the aspect of spirits fresh from Pluto's realms. What a contrast!—what a change!! Ah, too much I fear that somebody has been telling this people fables, and has somehow or other, forgotten to tell them that they are not sober realities.—And then he plays certain tricks of buffoonery, said to be in imitation of the rites and ceremonies of an institution, which these most potent, grave and reverend seigniors, denominate immoral, indecent, and profane, and all this is under the specious pretence of improving the morals and advancing the best interests of the people! I cannot but think, after mature reflection that these modern censors take rather an odd way to correct the immoralities of the times. I will tell a story. It was my hap not long since to fall in company with an honest jack tar, who, I thought perfectly delineated the deceptive arts of these political mountebanks, by making use of the following similitude. ‘Supposing,’ said he, ‘that I was far at sea, with a large ship and valuable cargo, and the safety of the ship and all on board depended solely on the harmony and unanimity of the crew. Supposing that one of my hands should traverse from stem to stern, endeavoring by all possible means to foment divisions and animosities until a dangerous mutiny was either felt or feared. And supposing he should, with unblushing effrontery, tell me that he felt such an anxiety for the safety of the ship, and such an affection for the crew, that he must make all the disturbance and do all the mischief he could. Why I would have the fellow on the capstan, and give him a cool dozen or two.’ Such were the coarse, but honest expressions of this child of Neptune.

Experience, (I am older than you) teaches me that the political pot cannot always boil. How very precarious then are those honors, if honors they may be called, which can rise only by its fermentation. The arts of aspiring politicians are ever shifting—what serves their turn to day fails them to-morrow. I am willing to be treated as an idiot, if the antimasonic hobby has not pretty nearly had its day; but who is to be its successor I predict not. There will always be some malecontents who are ever on the alert to seize upon something which will raise a breeze and waft them into notoriety. Just so soon, Moses, as a new trick is successfully played off, the old ones and their schemes are lost in oblivion. I am confident that the great mask is about to be shifted for one of less appalling form and feature, as the halo that encircled your brow, as a reward of your antimasonic labours of love, is fading away—see, it is gone!

I cannot persuade myself to conclude without frankly telling you the situation in which you live. The tide of popular opinion, which once buoyed you up, and wafted you pleasantly along now begins to set hard against you. Among the most reckless of your order you have taken the highest stand, and if that order falls to the ground, you must fall hard. There can be no medium in your case. If the basest faction that ever disgraced this country prospers and prevails, you will rank high in the catalogue of factionists. If not you are an undone man.

So writes—

TALES.

[From the Baltimore Minerva.]

THE BRIGAND AND THE WIDOW'S DAUGHTER.

Desolation! with destruction
Fall on my coward head, and make my name
The common scorn of fools, if I forgive him.
Venice Preserved.

The Widow's daughter was fair and lighthearted; she had heard many romantic stories of the brigand of Bohvina, who had for years desolated the country and won, by his daring acts, the title of King of the Mountains. She loved him, though she knew him not—for he paid secret visits to her in the character of a deserter under the sentence of death; pity first moved her heart, and the manly beauty and courage of the stranger added strength to the feeling. She followed him to the mountains, and when she did know him it was too late to retrace her steps—for shame and a dread for the anger of her mother had compelled her to fly her paternal roof. She wandered through the wild and dreary places, haunted by the banditti, she partook of their fatigues and their dangers—for her heart clung to the author of her misery.—Unhappy girl! she little dreamed of the agony in store for her. In the course of time she gave birth to a son, a bright and beautiful child, bearing on its features the impress of his mother's smile blended with the stern glance of his outlawed father. She loved that boy dearer than life, for she thought in after days that he would be a comfort to her. The brigand, since he had resumed his real character no longer looked upon her with that tenderness which first won her heart; cares and troubles daily assailed him, and his soul was too much engrossed by business to make room for love. His band, once so numerous, so fearless, had been routed and destroyed; the soldiers of France had defeated him in several encounters, and the companions of the chief had perished. Several had been betrayed, by treachery, others had fled—and a reward of two thousand dollars was offered for his head; four men only stood by his side—four out of sixty strong!—To resist was now useless. They retreated in haste to their last and safest hold, and pursued closely by their enemies. Luckily the foreigners knew but little of the mountain passes; caution on the part of the Brigand was all that was required, for the least noise would give a clue to the pursuers.

On they went scarcely daring to breathe lest the sound should reach the ears of the soldiers. The child had been long sleeping in its mother's arms, and he awoke at this critical moment—'Silence!' exclaimed the chief in a low, but terrible voice.—The poor girl placed her lips to the mouth of the crying child, and called him all those tender and endearing names only known to mothers—'My son—my child—my darling child—my little Ambrose!' she longed to make him feel the danger to which his whimpering was exposing them—but the child only felt the pains of hunger which provoked his cries.

'See that he be silent, woman!' again muttered the chief, 'his life is less precious than ours; on your peril keep him silent.'

The mother amazed and affrighted, cast a piercing glance upon the Brigand, she could scarcely believe his horrible threat—but the glance of the chief spoke his firm resolution. In the meanwhile the pursuers had heard the cry of the child, they were certain that the chief was at hand, for they had learned that a woman & child were with him. They sped onward—their footsteps were heard, and the fugitives would be on the point of being seized, did not a sudden and profound silence make the pursuers loose the track again.

'Now let him be silent!' said the chief—and the child was silent—its little lips were forever sealed, it uttered not another cry to betray the route of the fugitives. To save his comrades and himself he seized the infant and dashed it against the sharp rocks! The horror stricken girl shed not a tear—breathed not a murmur—the chief turned away his head, and his companions cast down their eyes, while the mother took up the mangled body of her murdered offspring; wrapped it in her apron and followed mutely on.

After she had carried it some time, the stern chief ordered her to cast it away—but she refused—the boy was silent—she wished to dig a little grave for it in some safe place, that she might visit it from time to time; but the Brigand wearied with the sight, again tore it from her arms, and cast it down the yawning ravine for wolves and vultures to prey upon. The young girl wept not—but her bosom rose and fell like the billows of a stormy ocean, her eyes flashed, and her lips quivered with indignation. The chief threatened to treat her in the same manner he had her infant, if she made the least murmur,—she spoke not a word.

Night came on, and the banditti, broken down with fatigue agreed to rest awhile; but would watch while the others slept? none of them were certain that they could resist the desire of sleep.—The young mother offered to watch; for in truth, her inflamed eyes showed that she had no disposition to sleep, she wished to weep unseen. Armed with the carbine and stiletto of her unnatural husband, she stood up and watched over the sleeping banditti.

Her eyes fell heavily on one of them,—he, the murderer of her son—his only son! then she thought of the innocent and happy days of her youth, of her mother, who, perchance had died with curses on her lips; of her love, courted so much by the youngest and bravest, which love a Brigand had repaid with contempt and outrage. She thought of all this—and vengeance filled her heart: an Italian's vengeance! Dark—terrible! as the first fires of a volcano. Above all she thought of her infant child murdered in her arms. Wretch!—he did not even fear my vengeance! thus far he has despised it!.....and then she laughed, but such a laugh!.....the carbine she held in her hand was then placed against the heart of one of the sleepers—the trigger was drawn, and a loud explosion awoke the banditti, and the girl had fled towards the bivouac of the soldiers, and they dared not follow lest they should fall into ambuscade. When she arrived at the camp, she asked for the commandant, when she was shown to him she said—

'It has fallen to my lot to kill the Brigand of Bohvina—he who has for years past desolated the Pouille—the king of the mountain; give me the promised reward, for the head is mine.'

The commandant looked upon her with surprise, and the soldiers seemed distrustful of a woman who had already proved a traitress—but when she related her terrible story, they pitied her. She conducted them to the spot where she had killed the brigand; his body lay there, for his comrades, fearing delay had abandoned it.

The two thousand dollars were accordingly given her; but her mother, for whom she had intended them, needed not her bounty, she had died, perhaps casting her malediction upon the head of her unnatural daughter.

One of the soldiers became enamored of her person and courage, and she became his wife.—A son blessed their union—but, she had no sooner given birth to it, than a frightful delirium seized her—she cried out that they were murdering her child while it rested in her arms, all efforts to bring her back to reason proved abortive, and she became a maniac, running through the fields, digging the earth with her withered fingers to find the body of her first born. Thus ended the days of the Widow's daughter.

BIOGRAPHY.

STEPHEN DECATUR.

Stephen Decatur a celebrated American Naval officer, was born Jan. 5, 1779, on the eastern shore of Maryland, whither his parents had retired while the British were in Philadelphia. He entered the American navy in March, 1798 and was soon promoted to the rank of first lieutenant. While at Syracuse, attached to the Squadron of commodore Preble, he was first informed of the American frigate Philadelphia, which in pursuing a Tripolitan corsair, run on a rock about four and an half miles from Tripoli, and was taken by the Tripolitans, and towed into the harbour. Lieutenant Decatur conceived the project of attempting her recapture or destruction. He selected, for this purpose, a ketch, and manned her with 70 volunteers. Feb. 16, 1804, at 7 o'clock at night, he entered the harbour of Tripoli, boarded the frigate, though she had all her guns mounted and charged, and was lying within half gun-shot of the bashaw's castle and of his principal battery. Two Tripolitan cruisers were lying within two cable's length, on the starboard quarter, and several gun-boats within half gun-shot on the starboard bow, and all the batteries on shore were opened upon the assailants. Decatur set fire to the frigate, and continued alongside until her destruction was certain. For this exploit, the American congress voted him thanks and a sword, and the President immediately sent him a captaincy. The next spring it being resolved to make an attack on Tripoli, commodore Preble equipped 6 gun-boats and two bombards, formed them into two divisions, and gave the command of one of them to captain Decatur. The enemy's gun-boats were moored along the mouth of the harbour, under the batteries and within musket shot. Captain Decatur determined to board the enemy's eastern division consisting of nine. He boarded in his own boat, and carried two of the enemies' boats in succession. When he boarded the second boat, he immediately attacked the commander, who was his superior in size and strength, and his sword being broken, he seized the Turk when a violent scuffle ensued. The Turk threw him, and drew a dirk for the purpose of stabbing him, when Decatur, having a small pistol in his right pocket, took hold of it, and turned it as well as he could, so as to take effect upon his antagonist; cocked it, fired through his pocket, and killed him. When commodore Preble was superseded in the command of the squadron, he gave the frigate Constitution to Decatur, who was afterwards removed to the Congress; and returned home in her when peace was concluded with Tripoli. He succeeded commodore Barron in the command of the Chesapeake, after the attack made upon her by the British man-of-war Leopard. He was afterwards transferred to the frigate United States. In the war with Great Britain and the United States, while commanding the frigate United States, he fell in, Oct. 25, 1812, with the Macedonian, mounting 49 carriage guns, one of the finest of the British vessels of her class, and captured her after an engagement of an hour and a half. When captain Carden, the commander of the Macedonian, tendered him his sword, he observed that he could not think of taking the sword of an officer who had defended his ship so gallantly, but should be happy to take him by the hand. In a letter written five days after the capture, he says, 'I need not tell you that I have done every thing in my power to soothe and console captain Carden; for really, one half the pleasure of this little victory is destroyed in witnessing the mortification of a brave man, who deserved success quite as much as we did who obtained it.' In Jan. 1814, commodore Decatur, in the United States with his prize the Macedonian, then equipped as an American frigate, was blockaded at New London by a British squadron greatly superior in force. A challenge which he sent to the commander of the British squadron, sir Thomas Hardy, offering to meet two of the British frigates with his two ships was declined. In January, 1815, attempted to set sail from New-York, which was blockaded by four British ships; but the frigate under his command, the President, was injured in passing the bar, and was captured by the whole squadron, after having maintained a running fight of two hours and a half with one of the frigates, the Endymion, which was dismantled and silenced. After the conclusion of peace, he was restored to his country, in 1815. The conduct of the Barbary powers, and of Algiers in particular, having been insulting to the United States, on the ratification of peace with Great Britain, war was declared against Algiers, and a squadron was fitted out under the command of commodore Decatur; for the purpose of obtaining redress. In the spring of 1815, he set sail, and, June 17, off cape de Gatt, captured an Algerine frigate, after a running fight of 45 minutes, in which the famous admiral Rais Hammida, who had long been the terror of the Mediterranean sea, fell. The American squadron arrived at Algiers June 28. In less than 48 hours, Decatur terrified the regency into his own terms, which were, mainly, that no tribute should ever be required, by Algiers, from the United States of America; that all Americans in slavery should be given up without ransom; that compensation should be made for American property seized; that all citizens of the United States, taken in war, should be treated as prisoners of war, and not as slaves, but held subject to an exchange without ransom. After concluding this treaty, he proceeded to Tunis, where he obtained indemnity for the outrages exercised or permitted by the bashaw. Thence he went to Tripoli, where he made a similar demand with like success, and procured the release of 10 captives, Danes and Neapolitans. He arrived in the United States Nov. 12, 1815, was subsequently appointed one of the board of navy commissioners, and was residing at Washington, in that capacity, when he was killed in a duel with commodore Barron, March 22, 1820, occasioned by his animadversions on the conduct of the latter. Courage, sagacity, energy, self-possession, and a high sense of honour, were the characteristic traits of Decatur. From his boyhood, he was remarkable for the qualities which presage eminence in naval warfare. He enjoyed the sea as his element. He possessed an active, muscular frame, a quick penetrating eye, and a bold, adventurous and ambitious spirit.

MISCELLANY.

NAUTICAL.

We are indebted to the Cambridge Chronicle for the following humorous extract from the Bombay Courier, which will, we think, be of marvellous assistance to naval officers who frequent balls; it is a nautical arrangement of the figures of the fashionable quadrilles.

Le Pantaloon.—Haul upon your starboard tack, let the other craft pass, then bear up, and get your head on the other tack, regain your berth on the larboard tack, back and fill with your partner, box-haul her, wear round twice against the sun in company with the opposite craft and your own, afterwards box-haul her again and bring up.

L'Ete.—Shoot a head about two fathoms till you nearly come stern on to the other craft under weight then make a stern board to your berth, side out for a bend, first to starboard and then to port, make sail and pass the other craft, get your head round on the other tack, another side to starboard and port, make sail to regain your berth, wear round, back and fill and box-haul your partner.

Le Poule.—Heave ahead and pass your adversary, yard-arm and yard-arm, regain your berth on the other tack in the same order, take your stations in the line, with your partner, back and fill, fall on your heel; and bring up with your partner, she then manœuvres ahead, heaves all aback, shoots ahead again, and pays off alongside; you then make sail in company with her, till nearly stern with the other line, make a stern board, and cast her off to shift for herself, regain your berth by the best means in your power, and let go your anchor.

Le Trenise.—Wear round as before against the sun twice, box-haul the lady, range up alongside her and make sail in company, when half way across to the other shore drop astern with the tide, shoot and cast off the tow, now back and fill as before, and box-haul her and yourself into your berth and bring up.

La Pastorale.—Shoot ahead along side of your partner, make a stern board, make all sail over to the other coast, let go the hawser and pay off into your berth and take a turn; the three crafts opposite range up abreast towards you twice and back astern again; now manœuvre any rig you like, only under easy sail, as it is always a light wind (zephyrs as they call it) in this passage; as soon as you see their helms down, haul round in company with them on your larboard tack and make all sail with your partner into your own berth and bring up.

La Finale.—Wear round to starboard passing under your partner's stern, sight the catheads of the craft on your starboard bow, then make sail into your berth, your partner passing athwart your bows; now proceed according to the second order of sailing, to complete the evolutions, shoot ahead and back astern twice in company with the whole squadron in circular order for sailing.

THE MIND.

As is the heart to the animal constitution, so is mind the vital impulse of the universe—the wonderful organ of all its complicated mechanism; its glory and its terrors. Confined corporeal in fetters, yet free as the air of heaven—knowing all things, yet unknown—perceiving all, yet unseen—creating all, yet uncreated—the everlasting fountain of all earth's misery, and its happiness—the arbiter of human destiny—the invisible chain which links us with the present past and future. Centreing in the Eternal, it encircles all intelligent existence, and binds it to the throne of God. How infinite in capacity! how vast in conception! how mighty in its energies! how terrible in its darkness! Every grain of the animal creation, every agent of nature bows to its supremacy. Without it, Earth is but a rayless and eternal prison-house, and man a mere animated machine—a living mass of corruption—a fettered slave—a moving sepulchre. By this alone he is constituted lord of the visible creation and lifted away from this dark world, into a higher and holier existence—a heavenly communion. By this he can bind the very elements to his will, and wield the collected energies of millions. He can develop the hidden mysteries of nature and analyze the intricate combinations of matter and motion. He can trace the courses of the planets, and condense to a point the remote events of empires and of centuries. By this he can roll the ocean upon the land, or bring up treasures from their depths. By this he can ride upon the wing of the storm or grasp the lightning that plays around Jehovah's footstool. At its bidding, the forest falls, and the gorgeous fabric lifts itself to the skies. At its bidding the sleeping statue springs from its marble bed, and the canvass glows with the splendors of earth and of heaven. What darkness is too profound for its research? what summit too lofty for its aspiration? what visions of blackness or of light does it spread before the eye of memory and of fancy? what soaring plume does it lend to genius? It can wander through all time and through all space. It can stretch back into the remotest past, and expand itself into eternal ages. How increased its power—how triumphant its bliss, when the fetters which dog its progression shall be stricken off, and the redeemed and unchained spirit may struggle upward and onward forever.

A QUAKER WOMAN'S SERMON.

Dear Friends—There are three things I very much wonder at: The first is that children should be so foolish as to throw up stones, brick bats and clubs into fruit trees to knock down the fruit; if they would let it alone it would fall itself. The second is that, men should be so foolish and even so wicked, as to go to war and kill one another, if they would only let one another alone, they would die of themselves. And the third and last thing, which I wonder at most of all is, that young men should be so unwise as to go after the young women; if they would only stay at home the young women would come after them.

One of the best bargains in ancient times was the exchange of Glaucus with Diomedes. The latter gave his suit of brass armor for one of gold.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, JUNE 4, 1831.

HARPER'S FAMILY LIBRARY—NO. XX.—History of Chivalry and the Crusades. By G. R. James, Esq. author of 'Richelieu,' 'Darnley,' 'De L'Orme,' &c. vol. 1. pp. 342.

We very much doubt whether the Mesars. HARPER have recently presented to their numerous patrons, a work possessing greater attractions, or one that has been received with more pleasure, and read with greater interest than the little volume before us. Everything connected with the subjects of which it treats seems to possess an interest peculiar to itself. The histories of Chivalry and the Crusades are kindred subjects; belonging to one great epoch of the world, and one constitution of society.—The materials of which both are composed, are drawn from the same great storehouse of chronicle and legend.—Until the appearance of Mills' 'History of Chivalry; or Knighthood and its Times,' the knowledge of the institution of Chivalry, was extremely limited, at least in this country. The common reader knew but little of its true character—he knew it only as he had learned it from the pages of fiction, or found it scattered, in detached parts, through the more ponderous volumes of history. And as for a history of the Crusades, prior to the appearance of Mills', it was indeed, so far as we were acquainted, rara avis in terris. One could hardly be had for love or money. We do not wish to be understood as saying that this history had never before been written; for it had. We believe, however, that it had never been reprinted in this country—we had never met with an American reprint. Mills' work was therefore received with great satisfaction, and met with a ready sale. But it was comprised in two large octavo volumes. Many who were anxious to possess it, could not afford the expense. The present work obviates that objection, and therefore we anticipate for it an extensive demand.

There is some difference of opinion among authors respecting the origin of Chivalry. But to whatever source its origin may be traced, it produced a considerable change in the manners and sentiments of the great.—Whatever may have been the abuses of the institution, and they have been much exaggerated; if its members were not so pure as its precepts, we must nevertheless respect it for its unquestionable utility. It threw grace over the ruggedness of barbarism, tempered the ferocity of rude man, and dignified the loveliness of woman; seconded the charities of religion, and nourished the charities of life. It has inspired those sentiments of generosity, sympathy and friendship, which have contributed so much to the civilization of the world; and has introduced that principle of honor which often checks the licentious, when moral and religious considerations would be ineffectual. When Chivalry made its appearance, the moral and political condition of Europe was deplorable. Religion existed only in name. A degraded superstition had usurped its place and threatened ruin to the reason and dignity of man.—The political rights of the feeble were sacrificed to the interests of the more powerful. War was conducted with fiendish ferocity and savage cruelty; no clemency was shown to the vanquished; no humanity to the captive. Woman—lovely woman, heaven's last best gift—was doomed to the most laborious occupations and vilest servitude. She was deserted and despised by that very sex, as whose protection and sympathy she had a natural claim. To put a stop to these disorders—to elevate woman to her natural rank—a few intelligent and pious men formed an association, whose members swore to defend the Christian religion, to practice its morals, to protect the widow, the orphan, and the gentler sex; and to decide judicially, and not by arms, the disputes that might arise about their goods or effects. To this association some learned writers have attributed the origin of Chivalry; while others have traced it to the public investiture of arms, customary among the ancient Germans. But hear our author:

'The first point required of the aspirants to Chivalry, in its earliest state, was a solemn vow, 'To speak the truth, to succour the helpless and oppressed, and never to turn back from an enemy.—James.

'Charlemagne expired like a meteor that, having broken suddenly upon the night of ages, and blazed brilliantly over a whole world for a brief space, fell and left all in darkness, even deeper than before. His dominions divided into petty kingdoms—his successors waging long and inveterate wars against each other—the nations he had subdued shaking off the yoke—the enemies he had conquered avenging themselves upon his descendants—the laws he had established forgotten or annulled—the union he had cemented scattered to the wind—in a lamentably brief space of time, the bright order which his great mind had established throughout Europe was dissolved. Each individual, who, either by corporeal strength, advantageous position, wealth or habit, could influence the minds of others, snatched at that portion of the divided empire which lay nearest to his means, and claimed that power as a gift which had only been intrusted as a loan. The custom of holding lands by military service had come down to the French from their German ancestors, and the dukes, the marquises, the counts, as well as the whole herd of inferior officers, who in former days had led the armies, or commanded in the provinces as servants of the crown, now arrogated to themselves hereditary rights in the charges to which they had been intrusted; and, in their own behalf, claimed the feudal service of those soldiers to whom land had been granted, instead of preserving their allegiance for their sovereigns. The weak monarchs, who still retained the name of kings, engaged in ruinous wars with each other and in vain attempts to repel the invasions of the Northmen or Normans, first tolerated these encroachments, because they had at the time no power of resisting, and then gradually recognised them as rights, upon the condition that those who committed them should assist the sovereign in his wars, and acknowledge his title in preference to that of any of his competitors.

Thus gradually rose the feudal system from the wrecks of Charlemagne's great empire. But still all was unstable and unconfirmed, the limits of the different powers in the state undecided and variable, till the war of Paris, the incompetency of the successors of Charlemagne, and the elevation of Hugues Capet, the Count of Paris, to the throne, showed the barons the power they had acquired, and crowned the feudal compact by the creation of a king whose title was found in it alone.

Great confusion, however, existed still. The authority of the sovereign extended but a few leagues round Paris; the Normans ravaged the coast; the powerful and the wicked had no restraint imposed upon their actions, and the weak were every where oppressed and wronged.—Bands of plunderers raged through the whole of France and Germany, property was held by the sword, cruelty and injustice reigned alone, and the whole history of that age offers a complete medley of massacre, bloodshed, torture, crime, and misery.

Personal outrage, however, had been raised to the highest pitch by the very absence of every thing like security. Valour was a necessity and a habit, and Eudes and his companions, who defended Paris against the Normans, would have come down as demigods to the present day, if they had but possessed a Homer to sing their deeds.—The very Normans themselves, with their wild enthusiasm and their supernatural daring, their political traditions, and magnificent superstitions, seemed to bring a new and extraordinary light into the very lands they desolated. The plains teemed with murder, and the rivers flowed with blood; but the world was weary of barbarity, and a reacting spirit of order was born from the very bosom of confusion.

It was then that some poor nobles, probably suffering themselves from the oppression of more powerful lords, but at the same time touched with sincere compassion for the wretchedness they saw around them, first leagued together with the holy purpose of redressing wrongs and defending the weak. They gave their hands to one another in pledge that they would not turn back from the work and called upon St. George to bless their righteous cause. The church readily yielded its sanction to an institution so noble, aided it with prayers, and sanctified it with a solemn blessing. Religious enthusiasm became added to noble indignation and charitable zeal, and the spirit of Chivalry, like the flame struck forth from the hard steel and the dull flint, was kindled into sudden light by the savage rudely of the nobles, and the heavy barbarity of the people.

The spirit spread rapidly, and the adoration of the populace, who almost deified their heroic defenders, gave both fresh vigor and purity to the design. Every moral virtue became a part of knightly honor, and the men whose hands were ever ready to draw the sword in defence of innocence—who in their own conduct set the most brilliant example—whose sole object was the establishment of right, and over whom no earthly fear or interested consideration held sway, were readily recognised as judges, and appealed to as arbitrators. Public opinion raised them above all other men, even above kings themselves; so much so, indeed, that we find continually repeated, in the writings of the chivalrous ages, such passages as the following:—

Chevaliers sont de moult grant pris,
Ils ont de tous gens le pris,
Et le lon et le seignorie.

Thus gradually Chivalry became no longer a simple engagement between a few generous and valiant men, but took the form of a great and powerful institution; and as each knight had the right of creating others without limit, it became necessary that the new class thus established in society should be distinguished by particular signs and symbols, which would guard it against the intrusion of unworthy or disgraceful members.

There are some considerations which induce the belief that Chivalry was a branch of Freemasonry; which position is consented to by many who have made the deepest researches into the one, and who were intimately acquainted with the spirit, rites, and ceremonies of the other. The object of both institutions was the same. It is not pretended that Chivalry was Freemasonry, but that the two institutions were intimately connected; that the former took its origin from the latter, and borrowed from it, not only some of its ceremonial observances, but the leading features, and the general outline of its constitution. The points of similarity are in some cases so striking, that several learned men have affirmed that Freemasonry was a secondary order of Chivalry, and derived its origin from the usages of that institution; but they seem to have forgotten that the points of similarity, on which their argument is predicated, prove with equal force that Freemasonry is the parent of Chivalry. But it is not our object here to discuss this question. Another short extract must close our notice of this portion of the interesting work before us:

'In France, I believe, the order first took its rise, and, probably, the disgust felt by some pure minds at the gross and barbarous licentiousness of the times, infused that virtuous severity into the institutions of Chivalry which was in itself a glory. If we may give the least credit to the picture of the immorality and luxury of the French, as drawn by Abbon in his poem on the siege of Paris, no words will be found sufficient to express our admiration for the men who first undertook to combat not only the tyranny but the vices of their age; who singly went forth to war against crime, injustice, and cruelty: who defied the whole world in defence of innocence, virtue, and truth; who stemmed the torrent of barbarity and evil; and who, from the wrecks of ages, and the ruins of empires, drew out a thousand jewels to glitter in the star that shone upon the breast of knighthood.

For long the Christian religion had struggled alone, a great but shaded light through the storms of dark and barbarous ages. Till Chivalry arose there was nothing to uphold it; but from that moment, with a champion in the field to lead forth the knowledge that had been imprisoned in the cloister, the influence of religion began to spread and increase. Though worldly men thereunto attached the aggrandizement of their own temporal power, and knaves and villains made it the means of their avarice, or the cloak of their vice, still the influence of the divine truth itself gradually wrought upon the hearts of men, purifying, calming, refining, till the world grew wise enough to separate the perfection of the Gospel from the weakness of its teachers, and to reject the errors while they retained the power of the Roman church.

In the mean time Chivalry stood forth the most glorious institution that man himself ever devised. In its youth and in its simplicity, it appeared grand and beautiful, both from its own intrinsic excellence, and from its contrast with the things around. In its after-years it acquired pomp and luxury; and to pomp and luxury naturally succeeded decay and death; but still the legacy that it left behind it to posterity was a treasure of noble feelings and generous principles.

There cannot be a doubt that Chivalry, more than any other institution (except religion) aided to work out the civilization of Europe. It first taught devotion and reverence to those weak, fair beings, who but in their beauty and their gentleness have no defence. It first raised love above the passions of the brute, and by dignifying woman, made woman worthy of love. It gave purity to enthusiasm, crushed barbarous selfishness, taught the heart to expand like a flower to the sunshine, beautified glory with generosity, and smoothed even the rugged brow of war.

For the mind, as far as knowledge went, Chivalry itself did little; but by its influence it did much. For the heart it did every thing; and there is scarcely a noble feeling or a bright aspiration that we find among ourselves, or trace in the history of modern Europe; that is not in some degree referable to that great and noble principle, which has no name but the Spirit of Chivalry.

We shall hereafter notice that part of the work which relates to the Crusades, and give such extracts as we believe will be acceptable to our readers. In the mean time, we would recommend the work as highly interesting and worthy of a conspicuous place in every private library. Our friends of the order of Knights Templars will be much interested by it, and to them we particularly recommend it. Humanity, polished courtesy, and the refinement of the present day, owe much to the code of chivalric observances.

ABOLITION OF MASONRY.

The Duchess County Intelligencer says that there is a proposition on foot which has the approbation of the Masons in that county, for effecting the entire abolition of Masonry in New York, by dissolving the Grand Chapter and Lodge, and by closing all the Lodges and burning their charters. The New York Commercial Advertiser approves the plan, and recommends that the Grand Lodge of the State which is to assemble in a few days, will entirely dissolve that body.

If there be such a proposition on foot, it never originated with nor is it sanctioned by the members of the Masonic Institution, in 'Duchess County.' We know the Masons of that county too well to believe any such thing. They would as soon surrender their liberties; their birthrights—and they will surrender them only at the point of the bayonet. There is too much ancient Dutch blood in them, to succumb to the proscriptive mandates of any intolerant political faction. No, no!—the Masons of old Duchess are not cravens—they will not be used as cats' paws to scrape the nuts out of any political fire, even though it be to satisfy the taste of an eminent political epicure. It strikes us that the projectors of this 'proposition' have been rather unfortunate in the selection of a location. Duchess county has escaped, in a great measure, the curse of antimasonry. At least, it is more free from it than any other county in the State of New York. Had one of the upper counties, that has been racked and torn to pieces by contention and anarchy, been selected, we could more readily credit the report. It is not usual for men to give up their civil and constitutional rights without a struggle. Duchess has not yet made that struggle—when she has, it will be time enough to talk of her 'approbating the entire abolition of Masonry.'

William Stone of the New-York Commercial Advertiser approves the plan. William Stone is a politician—he is an Antimason. Masons have long since cast him off as base coin. What importance then attaches to his approval or disapproval of any measures touching the Institution of Masonry? Thurloe Weed approved of the 'entire abolition' of whiskers! but whiskers are not abolished. Nor will Masonry be, though William Stone 'approves the plan.' Stone approved of Masonry, so long as his interest was to be promoted by it, and he would still approve of it could he convert it into an engine for the advancement of his political views. 'This he cannot do; and therefore desires its 'entire abolition.' But he may be assured that the Lodges have no idea of 'burning their charters.' They value them too highly to make that use of them, though certain political interests might be advanced thereby.

The political managers at this time have a difficult hand to play: the cards must be managed with consummate skill, or they lose the game. They must not hope to succeed through the sacrifice of Masonry—they must not attempt to rise on the ruins of the liberties of any portion of the community. It is rank folly to suppose that antimasonry will die, though Masonry be abolished. It has become an organized political party, and will exist so long as there are depraved political demagogues enough to sustain it. At present there is no want of such materials. The Lodges of Monte county tried the experiment—two years ago—they surrendered their charters and ceased to meet. The excitement was not allayed—it rather increased; and Masons were abused as cowards and sycophants for surrendering their legal rights. The act was seized upon as evidence of their guilt! The infernal spirit raged with tenfold more fury than before! Antimasonry is not to be put down in this way. And if it be, are Masons prepared to surrender their liberties to appease the fury of a gang of base political knaves? Heaven forbid.

LIBRARY OF SELECT NOVELS.—Messrs. J. & J. HARPER, New-York, have just commenced the publication of a series of works of fiction, under this title. We have been politely favored with the 1st and 2d Nos. comprising the well told story of the 'Youth and Manhood of Cyril Thornton,' by Hamilton. It is a novel of the first water, and those who have never read it, and are fond of fictitious compositions,—which like every other pleasure if not immoderately indulged in, are not only very pleasant, but often productive of good effect,—had better procure it forthwith. It is got up in elegant style, and offered on very reasonable terms. The 3d and 4th Nos. of the series will consist of an original American Tale, by JAMES K. PAULDING, Esq. entitled 'The Dutchman's Fireside.'

There is much truth and good sense in the following remark from a notice attached to the work before us: 'Were novels of every kind, the good as well as the bad, the striking and animated not less than the puerile, liable to the charge of enfeebling or perverting the mind; and were there no qualities in any which might render them instructive as well as amusing—the universal acceptance which they have ever received, and still continue to receive, from all ages and classes of men, would prove an irresistible incentive to their production. The remonstrances of moralists and the reasonings of philosophy have ever been, and will still be found, unavailing against the desire to partake of an enjoyment so attractive. Men will read novels; [and so will girls,] therefore the utmost that wisdom and philanthropy can do is to cater prudently for the public appetite, and, as it is hopeless to attempt the exclusion of fictitious writings from the shelves of the library, to see that they are encumbered with the least possible number of such as have no other merit than that of novelty.' It is with this view that the publication of 'The Library of Select Novels,' is undertaken; and as it will embrace none but such as have received the impress of general approbation, or have been written by authors of established character, we think the reader will unite with us in wishing the publishers a generous patronage.

MASONRY IN ALABAMA.—A correspondent in Washington, Ala. writes that notwithstanding the persecution, slander and abuse of antimasonry, the Institution is prospering in that State. And by the proceedings of the Grand Lodge, we perceive that a petition has been presented praying for the institution of a Lodge at Montgomery Hill, under the name of Clinton Lodge. A Grand Lodge has been established in Florida, and acknowledged by the G. L. of Alabama. Measures are about to be taken for the erection of a new Hall for the accommodation of the last named G. Lodge; the officers of which are Thomas B. Creagh, G. M.; Wm. J. Mason, D. G. M.; Wm. Leigh, S. W.; Richard B. Walthall, J. W.; Rev. Hugh McPhail, Chaplain; James Penn, G. L.; Benj. B. Fontaine, G. T.; John G. Aikin, S.; John Craig, S. D.; Doric S. Ball, J. D.

[Our correspondent is informed that the private note about which he inquires, was duly received and attended to. We trust he has our answer before this.]

MR. RUSH'S LETTER.—We commence to-day the publication of a review of Mr. Rush's letter, to which we invite the attention of our readers. And we would respectfully request those editors who have given insertion to Mr. R.'s letter, to give place to the reply also. The request is we think a reasonable one, and such as they cannot object to—if they would do justice to an injured and much abused association.

FALSE REPORT.—Mr. Palfrey, editor of the Salem Register, and member of the House of Representatives, now in session in this city, in a letter to his agent dated Wednesday afternoon, has the following unwarrantable remark:

It is reported this morning that the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts have agreed to relinquish their charter and to dispose of their new edifice in this city for other purposes. The report, we understand is premature, but such a measure is in contemplation!!!

The report is not only premature, but there is not even the shadow of truth to justify it. Mr. Palfrey might have informed himself correctly on this point, had he been so disposed. He seems to speak from his own knowledge, when he says, 'such a measure is in contemplation.' Will he favour us with his authority? No such measure is in contemplation. The whole report is a base fabrication, contrived by men whose occupation is the coining of lies and the circulation of scandal. As a matter of justice, Mr. Palfrey will, of course, correct the error into which his too easy credulity has led him.

MASONIC CELEBRATION.—The anniversary of St. John the Baptist will be celebrated by Leicester Lodge in Leicester, on the 24th June next. The neighboring Encampments, Chapters, Lodges, and Brethren, generally, are respectfully invited to attend. An address may be expected on the occasion.

Mr. Joseph Spafford, of Weatherfield, Vt. was burnt to death at the house of Edmund Durrin, in Springfield on the 23d inst. by his bed-clothes taking fire; by what accident the fire was communicated is not stated. The deceased was a very worthy man, in the 62d year of his age.

It has been ascertained that hydrophobia may be communicated by means of the saliva on bites taken from animals who have died of that terrible disorder. Travelers should observe the greatest caution, in this matter, at a time when rabid animals are about.

Markley, the inhuman wretch who first murdered and then burned up the family of a Mr. Newey in Pennsylvania, consisting of six persons, has been convicted of murder in the first degree.

Messrs. Livingston, the newly appointed Secretary of State, and Woodbury, Secretary of the Navy, have entered upon the duties of their respective departments.

The New-York Courier says, the meaning of Dzibitsch, when translated, is said to be 'thief, or thief-taker.' He went to steal the liberty of Poland; but the Poles are good thief-catchers, and sent their Old Hays [Skrynecki] after him. It is probable that the next arrivals will bring us accounts of his capture.

Errata.—In the letter 'To Richard Rush, Esq.' in our last, 2d col. 4th line for 'unproven' read 'improved'—12th line, for 'promotion' read 'formation'—5th line from bottom, for 'sufferers' read 'supporters'—Emphatic Calvinism and Calvinistic, for Hopkinsianism and Hopkinsian, and the historical allusion will be more correct.

MASONIC FESTIVAL.

The nativity of St. John the Baptist will be celebrated at Hardwick, Mass. on the 24th of June next, by King Hiram's Royal Arch Chapter, joined by Mount Zion Lodge. The neighboring Encampments, Chapters and Lodges, and the brethren, generally, are respectfully invited to attend, wearing their jewels and appropriate clothing. An address will be delivered by Rev. Ezekiel L. BASCOM. The procession will form at the Hall of C. Ruggles, at 11 o'clock A. M.; by whom suitable refreshments will be provided.

Tickets, for gentlemen $1, for ladies 50 cents each. By order of the Committee.

GARDNER RUGGLES.

THE WREATH.

[From 'Bell's Summer and Winter Hours.']

I loved thee till I knew
That thou hadst loved before,
Then love to coldness grew,
● And passion's reign was o'er;
What care I for the lip,
Ruby although it be,
If-another once might sip
Those sweets now given to me?
What care I for the glance of soft affection full
If for another it once beamed as beautiful?

That ringlet of dark hair—
'T was worth a miser's store;
It was a spell 'gainst care
That next my heart I wore;
But if another once
Could boast as fair a prize,
My ringlet I renounce,
'T is worthless in my eyes;
I envy not the smiles in which a score may bask—
I value not the gift which all may have who ask.

A maiden heart give me,
That locked and sacred lay,
Though tried by many a key
That ne'er could find the way,
Till I, by gentler art,
Touched the long-hidden spring.
And found that maiden heart
In beauty glittering—
Amidst its herbage buried like a flower,
Or like a bird that sings deep in its leafy bower.

No more shall sigh of mine
Be heaved for what is past:
Take back that gift of thine,
It was the first—the last.
Thou mayst not love him now
So fondly as thou didst,
But shall a broken vow
Be prized because thou bidst—
Be welcomed as the love for which my soul doth long?
No, lady! love ne'er sprang out of deceit and wrong.

MORNING SONG.

[BY ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.]

Oh, come! for the lily
Is white on the lea;
Oh, come! for the wood-doves
Are paired on the tree;
The lark sings with dew
On her wings and her feet;
The thrush pours its ditty
Loud, varied, and sweet.
We will go where the twin hares
'Mid fragrance have been,
And with flowers I'll weave thee
A crown like a queen.

Oh, come! hear the throistle
Invites you aloud;
And soft comes the plover's cry
Down from the cloud:
The stream lifts its voice,
And yon lily's begun
To open its lips
And drink dew in the sun;
The sky laughs in light,
Earth rejoices in green—
Oh, come! and I'll crown thee
With flowers like a queen!

Oh, haste! for the shepherd
Hath wakened his pipe,

And led out his lambs
Where the blackberry's ripe—
The bright sun is tasting
The dew on the thyme—
The gay maiden's liting
An old bridal rhyme—
There is joy in the heaven
And gladness on earth—
So come to the sunshine,
And mix in the mirth!

MISCELLANY.

THE POLES.

In 1778.—Who (says the Prince de Ligne,) would not feel an affection for Poland, the Poles, and above all the Polish women? Who would not admire the wit and courage of the men, and the grace and beauty of the women? The manners of the Polish ladies are more equally fascinating than those of all others. To prefer another city to Warsaw is impossible. There you find the most refined ton of Paris allied with oriental manners; the good taste of Europe and the magnificence of Asia united; the politeness of the most civilized society, with the plain, unaffected hospitality of barbarous nations. Who would not admire a people whose external appearance is universally noble and prepossessing, and whose manners, though plain and unassuming, are polite and cordial? In the cities you meet with good breeding and urbanity everywhere; and in the country a good natured roughness prevails. The comprehension of the Poles are quick, their conversation light and agreeable, and their education has made them possessors of every talent. They have the gift of languages, are deeply read in general literature, elegant and accomplished. Their taste in everything is highly cultivated, they are admirers of fine arts, passionately fond of fetes and private theatricals, and of their national dancing. Their dress is original, some of their customs extraordinary, their style of living magnificent. They are good and open hearted, and very gratefully inclined. My own admiration of them is unlimited.

FAITH.

"Children," says Cecil, are capable of very early impressions. I imprinted on my daughter the idea of faith, at a very early age. She was playing one day with a few beads, which seemed wonderfully to delight her. Her whole soul was absorbed in her beads. I said, "My dear, you have some pretty beads there!" "Yes papa." "And you seem vastly pleased with them." "Well now throw them behind the fire." The tears started in her eyes, she looked earnestly at me, as if she ought to have a reason for so cruel a sacrifice. "Well, my dear, do as you please; but you know I never told you to do anything which I did not think would be for your good; she looked at me a moment longer, summoned up all her fortitude, her breast heaving with the effort, she dashed them into the fire. "Well!" said I, "there let them lie; you shall hear more about it another time; but say no more of them now." Some days after, I bought her a box full of larger beads and toys of the same kind. When I returned home, I opened the treasure, and set it before her; she burst into tears with excessive joy. "These, my child," said I, "are yours, because you believed me when I told you to throw those paltry beads behind the fire; your obedience has brought you this treasure.

WILLIAM HENRY CLARK, PRINTER.

[Original.]

TO HON. RICHARD RUSH.

'In saying that recent disclosures have shown the dangers of Masonry in the United States, let us see if I am not right. I desire to be guided by facts, and to look at them rigorously. Your inquiries are broad, and should be met broadly—but facts shall be my basis, and I wish to deal with them practically, as I have really beheld them. You apply to me as citizens, taking an actual part in the affairs around you. I am to answer you in that capacity, and as a member of the same community.

The public all know, that certain trials have been held from time to time in the state of New York, for the discovery of the authors of the abduction and murder of William Morgan. Against this man's liberty and life, an extensive and formidable conspiracy had been laid, which ended in the destruction of both. He was a native of Virginia, and had removed into New York. It was there, it seems, that he committed a certain offence, not against the laws of his country, but the Code of Masonry; namely, that of revealing its secrets; and this is the offence for which he is made to suffer death. The conspirators neither laid against him, nor pretended any other. The case is therefore purely Masonic in its origin and termination. There is nothing extraneous to embarrass the judgment or lead away the thoughts.

When I remark, that the public all know of the trials, I mean that they have heard of them, generally; for I do not believe, that one person in fifty knows anything more about them. I have followed up the account of them, as far as I have had the means; and especially those that have taken place at Lockport, within the last few months. I have done so in no prejudiced spirit, but with an earnest desire to understand the whole case rightly. They appear to me, to unfold one of the most extraordinary incidents that has ever transpired. All the circumstances considered, I know not where we shall seek for its counterpart. It is seen from these trials, that the laws of the land cannot be executed upon the authors of an audacious and bloody conspiracy, although its entire theatre was in one of the most populous parts of the union, although attempts have been made to enforce them in all practicable ways, for a period now exceeding four years, although the government of the state of New York, has aided, by its immediate countenance and direction, the public prosecutions, besides having issued commissions of special investigation; and, what is more astonishing than all, although the conspirators, with their aiders and abettors, are, in all probability, known to more than one hundred persons belonging to the Masonic body, if not to a larger number. That they are certainly known to a great many Masons, if to fewer than one hundred, is plain, from lights that must bring conviction home to every dispassionate and sound mind.

Such is the case as it meets us on the threshold. It is startling. Under a government of laws, and in a season of tranquillity, it must be pronounced an anomaly. It seems a scandal upon the trial by jury, upon the public examination of witnesses, upon our forms of presentment and indictment, upon the power of commitment for not answering legal questions, upon all the modes heretofore the boast of our judicature, for getting at the truth; all of which have been, so earnestly, solemnly, yet fruitlessly resorted to. Amidst the din of arms we are told, indeed, that the laws become silent; but that they should so totally lose their authority, at a period of profound peace and general good order, as they have done on this occasion, must arise, from some extraordinary and portentous cause. The victory of crime is the opprobrium of the law, and should call forth a spirit of determined inquiry into the cause.

It has been said, that the human bosom is not strong enough to hold the secret of a foul murder. So heavily does it press, that the stoutest heart gives way, seeking relief in the gush of its sin. Hitherto, also, in proportion as the knowledge of the fact of murder has been shared by large numbers of people, has been the ease, the promptitude, we may add, the certainty of detection. But in Morgan's case we behold the frightful reverse. It stands, in this respect, alone, in the records of criminal jurisprudence. The law books of ancient and modern times, might safely be invoked for a precedent. The difficulty of keeping the secret of a murder, operated as some safeguard over innocent life. It served in some degree to deter the murderer himself, by making him shrink from the fear of his own thoughts afterwards, and to obstruct his fell plans, from the like fear keeping away accomplices. As by stripes, the flesh is made to quiver, so the whips and stings of remorse, lacerate the heart. They are internal executioners, from whose torture the guilty cannot escape. But here, we behold this safeguard of life put to scorn, one seated in the very conscience of man, and which nothing but the most baleful potions, administered as if by infernals, could ever extirpate.—Every sober minded citizen, will be anxious to arrive at the solution of this phenomenon. If a train of evidence altogether irresistible in its direct or circumstantial application, force upon his mind the belief, that its entire and complicated horror, is clearly traceable to the confederated and unholy contrivances of bad men who are Masons, all his right feeling as a citizen must be shocked. He must stand confounded, at seeing human life and liberty so sported with, by a power the more tremendous in its victory over the laws as it rides in darkness. Good men who are Masons, will turn from such conduct with abhorrence. Candid men of the society, on hearing the relation of it, may be disposed to ask themselves, whether all the benefits of Masonry, alleged or real, can be a counterpoise for the perils which may thus spring from it, through deluded or depraved zealots, who gain admittance to its sanctuary; and who effectually silence compunction under iniquity, by flying to the misunderstood or perverted ties and obligations of the craft.'

It seems to be a prominent part of your design to make men believe you honest, and scrupulously careful to be guided by nothing but facts. And this is in perfect accordance with the principles of human nature. The weak points of a man may be known by his special fortifications; because he knows his own weakness, he thinks that others see it. But like an absolute monarch, you are ready to make facts, when they are not found suited to your purpose. One would have supposed, had you not expressed to the contrary, that your main design was to see how far you could pervert and misrepresent them. But you have said it, and truly Richard Rush is an honorable man! his facts must be facts, even if opposed by truth.

You assume the ground, that Wm. Morgan was murdered by the Masons, (you say, as will hereafter be seen, by 'bad Masons') for revealing the secrets of Masonry. That the 'case is purely Masonic in its origin and termination.'

Pardon me for speaking the truth—this foundation is false! and when I say it is false let not the lie return to insult our honesty. If men who were Masons, abducted or murdered a man by the name of Wm.

Morgan, let them be searched out and punished to the utmost rigor of the laws. Masonry urges the justice as much as the laws require it. What were the acts of Masonry officially, in relation to this affair? Read for yourself.

'The following preamble and resolution were adopted by the Grand Chapter, State of New York, at their Communication in 1827.

'Whereas, the rights of personal liberty and security are guaranteed by the free constitution under which we, the members of this Grand Chapter, in common with the rest of our fellow citizens, have the happiness to live: and whereas, we esteem the preservation of these rights of vital importance to the perpetuity and full enjoyment of the blessings of our republican institutions: and whereas, the community has lately witnessed a violation of the same, under the alleged pretext of the Masonic name and sanction, in the case of Wm. Morgan: and whereas, the principles of our ancient and honorable fraternity, contain nothing which in the slightest degree justify or authorize such proceedings; but on the contrary, do in all their tenets and ceremonies, encourage and inculcate a just submission to the laws, the enjoyment of equal rights by every individual, and a high and elevated spirit of personal as well as national independence:

Therefore, Resolved, By this Grand Chapter, that we its members, individually and as a body, do disclaim all knowledge or approbation of the said proceedings in relation to the abduction of the said Wm. Morgan; and that we disapprove of the same as a violation of the majesty of the laws, and an infringement of the rights of personal liberty, secured to every citizen of our free and happy republic.'

Do you say that this Preamble and Resolution amount to nothing, because they come from Masons?—Then all your assertions amount to nothing, because they come from a man! If you can point to a Mason who loves not the truth, to every such member I can bring fifty men, who are not to be believed; and thus the argument of this kind and quality is against you. DeWitt Clinton, at the head of the institution in the United States, was unremitting in his exertions to detect and punish the offenders.

But in the name of common sense and decency, why do you visit every member of the Institution with a crime, which meets with their disapprobation as well as yours? You think it very probable that the abduction of Morgan was known to one hundred persons, (out of two hundred thousand in the United States!) and conclude, all 'startling' with astonishment, that the case must be a perfect 'anomaly'!!! That some crime has been committed, nobody knows exactly what, or where, and every possible investigation is altogether fruitless in giving light upon the subject.

Was there never a murder without a criminal? Are not cases of wickedness occurring every day, which are veiled in mystery and the authors unknown? You know it to be so, therefore admit the fact, if you are 'desirous to be guided by facts.' Yet you assert with an assurance worthy of actual knowledge, that this case is 'AN ANOMALY'!!! Have not the laws tried and sentenced to punishment all that can be proved guilty of any participation in the deed? This is more light than hundreds of other cases of the most atrocious character have ever received! Even in sight of your own residence was there not the murder of the unfortunate Wells 16 years ago? and nothing of the deed known to this day, only that he was murdered for his money! and yet this case, which admits of no certainty, 'is a perfect anomaly!'

Because you cannot get from the Masonic body information which it does not possess, you wonder at its power, you startle at its operations, and like a huge bear that has lost her cub, skulk and growl at every Mason as she does at every man that passes in her path. No! the persecuting gang of antimasons may thank themselves, for the frustration of justice. Instead of asking the co-operation of Masons, as men, they accused them, one and all, as murderers. Instead of investigating the evil where it originated, they scattered their firebrands over the country. Instead of quenching the fire that the smoke might be dispelled—they scattered it and enveloped day in all the darkness of night. They abused the harmless and accused the innocent. They prostrated confidence, and then, with a damnable hypocrisy, asked for its favors.—They branded the fraternity as devoted to falsehood, and then asked for its truth. They called for information, and cast it beneath their rottenness, as false. They imagined lies, and conjured Freemasons, in the name of religion and all that is good, to swear to them! Base politicians, willing to ride into power at any expense, joined in the general din of disgraceful detraction, and are now as busy in executing and fabricating lies as their subordinates are in circulating them.

Is this the way to justice? Is this the mode which our Saviour pointed out, for the redress of wrongs! If so, I pray God to sink me to the regions of forgetfulness and blot out all the records of memory. I turn your words upon yourself and your party; they originated where they were most needed. If God ever permitted 'unholy contrivances' to exist in this earth, he has fixed the curse upon the members of your party. If there be a deed of wickedness, yet undone, (by antimasons) it is not because their wishes did not reach it, but that their sagacity and power were not equal to its attainment. What they have not done they have threatened, and what they have not threatened, happened not to come within the scope of their knowledge. In this general assertion I will have charity to except the honest dupes of the party. For them, seriously, I entertain the profoundest pity.

For what cause do you introduce this sentence, that 'Good men who are Masons, will turn from such conduct with abhorrence.' What does it mean? We know and acknowledge the truth of the sentence for ourselves, but in your hands what does it mean? You talk about the 'frightful reverses,' 'consciences put to scorn,' 'baleful potions administered by infernals,' 'complicated horror,' 'unholy contrivances,' and the 'tremendous power' of Masons, and in the next breath, as though conscious of your injustice, you say, that good men who are Masons, will turn from such conduct, (which is their own) with abhorrence! But do you add that the deed was done by bad members of the society? The inconsistency fastens to your very flesh. You need not be informed, and you cannot deny, that the government of the institution is in the hands of the best and greatest of men, throughout the world, and always has been. And that no institution is chargeable with what its officers and leaders condemn in common with the rest of the community and have even denounced as antimasonic and contrary to all the laws of the order. If there does exist this 'terrifying,' 'startling,' and 'tremendous power,' you so much talk about, in the Masonic Institution, where is it invested? Is the bad members? Do the good members make laws and the bad members execute them? The 'good Masons' look with abhorrence upon the execution of the laws which they make and subscribe to? 'Abhorrence,' and enjoyment, according to our own free choice, synonymous terms—ridiculous, worse than ridiculous; it is wilful and wicked nonsense.

'If a power shrouded from the day, has been found of efficacy sufficient, to interpose a fatal obstruction to the great course of public justice where guilt has been so aggravated, are we to suppose that the mischief ends here? That it is a single, and insulated instance? It is impossible. He is weak and credulous who believes it. In the vast and active character and business of Masonry, in its close and diversified connexions with society at large, whose movements from behind its own screen it can watch and follow up at pleasure, it must happen that the streams of justice will often be tainted, on occasions less conspicuous, by the same power. A danger then exists, under the highest moral and even judicial demonstration, which ought to rivet deep attention, and awaken general alarm. Not only has the government of the State of New York lent its efforts in aid of the ordinary process of law, for detecting the culprits in this audacious conspiracy. The government of Upper Canada has stepped forward in co-operation; for it is a characteristic of the conspiracy, that there were strong suspicions of its embracing depraved members of the fraternity in that foreign jurisdiction; so extensive were believed, and on rational grounds, to have been the hideous workings of its malignant sympathies.—But all has been in vain. Executive messages, executive acts and proclamations, with the offer of executive rewards, like indictments and jury trials under special courts and judges, (for these too were added,) have all fallen to the ground. The Law is still paralyzed by a hidden agent, that continues to prove stronger than the combined force of its machinery and its ministers. The Lodge of this agent, has become its sepulchre. There it lies, a spectacle for freemen to look at.

In the whole compass of affairs to which government is subservient, there is nothing, of such transcendent importance, as the faithful and effective administration of justice between man and man, and by the body politic against public delinquents. It is of daily, unceasing, emergence. It blends itself with all the wants, duties and necessities; with all the hopes and all the dangers, that belong to the political and social condition of the world. It comes perpetually home to the immediate business and bosom of mankind, the remark so often repeated from Bacon, but which on this subject has its application in exact truth. Hume describes it as the sole end and aim of all government; and, certainly, if such an administration of justice be wanting, it is not going too far to assert, that the functions of government have stopped in a point that is vital. If we have laws without the power to give them effect we are in the condition of a people having none; which brings society to a pause. The levy of ship money, was among the causes that produced the decapitation of Charles I. and a change in the English Dynasty. The tax of three pence a pound on tea, helped to bring on our own revolution. How small such acts in themselves; yet in union with a quick and well understood spirit of public liberty, how vast their consequences throughout nations, and the posterity of nations. I fear not to say, that neither of them, were calculated to press so destructively upon the great fabric of society, as the fact before us, of a secret combination in the heart of the republic, being able to keep the laws at bay in this case of the murderers of Morgan; so long to trample upon, so long to triumph over them. The apathy prevailing under the baffled efforts to probe and fully to punish so great an enormity, is, to my mind, inexplicable, among a people watchful of their rights, and who would ever be ready, it might have been supposed, to embody the whole power of society, wherever any one of its members, however humble, was seen to be so ruthlessly struck down. Interposition should have been the more immediate and decided, as the blow was so bold and terrible; as it was given amidst concomitants so unusual, and indicative of so supreme, so insolent a contempt for the laws. If ever an event arose in the annals of any people, that should have made the whole body of the public, identical with the authority of the magistrate, by a burst of indignation and a concert of efforts, it was THIS. No other feeling ever yet kept permanently alive the spirit of public liberty, or upheld the supremacy and grandeur of the laws.—They both die as certainly under torpor, as if crushed by an open despotism. It is one of the ways in which states begin to lose their liberties. It is a deadly opiate, diffusing itself through the political system, against the instillations of which, the patriot heart should be roused by every consideration that can animate it to its highest duties.—When the magistrates are seen with the ensigns of authority powerless in their hands, an appeal is made to the inextinguishable allegiance and generous devotion which should bind every citizen to the common weal. The love of public freedom must be shown in the inviolable maintenance of individual rights. We are degenerate Republicans, we are no Republicans, otherwise.'

Not content to confine your suspicions to a case which is of itself the most undefined and the least certain in its particulars of any ever brought before this community, you act the noble and manly part of making a general accusation against the Institution. 'That this,' what? 'is a single, an insulated instance,' 'is impossible!' 'And that he is weak and credulous who believes it.' 'Because you cannot explain the mystery, which you yourselves have created and imagined, there must needs be other cases, of what? Why, as you would be thought a charitable man, MURDER, we suppose! That the Institution is one dedicated to Injustice and Murder!'

These assertions from a mad-man, would create no great surprise, but to receive them from one who runs at large in society; from one who has had the advantages of example and religious instruction; from one who is reputed to be of sane mind, and blessed with the ordinary faculties of man, can only create our utmost astonishment that such privileges could be so trampled under foot even by the most perverted and depraved principles of human nature!

Is it to be supposed that men possessed of the common dignity of nature, a proper self-respect, and a consciousness of honesty, will condescend to repel such despicable insinuations? No, never! We hurl back with a righteous vengeance the base suspicions to the vile source whence they sprung, to your own bosom, to the bosom of your own party, where there is visible and constant evidence of the 'horrid workings of malignant sympathies.' They are so wickedly grovelling in their nature that our very contempt starts back at their polluting approach.

One would suppose from your remarks that the most extensive arrangements were made for the abduction of Morgan. That not only the Masons of the United States were engaged in the conspiracy, but even the depraved members of Upper Canada. According to your own statement, which I challenge you to prove, one Mason in five thousand had knowledge of the supposed murder! and even this one a depraved member of the Institution! Wonderful! Indeed it is wonderful! even more, monstrous! In New York state there would not be more than one to ten thousand, and that one 'a bad member!' Any but those of your party, who are 'guided by facts,' would think this an enviable proportion of goodness! The holy cause of God found one in twelve a traitor! Taking your one hundred 'depraved members' and add the worthy and honorable band of seceders, and the amount of treason is of no account compared with the treason of other Institutions. Besides, the ten thousand make laws and the wicked 'one' executes them! 'Good men, it is TRUE, belong to the Institution,' but bad men CONTROL them! How natural, how perfectly in accordance it is with all our knowledge and experience!

You speak of executive messages. Had you forgotten that DeWitt Clinton offered the first reward and ordered the first investigations! Truly you are not an artist to make tools to cut your own flesh, else facts, in spite of cunning, would show more than the hems of their garments.

You obviously had some artificial excitement or physical disease when you wrote this letter, for there is a perceivable fluctuation from reason to absurdity. You had adroitness sufficient to envelope your poison in honey, that it might be palatable, and with what was universally acknowledged as wholesome to the mind, you mixed the 'midnight weeds of sin, thrice blasted, thrice infected,' and with rank and earnest hypocrisy recommended the baleful potion.

You talk of the 'levy of ship money' as the cause of the decapitation of Charles the 1st. The tax of three pence a pound on tea, 'as being one of the causes of the American Revolution,' and then add, 'How trifling such acts in themselves!' You even venture to say that the case of Morgan is of more consequence than these. And although you class it among the trifling circumstances of men, you add with a sudden impetuosity and evident madness, that 'If EVER an event arose in the annals of any people, that should have made the whole body of the public, identical with the authority of the magistrate, by a burst of indignation and a concert of efforts. It was this!—Let us see what you mean! In the first place you violate consistency; for the subject is magnified from a trifling point of a cause to a stupendous cause itself. But that's no matter, as you deal in facts, the growth is not unnatural. It seems that you consider that the event should have made the whole body of the public, identical with the authority of the magistrate, by a burst of indignation and a concert of efforts. That is, it was the duty of the people of New York, to establish that 'concert of efforts with the authority of the magistrate,' to put down Masonry, at the head of which was the magistrate himself! The people of New York in connexion with Masonry, to rise indignant to put Masonry down!

Morgan's case is no common one. It is of great and inspiring magnitude. Looked at by itself it may be called detached, or little, by those who little know how to think, or are determined not to think. But properly weighed by its principles as well as its facts, it is momentous and appalling. It is no case for County Courts. It is for the nation. That is its proper tribunal. Those who will lift up their minds to an enlarged and just conception of it, instead of keeping down to a superficial and imperfect one, will see it under a connexion indissoluble, with a train of public principles with which are interwoven the interests, the safety and the durable glory of the nation. Let the law, that sheet anchor of society, come to miss its grapple upon public felons, banded in league together by a principle that exalts their crimes into achievements of merit, and everything is exposed to wreck and dissolution. The daring and profligate nature of the conspiracy against the liberty and life of this citizen; the inflexible and malignant vigor of purpose with which, step by step, it was pursued to consummation; the cool, the systematic, the inveterate depravity of all the actors in it, have no parallel in the previous history of our country, scarcely in that of any country. I challenge the Spanish Inquisition to exceed it. I boldly invite a search into the archives of that engine of a ferocious despotism, which for four centuries in Europe crushed its unhappy victims with a vengeance so diabolical, under colour of vindicating holy church, to produce a case that goes beyond it. Morgan's immolation was in spirit, almost in form, an auto de fe. Holy Masonry found its vindicators too. The similitude is close and shocking. It should burn the cheek of every American, who contemplates it. The iron clamps that were probably prepared for the feet and hands of Morgan, aptly compare with the chains in which the victim of the inquisition was habited, when trembling on the verge of eternity; whilst the pictures of devouring dogs and serpents that were hung round his neck, completely prefigure the horrid gang of murdering conspirators who plunged their hands in the blood of Morgan.

This case, thus far, is entirely out of the track of all events in a free or well governed community. It befits the grim despotism of dark and superstition ages and countries.

When robbers and pirates are about to make choice of a leader, villainy becomes the standard of merit. He that can lie with the most cunning, plan with the most art, and murder with most coolness, succeeds.—For every cause requires leaders fitted to its objects.

You seem to have been perfectly instructed in this principle. In order to be considered as worthy of the first place in the party, the only object of your ambition, assertions and protestations are to be made outstripping every hot-head of the party. Have lies been told? it becomes your duty to utter greater ones. Has justice been invaded? it becomes your duty to denounce it as contrary to your schemes. Have good principles been perverted? it becomes your duty to scoff at them and trample them under foot. Have good men been proscribed and slandered? it becomes your duty to christen them fiends, demons and infernals!

As you set out with a strict intention to confine yourself to facts, we presume you stated only what you know. You have drawn a picture of particulars which none but one possessing actual knowledge should have a right to sketch. You have discovered that 'the daring and profligate nature of the conspiracy against liberty and life of this citizen, the inflexible and malignant lightening of purpose with which, step by step, it was pursued to consummation, the cool, the systematic the inveterate depravity of all the actors in it, have no parallel in the previous history of our country, scarcely in that of any country.'

Now you must mean something in all this, or you must mean nothing. You speak of 'the inflexible and malignant vigor of purpose' in whom? You speak of the progress of the conspiracy, as 'step by step' to consummation, by whom? of the cool the systematic, the inveterate depravity of all the actors in it, who are they 'all?' of 'systematic course,' what was it? You stated enough to merit an indictment, and by all that's just and good were I the special counsel for these cases in N. Y. Richard Rush, of York, should be brought to the bar to answer for his undoubted knowledge in detail.

It cannot be said now that all who are disposed to speak, are ignorant of this 'nefarious deed.' For he that knows and can explain so fully every peculiar characteristic of an act, knows more, he knows the actual perpetrators of it. He can point out the 'step by step, and if the steps are but seen, those who take them are discovered. He can put his hand upon their heads, he can call out their names. If he does not know them, he is filled with an Iago's blood and purposes, and fit for 'treason and stratagem.'

The following is an unparalleled sentence, and I record it as a peculiar instance of aberration from reason.

'I challenge the Spanish Inquisition to exceed it.'

There is a close and shocking similitude 'between a case that cannot be explained, and those of an Inquisition, such as burning at the stake, cutting out tongues, stretching and dislocating limbs, crushing the bones upon the rack, and the like. The similitude is so striking, our reason is utterly knocked from her seat! and all our faculties shrink from the task of comprehension.

Next, with 'the Devil before him,' he attacks with an awful 'howling, clangor and fury, The Public Press. To have a just conception of the beauties of this attack, it should be accompanied with Haydn's 'Representation of Chaos.' However, as many are not in a condition to order its performance, I would recommend a Den of wolves, or what might be even more available, an assorted Caravan of animals whose hunger uttered forth cries of ferocious desperation. Let the reader seat himself in the midst of them and read the following:

'But I am now to present an aspect of it, still more extraordinary, still more alarming. How to present it, how to realize it, I am at a loss. It seems a delusion. It doubles all my amazement. I would throw it off as a phantom if I could; but I cannot, and I sink in my feelings as an American citizen, under the mortified and abashed consciousness of its truth. Perhaps I ought to pause ere I advance further. That which I am about to touch, is on all sides encompassed with hazards. A saving energy it has, indeed for its friends, and knows how and when to exert it; but it can make its blast howl about the ears of all, who, with unanctified steps, approach its precincts: blest as from Boreas and Eurus, and Carus and Argestes, loud.' If I followed the counsels of prudence, I should bend the knee in reverence and retreat before it. But I will proceed. At your call, I have taken what I believe to be the cause of public order, and of truth, in hand, and that cause must be my shield. A saying that we had when I was at school, comes into my mind, I scarcely know how to quote it, and must hope for your pardon if I do. 'It was not fiat justitia, ruat cælum; but, TELL THE TRUTH THOUGH THE DEVIL BE BEFORE YOU. Let it be heard.

Hitherto, when a murder, especially one attended by any startling or unusual circumstances, has been committed by unseen hands, in a country where existed a free press, the great instruments has never failed to raise and keep up the alarm. It has done more, far more, than write depositions and search warrants; more than the whole roll of sheriffs and constables and deputies, with the posse commitants in their wake, to drag the perpetrators from their cover. By its universal and spontaneous activity, operating like a moral hue and cry, it helps to point a right public vigilance and suspicion. It ministers usefully to public indignation, making it strong and stirring. It puts everything in motion, itself heading the pursuit.

It sharpens scrutiny, reinvigorates flagging exertion, smites like inward fire upon the fears and pantings of the skulking felon, and throws out signals of all kinds a thousand times more valuable, when its mighty trumpet is sounded in a good cause, than any that Masonry ever planted upon its mysterious lodges. Need I instance the case of White at Salem? Need I mention that of Thurtell in England a few years ago, when the unceasing clangor of their press reverberated even to our shores.—Paris never had such a policy, society never such a conservative principle. It is omnipresent. Like flashes from the heavens it lights up the entire horizon. Its sweep is from the 'orient of the dropping west,' the whole nation its stage, the whole people its audience. What a power in society when directed to proper ends, how resistless how awful! But, in the case we are considering, with the exception of the comparatively few newspapers, antimasonic in special name and object, the press, as far as I have had opportunities of observing, has been shamefully silent. This best guard of a free state, better than legions of bayonets, this Lion at its portals, whose noble nature for the most part it is to spring forward, enraged and uncompromising, upon crime, has been lulled to sleep has been chained and muzzled; has been faithless; has been criminal. I say criminal. Silence in such a cause is participation. It shows, in effect, companionship with the murderers, had there been nothing more than silence. It is keeping bands with blood, when a voice, loud, simultaneous and incensed, should have rung through the land.

May I not justly say that the whole transaction, in every feature in which the public have a right to feel an interest, is an anomaly. Generally it has been the course of the Press as though a salutary instinct of its nature, to be too quick rather than too slow; to fly at wrong in the remote intention and tendency; to err by inflaming too much, rather than too little. But here, in Morgan's case, with the stain of blood before its eyes, with crime actually perpetrated, and crying for punishment, it shuts its eyes. It becomes suddenly and stupidly blind, or it turns traitor. There is no alternative. The press on this occasion has fallen into stupefaction, or turpitude; for it cannot so utterly have lost its senses as not to know, that the crime would never have been committed and left unavenged, but for the full and continued existence, in our country, of the Masonic obligation. No sophistry can gain-say this position. The evidence of it is flagrant; its foundation is upon a rock.

The worst is to be told. For, whence this infatuation, or this connivance? Whence this most marvellous exception to all its wonted eagerness and fire. Whence the sudden spiking of that artillery, that ever heretofore has played its volleys upon crime? Whence, but because the Press itself is under the deleterious enchantments of Masonry, or otherwise wears its manacles. Whether, the iron ones forged for it by the Institution itself or those existing in the influence of readers and patrons, the result is still the same. How else could it have happened, that it has withheld from the people, the incontestible evidences of Masonic guilt, which the repented and solemn trials in New York have afforded? Does it act in this way on other occasions? Did it even suppress from its columns the publication of the case of the wretched pirate, Quito, with all its train of particulars, during this present spring? Has not this case, a case certainly of no novelty in its principle, been running the rapid rounds of almost all the papers of the Union? Yet, no word have we of the trials at Lockport, that were going on at the same instant; not a whisper, not a breath. All is silent like the tomb. How will the Press shake off the obloquy of such conduct. It cannot shake it off. There is no other explanation of it, than the one given. Will it pretend to allege, that those trials brought out no evidence of Mason's guilt? Will it presume to say; in extenuation, that the murdered remains of Morgan are still unfound? Preposterous! insulting, extenuation? Why not publish the evidence itself, and let the people judge, as at all events, the case had become one of great and commanding public notoriety. If the people were to transfer a portion of their indignation from the murderers of Morgan to those presses of the country that have evinced an anxiety to hush up the foul deed, they would be acting righteously. It would show the Press, by a lesson never to be forgotten, that the people were the true fountain of justice, as well as power.

You confess that if you had followed the counsel of prudence, the attack would not have been made; that your great love for truth impelled you forward. It must be that there has been a falling out between Truth and Prudence, as moral man has considered them as inseparable Companions! But certain it is, if they are opposed to each other, Prudence suggests the best policy, and this instance most abundantly discovers.

TABLES.

THE LACE CRAVAT.

The 4th of January 1736, the melancholy intelligence, that the Queen Sophia, wife of George the First of England was expiring, was communicated to the inhabitants of Windsor castle. Conscious of the near approach of death, the queen summoned the royal consort, and, beckoning all her maidens to retire, was left alone with him for more than an hour; the courtiers remarked that when His Majesty returned, notwithstanding his habitual coldness, his face was bathed in tears.

The Queen Sophia saw her life rapidly terminating without alarm. Though her head had been encircled with a crown, existence had possessed few charms for her. She had seen herself for several years neglected by her husband whom Lady Horatio D——— had subjugated by her blandishments and great personal attractions; being of a meek and submissive disposition, she had suffered in silence; but, when she felt that a few hours would terminate her earthly career, she determined to devote the brief space that was left her, in endeavoring to break this criminal connexion. When she saw her husband standing beside her death bed, she extended her slender, emancipating hand to him, and said, in the faintest tone of expiring nature—'Ah! should not have died so soon, if you had loved me.' The king, bending over her hand, kissed it; and checking the tears that fell from his eyes, was going to speak but the queen interrupted him saying:—'George all now is forgotten, all is forgiven—He who calls me to his presence sees into my heart—that heart which still loves you. I will not reproach you with the past; but I will address a prayer to you.' Saying these words, she partly rose from her bed, grasped the hand of the king with all the strength to her remaining, and added: 'In the name of the Redeemer of men, if not through love, through pity for me, for the sake of your eternal salvation, I implore you to renounce the guilty course of your life you now lead. If there was any hope of my restoration, you might suppose that selfish feelings prompt my supplication; but to-morrow I shall be in my coffin, cold and insensible to every thing. Grant then my last prayer I implore, as you regard your own soul—do not again see Lady Horatio.' 'I promise it,' replied her consort; but dear Sophia do not speak so—such thoughts aggravate the danger of your situation.' No, George they have deprived death of its worst sting. I behold heaven opening to me;—that haven for the just and upright, where jealousy never enters; where, George, when you shall have reached, you will love only God and me—there where one loves only those whom he should love. To-morrow——'

'Banish the idea: you are not in so much danger. The physicians assure me that you may still be restored to your people. All England prays for you.' 'I wish not my stay here below to be prolonged; I only ask of you to think of that eternal abode, I am now to enter—I to-morrow, you in a year.' Pronouncing the last words, she threw into her voice all her strength: and then fell back exhausted with the effort on the bed, fixing her eyes upon those of her weeping husband pointed with her finger towards the clouds.

As she had predicted, the next day, dead, cold and insensible to all, she was exposed, crowned, to the public gaze upon the bed of state. All the court came in sorrow to render their last homage to their lamented sovereign; but when the carriage of Lady Horatio drew up before the castle; the officers of the palace advanced and signified to the discarded favorite that she could not be admitted. Soon the news of her disgrace circulated. It was the subject of conversation of the persons who traversed the apartments; and even in the chamber where the corpse of the queen was exposed, many observed, 'If it had occurred earlier she who lies here, would not, perhaps have died so soon.' Others said: 'It is merely through etiquette; her disgrace is but transient;' and they were right; for, ere a month had elapsed, Lady Horatio had resumed her empire in the heart of her royal admirer. But all her blandishments whether of real or effected love, could not dissipate the gloom which rested on the mind of the widowed monarch, who in vain endeavored to banish the recollection of the last prayer of the queen.—He was passionately fond of music, and Lady Horatio provided the most charming concerts for his entertainment and to cheer his sinking spirits; but in the midst of these pleasures he heard rising above the harmonious sounds of a hundred instruments:—To-morrow, you in a year.

Although the queen had been dead now six months, and George was a daily visiter at his favourite's splendid mansion, yet, she had not been permitted to re-appear at Windsor, where, her vanity and her eagerness to humiliate her rivals and enemies, made Lady Horatio particularly desirous of seeing himself established. Often she spoke to the king on the subject; but he always waived her request by allusion to the requirements of courtly usages. At length she wrung from him the ardently wished for privilege; and a few hours after granting the permission she appeared at Windsor castle, glittering with diamonds and swelling with pride. Never had she displayed so much vivacity and haughtiness; never had the king felt so sad, nor so humiliated; a great weight hung on his heart; and to him the day was tedious and embarrassing. The hour of retirement shielded him at last, from general observation, and the speaking eyes of reproach; but did not relieve him from the countless stings of remorse which agonized his soul.—As he approached his bed he recalled to his mind that it was his injured queen who had embroidered its drapery and ornaments; and, in vain, he strove to chase away the thought. On his chimney piece there was a Kalendar, on which his resting eyes, counted the rolling months, and indicated to him that six of the predicted space of his remaining existence had expired. In the hope that sleep would dispel such gloomy reflections, he sought his couch; but 'nature's sweet restorer' visited him not,—that which the poorest laborer of his three kingdoms enjoyed was denied to the ruler of millions of obsequious subjects. Through the high and large windows of his chamber, the silver moon threw a long ray of light on the carpet; and suddenly discovered to him, between the bed and the casement, something, which resembled smoke, rising in the middle of the apartment; supposing it to proceed from a spark that had fallen on the floor, he rose to extinguish it, but on reaching the spot where he had seen the smoke he found nothing, perceiving only that the odour of frankincense, and those fragrant spices which are burned around the dead, was spread through the room. Scarcely had he returned to his bed, when again he saw a blueish vapor rolling upwards: it resembled a light cloud, and soon condensed itself, and from, at first, having no distinct form, gradually assumed the appearance of a human figure; the phantom, if it was one, preserving its transparency, the rays of the moon piercing its shadowless body. The king seeing it advancing towards his bed; by an involuntary movement turned, so as not to behold what appeared to him to be a supernatural visitant; but a hand colder than monumental marble was laid on his naked shoulder, and, at the same time, a sweet voice thrice repeated: 'George! George! George!' Trembling in every limb, and covered with a cold sweat, the guilty husband of Sophia of Brunswick turned his head, and saw bending over him the shade of his late queen. Death had only paled her features; her large black eyes shone with an extraordinary brilliancy in the midst of sepulchral whiteness; her vestment was a long winding-sheet, and on her head glistened, with horrid mockery, the crown which, is placed in the coffins of kings and queens in their funeral obsequies.

DISTINGUISHED CHARACTERS.

EPICETUS, the celebrated Stoic Philosopher, was born a slave, and spent many years of his life in servitude. This was the fact also with Æsop, Puhlius, Syrus, and Terence.

The Abby Haay, who died in Paris, a few years since, celebrated for his writings and discoveries in Crystallography, attained his distinguished elevation in spite of every disadvantage of birth.

Winckelman one of the most distinguished writers on classical antiquities and the fine arts, that modern times have produced, was the son of a shoemaker. He contrived to keep himself at college, chiefly by teaching some of his younger fellow students, while at the same time he, in part supported his father at the hospital.

Arnigo, an Italian poet, of the sixteenth century of considerable genius and learning, followed his father's trade, that of a shoemaker; and in the course of his life published a very elaborate work on the 'Shoemaking of the Ancients.'

The celebrated Italian writer Gelli, when holding the high dignity of Counsel of the Florentine Academy, still continued to work at his original profession of a tailor.

Metastasia was the son of a common mechanic, and used when a little boy to sing his extemporaneous verses about the streets.

The father of Hayden, the great musical composer, was a wheelwright, and fitted also the humble occupation of a sexton; while his mother was at the same time a servant in the establishment of a neighboring nobleman.

The father of John Opie, the great English portrait painter, was a working carpenter in Cornwall. Opie was raised from the bottom of a saw-pit where he was employed in cutting wood, to the Professor of Painting, in the Royal Academy.

The parents of Castaldi, the elegant Latin translator of the Bible, were poor peasants, who lived among the mountains of Dauphny.

MISCELLANY.

THE CRUSADES.

The descriptions of Mr. James, in his history of Chivalry and the Crusades, which forms the twentieth volume of the Family Library—his portrayal of the sufferings of the knights and soldiers in the first and second crusades—their privations and their patient endurance and heroic actions, when the moth of hunger was gnawing at their vitals, and the haggard form of famine stalked with hollow and ghastly look throughout the cities and camps—all these and many more are given with a masterly power, and called to our recollection Maturin's awful fiction of famine in the family of Walberg. We will serve up to our readers an extract from the battle before, and downfall of Antioch.

Having assembled their forces in the valley, Godfrey and Boemond explained to their followers the real nature of the enterprise they meditated. A single interpreter was sent forward, to confer with their traitorous coadjutor, and to ascertain that all was prepared. Phirouz assured him that he was ready, and asked eagerly where were the knights; being told that they were near, pressed them to advance, least any thing should excite the suspicion of the other commanders, especially as, from time to time, men with lighted torches patrolled the wall during the night, and it was necessary that they should take advantage of the interval. Godfrey, Robert of Flanders, and Boemond, instantly led the troops to the foot of the fortifications, a rope was let down, and a ladder of hides raised. At first, no one could be found to mount. Unaccustomed to carry on any warlike operations during the night, a thousand unwonted fears took possession of the bosoms of the crusaders. At length, urged by the chiefs, and encouraged by Phirouz from above, one knight—which of the body is not certain—began to ascend the ladder, and was followed by several others. Silence then succeeded, and temporary hesitation once more took possession of the force below; but the voices of their companions who had ascended, whispering assurances of safety and fidelity, soon renewed their courage, and many attempting to climb the ladder at once, it gave away under their weight, precipitating them upon the lance-heads that were buried in the fosse.—The clang of their armour as they fell was a new cause of alarm, lest the sound should reach the other towers: so loud, however, was the roaring of the wind, and the hollow rushing sound of the Orontes, that the noise was not heard by any but those immediately around. The ladder was easily repaired, and more than sixty knights had reached the top of the battlements, when the torch of the patrol began to gleam along the walls in its approach towards them. Hid in the shadows of the tower, the crusaders waited the officer's approach, and, before he could spread the alarm, death had fixed the seal of silence on his lips forever. The knights now descended through the staircase in the masonry, and finding the soldiers of the guard asleep, they speedily rendered their slumbers eternal. A postern gate was then forced open, and the seven hundred champions rushed into the city sounding their horns in every direction, as had been agreed between the chiefs, in order that on this signal the town might be at the same time attacked from without.

It would be painful to dwell upon the scene of slaughter that ensued. The Turks were soon awakened by the shrieks of their falling comrades, and by the trumpets of their victorious foe; they ran to arms, and for many hours manfully opposed their conquerors hand to hand, though all hope of victory was now over. The Greeks and Armenians hastened to force open the gates and give entrance to the rest of the army of the Cross; but, in the darkness that prevailed, many of the Christians as well as the Turks were slaughtered by the victors, who butchered all ages, sexes, and conditions, with indiscriminate rage and haste, in which fear and agitation had probably as much to do as cruelty and fanaticism.

During the whole of the night the crusaders continued the massacre of their enemies; and Albert of Aix declares, that the following morning they found they had slain many of their own countrymen by mistake. Such a fact is not difficult to conceive of a body of men wandering without guide through a hostile town, with the paths of which they were unacquainted. As ever follows the violent capture of a large city, the soldiery first satisfied themselves with bloodshed, and perhaps added some extra cruelties to gratify their fanaticism, and then betook themselves to plunder and debauchery; nevertheless, they committed not greater excesses than we have seen perpetrated in days not very distant from our own, by the troops of civilized nations, without the fiery stimulus of religious zeal for a palliation.

I mean not to defend the cruelties of the crusaders, but I mean to say, that they were not extraordinary in that age, or in any age that has yet passed; God only knows what may be to come. The crusaders treated the infidels as the infidels had often treated the Christians: and as Christians, unhappily, have too often treated Christians like themselves. Their plunder was not at all of a more atrocious kind than that which attends every storm; and as to the hypocrisy with which Mills charges them, that writer quite loses sight of the spirit of the age on which he writes, and metes men's actions by a standard that they never knew. The crusaders were not hypocrites, they were merely fanatics; and in the relentless fury with which they pillaged, injured, and massacred the Turks, they thought they did God as good and pleasing service as in singing praises to him for the victory they had obtained. They were fearfully wrong in their principle, it is true, but still they acted upon principle, and therefore in this they were not hypocrites.

HEROISM.

The following generous action is worthy of record; there is somewhat even of sublime in it.

A great inundation having taken place in the north of Italy, owing to an excessive fall of snow of the Alps, followed by a speedy thaw, the river Adige carried off a bridge near Vienna, except the middle part on which was the house of the toll-gatherer, or porter, I forget which; and who with his own family, thus remained imprisoned by the waves, and in momentary danger of destruction. They were discovered from the banks, stretching forth their hands, screaming and imploring succour, while fragments of the remaining arch were continually dropping into the water.

In this extreme danger, a nobleman who was present, a count of Pulzinski, I think, held out a purse of one hundred sequins, as a reward to any adventurer who would take a boat and deliver this unhappy family. But the risk was as great of being borne down by the rapidity of the stream, or being dashed against the fragment of the bridge, or, of being crushed by the falling stones, that not only the vast number of spectators, had courage enough to attempt such an exploit.

A peasant passing along, was informed of the proposed reward. Immediately jumping into a boat, he, by strength of oars gained the middle of the river, brought his boat under the pile, and the whole family descended in safety by means of a rope. 'Courage!' cried he, 'now you are safe.' By a still more strenuous effort, and great strength of arm, he brought the boat and family ashore.

'Brave fellow,' exclaimed the count, handing the purse to him, 'here is the promised recompense.' 'I shall never expose life for money,' answered the peasant. 'My labor is sufficient livelihood for myself, my wife and children. Give the purse to this poor family, which has lost all.'

There are few countries in which infants undergo such tortures as in Persia, in spite of which deformity is very rare. The moment an infant of either sex sees the light, it is plunged repeatedly into cold water; it is enveloped in swathings, which are bound so tight as nearly to stifle it. It is then laid on a cradle without any sort of a mattress, the bottom of which is formed of leather, stretched like a drum, and perforated in order that no wet may accumulate. The unhappy babe is fastened down to his cradle with bandages of cotton about eight inches wide, and from twenty five to thirty feet long, which are wound over the child and under the cradle. They are in such a state of compression that it is marvellous to me that one survives. Nevertheless, in this state the unfortunate little creature remains twelve hours at a time. Let what will happen, it is never freed from its bonds except morning and evening, and then only just long enough to change its linen.

London on the river Thames, is ten miles long, from east to west, and six and a quarter broad, from north to south, and fifty miles in circumference. Its population is 1,500,000. It contains 70 squares, 800 streets, 177,000 houses, 146 parishes, as many churches, 82 chapels of Ease, 15 Roman Catholic chapels, 6 Synagogues, 7 Quaker chapels, 163 Dissenter's chapels, 13 theatres, 4 medical colleges, 33 hospitals, 72 banks, besides numerous other public institutions.

Paris is four and a half miles long, about three and a half broad, and seventeen miles in circumference. It contains 750,000 inhabitants, 12 mayoralties, 12 palaces, 16 bridges, 26 hospitals, 67 banks, 142 churches and Chapels, 80 fountains, 32 markets, 4 museums, 9 prisons, and 15 theatres besides numerous other public buildings.

THE WRONG LEG.

Dr Thomas (Bishop of Salisbury) forgot the day he was to be married, and was surprised at his servants bringing him a new dress. A goat stinging him in the leg, the doctor stooped and scratched the leg of a gentleman who stood next to him.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, JUNE 11, 1831.

'ABOLITION OF MASONRY.'

The editor of the Providence Literary Subaltern, whose kind offices in favor of the Masonic Institution, claim for him the thanks of its members, in copying the report of the abolition of the Grand Lodge of New-York, makes some remarks which we think uncalled for, and to which we assure him Masons will never subscribe. He assumes as certain what, to say the least, is problematical, that, the 'antimasonic party will triumph, and the day is not far distant when its reign will be felt throughout the union'—the antimasonic party is too strong of itself to be beaten—it outnumbered Masonry in a tenfold degree, and the fact need not longer be disguised, that antimasonry is destined to predominate in this country, and the day is not far distant, when it will ride down and triumph over all opposition'—'that party has obtained a foothold that cannot be destroyed, and it will soon be the most formidable political association in the country.' Such are the premises; from which he draws the following conclusions. 'Masonry cannot stand; the crusaders are too strong—they are armed with poisonous weapons for the warfare, and have enlisted under their banners, men and materials that cannot be repelled'—'the Masons are too weak, too powerless to stand the tempest'—'the time is at hand when, if the long persecuted Mason does not make his peace, he will be obliged to sue for mercy at the hand of his proud conqueror!' 'to the most careless, and reckless observer, it must be apparent that Masonry cannot stand. Those who are now arrayed against it, possess ten times the strength that the united Lodges of the country could ever muster, and they will soon call to their aid and assistance—they will soon rally around their standard, ten thousand men, who have not heretofore cared the value of a rushlight about the subject.'—'The time has arrived when the public good, and the happiness of the people, the dignity of the nation and the safety of the constitution demand the suppression of the excitement which Masonry has created; and it cannot be suppressed, without the utter prostitution and abolition of the order.' 'As things now are, and situated as the Masonic body is, they are called upon by that respect and regard for themselves, which they ought to cherish, and by that love which they bear the common country, to dissolve their several bodies, abjure the Lodge room, and unite in a common laudable effort to restore peace and harmony to the nation.'

We believe we have stated the case fairly. The premises are evidently false: and it is not, therefore, at all surprising that the conclusions are visionary and unsound. We would not be understood as imputing to Mr. Southworth any other feelings than those arising from a conviction of the truth of the sentiments which he freely avows. But where is the evidence that the antimasonic party is too strong of itself to be beaten? We have seen nothing to warrant such belief. Are we to look for it in the state of New-York? At the last gubernatorial election in that state, the antimasonic party, aided by the friends of the American System, by the friends of Mr. Clay, were beaten by the Jackson party alone, notwithstanding the division of that party, occasioned by the nomination of Gen. Root. It will not be denied that antimasonry is as strong in New-York as in any other state. At the town elections, the antimasonic party was beaten in Batavia, in Utica, and in numerous other places, where it had previously triumphed. These were the strongholds of antimasonry—its birth-place—and we can perceive nothing in its defeat which indicates that its 'reign will be felt throughout the union.' Antimasonry is raging in a few counties in the interior of Pennsylvania; yet it has not been able to elect more than twenty or thirty Representatives, and a few village officers. After the greatest effort and long preparation, the Antimasonic State Convention, held 28th May last, consisted of sixty delegates only, and but half the counties of the state were represented. In Ohio it has met with but little success. In Vermont it has more strength, and yet it is not powerful enough to compete with either of the other political parties. In Connecticut, its whole strength does not amount to half the strength of the Jackson party. In Rhode Island, the antimasonic party, connected with the supporters of Mr. Clay, number less than eight hundred more voters than the Jackson party. In this state, neither of the great political parties have anything to apprehend from its growth. It can never predominate here.—In the other states of the Union, if we except New-Jersey, antimasonry is hardly known. What evidence have we then that the day is not far distant 'when it will ride down and triumph over all opposition?' We must think Mr. Southworth is unnecessarily alarmed. We cannot perceive the danger he apprehends. Nor can we perceive any valid reason why his friend HENRY CLAY 'must be given up and be deprived of the justly merited honors of his country.' On the contrary, we are not certain that the prospects of Mr. Clay do not brighten with the increase of the antimasonic party. We own that we cannot see any favorable indications of his election, if left to contend single handed against the present incumbent. But by the nomination of a third candidate, if the antimasonic party is as strong as Mr. Southworth would have us believe it to be, the election may possibly be thrown into the House, where Mr. Clay's chance of success will not certainly be less than it otherwise must be. It is rank absurdity for his friends to think of securing his election by any compromise with antimasonry—they cannot connect him with that faction, without sacrificing him;—nor will he be connected with it. If his friends hope ever to place him at the head of this government, he and they must remain firm on their principles—they must not sacrifice the integrity of the party, nor compromise the honor of their candidate. The antimasons will not support Mr. Clay unless he publicly renounces and denounces Masonry;—his friends will hardly advise him to this course—they would hardly venture the base proposition. Since then the antimasons are a distinct party arrayed against Mr. Clay, let the National Republican party come out manfully and honorably and unite with the friends of liberal principles in crushing the hateful monster while he is yet weak. This seems to us to be the surest way of securing the ultimate success of the man of their choice. Such a course would add more to the strength of Mr. Clay, than will all the prating about the 'abolition of Masonry.'—Masonry will never be abolished, except with the liberties of the country. And though the support of the antimasonic party might add to Mr. Clay's chance of success, that support can never be obtained at a sacrifice of such magnitude as the 'utter abolition' of the Masonic Institution. The people of this country will not sustain a party based upon such corrupt principles and carried on by such unsanctified means, as the antimasonic; and the less the National Republican party have to do with it, the better for itself and for the future prospects of Mr. Clay.

The time will never arrive when any portion of the people of this country can be called upon by any principle of right or justice, to surrender the privileges guaranteed to them by the laws and constitution of the country. Neither the 'public good,' nor the 'happiness of the people,' nor the 'dignity of the nation,' nor 'the safety of the constitution,' demand such a sacrifice. The nation cannot accept of it, without a compromise of its dignity. The nation cannot permit it. What constitutes the nation? Is it the whole people? or is it a faction, or a party? If it be either or both of the latter, then probably the interests of one or both may require the sacrifice. But if it be the whole people, then the demand requires that the legal rights of one portion of the nation be sacrificed to appease the fanatical fury or sinister views of another portion! Truly this is a new method of securing the 'dignity of the nation' and the 'happiness of the people!'

We agree fully with the editor of the Subaltern, that the 'dignity of the nation and the happiness of the people,' demand the 'suppression of the alarming excitement,' but not at a cost so great as the 'utter prostitution and abolition' of Masonry—even though Masonry were not worth preserving. Men will not be robbed of their rights, any more than they will be of their money.

However desirable the election of Mr. Clay may be, his warmest friends cannot seriously and soberly wish to elevate him on the ruins of the inherent and sacred privileges of a class of men, who are as honest and patriotic as any other class under the canopy of heaven: it were a poor compliment to the honor of Mr. Clay to suppose for a moment that he would consent to rise on the prostrated liberties of his brethren.

We are fully sensible of the unpleasant and, politically, unfortunate relation in which Mr. Clay stands to a class of men who, actuated by the basest of motives and influenced by the most unjust and unhallowed principles, have turned a righteous excitement into the most serious and dangerous of factions: a faction which neither Mr. Clay nor his friends can desire to sustain. Much less do we believe that they are prepared to sacrifice the liberties of any portion of their countrymen to appease its cormorant fury. Such policy would be a direct blow at the root of our republican system of government. It would disannul the fundamental principles of the constitution, and destroy at once those blessings for which the patriots of the revolution sacrificed life and fortune. It cannot be—it must not, it will not be. No honest man can wish it; no patriotic man will aid it—no friend to the free institutions of his country will permit it. We would sooner sacrifice the last drop of blood that courses through our veins than submit to it. The liberty we profess is the sacred legacy of our fathers: it has been entrusted to us to be transmitted in its purity to another generation: we will faithfully discharge that trust, at whatever hazard; at whatever sacrifice.

What good is to result from the sacrifice of Masonry? Antimasonry cannot be put down by it; it will not be satisfied by such a sacrifice, and they know but little of the views and principles of the men by whom the wires of that faction are moved, who contend that it will. Antimasonry is as cormorant as death, and will not be satisfied though one half the human race be immolated to appease its infernal appetite. The only way to destroy the monster is to deprive it of the power to administer to the ambition of the vile panders who are attached to it. Do this and it will die of famine. How are Mr. Clay's interests to be promoted by the abolition of Masonry? Will he be any less a Mason, because the Institution has ceased to exist? We think not. The existence of a particular church, is not necessary to make a man a Christian. If he believes in the great essentials of Christianity, and acts according to those essentials, he is a Christian, and would be so even though all the Churches in Christendom were struck from the face of the earth. The boy does not repudiate his education, though the school-house be burned down. There would be as strong reasons why the antimasonic party should not support Mr. Clay, after the 'abolition of Masonry,' as now exist; and there would be as much inconsistency in their doing so. Masonic obligations cannot be disannulled by the abolition of the Institution: they are not taken with reference to a certain day, or to a particular circumstance. Mr. Clay cannot, therefore, be benefitted on this score, by the destruction of the Institution. Is it supposed that if Masonry ceases to exist, Masons will leave Gen. Jackson, and as body, give their support to Mr. Clay? If so, we pity the weakness of the man who conceived the absurdity. Masons do not support Jackson, because he is a Mason; and we hope they will never be driven to that necessity. It is well known that a majority of the Masons in the New-England States are friendly to the election of Mr. Clay, and if they do not continue so, the change will be attributable to the folly and rashness of his friends. They had no right to connect his name with the subject at all, and if they persist in the course they have commenced, Masons will not be answerable for the consequences. 'The abolition of Masonry' is altogether out of the question. Masons will never consent to that, for the mere purpose of allaying excitement, or securing the election of Mr. Clay, or any other man under heaven. No Grand Lodge has the power to dissolve the connexion, and none would do it, if it had. It would be as reasonable to ask the Legislature of this State to sell the liberties of the people, as to ask the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts to surrender the rights and privileges of Masons. Before Masonry can be abolished, the consent of every Lodge, of every Mason in the country must be obtained. The Grand Lodge has no power to revoke the charters of Lodges, so long as those Lodges conform to the ancient Constitutions of the Order; nor has it the power to deprive any Mason of his Masonic rights and privileges. The friends of this measure will readily perceive that they have a very unwelcome task before them; and one that will hardly be accomplished in season for the next Presidential election.

In conclusion, we will take the liberty to remark, that it would be far better for the friends of Mr. Clay to pursue an honorable, straight-forward course, leaving Masonry to take care of itself. They have nothing to do with that, nor that with politics. Masons will vote for whom they please. They will not inquire whether the candidate be a member of the Institution or not. No man can ask more of them, and more no man will get. Such of them as prefer Clay to Jackson, will vote for Clay, and the contrary. This should satisfy all parties, and if it does not, Masons are not to be charged with the dissatisfaction. Masons will not consent to become pack-horses, to be bought and sold at the will of any political trader. And those around us, if any such there be, who have foolishly presumed to the contrary, and impudently undertaken to arrange the terms of sale, had better 'give up' the contract, before they find themselves overwhelmed by the magnitude of their own visionary projects.

HENRY CLAY.—The subjoined extract is from the Albany Evening Journal, an antimasonic paper, under the management of the celebrated Thurlow Weed, of whisker-pulling memory. We are thus particular in naming the source from which it is derived, in order that the reader may know how much credit to attach to it. So far as any statement from such sources is corroborated by concurring testimony, it is entitled to credit, and no farther. Weed has told a very different story; or we are not correctly informed; and taking into consideration the present state of this lying world, we should not be much surprised, if we were not. The science of political gambling is brought to great perfection, and the measure of moral depravity is nearly full. We are determined to believe nothing that is not as self-evident as the nose on a man's face—a thing always before his eyes, and about which he is not likely to be mistaken. The Albany Daily Advertiser may establish the truth of the following by publishing the letter spoken of—if it were ever written. If it be true that Mr. Clay has forbidden the association of his name or interests with antimasonry, we hope his friends will talk no more of the 'abolition of the Masonic Institution.' The extract follows:

'Mr. Clay's friends have placed Freemasonry between him and our party. This is an impassable barrier. They do not desire to see the obstacle removed. They deliberately preferred the election of Throop and Livingston, to the success of their tried and fast political friends. The party which defeated Granger, Stevens, Spencer, Cady, Martindale, &c. can neither wish nor expect the co-operation of antimasons. Indeed our party is prohibited from supporting Mr. Clay, even if they desired to do so, by his own letter, published last fall in the Daily Advertiser. In this Masonic organ, an extract of a letter from Mr. Clay appeared, in which he forbid the association of his name or interests with the antimasonic party.'

LIBEL SUIT.—The indictment found against the editor of the Galaxy for an alleged libel on one Avery Allyn, will be tried before the Municipal Court, in this city on Tuesday. We understand able counsel has been retained by the defendant; and the trial will probably be unusually interesting.

THE 'FALSE REPORT.'—The Salem Register of Thursday has the following explanatory remarks, relative to the report, (to which it last week gave publicity,) 'that the Grand Lodge had agreed to relinquish their charter and sell the new building.'

'The report alluded to was current on the day I noticed it, and came to me through two or three different channels. On inquiry I found it was premature, and so stated it—but in conversing on the subject with a gentleman connected with the Grand Lodge, I understood him to admit that such a measure was in agitation, or in contemplation, had been talked of, was favored by some members of the Lodge, and would be proposed at a future meeting. This was my understanding of his remarks, and I thought warranted me in saying as much as I did. But the gentleman thinks I misunderstood him in some degree, and it is very possible I did.

From all that I can learn, some members of the Lodge would be in favor of such a measure, but the great majority would resist and deprecate it under present circumstances.' The difficulty seems to have originated in a very great misunderstanding between Mr. Palfrey and the 'gentleman connected with the Grand Lodge.' We doubt not that Mr. Palfrey felt himself warranted in publishing the report—that he believed it to be true.

MUNGO PARK.—The following important intelligence brought by an arrival at Baltimore from Rio, will be received and read with great interest;

But by far the most interesting news brought by this arrival is the account furnished of the African expedition of Lander, the discovery of the course of the Niger, and the recovery of the long sought manuscripts of Mungo Park. The English Ship Carnarvon, which arrived at Rio Janeiro early in April, from Fernando Po, an island in the mouth of the river Cameroes, in the Gulf of Guinea, brought as passengers Richard Lander, the well known companion of Clapperton, and his brother, John Lander. These young men have been absent 17 months in the employ of the British Government, in prosecuting the search after the course of the Niger. Having reached the point (mentioned in Clapperton's book) where Park was murdered, they succeeded in recovering his books, letters, manuscripts, and a double-barrelled gun, which was his property.

Being obliged to abandon their design of proceeding to Timbuctoo, from which they were scarcely fifteen days journey, for want of presents to bestow, without which there is neither sound protection, nor assistance from the authorities of the country, they in consequence re-embarked at the place where Mungo Park lost his life, and following the current of the river, which runs at the rate of four miles an hour, they ascertained that the Niger before it divides itself into various branches is ten miles wide. They then resolved to proceed by one of the most considerable of the branches, which flowed rapidly to the west. As they approached the coast they were taken prisoners by the negroes who inhabit the banks of the river, and were again obliged to embark to be conducted to the presence of their king who lived at a great distance. They were plundered and treated as slaves, and were threatened to be sold and sent into the interior.—They succeeded, however, after great difficulty, in persuading the chiefs by promises of a great reward, as well for their persons as for the property they still possessed, to send them to the coast of Guinea.

Having again embarked, they at length arrived at the Bay of Benin; where the Europeans gave them every assistance they required.

These travellers affirm, that the river Nouna, which discharges itself into the Bay of Benin, is the most considerable branch of the Niger, and that the other, like the Calabar, also flows to the ocean. They also stated that their guides told them that the city of Timbuctoo is not situated on the Niger, but distant from it 12 leagues to the north. They admired the beauty and fertility of the country through which they passed, the extent of which is calculated to be 1800 miles. The inhabitants of the interior are Mahometans, and are much more tractable and civilized than the negroes who inhabit the coast.

They took passage on the 6th April, in the British transport William Harris, for Portsmouth, England.

The public will expect with great anxiety, the narrative of these adventurous travellers. They have solved a problem which has deeply interested the scientific world, and they cannot fail to meet with an appropriate recompense, for their toils and discoveries.

'A BROTHER IS NO MORE!'—James O. Rockwell, editor of the Providence Patriot, died on Monday last, in the 24th year of his age. The Journal of that place has a handsome obituary notice, from which we extract the following:—

'The death of this young gentleman, has happened under circumstances, at once peculiar and impressive—he has fallen the victim of high wrought sensibilities. The world, which so often to the eye of youth seems clad in golden garniture, was putting on for him, the gloomiest hue—disappointments in his only prospects—those on which he had hung his hopes—for a long time had been feeding on his spirit, and abstracting from his cheek and eye, their color and expression.'

As a true poet, his eye was open, and his ear alive to every hue and sound in nature, and he deeply quaffed the waters of those 'swelling founts,' [which, while they refine the heart, do steal away its sterner and stronger substance.—[Trav.]

An antimasonic paper in Rhode Island, charges Dr WITT CLINTON with perjury! He has before been accused of committing suicide, &c.; but we believe this is the first time the charge of perjury has been alleged against him. When will these blood hounds be satisfied, when will they permit the dead to rest in peace!

An attempt was made to set fire to the house of Engine Co. No. 10, on Saturday evening while the engine was gone to the fire on South Boston Bridge. One of their lamps had been lighted and put among some shavings under the house. The fire was discovered and extinguished by No. 4, of Charlestown, in coming over to the fire.

Gaudett and Collibett, convicted of piracy and murder, are to be executed, in this city, on the first of July.

LINES.

Grieve no more that life is brief—
The day a snare—the night a thief.
None would toss a century long
On a stream so dread and strong;
Nor lament an infant's span,
That had grown to restless man.
Or if sad that life be long;
Ties of nature—why this throng?
There is praise in duty done,
Glory for the conscience won;
There 's in retrospection—peace,
When our years in virtue cease.
Enough—or brief or long the strife
Of temptation's varied life—
Enough, a phantom prospect's book
That hath mingled dead forsook.

PRINTERS OF PARIS.

Written by C. F. Ames, and sung at the late anniversary of the Albany Typographical Society.

TUNE—'The Hunters of Kentucky.'

When Charles the Tenth and Polignac
Were forced to turn for sorts, sir,
They found the People chemists, all,
Provided with retorts, sir;
And when to carry out their plan,
They sent the press to winter,
They found the people were a press,
And every man a printer.

Oh, the Press!
And the Printers free of Paris!

The Editors were to a man
Pronounced a bold faced letter,
Who dared defy the censorship
To overrun their matter.
The students of that glorious school,
Whose name in rhyme comes ill, sir,
Were found as every man will say,
Of boys the nonpariel, sir.

Oh, the Press, &c.

'Our own Fayette,' a capital,
Commenced a sentence well, sir,
In saying that the Bourbon line
In France must cease to dwell, sir,
And when the Guard, the National,
Were formed in order fine, sir,
The working-men were spaces all,
To justify the line, sir.

Oh, the Press, &c.

Prince Polignac was but a fool,
Though foreman of the nation;
He threw his office into pi,
And lost his situation;
While Charles turned out a pressman poor,
Could ne'er a frisket fly, or Work off a sheet of foolscap clear,
Without a Monk or Prior.

Oh, the Press, &c.

The people went to work alone,
And shook up every case, sir,
And published soon a work well known,
'Tis called 'The Great Three Days,' sir;
Republished since in Belgium,
And in the press in Poland;
God speed the day when this great work
Shall be unknown in no land.

Oh, the Press, &c.

May all the world a copy take
Of this Paris publication
Till Freedom, Justice, Truth and Right
Shall rule in every nation;
The Press remain forever free,
Its vigor ever new, sir,
And the worn out types of kings and priests
Go to—the printer's shoe, sir!
Oh, the Press, &c.

[From the Baltimore Gazette.]

DONBROWSKI MAZOURKA.

OR WAR-SONG OF THE PATRIOTIC POLES.

Once more among the free and brave,
Oh Poland, we 'll replace thee;
And banish from thy soil each slave
Who breathes but to disgrace thee.
Is there a sword that now shall sleep
Against the side that bears it?
His country's curse forever keep
With him—the wretch who wears it!

CHORUS.

Ages of glory
For thee our dreams betoken,
In the proud page of story
When thy bonds have been broken.

No, like a star, whose steady light
Some passing clouds had shaded;
Or flowers that the winds of night
Have, for a season, faded—
So Poland yet shall pierce the gloom
That veils her native splendour,
When, bless'd again with that grim doom
Our lives—our deaths—shall lend her.

CHORUS.

Age of glory
For thee our dreams betoken,
In the proud page of story,
When thy bonds have been broken,

CUPID'S COURTSHIP.

For Delia's heart, Love came,
But found 'was not at home,
'It chooses,' said the Dame,
'With pleasure yet to roam.'
Love bow'd but little car'd
To chase so light a thing,
Politely left his card,
And spread his golden wing.

'T was long e'er Love, thus cross'd,
Again essay'd to win,
'T was still 'Love's labor lost,'
The boy could not get in,
For Pride, who chanc'd to see,
His golden pinion flap,
Unkindly turned the key,
Before the boy could tap.

Once more the urchin thought,
To win the fancied prize,
But by Experience taught
He first unveiled his eyes.
He saw—not fresh sixteen,
But faded thirty-two,
And stung with deep chagrin,
Love bid the Fair adieu.

LOVE.

A wit, describing the universal empire of love, drolly describes its onsets among the finny race:—

—Love assails,
And warms, 'mid seas of ice, the melting whales;
Cools crimped Cod, fierce pangs to Perch imparts,
Shrinks shrivelled Shrimps, and opens Oysters' hearts.

THE PUBLIC PRESS.

Your extravagant mode of expression is only surpassed by your misrepresentations. What are the facts in relation to the PUBLIC PRESS? There is not, and I believe it will be found correct, a single newspaper in the United States but what has alluded to the abduction of Morgan in some shape or other. But you ask, how? Editors have spoken according to their best knowledge of the subject, what more could be required of them? IT IS A FACT, and well worthy to be remembered, or in other words, 'never to be forgotten,' that the press has refused to sanction and give currency to the slanders and lies of antimasons and antimasonic political demagogues! IT IS A FACT, that there is too much virtue and good sense in the conductors of the press to second the measures of a party which seems to have no ends to gain but those of sin and wickedness. IT IS A FACT, that the corps editorial of the United States did not consider that the prosperity of its ranks would be promoted by hailing and recognising scribblers of antimasonry as brethren! IT IS A FACT, that the press 'sharpens scrutiny, re-invigorates flagging exertion, smites like inward fire upon the fears and pantings of the skulking felon, and throws out signals of all kinds,' when proscription and persecution is the order of the day! When office seekers would barter their own souls to the Devil for a place of honor, or steal their neighbor's rights and privileges, to feed diseased ambition and fatten their imps of execution! IT IS A FACT that the press in its silence has scrupulously observed a proper self-respect, in holding as beneath its lowest contempt the 'hypocritical professions of antimasonic investigating committees; their disgusting circulars, and protestations of honesty! If 'the press on this occasion has fallen into stupefaction, or turpitude,' is it because it has not responded to the howlings of antimasonry? No! If the press is chargeable with any unwarrantable neglect, it is, that the 'Lions at its portals, did not spring forward, enraged and uncompromising, upon the systematic monster of calumny of all goodness, and stamp destruction and death upon its notorious front.

The cause of Morgan was nowhere; here with all the confusing causes of iniquity it was lost to the sight. The remedy become in magnitude to the evil, what Mount Aetna is to a spark. It belched forth smoke and burning lava as from the den of furies, and enveloped the scene in utter darkness. Here in this valley of infatuation and unrighteousness do they now grope and scream suspicious like the midnight owl; and not knowing where they step themselves, madly pretend to investigate the steps of others.

In this volcanic crater of darkness has Richard Rush of York, been let down. He was told there was honor, office, promotion there! Poor soul! how he rages, and participates in the nature of the infernal abyss of mystery. The want of light where there never was light, astonishes him! The want of knowledge to correspond with his imagination, shocks and terrifies him. The want of virtue where vice presides, makes him lament! The want of co-operation from the regions of light and honesty drives him to desperation!

To close this scene I will take back stolen words! words that common sense and decency in mercy to mankind may permit you to use, but never to apply. 'No sophistry can gainsay this position. The evidence of it is flagrant; its foundation is upon a rock.'

We next find this paragon of reason and logic reverting back to the time of our fathers.

'Had a case like Morgan's arisen in 1776; had blood been so atrociously shed, and gone so long unavenged, through any acts of the government then ruling us, or the black doings and subtle hidings of Masonry within its borders, I believe that it would have acted upon public opinion like an electric shock, and that our fathers would have sought no stronger cause for prostrating in the dust an open authority or a secret influence, that could so iniquitously prostrate justice. Am I wrong? Do I affirm too much? Am I giving way to feeling, in place of reasoning? No! I speak under the highest of all sanctions, before the American public. Turn to the declaration of independence, that glorious charter of our liberties, and see if it be not there recorded as one of the causes for dismembering an empire, that the British King, by his odious acts, had obstructed the administration of justice in our country. No single case, comparable in atrocity to this of Morgan's, whether as regards the original conspiracy and murder, or the total obstruction of the laws since, ever disgraced the tyranny of that era over us. If one like it had occurred, a town meeting in Boston would have rallied New England to her duty; the fire of Patrick Henry's eloquence would have summoned Virginia to hers;—the decree would have gone forth, and Monarchy or Masonry would have fallen. That the contest with the latter would have been the most difficult, I have no doubt; but down it would have come. Had the universal Press of the country done its duty, in a spirit resolute and lofty as of that day, instead of sluggishly remaining quiet, or ignominiously conniving, this conspiracy against Morgan would long since have been laid bare, and public justice been vindicated. Its voice would have carried consternation into the recesses of every lodge. Its thunders would have shaken their very walls and rafters; their foundations underneath would have rocked, their turrets above would have trembled, and Masonry in turn, like the suffering victim of the conspiracy, would have put up its prayer for mercy. Appalled, menaced for its existence, it would have been seen everywhere in motion. Then, then, its activity, its discipline, its terrors would have been at work to ferret out the deep guilt. Its conclaves would have assembled for no other object, until that object had been attained. The institution would have been placed under accusation; it would have been arraigned before the dread bar of the nation; where under the majestic inquest of the Press, it would have stood, pale and breathless, waiting its doom. The spectacle would have been sublime! And who can doubt the issue? Who can doubt but that the truth would have come to light? Who can doubt but that the cloud, all along so dark, would have 'turned her silver lining' on this plot of death? No one, surely, who has remarked the potency which this institution has ever shown in securing ends on which it chooses to bend its whole purpose, and employ all its exertions. I repeat, then, that the press has shown a dull insensibility to the high motives and feelings by which it ought to have been fired in this case of enormity, or it has been a traitor to its trust. It ought, forthwith, to have put the Masonic institution upon the defensive.—That was its true position before society; under a case of conspiracy and crime, planned and executed by those who notoriously belonged to the secret institution. I lay this down in strict reasoning, and so let it be judged; so would I clinch upon the Press the charge of infatuated dereliction, or accessory guilt.'

This is presumption with consistency! A reference is made to a time when every master spirit of patriotism, was a leader in Masonry! When patriotism, was nursing and guarding with the same hand and equal care the tree of Liberty and the growth of Freemasonry! Had you been reckless of the past, and cast the veil of oblivion over the pages of its history, you would have realized the redeeming spirit of prudence for your purposes. But out-marching your own discretion, all facts and fabrications are destined to fall within your grasp and lacerating process. You unadvisedly utter what may be the truth, when you suppose, that the race of men then ruling here would have succeeded in detecting and punishing so foul a deed, as the probable one of Morgan! They had sacrificed too much to despise the influence of good principles.—Having fought for liberty they were willing that every man should enjoy it, for they declared it to be his natural birth-right. Feeling conscious of an all-pervading honesty, in its native dignity, they were above the base suspicions of a guilty mind. There were no materials then fit to make a party like yours and raise a cloud to darken the fair face of justice. The members of the conspiracy would have been sought out from the field of action itself, and reason would have directed the execution of the laws without permitting base aspirants for office, to aid in the investigation. There would have been no indictments without evidence, nor conviction without crime, or the impairing of confidence, without just reason. Principle would have acted with charity, and justice with mercy. Citizens would have solicited the advice of Freemasons, and Masons would have promptly answered the call and lent their cordial co-operation in the common cause.—But now good men are deterred from action, by the forwardness of bad men, and justice suffers defeat in consequence of being linked with unrighteousness.

We now come to the sublimest part of the letter.—It dashes down upon us like a torrent from a mighty river, with a great noise, but falls like water, harmless to the ground, not to be gathered up. But here it is, we formally arraign the reasoning for trial.

'Had the universal Press done its duty, in a spirit resolute and lofty as of that day, instead of sluggishly remaining quiet, or ignominiously conniving, this conspiracy against Morgan would long since have been laid bare, and public justice been vindicated. Its voice would have carried consternation into the recesses of every lodge. Its thunders would have shaken their very walls and rafters; their foundations underneath would have rocked, their turrets above would have trembled, and Masonry in turn, like the suffering victim of the conspiracy, would have put up its prayer for mercy. Appalled; menaced for its existence, it would have been seen everywhere in motion. Then, then, its activity, its discipline (observe, 'ITS DIS-CIPLINE!) its terrors would have been at work to ferret out the deep guilt. (Who ever knew that Masonry had changed since THEN!) Its conclaves would have assembled for no other object, until the object had been attained. The Institution would have been placed under accusation; it would have been arraigned before the dread bar of the nation; where under the majestic inquest of the Press, it would have stood, pale and breathless, waiting its doom. The spectacle would have been sublime.

You have furnished foundation and principles for a scene still more sublime. We will sketch it. We sketch it with a view to show you the practical character of your philosophy.

There were two men who had always lived from their days of boyhood, in the strictest friendship, and on the most brotherly terms. In an unguarded moment one of them uttered to the other expressions of the severest reproach for some act of his, which were received with an angry retaliation. Altercation of words first occupied their excited passions; but soon words were substituted by blows, and the original aggressor, with deadly aim, struck his friend to the earth. The blow was fatal—the victim breathed no more. The murderer was arrested and committed to prison to await his trial.

Now these two friends belonged to the most respectable families of the place, where the deed was committed. They also belonged to the same and most powerful Institution. An Institution which pervades the whole civilized and even savage world. An Institution embracing every rank and interest of society! An Institution having 'its secrets,' and 'guarded by strong penalties.'—An Institution stretching from nation to nation, and having 'numbers and antiquity on its side: and the sense of affiliated attachment and union among its members is perceived to be exceeding energetic and zealous! An Institution that often controls religion; but almost always, the politics of the country! An Institution that often openly defeats justice and encourages vice! An Institution that turns stern judges from their duty and leads jurymen to violate their oath. An Institution that disarms the able advocate in redressing wrongs and protecting innocence! An Institution although encouraging virtue, yet not willing to expose vice! An Institution that disarms the brave in battle and favors the desertion of the coward! It is an Institution, in short, that wherever men act, whether publicly or privately, it has a positive and irresistible influence, and often to turn justice from her plain and onward path! The abuse of the principles of this Institution led to the encounter between these men; and the encounter ended in death.

It is the Institution of FRIENDSHIP and PARENTAL AFFECTION!

The time appointed for the trial at length arrives. The court assembles; counsellors flock to see the process of the law; jurors are sworn and witnesses are called. Public curiosity is 'on tiptoe' and laboring under a painful suspense. The Temple of Justice is crowded almost to suffocation. The prisoner is brought to the bar and submits to the curious and restless gaze of the populace.—He pleads 'not guilty' with a firm voice and collected countenance. The evidence of his guilt is elicited from the witnesses, and the different statements are compared by the government attorney. The law is quoted and construed, and its application explained. He is answered by the counsel for the prisoner, in a powerful appeal to the sense, justice and mercy of the court and jury; he entreats that they would consider the former good character of the man, the peculiar circumstances which led to the act. The judge sums up the case, and instructs the jury what principles they are bound to observe, and what their legal premises are, leaving them free to make deductions according to their conscience and obligations. The jury retire. All are anxious to hear the result. The foreman returns and reports that the jury cannot agree, that it is impossible—and asks for their discharge! The court grants it, and orders a new trial. The people begin to grow uneasy. 'What doubt can there be of his guilt?' says one. 'None at all!' answers another. 'It's as plain a case as ever come to jury,' says a third. 'There is something wrong in it, I have not the least doubt in the world,' adds a fourth. And thus is the hum of the crowd made up. However, a new jury is empanelled and the evidence repeated. The case is given to the new jury by the judge; they retire and soon return with a verdict of Guilty! The counsel for the prisoner asks for a new trial and states his reasons. The court answers the request.

The public Press now begins to censure; it doubts the honesty of the jury, and uprightness of the judge. The people become excited and violent in their abuse of the court. The third trial proceeds, with unusual delay and difficulty. Witnesses are not all to be found, and an adjournment becomes necessary. The officers of justice are sent far and near to compel attendance, and after many serious embarrassments the essential witnesses are found and the trial proceeds. The result is the same as before, the prisoner is convicted. The court with great feeling and solemnity passes the sentence of death upon him, and he is remanded to his cell.

There is now a new difficulty to obstruct the operation of justice. The governor refuses to sign the death warrant. Three years have now elapsed since the commission of the horrid crime of murder, although attended with every evidence of certainty, and yet the deed goes unpunished. Indeed the prisoner is permitted to escape—unpunished and with impunity to walk forth among men. In this time the people were not idle in investigating this defeat of justice. The Press, indignant, opens its 'artillery,' and plays its volleys upon the unheard of trial and contempt for the laws. It is now ascertained that the primary cause of this wicked negligence on the part of the government is attributable to the abuse of the principles of this powerful Institution. That some of the jury, witnesses, advocates and governor were members of it, and felt bound to aid each other in clearing the prisoner.—Meetings are called, resolutions passed, expressing the indignation of the people, and their determination to put down an Institution which is liable to such abuses. Every 'sober minded citizen' stood confounded at seeing human life so sported with, by a power so tremendous, and felt anxious to arrive at the solution of the phenomenon. 'Candid men of the society on hearing the relation of it, are disposed to ask, whether all the benefits, alleged or real, can be a counterpoise for the perils which may thus spring from it through deluded or depraved zealots, who gain admittance to its sanctuary; and who effectually silence compunction under iniquity, by flying to the misunderstood or perverted ties and obligations of the craft.' 'The case of blood that has been so atrociously shed, and gone so long unavenged through acts of government; acted upon public opinion like an electric shock, and the cause led to the determination on the part of the people to humble to the dust, an open authority or a secret influence that could so iniquitously prostrate justice. Town meetings in Boston milled New England to her duty, and the orators of the country summoned the people to theirs—and the decree is sent forth that this Institution must fall.'

At this period of the excitement 'a giant spirit was roused from its slumbers.' Though years of commotion and terror had agitated every town and every state, this mighty spirit reposed motionless and undisturbed. It was a spirit that disdained the common gifts of man, and was influenced only by motives which led to deeds of greatness. Greatness was its eigment! like Cæsar's it must be first or nothing!

It was the spirit of Richard Rush!

Richard Rush, of York, of slow deliberation, sanctioning thought by thought as reason gave permission, as quick as lightning flash was 'startled,' 'terrified,' and roused to action. His talents, 'like flashes from heaven lighted up the entire horizon.' His power was felt 'from the orient to the drooping West.' 'He set up a moral hue and cry; and made public indignation strong and stirring.' He addressed the nation thus:

'This Institution being the parent of the crime, must be answerable for it. If the Institution had not existed, the crime could never have taken place. What one man does all others in any way connected with him are responsible for. It is not possible that we can remedy the evil without utter and absolute extermination. If justice be vindicated in this case, who will be bound for the strict execution of the laws hereafter? "If a power shrouded from the day, has been found of efficiency sufficient to interpose a fatal obstruction to the great course of public justice, where guilt has been so aggravated, are we to suppose that the mischief ends here? That it is a simple and insulated instance? It is impossible. He is weak and credulous who believes it." "And as to those who chant the praises of this Institution, say to them all that they are as dust in the balance to the unfathomable guilt, which bad men of the brotherhood have forever fastened upon it; and that the only way to stop the stream of blood and pollution which you have detected, is, to dry up the fountain." 'I like the clamour, I only wish I had been roused before to this great subject. I want facts, and facts I have, and though I have no actual knowledge, yet, if I have facts, I am armed with a power that defies opposition. The Institution must be put down, crumbled to the dust, and dead to everything but the page of history!'

The arguments of this appeal were irresistible. The people all at once became indignant, enraged and boisterous in their calls for justice. The Institution must be given up, if the arms of our country, were called to effect the result. The members must renounce it, and destroy every root and branch, beyond recovery. Each and every man began to persecute his neighbor, from mere suspicion.—Now comes the general cry, almost, pealing and reverberating from the skies, as quick and heavy thunder, for the 'Institution to be placed under accusation. By one consent the cry was answered, and 'it was arraigned before the dread bar of the nation, standing pale and breathless, waiting its doom.'

But who is to be judge, for all the judges are members of the traitorous body? Richard Rush, of York; for who else is just and honest! Who is to be jury? for the Institution embraces human nature, and every MAN is a member? Richard Rush, of York; for who else is impartial and unbiassed in opinions? Who is to be advocate, for all the members of the bar are bound by the ties of the fraternity? Richard Rush, of York; who else is able? Who is to be witness, as all the evidence is confined to the friends of the criminal? Richard Rush, of York; who else has knowledge of facts! Who is to make the law; for our fathers, ignorant souls! provided for no such case? Richard Rush, of York; who else can know the wants and difficulties of the people so well!

No sooner said than done, Richard Rush was made Dictator; and the destiny of the people intrusted to his keeping.

True to his trust, he becomes omnipresent, and summons, with solemn air, the nation to his Court and bar.

All knowledge has been surrendered; he comprehends the power of millions, and orders before his mind the facts of millions, which pass in review; for facts are facts when true, and facts, whether true or false, he has. Now 'the whole nation becomes his stage and the people his audience.' The scene is sublime! With a desire to 'make the case irresistible, by its concentration and simplicity,' he speaks with brevity, and addresses the mighty audience thus:

Being above all moral contagion myself, I am of right your judge, in all respects. The many abuses of privileges granted you, render the privileges of no advantage to your state or condition. A privilege is of no benefit to any, if one 'depraved member' of the human family violates it. It immediately becomes an evil. This powerful Institution, which is the Institution of Friendship and Parental Love, above all others is the most dangerous! It has sanctioned a murder and defeated justice in every attempt at vindication. It strikes at the root of the stern and unbending administration of the laws, and esteems the obligations of citizenship of minor importance to those of her own. Male and female are fastened in its fetters, and union, strength, and secrecy, are its characteristic evils. We all know that friend will favor friend, and parent will favor child, in violation of the law. That the obligation of these relations is stronger than almost any other, and if permitted to exist will pollute the fountains of justice and take from us all the privileges of liberty. The same principle exercises great influence, though somewhat differently modified, in the matrimonial relation. I need not relate instances of unalterable affection in devoted wives to their husbands, who were under sentence of death; of their unwearied exertion to save their lives, although they knew them to be guilty of the crime for which they were condemned. These things must be familiar to you all. Then this be my decree, absolute extermination to the Institution of FRIENDSHIP AND PARENTAL LOVE.

Freed from every virtue, the vast assemblage dispersed! Each one marking for himself a course, unknown, unseen, untrodden by others. All retreated from the throne to the utmost extent of space, to common sense and reason, leaving their judge to direct, rule and govern his MIGHTY SELF, BY HIMSELF, and for HIMSELF—FOREVER.

The particulars of this case of murder are not drawn from the imagination, but are matters of fact. The criminal was the son of the governor: the judge, jurors and others engaged were the governor's friends, and as they thought and believed, acted as such. The result is in perfect accordance with your reasoning and philosophy!

The Providence Daily Advertiser contains a list of the delegates to the Antimasonic Convention, recently held in Faneuil Hall. We copy the names of the individuals who represented the county of Suffolk in that assembly of patriots. It will be seen that the medical profession was powerfully represented; and the 'middling interest' too, it appears, was not neglected in the selection of delegates. Fifty years hence we shall, probably, see the names of the immortal sixty-five on parchment, as we now see the names of the signers of the declaration of independence.

[From the National Gazette.]

We have received from different sources, strictures exceedingly severe upon Mr. Rush's letter concerning Masonry. It was only a few days ago that we could bring ourselves to read this unique production. We regard it as highly reprehensible, and shall, in due time, treat it accordingly. That gentleman has denounced and stigmatized the American Press in general with a fierceness of invective which indicates a great want of judgment as well as temper in the whole question. His charges, moreover, are altogether unjust. With regard to the Press, he is a wanton and violent aggressor, against whom the journalists of this country should make common cause. It surprises us that his extravagant letter has found favor with any one American editor except such of the corps as are specially devoted to political antimasonry. We have never had any communication with any Mason as such; we know not where the influence of Masonry or Masons is felt; by no possibility could we be subject or obnoxious to it in the least degree. But we have always endeavored to discountenance, and will ever resist, the antimasonic excitement, as unworthy of the reason, justice, probity and candor of the American people.

Mr. Rush appears suddenly as a new Peter the Hermit, preaching, with furious zeal and hyperbolic rhetoric, a wild crusade against what may be termed phantasmagoria, conjured out of a single crime real or supposed, the work of a certain number of fanatics or miscreants, which seems to have been as strongly reprobated by the Masonic bodies, as by their antagonists. Enormous exaggeration is the principal trait or leaven of his Letter; in the tempest and whirlwind of his passion, he has fallen into palpable inconsistencies and sophisms; and, as a national politician, he seems to have wholly forgotten the interests of Mr. Clay, or deemed them utterly insignificant, in comparison with other objects. As far as his present declamation may be operative, in the contest between the mere Jackson party and the National Republicans, it must be injurious to the cause of the latter, which is now the most important of our political concerns. We have never admired Mr. Rush as a political economist, a statesman or writer; but we have been accustomed to view him personally with much respect, and we therefore sincerely regret the extraordinary leap which he has just made upon a stage suitable only for a different description of actors.

DISGRACEFUL.—Some of the antimasons in Queensbury, Warren co. we are informed, were so enraged at their defeat at the town meeting on Tuesday last, that they undertook to subdue Masons, and those who did not see fit to unite in the 'holy cause' of antimasonry, by force—they used their fists very freely, but not being successful, knives were resorted to! We understand one man was much injured in an affray with an anti—the anti knifed him in good earnest.—[Sandy Hill Herald]

Sutton Royal Arch Chapter holds four regular communications in a year, on the Tuesday preceding, or at the full moon, in March, June, September, and December. Their annual meeting is in March. The Officers chosen at their annual meeting, A. L. 5831, were as follows, Jonas L. Sibley, H. P.; Thomas Harbach, K.; Caleb Chase, S.; Harvey Park, T.; Daniel Tenney, S.; Nehemiah Chap, R. H. C.; Amasa Roberts, C. H.; Daniel G. Livermore, P. S.; John W. Whipple, M. 3d V.; Joseph L. Freeman, M. 2d V.; Jothan Gale, M. 1st.; Simeon Woodbury, S. S.; Simon Tenney, Jr. J. S.; Daniel L. B. Goodwin, C.; Amasa Roberts, Caleb Chase, Nehemiah Chase, Com. of Finance; John F. Barton, Ml.; Samuel Williams, Tyler.

ANTIMASONIC VAGRANTS.—Antimasonic moralists set up a wondrous hue and cry about the wickedness and immorality of Masonic ceremonies; yet they have a company of strolling mountebanks, scouring our towns and villages, and exhibiting, as they profess, these very blasphemous ceremonies! Now, assuming as true, that Masonic ceremonies are indelicate and of pernicious tendency, these mercenary bands are either imposters, and are not representing the true ceremonies of Masonry, or they are spreading blasphemy and wickedness throughout the country. In either case they are indictable, and ought to be punished. Admit that they represent the genuine principles of Masonry, and that those principles are irreligious, in which case are they calculated to do the greatest harm, by being confined to the Lodge room, or by being hawked about the country, and peddled out to the simple and credulous? The answer to this question is very simple; and is, perhaps, worthy of the consideration of the civil authorities of towns wherein these fellows make their appearance.

ANTIMASONIC RHETORIC.—In speaking of antimasonry in Massachusetts, Thurlow Weed says, 'the cradle of liberty has commenced rocking.'—To have finished the figure and rendered its beauties complete, he should have added, 'and the antimasonic baby is going to sleep.' 'Hush my dear lie still and slumber.'

The Olive Branch Lodge, situated in Sutton, holds four regular communications in a year, viz. on the Monday preceding, or at the full moons, in February, May, August, and November, and the Communication in February, is their annual Meeting, for the choice of Officers; the following is a correct list chosen and appointed in February, A. TABLES.

THE LACE CRAVAT.

[Concluded.]

With hollow, solemn accents, in the profound silence of the night, the spirit addressed the fearful monarch: 'George, you have forgotten the sacred promise you made me on my death-bed. God has permitted me to come and recal it to your mind. George, be converted unto the Lord, his judgments are terrible, and verily, verily, I say to you, your day approaches; she whom you love with an unhallowed passion, can precipitate you into the dwelling place of the wicked, but she cannot retain you on earth one moment beyond your appointed hour. George! George! be converted unto the Lord.' After these words, a slight breathing passed over the visage of the king. He looked, but saw nothing; he listened but silence reigned. 'Do I sleep?' he asked himself—'is it a dream? No, I am sure I did not sleep. Ah, how much the shade resembled her who—oh, there is no room for doubt—it was a warning from above. I am resolved—fixedly, immovably resolved, to see no more her whom I ought not to love.' And to confirm this good resolution, the king knelt in prayer. He counted the strokes of the deep-toned bell, as they echoed along the vaults of the castle, proclaiming the passage of the leaden-footed hours of the tedious night.

The ensuing day had been fixed upon, as the occasion of a magnificent fete at Lady Horatia's in compliment to the royal lover; but he sent her word he should not attend; and that for several days he would only be visible to his ministers.

This sudden resolution alarmed the favorite. She managed so well that she gained access to the repentant monarch notwithstanding the orders he had given; and though he at first signified by the coldness of his manners and the severity of his observation, his displeasure at her intrusion, she appeared so lovely and seducing, that he was just going to express by a fervent exclamation the witchery of her charms, when his eyes suddenly fell on the spot where the queen had appeared; seizing then the hand of his mistress, he said: 'Here even here, she bade me last night to renounce you.'

'Whom?' inquired Horatia, 'whom did you see last night?'

'Her, whom God gave me for a wife, the queen Sophia.'

'You and England have wept her. Think no more of her; she is at peace in the tomb.'

'Tombs sometimes re-open; her's has opened its marble jaws and freed its tenant—last night—even in this chamber—there—near my bed, I saw her with these eyes that now behold you; and heard—ay, heard her speak—'George! George!' she cried, 'be converted unto the Lord, and break the unhallowed ties in which you are bound.'

'Ah, sire, you love me no more; and to sever those bonds which form my happiness, you have recourse to visions and dreams! Sire, it would be more sincere simply to say, Horatia, I no longer love you.' Tears and sobs followed these words, and the king who retired to a distance, returned to his lover and said: 'Horatia, how can you say I have ceased to love you. If I loved you not, I should have no cause to complain.—Duty bids me to see you no more, to separate from you forever, but my love is even stronger than my duty to God; for He has despatched a messenger from the dead to command me to renounce you, yet still I adore you;' and he pressed her fondly to his bosom, and her tears were quickly dried.

What power is there in the words of the woman one loves! They know so well how to insinuate themselves into the heart and influence the judgment, that before the end of the day, George disbelieved he had received the previous night, a warning from above, and that it really was Sophia of Brunswick who had appeared to him; the conviction he had felt in the morning vanished before the incredulous smiles of his lover.

'Yes,' he repeated when he retired to his sleeping apartment, 'Horatia is right; it was a creation of my brain; the dead did not appear to mortals.'

He deceived himself. The spirit of the queen again revisited him. She was pale as before; but the expression of her countenance still more stern. 'George,' said the spectre, standing at the foot of his bed, the purple curtains of which she had raised with her hands, 'George, you would rather trust her who has said that God had not through me, admonished you, that it was only an idle dream which disturbed you, than believe me—Now listen to me—this is the last time that I who was your wife, and whose body is in the grave, will be permitted to appear to you—after this interview my silence will be eternal; my lips will fall into dust. George, be converted unto the Lord, for your hour approaches; and that you shall not say again, 'No, Sophia of Brunswick has not issued from the tomb!' I will leave you an evidence of my spirituality; if the hand of a mortal can untie the knot made by the hand of a tenant of the sepulchre, then may you laugh at my words and at my warnings; but if, on the contrary, neither you, nor she, nor any other can untie it, say then, truly it was the spirit of Sophia of Brunswick that appeared to me and warned me to be converted unto the Lord.' So saying, the spectre leaning over the bed, took a lace cravat that the king had laid aside, tied a knot in it, and threw it on the breast of its astonished and trembling owner. The heavy velvet curtains fell, and the vision disappeared.

The king no longer doubted. Covered with a cold sweat, his heart audibly beating, he lay motionless; his distended eyes immovably fixed on the place where the spirit had appeared, as if he still beheld its awful form; his breath suspended to catch the stilled unearthly accents of his visitant; but nought save the oscillating pendulum of the clock, disturbed the silence of the hour. The light piece of lace rested like an immense weight on his breast; and he dared not remove it. Finally, blushing at his fears, he suddenly sprang out of bed, took the knotted cravat, and trembling in every fibre, carried it to a lamp, which was burning in an adjoining cabinet. He made divers attempts to untie it, but all his efforts were vain, every unsuccessful experiment increased his fear and perturbation. Returning to his chamber, banishing the idea of sleep, and preparing a great light, he commenced reading several petitions, which had been presented to him during the preceding days; but in the midst of his busy employment, the thought of the spectre constantly occupied his mind.

The subsequent evening the king went to Lady Horatia's, his gloomy countenance betokening his inward anguish; as she came smiling towards him, attired for a fete, he said, 'The time for smiles and festivity is passed. You have deceived me, madam; last night the queen again appeared to me.'

'Sire you are not well; your mind is agitated; you are deceived,' replied Horatia.

'Tis you, and you alone who are deceived, rejoined the monarch, in displeasure. You would have me believe it was only a dream. Well;—behold!' and he gave her the cravat, adding: 'Hear what the queen said to me: 'George be converted unto the Lord, for your hour approaches; and that you shall not say to-morrow, No, Sophia of Brunswick has not issued from the tomb! I will leave you an evidence of my spirituality. If the hand of a mortal can untie this knot made by a tenant of the sepulchre, then may you laugh at my words and my warnings; but if, on the contrary, neither you, nor she, nor any other mortal, can untie it, say then, truly it was the spirit of Sophia of Brunswick that appeared to me, and warned me to be converted unto the Lord!' 'Horatia, here is the knot; strive to untie it—if you succeed, I shall believe 'twas but the vision of a diseased imagination—I shall be cheerful and happy.'

'Give it me,' said Horatia, who still smiled, though inwardly alarmed at the manner and words of the king, 'give it me, I will soon untie the knot;' and with her pretty fingers, glittering with diamonds, she turned and re-turned the lace cravat, in the hope of finding some clue to the mystery, but unsuccessfully; in vain she applied all her strength; and exercised all the methods-art, or ingenuity suggested. All her efforts relaxed, not in the least, the supernatural knot.

'You must be convinced now,' said the king, 'you cannot succeed.'

'But,' replied she, now grown impatient and uneasy, 'I can do as Alexander did with the Gordian knot,' and she threw the cravat into the fire. The king hastily snatched it out, and already on fire, threw it far from the hearth; in falling it touched the light dress of the Lady Horatia, which immediately caught, and enveloped the beautiful wearer in flames. Terrified and losing her presence of mind, she fled crying for help; her haste, and the opening of doors increased the fire. Her piercing shrieks rung throughout the castle, and she resembled a flaming meteor traversing its long halls. She was no longer the young lover of the king attired for a fete. She soon fell and expired in horrible agonies.

From that day the king became more and more melancholy; and passing many hours in prayer. He founded a hospital; and did much good in the name of the queen Sophia. He often repeated: 'Part of what she predicted has been verified, no hand could untie the knot she made; the remainder of her prophecy will also be fulfilled in my early death.'

The king did not deceive himself; two months after the death of the Lady Horatia he died; the queen had not been dead a year.

'I have lived,' said Dr. E. D. Clarke, 'to know that the great secret of human happiness is this:—never suffer your energies to stagnate.' The old adage of 'too many irons in the fire,' conveys an abominable lie. You cannot have too many; poker, tongs, and all—keep them all going.

LITERARY.

THE DUTCHMAN'S FIRESIDE.

We publish to-day, two chapters from this forthcoming novel of Paulding's, which, if we mistake not, will prove the most popular of all his works. Of the style of this work, it is unnecessary to speak, as by general consent, the public have long since conceded to Mr. Paulding, the merit of being one of the first writers which our country has produced. Independent of the purity of style, so characteristic of all his writings, the story of the Dutchman's Fireside is admirably conceived, and told in the author's most quaint manner. It abounds moreover, with reflections of the graver kind, which are worthy of being treasured up by every reader. The following, for example, on the impropriety of attempting too early to instil into the infant mind a knowledge of books, should be written in letters of gold; and the parent who does not consider it worthy of reflection, will in after life, feel that he has not faithfully discharged his duty to his offspring:—

'Assuredly learning is a thing of almost inestimable value; but still I doubt it may be bought too dearly. Why should the season of childhood which God and nature have ordained to be a period of freedom from cares and toils, be converted into one of labor and anxiety, for the sake of a little premature knowledge, which the early and tender intellect is unable to comprehend, or the comprehension of which requires an effort of the mind which stunts its growth forever afterward? Knowledge should only keep pace with the natural growth of the human faculties. If it comes to exceed the powers of the mind, and to be too great for the grasp of our reason and judgment, the overburdened intellect becomes but an ass, laden with treasures of no use to the bearer, and only calculated to oppress the wholesome vigor and vivacity of nature. When I see a little urchin, who ought to be enjoying nature's holiday and strengthening his constitution by wholesome exercise to bear the vicissitudes of the world in after-times, kidnapped and sent to school to set on a bench for four or five hours together, employed in learning by rote what he is unable to comprehend, I cannot help contemplating him as the slave and the victim of the vanity of the parent and the folly of the teacher. Such a system is only calculated to lay a foundation for disease and decrepitude, to stunt the physical and intellectual growth, and to produce a premature old age of body and mind.'

It is a long time since we have derived so much pleasure from a work of fiction, as the perusal of the Dutchman's Fireside has afforded us; it abounds with beauties of every description; and is destined to add largely to the well-earned fame of the writer. The following picture of the past and present state of society in Albany, is equally applicable to this city; where the simple manners and honest peculiarities of our Dutch ancestors have disappeared, and their places usurped by splendid ignorance, and the host of vices attendant upon an aristocracy of wealth. There is much truth—we say it with regret—too much truth in the sketch:—

'The intercourse of young people in those times was very different from what it is at present. I pretend not that one age is, upon the whole, wiser or better than another; or to sit in judgment upon my contemporaries. But I often catch myself contemplating, with something like sober regret, those days of unostentatious simplicity, easy, unaffected intercourse, and manly independence. Who, indeed, that hath gathered from history and tradition a picture of the manners, modes, and morals of the ancient patriarchs of Albany and its neighborhood, but will be inclined to contrast them dolefully with those of the present times? Who but will sigh to behold their places usurped by gilded butterflies, ostentatious beggary, empty pretence and paltry affectation? In the room of men independent of the smiles and frowns of bankers and bankrupts, he will find speculators glittering in their borrowed plumage for an hour or two, then passing away, leaving nothing behind them but the wrecks of their unprincipled career. Where once sat the simple magistrates, administering the few simple laws necessary to regulate the orderly community over which they presided, is now collected a body of garrulous, ignorant, visionary, or corrupt legislators, pampering their own private interests at the expense of the public good, and sacrificing the prosperity of one portion of the State to the grasping avidity of another. In the room of prosperous yeomanry and independent mechanics, we behold crowds of hungry expectants, neglecting the sure and only means of competency, and begging, in the abjectness of a debased spirit, permission to sacrifice their independence for a wretched pittance, held under the wretched tenure of a man who has no will of his own. The once quiet city, where the name and idea of political corruption was unknown, is now a whirlpool of intrigue, where empty bubbles are generated and kept alive by the agitation of the waters and boiling and conflicting eddies gather into one focus all the straws, and chaff, and feathers, and worthless nothings, that float upon the surface of the stormy puddle.'

We have been furnished by the Messrs HARRIS, with the proof sheets of this work, in advance of the publication, and do not feel at liberty to extend our quotations. We can assure our readers, however, that there is a rich treat in reserve for them; and all who admire graphic descriptions of nature, and accurate delineations of character, will unite with us in pronouncing this the best of the Author's productions.—[New-York Courier.]

MISCELLANY.

HOW TO MAKE A CHILD HATE THE STUDY OF ENGLISH GRAMMER.

Set him to committing his Grammar to memory. Proceed exactly according to the course of the author's arrangement. Require him to recite precisely the language of the book.—Regard the ideas as of little comparative consequence. Go through in this manner. Then begin again, and go through the second time. When the pupil neglects his lesson till near the close of the school, drive him to it, and make him learn it before he goes home; however fatigued his mind or body may be. Take care above all, to have him learn the rules—the examples and illustrations as well as the principle. Spend nearly all the first term in this manner.

At the commencement of the second term, require him to commit his grammar to memory once more. Next set him to parsing the first chapter of St John, in the New Testament. Blame him if he cannot understand why the word beginning is a noun. In order that his ideas of verb may be clear and definite, make him conjugate the verb to be through all its changes, whenever it occurs; if it is three times in a single verse. Give him a lecture, now and then, on the word that. Tell him it is sometimes a relative pronoun, sometimes an adjective pronoun and sometimes a conjunction; and that he must determine which it is, in any given case, by the sense of the passage. Make him repeat the words, at every step he takes.

While parsing, take care to have a considerable number of pens to mend before you in order to save time by mending them while you hear the lesson. Take care also to have several scholars call for assistance in their arithmetic while the class is up. One thing more is indispensable, which is, to have one pupil in the class far behind the rest in progress, and make the more advanced scholars in every instance, wait for him.

WOMAN AT HOME.

It is said that the character of a woman may be known by the internal appearance of her house, and the dress and manners of her children. If the furniture of her apartments exhibits an air of extravagance and show, rather than comfort, we may infer that she is a vain woman; and that her mind, and her dress, are equally fantastic. If the ornaments of her house, however splendid they may be, are badly arranged, or incongruously assorted with those that are mean or common, and more especially if the drapery of Arachne is suffered to hang through the walls or cornices, it is a 'proof strong as holy writ,' that she is deficient both in taste and neatness. Such a woman would as likely as not wear black stockings with a white dress—roses in her beaver, and a cap to save the trouble of combing her hair.

If her children, notwithstanding the fashion or richness of their clothes, are dirty or carelessly dressed—if their minds are uncultivated, and their manners rude, the mother will most generally prove to be both ignorant and indolent, or which is worse, wholly indifferent to the well-being of her children. The opposite of all these may be ascribed to the woman whose house is neat in every part as far as she is able to render it so. It matters not whether she dwells in a palace or a cottage, order and neatness are conspicuous in every thing around her. In the dress of her children, she unites simplicity with taste, and attends at once to the improvement of their minds, and cultivation of those graces which, in a greater or less degree, according to their respective stations in life, will recommend them to society. Such a woman, although she may not be learned or accomplished according to the modern acceptance of the term, will be found to possess judgment, good sense, and a correct taste. With respect to her dress, its 'unfitness' will never be made an apology for not seeing her friends. Her domestic, or other engagements, may with propriety prevent her from receiving their visits; but if she chooses to see them, her dress, if proper for the business in which she may happen to be engaged, she will never be ashamed of. Both at home and abroad it will always be dictated by a sense of propriety.

[From the Subaltern.]

'Do you bite your thumb at us, sir?
I do bite my thumb.'

Shakespeare.

'Come on, begin the grand attack,
And I'll be there and sound the trumpet.'

Dr. Christopher Caustic.

We have seen and read, with vast delight and edification, the proceedings of the antimasonic convention, 'began and holden' in the city of Boston, for the purpose of suppressing all secret societies, and exterminating the members of them. We notice with exquisite pleasure, that something was said about 'withholding the common courtesies of life,' from Masons. The 'honorable men' did not exactly say that they would do so, and treat those infernal Masons as they deserve, but they hinted at the propriety of so doing, and intimated the state of their feelings towards Masons, by permitting such a thought to enter into their hearts, and form itself into audible and articulate sounds upon their lips.

'A hint is as good as a kick to some folks,' says the proverb. We trust we shall always be found zealous in so good a cause, and will do all in our feeble power to assist and farther so charitable, so rational, so christian and so desirable a consummation.

The world has been in pain long enough about the secret of Freemasonry; it is high time that secret was forcibly extorted from its guardians, or that those guardians should become 'vessels of the law's fury.' We have seen with feelings of the liveliest pleasure, that the public begin to be convinced that their lives and property are not safe in the hands of a Masonic jury. We rejoice to see it recommended to the clergy to excommunicate, unbaptize and exclude from the communion of the Lord's supper, those wretches whom it would be a stretch of christian charity, to call merely misguided, when it is proved already, that they are no better than murderers,' and it will go never to be thought of soon.'

Such is our zeal and indignation against all secret societies, that we propose further that, all marriages already contracted or that may hereafter be contracted with Masons, be declared null and void, and that the children of all such horrible, unnatural and incestuous connexions, be considered illegitimate, and incapable of inheriting real estate, and that all real estate already in the possession of such nondescript children, be seized and confiscated for the use of antimasonic societies.

Secondly—that all physicians, surgeons, midwives and apothecaries, be compelled to give bonds, under the penalty of the 'withholding the common courtesies of life,' to put to death all children of Masons that may hereafter come under their professional care, either at time of their birth, or at any time previous to the age of twenty one years, and that every such physician, &c. be entitled to such remuneration for so doing, as may be awarded by a committee of the nearest antimasonic society.

Thirdly—That any single woman found guilty, or suspected of encouraging the addresses of a Mason, with the intention of marriage, shall be compelled to do penance as follows:—After divine service in the afternoon, the penitent, clad in a white sheet and bearing a lighted candle in her hand, shall proceed up the church, loudly and distinctly proclaiming her guilt,—after which the clergyman, or antimason present, may question her concerning the conversation that had taken place between her and her Masonic suitor;—and that no clergyman or justice of the peace, on pain of being debarred from 'the common courtesies of life,' perform the ceremony of marriage in any case where a Mason is concerned, however remotely.

Fourthly—that the antimasonic portion of the militia be immediately called out, mustered, armed and drilled for one week, preparatory to enforcing the law, 'withholding the common courtesies of life,' from Masons.

Fifthly—that killing a Mason be no longer considered felony, but justifiable homicide, and that all antimasons be permitted to wear arms, either concealed or openly, as they think best. Some of the more moderate antimasons think that this law should be the first past, but such lukewarm counsel suits not the spirit of the party;—we would have Masons

'Years in dying, never dead.'

The bare extermination of the vermin is easily enough accomplished, their quietness and timidity, their regard for the laws and their absurd notions of 'hereafter,' &c. render them an easy prey. Punishment to be salutary must be felt;—our legislators did not regard the pomp and circumstance when they decreed hanging as a punishment for certain offences, it was the pain and disgrace that was contemplated. Besides—antimasons remember, Morgan.

Sixthly—In anticipation of the exterminating crusade that will soon be practiced, as it is already preached, against Masons, we beg leave to recommend the following scale of bounties to be offered to the troops employed in that glorious christian warfare:—

For the head of ever Grand Royal Arch Mason, five dollars; every Grand High Priest, five dollars; and the same for the head of every one bearing the title of Grand; for the head of every Most Excellent, four dollars; for all Excellents and Sirs, three dollars; all Master Masons, two dollars; all Fellow Crafts, one dollar; Entered Apprentices, fifty cents; for every certified pair of Masonic ears, one dollar,—every certified single ear, twenty five cents, to be paid in Indian land.

Seventhly—To show our detestation of all secret societies, and of every thing that looks like a secret, we propose that all Masonic and neither one nor t' other postmasters, be turned out of office, and sworn antimasons 'reformed' into their places, and that no 'sealed letters be mailed, but that all be read by the post masters, and such as are found to contain any thing of importance or that looks like a secret, in love, law, commerce, manufactures, agriculture, politics, metaphysics, tea-table scandal, or miscellany, be published in some antimasonic paper, that 'the common courtesies of life be withheld' from the writers of such letters as are not understood, that the 'nation may learn secrets no more.'

As the sole object of the amalgamation of antimasonry with politics and religion, is to obtain possession of the whip as well as the reins of secular power, we must earnestly recommend that we—antimasons—form a coalition with the Sunday mail folks, for mutual assistance, in backing up their petition, and they lending their aid to 'withhold the common courtesies of life' from all secret societies, and that a national association be formed, to be called 'The Washington, La Fayette, and De Witt Clinton antimasonic, anti-Sunday-mail carrying, anti-Sunday steam boat running, anti-Sunday laughing, anti-Sunday smoking, anti-Sunday snuff taking, anti-Sunday chewing tobacco society.'

We also suggest the propriety of instructing and encouraging the boys and other idle people, to throw stones at the windows of the different Masonic lodges, in order to provoke the members to some overt act of violence, for we would insist to 'keep on the windy side of the law,' till we have an opportunity of moulding the law as we like. Being unable to prove to the public by facts, convinced by arguments, or persuaded by eloquence, that Masonry exerts any deleterious influence upon religion, politics, or morals, or that its existence, its ceremonies or its titles are illegal or unconstitutional, we must follow the advice once given to Catalina, 'petre auxilium etiam ab infirmis,' to enlist under the banners of antimasonry, every infamous scoundrel whom we can coax or hire to stand by us.

We can make no advances by the means of facts, rhetoric or logic, and we must, per force, employ the means that the devil and our own ingenuity suggest. We have indeed succeeded in raising a partial hue and cry, but that is not enough; we are actually now in the same predicament as certain noisy politicians noticed by Dr. Johnson; 'a dozen of noisy, half drunken fellows get together in the bar-room of a tavern, who imagine that the noise made by themselves is made by the world around them.'

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, JUNE 18, 1831.

TRIUMPH OF THE PRESS.

We congratulate our brethren of the type, as well as our brothers of the Masonic Fraternity, in the prospect now looming before us that the liberty of the Press will yet be protected by the laws; antimasonic bigotry and conspiracy to the contrary notwithstanding. On Wednesday, in the Municipal Court for the City of Boston, came on for trial the libel case of the Commonwealth vs. F. S. Hill. A more ample hall of judicature, than usually had been occupied by that court, was provided by the mayor and aldermen, especially for the occasion of this trial; anticipating, we presume, that the concourse of spectators and auditors would be immense; so great was the excitement of the pros and cons of Masonry.

The case was opened by J. T. Austin, Esq. the county attorney for the government, by a motion that the defendant, before the empanelling of the jury for the trial, should be required to file a brief statement of all such matters and things as he proposed to give in evidence to satisfy the jury of the truth of the matters alleged as libellous in the indictment. A late statute of Massachusetts having altered the old common law as formerly practiced upon, which quaintly affirmed that 'the greater the truth the greater the libel,' so as to allow the truth now to be given in evidence under the plea of not guilty, in prosecutions for a libel, provided it be made satisfactory to appear on the trial 'that the matter charged as libellous was published with good motives and for justifiable ends.' Mr. Austin argued, at great length, in support of his motion, adducing as authority the statute altering the law of libels; contending that for the due and proper administration of that law, conformably to the Bill of Rights, it would be, if not necessary, at least proper for the court so far to alter its practice, under the common law, as to require the filing by defendant of such a brief statement; otherwise the prosecuting officer might be surprised by the production of evidence, and not be prepared to meet it, with evidence to the contrary; and therefore without such brief statement, ample and exact justice could not be administered.—This motion was successfully opposed by the counsel for the defendant, Messrs. Prescott and Parsons. The Hon. Judge Thatcher, however, thought the motion to introduce a new practice into the proceedings of the court, was of sufficient importance to require mature consideration, and the court adjourned to next day.—On Thursday morning, at the opening of the court, the judge announced the decision, substantially that there was no sufficient reason for altering the practice of the court; and no such statement as moved for, could, therefore, be required of the defendant. After some further discussion before the court, upon the subject of the evidence and witnesses to be adduced to prove the facts stated in the pretended libel; which discussion we considered as intended rather as an apology for the course intended to be pursued (the prosecuting witness declining the investigation of the truth) than for the purpose of facilitating the process of the trial; the counsel for the government intimated that a 'Nolle-prosequi' might be entered on the record. This was accordingly done. Thus ends the prosecution.—From all which we, with all due deference to those more knowing than ourselves, infer and conclude that the said notorious Avory Allyne not being willing to meet the truth and hear publicly proclaimed and investigated, in the halls of justice and before the proper authority, his shameful proceedings and own personal debasement of his own character, has chosen to prove craven, and thus deprived the government of the evidence on which they chiefly relied to sustain the charge. In this case we think the attorney acted with great discretion, and hope the final issue of this prosecution alias persecution, will in some degree, allay the anti-masonic excitement.

We are right glad to hear from our old friend and correspondent, Sir Peter, again: his cogitations are always welcome. We are very much pleased to perceive that the thermometer ranging from 90 to 100, has not had the effect of melting all his ideas; as is very apt to be the case with many writers about these days: at least friend Peter's power of meditation has not been melted with 'fervent heat' these hot days; as will appear by the following.

Thoughts and meditations of Peter Pense, Esq.

'Aspiring to be Gods, if angels fell;
Aspiring to be angels, men rebel.'

Nothing can be more consonant than this sentiment, with a belief in Heathen mythology; or less becoming the mouth of a Christian. The Gods of the ancients are represented many; and each jealous of his own rank and prerogative. To emulate or aspire, therefore, among such Gods was deemed treason and rebellion; for continual strife, bickering and contention distinguished them. And Phaeton was justly hurled from heaven, for an act of presumption, in assuming to himself the seat of the coachman, Apollo, and attempting to guide the Chariot of the Sun.

But the God of the Christian is a God of power, without jealousy, of infinite goodness; and his angels are the ministers of justice and truth. To aspire toward the goodness and perfections of such a Being, and to emulate such ministers, is the proper, and most laudable employment of men; and leads directly to the summit of human excellence and perfection. With more wisdom and correctness, the poet might have said,

Aspiring to be God, though Satan fell;
Aspiring to be angels, men excel.

Poets are seldom philosophers.

Emulation alone, among cotemporaries, is not adequate to the production of the greatest excellence of human character. An image or angel of perfection should be formed by every man, and kept always present in the mind; and which, as a friendly Mentor, during the whole course of his life, in word and action, he should aspire to copy and pursue. His endeavors shall not be in vain; although, he can never overtake the fancied perfection; for the imagination will always outstrip the action. Theory will soar, where practice cannot creep. The image will improve, as the man approaches to excellence; and will always loom up, if I may use a nautical expression, to something better and more exalted than himself. Though it be sure to elude his embraces, the man loses nothing by the pursuit. He will calmly move on, in the road to perfection, without envy or annoyance; and in age, (if nature be not in fault,) with general approbation, will be esteemed the wisest and best of men; and, when life shall close, depart from the world with reputation and applause here, and a cheering hope of an hereafter.

Not so the man who, having never formed in his own mind such an image of perfection, depends alone, for wisdom and goodness, reputation and applause, upon the emulation of cotemporaries. Such a being is satisfied with surpassing the inhabitants of his neighborhood, and those who happen to come within his knowledge. And here is an end of his greatness. To be wise, great and good, a man must emulate himself; and aspire after the perfection of that image, which in his own mind, as a proper subject of emulation, he independently creates for himself. This emulation will produce a Voltaire, a Locke, a Newton, a Haward, while from the other we can expect little; at most, a Clark or a Leibnitz. While Newton, with aspiring genius, was building upon his own inventions; unfolding the laws of nature, and in the sublime science of astronomy and in optics far distasting all his predecessors; Clark and Leibnitz were employed in emulating each other, and striving for victory; and, by their contradictions and metaphysical jargon, having confused their readers, were content to be confused themselves; and finally died, like two well-matched gamecocks; each crowing in his last agonies, as a signal that he deemed himself the victor. Had they more usefully employed their talents, and each confined himself to his own meditations and the communication of his thoughts to the public, the world would have been better instructed, and they have deserved a better fate.

TREMENDOUS.—A Rio Janeiro paper of April 13th contains an account of a violent thunder storm which descended upon port Alegre on the 11th of March. The rain fell in torrents, and the lightning struck in several places. A powder-house about a league from the city, containing 37,500 pounds of powder, was struck and blown to atoms. The explosion shook the whole city, like an earthquake. The houses on the margin of the river felt the shock most, and every building received more or less injury. All the materials of the powder house were thrown to the distance of more than 200 rods; the foundations were torn up, and not a tile or beam was left. The woods in the immediate vicinity were swept down, and the largest trees torn up by the roots. [Trav.]

ANTIMASONIC.—Myron Holley, Esq. well known in this State as a man of talents, has become editor of the Lyons Countryman, and O. L. Holley Esq. late editor of the Troy Sentinel, is soon to publish a daily paper in this city. Well may we say par nobile fratrum editorium antimasonicum. The elder Holley was celebrated as a canal commissioner, he was a valuable practical man, occasionally speculative. The younger Holley left literature and this city some ten years ago, a tall good looking young man, he returns equally tall, bearing the serious impress of Antimasonry on his brow, which we apprehend in all New York, excepting the third ward, will serve to accumulate a few wrinkles and disband the few hairs which cover his fine head.—[N. Y. Enq.]

PITIFUL REVENGE.—The Providence Advertiser, the other day circulated a report that the Post Master had been removed, and named the successor. It turns out to have been a fabrication of the editor, to gratify his personal feelings. The Providence Patriot thus explains the matter. 'Mr. Hallet applied a few days since for a box in the office, and was refused. He was told that no account could be kept with him as he had failed on a former occasion to comply with the rules of the office, he had used all the chicanery of a dishonest man to evade the payment of his postage bill, and could not be trusted again.'

MR. EDITOR—Observing in your paper of last week, a description of France during the Revolution of 1793, brought to my recollection the following—which perhaps is a revised edition of the same work, or written by a historian of kindred spirit:

[Exeter News Letter.]

Mr. B. Badger, formerly editor of Zion's Herald, and more recently of the Christian Advocate, proposes to publish a religious, literary and miscellaneous news paper in New York city, under the title of 'Badger's Weekly Messenger,' which shall not be of a Sectarian character. We wish him success.

MURDER.—On Wednesday afternoon, as one of the stage coaches was passing over the Salem turnpike to Boston, a man was discovered sitting on a rock, near the wall, a short distance from the floating bridge, in Lynn, bleeding at the side of the head, and apparently insensible. On examination it was found that he had received two severe wounds on the left temple, one of which was about one and the other three-fourths of an inch in length: while in the act of removing him he died, without having been able to speak a word. He is supposed to have been murdered, and suspicion rests upon a man who had been seen with the deceased in Lynn:—names unknown.

The Fredonia (N. Y.) Censor speaking of Mr. John Q. Adams who took a seat in the convention of knaves and blockheads recently congregated in this city says.—

Truly, it must be a very dignified station for one who has presided over ten millions of free people to be found among a set of broken down political office seekers whose avowed object it is to disfranchise a large portion of their fellow citizens. It was thought he let himself down sufficiently when he accepted a seat in congress, but he may now be said to be fairly at the bottom. He can go no lower.

A meeting of the people of this city was held on the 10th inst. to adopt measures for the relief of the sufferers by the fire at Fayetteville, N. C. H. G. Otis was chosen Chairman, M. Brimmer, and T. B. Curtis, Secretaries. A committee to obtain Subscriptions was appointed; and in anticipation of contributions, two thousand dollars was immediately procured and remitted.

NEVER DESPAIR!—'Better late than never.'—We glean the following for the edification of such, if any there be, as imagine themselves too old to enter the noose matrimonial. Married, in Steuben co. on the 11th ult. by Rev. D. Smith, Mr. Moses Alexander, aged 95, to Mrs. Frances Tompkins, aged 105!

HINTS TO EMIGRANTS.—by felling the trees that cover the tops and sides of mountains, (says de Humboldt,) men in every climate prepare at once two calamities for future generations,—the want of fuel and scarcity of water.

In Lincoln Ms. at a recent town meeting a motion was made to raise from the list of Jurymen the name of a gentleman on account of his being a Freemason, which was almost unanimously rejected, four or five only voting in favor of the motion.

EXCESSIVE LOVE!—A Miss Susan Coster has been tried recently in the State of Alabama, for firing a pistol at a false lover, as he was escorting another fair one to church. She was acquitted on the ground that there was no malice, but on the contrary, an excess of love!

The anniversary of St. John is to be celebrated at Wiscasset Maine, by Lincoln Lodge on the 24th instant, an address is to be delivered on the occasion. The brethren in that vicinity are invited to attend.

POETRY.

[From the Am. Traveller.]

POETRY.

By O. W. W.

'Yet would I press ye to my lips once more,
Ye wild yet withering flowers of Poesy;
Yet would I drink the fragrance which ye pour,
Mixed with decaying odours; for to me
Ye have beguiled the hours of infancy.'

[Henry Kirke White.]

I.

When care the tired spirit hath depressed,—
When on the pallid brow the mark is set
Of grief's dejection, an unwelcome guest
To him who strives, but cannot all forget
High hopes, that once his swelling bosom met;
When mind, through weary suffering, is turned
From arduous attainment,—there may yet
Be found a peace for which his soul hath yearned—
A calmness, which if truly sought, is ever earned.

II.

And grief hath been my own; I do not mean
The fancied sadness of a dreamy hour—
Yet have I found sometimes a spell, to wean
My thoughts from sorrow's melancholy power;
For Poesy hath cast a gladness o'er
My early days—in hours of trying pain
I drunk the fragrance breathing from its flower,
And felt a freshness stealing through my vein,
Forgetfulness within the music of its strain.

III.

I have not sought a momentary joy
From the illumination of its page;
It hath an essence fitted to employ
The higher musings of our riper age;
And yet like bird, whose solitary cage
Precludes a far and unimpeded flight;
The spirit tamed by earthly pilgrimage,
With upward look still strives in futile night
Towards realms it would attain, yet may not reach them quite.

IV.

Or if sometimes its energy may gain
One taste of joy, toward which the eye is cast;
One step in regions where the soul will reign
Unfettered, when the dream of earth is past;
We weep that these creations are so vast,
So far above the searching power of mind;
Then smile, to think each moment fleeting fast
Doth bring us nearer, where all unconfin'd
The soul will want and leave these bonds of flesh behind.

V.

If there be any who have striven for
The guerdon of applause to bear him on,
Such strife for fame is but an idle war,
A grief, when lost—a weariness, if won.
But Poesy hath in its glorious sun
A meed sufficient to repay our toil,
A light which burneth o'er the path we run—
And Time himself, who doth our treasures spoil,
The purity of such delights can never soil.

VI.

My aspirations have not been that fame
Would grace my forehead with her ivy twine;
It is not for an oft-repeated name
That Poesy I studied to divine,
And make its hallowed inspiration mine:
And thus, since I have not essayed to wear
The wreaths on more inspired brows that shine,
It will not move me, so the young and fair
Gaze not upon my leaf, nor twine with flowers my hair.

VII.

'One only voice, which gave to me the meed
I coveted, no longer meets mine ear;

The only lip whose praises I might heed—
That smile, the only smile I counted dear;
That eye which gave the tribute of a tear
Sometimes unto the music of my song,—
Are distant; and perhaps so they were near,
Would pass me now unnoticed in the throng;
Then wherefore seek for others the gay world among?

VIII.

There are, who count an unessential thing
The dream of Poesy—it is no dream,
But a reality, from which doth spring
Each higher thought. have such made earth a theme
Of close observance? Her creations gleam
With rarest beauties; what be such but pure
Development of Poesy's esteem?
Which in each fair existence must endure,
While nature lasteth, and the site of earth is sure.

IX.

Have such turned upward their admiring gaze
Upon the eloquence of this bright sky?
Have such e'er traced yon system in its ways
Nor read above the words of Poesy?
Have such observed with reverence the sea
When waters lit with radiance the air;
Nor fancied that within their melody
Its spell was writ mysteriously there—
Now living in the wave, now dwelling in a star?

X.

While earthly passions claim us as their own,
Her dreams recall our feelings when they soar;
'T were vain, the hope to meet its gentle tone
In perfect harmony; but when no more
Unmeaning visions cloud our spirits o'er,—
When brighter prospect to the soul is given
Of mysteries which then it may explore;
When earth is past, and death's dark vale is riven,
Our harp may wake its sweet, its purest strain in Heaven!

REGRETS.

ALAS! my hair is turning gray,
My limbs are growing slender;
I find my heart too, day by day,
Becoming very tender;
My bosom's lord sits on his throne
With an unusual lightness;
And the gay world has never shone
With half its present brightness.

Ah! I have been a thoughtless youth,
To sport so with affections;
To promise so much deathless truth,
And break such rich connexions;
To hurry on from fair to fair,
From one love to another,
And to be welcome every where—
But only as a brother!

I might have married years ago,
Some fair and wealthy lady,
But now my light is burning low,
And life is growing shady;
My single friends have left my side,
To wed their half a million,
With some quite pretty partner bride,
To dance through life's cotillion.

I speak, but fair ones do not stay,
As once they did, but shun me;
No eyes grow bright with melting ray,
When resting soft upon me;
No bosom beats beneath its lace,
Its gentle thoughts to another;
No angel shows a troubled face,
When I address another!

E'en thus it is, though on my life
I cannot guess the reason;

I must live on without a wife
Through my appointed season.
In single blessedness must go
Where they will shortly lay me,
With not a creature willing to Love, honor, and obey me!

OH NO, I NEVER SHALL FORGET.

By T. H. Bayley.

Oh no, I never shall forget,
When, in our early years,
She smiled, and should I heave a sigh,
She'd calm my rising fears;
Her name, I ne'er can mention it,
It glows within my breast;
Her words I never shall forget,
Till in the grave I rest.

Her beauty, unsurpass'd by none,—
None with her form could vie,
Her virtue, Ah! the poor can tell,
And spirits in the sky.
She loved me—why was I bereav'd,
Of her none can replace?
Oh! when shall I again behold,
That form, that smile, that face.

Like one unheeding all around,
I fancy she is nigh;
Oh! could I take her to my arms,
She'd drive away the sigh;
And yet that sigh a pleasure gives,
Though short, within my breast,
Her words, I never shall forget,
Till in the grave I rest.

I LOVE MY LOVE.

I love my love—I love her true,
As faithful as the star
Yields its steady light,
In the darkling night,
To the ocean's mariner.

I love my love!

I love my love—I love her true,
I love her fondly—well:
And eyes, though weak,
Yet language speak,
And her own pure heart's thoughts tell,
She loves as well!

I love my love—ah! should I e'er
Forake her radiant shrine;
May misery
Await on me,
Sweet peace be never mine.

I love my love!

I love my love—no idle flame,
No soulless passion ours;
But holy truth
Enshrined in youth,
Whose path is strewn with flowers;
Our hopes and our joys mount on life's buoyant wave,
Together arise, and both shrink in one grave!

I love my love!

The sufferings of the wicked may atone
For their own sins, not others.
The innocent alone can be peace offerings
For others' crimes. So the old patriarchs,
Would offer up some inoffensive lamb
That never sinned, or thought of such a thing;
And so the high Beneficent above
Gave his own son, as spotless and as pure,
To atone for all mankind, because of all
The human race there was but one
But had enough to answer for himself,

TO HON. RICHARD RUSH.

We next find this Quixotic logician in a difficulty which he is sufficiently candid to confess:

'I feel anxious to stop; but as yet I cannot. I must look round upon the unparalleled scene. It brings with it a weight of thought and feeling, that is oppressive. I did not sit down to write a dissertation on Masonry, nor am I going to give myself to this task. I dwell not upon its remote origin and long history; upon its curious titles; upon its ceremonies, of oriental mould, and celestial exaltation. I dive not into its claims to science, to philanthropy, or to religion. All these I leave, for good or for bad, for censure or for commendation. My concern at present, is with none of them. I purposely turn away, that there may be no diversion from the scene I am surveying. I am in a field by itself. There my astonished sight behold two figures: the State, with the broken sceptre of the laws in her hand, on one side, and Masonry, with a veil over her face, on the other. My vision is distinct, though the spectacle is so portentous! I go not beyond the narrative that presents it. Keeping to that, I am guarded against mistake or confusion. I have here, immovable ground under me. I take post as upon the verity of a legal record. A few facts are all that I want, and these I have. I desire to render the case irresistible, by its concentration and its simplicity.'

A philosopher would doubtless be inclined to inquire the nature of an impulse so lasting in man, as to be altogether above his control. To have ones faculties put in motion without possessing an ability to stop them; to be oppressed without a remedy for the removal of such oppression, is certainly a condition of great, if not extreme distress. Such a trial must weaken the stoutest heart, and gain the commiseration of humanity. I think it was exceedingly unkind in the committee to extend such an impulse to a patriot; the experiment might have been tried with equal success on any common vulgar man, who was good for nothing else. To force a man against his will, when he stands acquitted of every crime, is against my conscience and should be against the constitution and Bill of Rights. But here is an instance of an illustrious man 'anxious to stop,' but cannot.' His movement is as incessant as the Dutchman's cork leg, which was made with such superior skill that it walked its possessor out of flesh and bones, and even existence, and now walks on its own account. Really, these things are of a serious nature, and as such I would be understood to view them.

But to return, you say, 'I did not sit down to write a dissertation on Masonry, nor am I going to give myself to this task. I dwell not upon its remote origin and long history; upon its curious titles; upon its ceremonies, of oriental mould, and celestial exaltation. I dive not into its claims to science, to philanthropy, or to religion. All these I leave, for good or for bad, for censure or commendation. My concern at present, is with none of them. I purposely turn away, that there may be no diversion from the scene I am surveying.' Indeed! do you confess so much? The value of a confession is measured by the importance of the revelation. To confess what is as plain to the sight as the Sun at noon-day—is no act of virtue or utility. What every one can see, no one can tell, and what every one can understand, no one can explain. No one, in his proper reason, would even suspect that 'you sat down to write a dissertation on Masonry,' upon reading your letter? although your professed object in writing was to give 'your opinions of the Institution.' It must be obvious to every reflecting mind that you did not intend to 'dive into its claims to science, to philanthropy, or to religion!' though you venture to assert that 'the evils of Masonry are stupendous.' No one could be so void of discrimination as to suppose that you intended 'to have any concern with the merits or demerits of the Institution, although you express an aversion to 'giving your opinions of Masonry, without your reasons, as they are to be published!' And so far as my observation extends, every candid man is of opinion that 'you purposely turned away' from the subject of Masonry, 'that there might be no diversion from the scene you wished to survey.' And when you add that 'you are in a field by itself,' you do but state what every person can see for himself.—Nothing in the world is more obvious. Therefore, your admissions are of no value to the reader, as they are nothing more than the conclusions of the most common discretion. Conclusions, permit me to say, that you will find in the mind of every honest man who reads your letter.

Who can read the following, without exclaiming, what strength of vision! What depth of wisdom! What immovable security! Oh! that such privileges should exclusively belong to one.

'There my astonished sight (in this field by itself) beholds two figures: the State, with the broken sceptre of the laws in her hand, on one side, and Masonry, with a veil over her face, on the other. (The word 'veil' means here, according to Mr. Rush's argument 'depraved members' of the Institution! One individual screening from the light of day ten thousand.) My vision is distinct, though the spectacle is so portentous. I go not beyond the narrative that presents it. Keeping to that, (truly said, for no one will ever accuse you of turning aside even to justice or wisdom?) I am guarded against mistake, or confusion. I have here, (where?) immovable ground under me. I take post as upon the verity of a legal record. (If there be any 'post' on legal record, then justice has been answered, else how do you find this 'post?' what 'is immovable ground' for you, on account of 'legal authority,' should have been as firm a foundation for the vindication of justice? however, probably you have made sundry repairs?) A few facts are all that I want, (no doubt of this whatever) and these I have. (Denied.) I desire to render the case irresistible, (what case?) by its concentration and simplicity.' The rogue 'desires' to escape detection, but his 'desire' does not, as a matter of course, secure him that privilege.

All these things you see! You might see more, and if you were disposed to raise your sense of justice and sense of sight a little, you would have found that all these things were branded by their right names. Had you but extended your observation beyond one single point, your 'astonished sight' would have beheld a third 'figure in this field, more prominent and visible than the others; the figure of JUSTICE proceeding to stamp these deeds of mystery and evil, with deep and indelible stain, 'ANTI-MASONRY.'

Some of the good people of Salem, in the times of our grandfathers, thought that they saw witches in the shape of old women, ride broomsticks in the air, play all the tricks of human impossibility, turn into cats and scratch, into dogs and bite! They saw them vanish, and then felt their pinches; they locked their doors and saw them riding in and out, as large as life, through the key-holes!—Their 'vision was distinct though the spectacle was so portentous!' Their 'post was as upon the verity of legal record.' They thought they had facts, for they only spoke of what they saw with their own eyes! You cannot say so much to strengthen your matters of fact. By some contrivance of human ingenuity these witches were arrested and so confined that they could not change their shape before trial. For 'if you lose the identity of a criminal, the indictment is destroyed. If you commit a being in shape of a woman, for trial, and the constable brings to the bar a cat to answer to the indictment, I hold it to be a plain case, that the cat should be discharged.—But these witches were bold enough to retain the same shape in which they were arrested. In consequence of this imprudence, they were sentenced by a JUDGE OF THIS COUNTRY! to be hanged in the same manner, precisely, as you would hang a pirate! Now did ever the question rise up in your mind, how a common man could succeed in hanging a witch! A witch is in league with the devil, it is said, and invested with supernatural agencies. And if the being, in custody, be a witch, bona fide, she could escape through cracks or key holes, or even through the pores of ponderous granite! She could vanish from the hands of the executioner, or from the noose of the rope! If the prisoner could not do these things, then the prisoner, in my humble opinion, can be no witch, and should be discharged. Seeing that you were given somewhat to the investigation of such subjects, I take the liberty to make these suggestions for your consideration. Particularly as cases have been determined, and precedents established of the kind alluded to, apparently without any 'desire to render them irresistible by their concentration and simplicity.' They stand upon 'legal record' and must, therefore, as it is thought by many, be on immovable ground.' From these considerations the subject assumes an importance altogether worthy of an exposition from your hands.

Here follows the antimasonic creed. No person is eligible to that party until he has recited it privately and publicly, and given some evidence that he is ready to slander, persecute and speak regardless of truth, when occasion may require,

'I believe that Morgan was seized, carried far from his home by Masons, and by Masons murdered. I believe that this was the result of a conspiracy, engendered and carried through, under circumstances of peculiar deliberation, malignity and terror. Yet, to this very hour, the infamous deed remains unpunished. I have watched the pursuit of justice. I see how she is disheartened, fatigued worn down, by efforts, continued throughout years, to clutch these worse than Calabrian banditti. I see her at fault; I see her countenance in despair.'

The following is false:

'Masons know the whole tale of blood. Who can deny this? Masons conceal it. Who can deny this? Can then any sentient reasonable being say, that Masonry is not at the bottom of the evil? True these are depraved Masons who act in this manner, and I do not mean to judge all other Masons by them; but Masonry, corporate, existent Masonry, is the root. The abandoned fiends of the order, who know the truth, conceal it on system. They are wicked through principle. They confound crime with crime; murder with murder. Like the signs of Pandemonium, they rejoice and dance in their blood. Like the crew in the Mask of Comedy, they are accused of their 'foolish disfigurement.' The deeper their guilt, the more they make themselves invulnerable.

Our contempt refuses to make comment—

What valour were it when a car doth grin,
 For one to thrust his hand between his teeth,
 When he might spurn him with his foot away?

The next passage is quite amusing:

You can no more grasp them, than if they sink into the earth, or mount into the air. Its spirit inexorable as death, destroyed the life of this citizen; and like a spirit, it became invisible. It is here—it is there—it is gone; no body can see it; but society feels it. It is the spirit of night. The magistrate strikes, but it is into vacuity. He follows up the blow, again and again, but it falls upon a shadow.

This 'tremendous' organization reminds me of Don Quixotte's battle with the giant, in his sleep. Have you no Sancho to find the giant's head? Truly, nothing but 'blood' should strike you with such terror! Poor Sancho!
 'plainly, everything about this house is enchantment!'

It is a singular truth that we find in different individuals, pursuing opposite courses, the same degree of assurance, and the same appeal to the intelligence of the people. In war, every general prays to heaven for the success of his arms, and asserts the justice of his cause; his enemy does the same. In law, every defendant expects judgment in his favor, he expects justice from the laws of his country;
 the plaintiff is confident of an impartial decision, and therefore in his favor. In religion, the inquisitor offers up his prayers and supplicates the special favor of God in the same words and tone, when he is torturing an unfortunate being on the rack, as the honest clergyman, who prays for the reformation of his people, with mild and charitable persuasion. Is patriotism, traitors to their country; profess in words, what true patriots act. The following extract is a rare exemplification of this principle, which may be turned, the language of vice to virtue.

Is all this nothing? Is it to be forgotten; to be mentioned with indifference; to be sneered at as fanfarons?
 If the press has turned deserter and gone over to the enemy, whose profligate cohorts have overthrown the laws, is that a reason why the people should not be true to themselves? Is the whole army to be given up, because the estimate have skulked? If so, where is our intelligence; where our estimate of the popular dignity; where our stern republicanism; where our quick, our exalted sense of country? Where, we may ask, had fled our Jefferson's sagacity, when he told us, that a Republic was the strongest government upon earth, since it was the only form under which, on a breach of the law, every one would fly to its support, as a personal concern? Had he heard the opposing spirit of our day, that could spurn the law? Had he heard of the spirit, creeping in darkness, that could not only cover the guilty with an armour impenetrable, but try to throw odium on those who cry out for retribution? Solon being asked, which was the most popular government, replied, that, where an injury done to any private citizen, is such to the whole body. The blood of a murdered Roman, of one single Roman, could once raise that whole race of freemen, as by a voice from above. It could call down a just vengeance against all who caused the deed. More than once, it changed their government. It expelled the Tarquins, it overthrew the decemvirs. It kindled a holy enthusiasm which nothing could appease, until the guilty authors were blasted and consumed, that thus the wounded commonwealth, a name sacred in Roman eyes, might have its propitiatory sacrifice. It was so, that Roman glory, that work of ages, as Tacitus describes it, that toil of patriots, and statesmen, and legislators, and warriors, was founded and kept pure. But, in our boasted Republic, the blood of an American, who was taken from his home—bound—tormented—agonized—born by the conspirators along the high roads with an impudent cavalcade of carriages and horsemen—cast into a fortress, over which had floated the sovereign flag of the union—and at last immolated—by harpies belonging to an organized and powerful institution—these crimes under the horrible delusion of their upstart lie—all this is to go for nothing! The Institution is not to blame, no! it is no fault of the Institution! The immolation is to cause no public dismay. We are to sit still, in stupid gaze, some beholding it with folded arms, others in derision! The Press is silent, or the Press scoffs.

How consistent! how becoming it is for a man who avows himself attached to a party which prostrates and plants every principle of goodness with which it comes in contact, to raise his voice with a presumptuous boldness as if he were devoted to the cause of justice! To discard every particle of gentlemanly feeling, and then to think that he is not entitled to the 'sneers' and indignation of the good sense of the community! To trample common 'intelligence' and experience underfoot, and then appeal to them for justification! To arrogate to himself and themselves the right of judging in matters of opinion for others, of dictating laws, commanding renunciations of principles held by some of the most distinguished citizens, volens volens; of saying what shall and what shall not be; of slandering their neighbors with impunity, and depriving them of such privileges as they may deem proper, and then to appeal to 'the popular dignity,' 'exalted sense of country' and the 'stern republicanism' of the people! It is the very essence of insult.

You quote Jefferson: It is to be regretted that you did not recollect more of the wisdom of that great man. I presume, however, you act in this case with a degree of doctrinal spirit; quote what seems to favor the cause which you have espoused; not what you consider to be the simple truth. These things are convenient, and the twisting of authority in such cases, and with such men as are forward to promote them is not at all inconsistent probably, with their perverted consciences. This may be severe, but nevertheless, true. It is my firm and candid opinion that a man who is willing to write and publish to the world such a letter as yours, both FALSE and INSULT-ING to the utmost degree, could be induced to second any scheme, however wicked. But this is too general.
 You had forgotten, that Jefferson, in the Declaration of Independence, states it as an established law of national justice, that every man has the right of choosing his own means of happiness and of exercising them without molestation? To whom are you refusing this very privilege?
 The answer is in your own words and actions. You are refusing it to the members of an Institution, which has been ennobled from its origin to the present date with the greatest and best of men. 'Freemasons' were among the first to assert our rights and maintain them. They pledged their sacred honor, property and lives to the cause of liberty, and proved themselves the first in the field and the first in council! Their deliberations and acts secured the full confidence of the people! More than this, the people loved and respected them, as their best and ablest men. They have always sustained the high character and to their exertions is their country indebted for many of its most valued blessings. The noblest projects of charity, public good, civilization and liberty originated with them. You can hardly name a blessing which the happy people of this country are permitted to enjoy but what Masons were either the original authors of it, or active promoters. Not because they were Masons, but that, being good men, they were friends and supporters of Masonry.

It is a manly part, indeed! after all this evidence, to suspect them of improper motives and designs? When they have lived and died with all the honors which their country could bestow upon them, and even immortalized the spot where their remains were deposited—to begin now to insult their memory and scandalize their preferences! It is manly, noble, and high-minded, beyond human conception or expression! Who could be so base as to 'scoff' and 'sneer' at it? The time has come, it seems, when base hypocrisy and stubborn wickedness are to be exempt from investigation and censure! or rather, in plain truth, you are professedly one, to ask for that period.

Where, we may ask, you continue, 'had fled our Jefferson's sagacity, when he told us, that a republic was the strongest government upon earth, since it was the only form under which, on a breach of the law, every one would fly to its support, as a personal concern? A strange question for an active antimasoon to ask! for principle of action is, when there is a breach of the laws, to punish the whole community. That when a man does wrong, every one should fly to his own personal support and contrive the downfall of his neighbor.—

 This is making it a personal concern in reality, and agrees with what we see every day in the conduct of your party. As for your interest and sympathy in the affair of Wm. Morgan, they are no more than the com-aspect of the Americans for the memory of the traitor Arnold! Your whole course (of your party) proves this and the end of your career will establish it as a matter of history. Fit men, indeed! to quote the sayings of patriots and lawgivers; to incite the people to duty; to censure them for their indifference and stupidity; to profess high respect for the laws and rights of individuals; to cry for 'just vengeance' upon the guilty, and protection for the patriotic!

BUNKER-HILL MONUMENT!

The annual meeting of the Bunker-Hill Monument
 Association was held yesterday, the 17th day of June.
 The elite of the antimasonic fraternity attended. The whole number of persons present was forty. After the proper preparative measures had been taken, the meeting proceeded to the choice of officers,—when the committee reported, behold!

Dr. ABNER PHELPS, was chosen President!

JOHN D. WILLIAMS, 1st Vice President!

GEORGE ODIORNE, 2d Vice President!

WILLIAM MARSTON, Secretary!

There were to be chosen twenty-five directors; it appeared that thirteen only were chosen; and these were Henry Gassett, Jonathan French, Jacob Hall, Daniel Weld, Benjamin V. French, Joel Thayer, Amos Farnsworth, William Austin, Wm. B. Breed, Nathan Adams, Timothy Fuller, Leverett Saltonstall, William Jackson.

The President of the Society last year, was the unsuccessful candidate for that office this year, viz. William Prescott, son of that William Prescott who stood throughout the day on the 17th of June, 1775, on the battle ground, until honorable and patriotic bravery could do no more. The first Vice President, and the unsuccessful candidate for that office, was John C. Warren, the nearest male relative now living, of that Joseph Warren, who on that day, ended his life on that ground. The other unsuccessful candidates, were those who have written, spoken, toiled, and given their best hours, and their money, in common with their fellow citizens, to raise this honorable monument to the glory of the slain.

Who, after this, will doubt, what antimasonry means? Why should antimasons address themselves to the building of this monument? The answer is, they are builders themselves. But they have a double labor to do, they must demolish before they can erect, and what will they not demolish to build themselves up, if those who are neither Masons nor antimasons, do not demolish this enemy of the public peace!

In whose hands now is the building of this patriotic memorial; and what have they to expect who hoped,
 in their day to see it perfected!

The meeting stands adjourned to Monday the 25th day of July next, to complete the choice of officers.

[Daily Advertiser.]

We recommend the following paragraph to those members of the late antimasonic convention, who were open-mouthed in condemning the conduct of the Press.
 Even Mr. Rush might profit by the example:

Attack upon the Liberty of the Press.—On Wednesday evening, a horse having run away with a carriage, took the direction for our office, and much to the dismay of our pressmen, those engaged in working on the first side—precipitated his head, neck and front through one of the windows, demolishing everything which obstructed his passage. Like most of the assailants of the press, the poor fellow fared badly, having been severely excoriated.—[Fred. Arena.]

CHOLERA MORBUS.

Many persons might have remained ignorant of the character of the cholera morbus, so long as it was confined to India and Persia, but its approach towards the centre of modern civilization renders it a subject of mingled curiosity and apprehension. For the information of those who are not aware of the magnitude of this evil, we shall first offer a description of the character of this disease derived from the account of the epidemic in India in 1817. This epidemic arose at Jessore, 100 miles from Calcutta, and continued for many months, constantly spreading its ravages till it reached, in one direction, to Bombay, and in the other extended along the whole coast of Coromandel; reached Ceylon, and stretched across the Straits of Sunda to China; it was also subsequently carried to the Mauritius. The cholera itself sometimes travels against the wind and the monsoon itself, and is not arrested by coldness of temperature. The proportion of persons it attacked in the epidemic just mentioned, in Bombay for instance, was 15,945, out of a population of 200,000 or 220,000 inhabitants, and it is asserted, that all the persons who did not receive advice, 1,294 in number, perished, independently of those who died in spite of medical attendance. This disease produces in many cases immediate death, all sensorial power being extinguished in an instant, 'just as the electricity from a Leyden jar is discharged, on the contact with the brass rod.' Where the disease is mortal, but dissolution does not take place so rapidly, the symptoms are 'violent vomiting with painful cramps, damp clammy sweats, cold and bloodless extremities, burning heat at the stomach, a sudden deathlike countenance.' The skin under the nails becomes incurved, the palms of the hands and the soles of the feet become shrivelled, and at last all pulsation totally ceases. In many of these cases, the patients are in dreadful agony, and require six people to hold them in their beds. From India the cholera has extended to Persia.

A MARKET FOR COCOONS.

The editor of the American Farmer is authorized to say that any quantity of cocoons will be purchased the ensuing season, by a gentleman who is preparing to erect a filature in Baltimore. From forty to fifty cents a pound will be given for them, according to the quality. Particular care should be taken in killing the crysalis that the fibre of the cocoons be not injured by heat and that all the crysalis be certainly killed. If the cocoons be put into a tin vessel, the cover closed perfectly, and the vessel be placed in a kettle of boiling water for half an hour, the crysalis will be all killed, and the cocoons receive no injury from too high heat, as the water will prevent the temperature rising above the boiling point.

We have thought proper to give this notice, that those who have been deterred from raising silkworms by the absence of a market for cocoons, might be induced to commence. At forty cents a pound, cocoons will be a very profitable article. One person, with a boy to assist during the last ten days, can attend to a hundred thousand worms; which, if well attended to—kept clean and well fed with white mulberry leaves, will produce 300 pounds of cocoons, which will bring at the minimum price $120; and if really first quality, which they will be by proper attention, they will bring $150—and the time occupied will not be over six weeks. What more profitable employment can females pursue? The gentleman will give notice in a future advertisement of the place at which the cocoons will be purchased. In the mean time, the editor will take pleasure in giving all necessary information on the subject. All letters must be post paid.

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR

Aug. meeting to day

To our COUNTRY COGINS.—The whole musical world is on a pilgrimage! The times of the chivalric king Arthur are returning, and the minstrel with his thrilling harp will soon resume his wonted seat at the festive board, or strike his numbers, beneath the wide spreading elm, in unison with 'the light fantastic toe.' Oh, for those happy days! Are we not right? Have not our military bands and vocalists 'migrated' to the south? has not the south returned the compliment by despatching to our musical aid, whilst our birds are on the wing, its 'National Band' to beguile our pensive hours? Then, most surely, the times of the minstrel king are at hand!

We learn that Mr. Hansen, Mrs. Ostinelli and Miss Cushman intend visiting, in the course of the following week, the neighboring towns, for the purpose of giving Concerts. We are pleased that it is so; for we are anxious that our country friends should share in our enjoyments, and partake of those recreations in which we are wont to indulge in our moments of leisure, which otherwise, perhaps, would be darkened by ennui, that morceau of an editor's life. This gifted trio intend entertaining, we believe, in the course of the tour, the good people of Dedham, Providence, Ed-lem, Lowell, Worcester, Andover, Newburyport, Portsmouth, and, probably, Portland; and we thus give timely notice to the corps editorial, that they may be on their watch-towers on the look out to greet these minstrels on their arrival with hearty welcome and good cheer, and on their departure light the beacon to aid them on their pilgrimage.

We dare say the fame of Mr. Hansen and of the accomplished Mrs. Ostinelli has, ere this, reached our brethren of the quill-and-scissors in the towns above enumerated; but the fame of Miss Cushman is, as yet, in the bud, awaiting the genial glow of heat and the refreshing showers of summer to expand its blossom and bring the flower to maturity: of this young lady they know nothing, and have everything to learn.—Miss Cushman made her debut, a few nights since, at the Concert given by the 'Musical Professional Society,' to the delight of the audience—what with her sweet voice, Mrs. Ostinelli's skill on the pianoforte, and Mr. Hansen's wonderful execution on the violin, flute and tenor, we predict for our country friends a delightful feast. When they shall have arrived pay them a visit; and, if ye be not delighted, dub us false soothsayers, and we will submit to the epithet with all due humiliation.

Mushrooms could not spring up, after a shower, more suddenly than do the periodicals of our country—not that we would compare them to mushrooms; no, heaven forbid! saving the comparison we mean nothing disrespectful to our honest brethren: some few of our publications might more properly be likened unto toadstools; for, like them, they are of no manner of use; and like them they too often prove a deadly poison to the unsuspecting dupes who handle them. But not of this class of periodicals is the print before us, of which we would now speak—it carries upon its front the cognomen its contents entitle it to:—'The Boquet: Flowers of Polite Literature.' It is in the quarto form, and is to be published semi-monthly at one dollar and fifty cents, by M Gardner & Co., Hartford, Conn. A piece of music, arranged for the pianoforte, is to accompany each number; that which accompanies the present number is by Brahms, 'The Anchor Weighed,' it is a pretty air, and if the selection of pieces fall not short of this specimen, then we will say in behalf of the musical reader, in the editor's words—'though you may not reap golden harvests, yet you will mark golden harvests.' The paper is very neatly printed.

Accounts, of steamboat accidents may be collected blackberrying. An excursion to the river was taken from a steamboat boiler, is quite a fashionable pastime. Sometimes steamboats are made to run at other, for the amusement of the passengers, when the boiler cannot be conveniently burst. The Brandywine was, on the 1st inst. blown up, on her passage up the Mississippi river, which, report says, caused the death of 80 persons. The blowing up of the General Jackson recently, on the Hudson river, was, it is said, caused by the most culpable neglect. We understand that the steamboat Orleans, in descending the Mississippi, came in contact with the Hudson, in the night, as she was ascending about twenty miles above New Orleans, both the vessels are said to have been seriously injured. The Coosa, the Missouri, the Waterloo, the Gleaner, the Home, the Washington, and the Philadelphia, have within a short time been wholly or partially destroyed. To these the western mail of Tuesday adds the Sylph, which on Saturday, the 4th inst. was run down in the river Ohio, by the steamboat Charleston, and totally lost. It appears to us that if steamboat proprietors are not more cautious, travelling by steam will soon be out of fashion.

On Thursday, a dog, supposed to be mad, was killed, in front of our office, by some persons supposed to be sane. We cannot vouch for the truth of these suppositions; all that we know about it is that the dog is dead; and if ever symptoms of hydrophobia passed over the usual serenity of his benignant countenance, there can be no doubt of the justice of his fate and of the humanity of his murderer. Dogs should always be killed whilst in the full enjoyment of instinct that there may be no danger of their abusing it. Surely man is a reasonable being; hereafter it will be an act of christian charity on his part to dash his neighbor's brains out, and thus save him from the danger of being bitten by mad dogs! Alas, poor Tray! he was a faithful creature! Sic transit gloria mundi!

The Philadelphians were all on tiptoe when the Boston 'City Guards' made their grand entre into their right-angled city. It is said that on no occasion, since the visit of Lafayette, has there been called out such a number of citizens. By special invitation they attended Mr Swaim's baths, which we think must have been very refreshing to the citizen soldier after a march under a scorching sun and through dusty streets. Their reception and entertainment has been highly satisfactory to them.

The Guards arrived at Providence on Thursday, in the steamboat President. They will probably return to the city this afternoon.

Both branches of the Legislature were on Thursday prorogued by the Governor, after a session of thirty days, in course of which seventy-three acts were passed, and a proposition adopted for a constitutional amendment for a small reduction of the members of the House of Representatives, which last, if passed by a majority of the Senate, and two thirds of the House of Representatives of the next year, and afterwards ratified by a majority of the people, will go into practice. The session has been protracted much beyond the usual length of the summer sessions, in consequence of the discussions to which these amendments have given rise. In future, the political year will commence on the first Wednesday in Jan. and a new election for the next year will take place in November next.—[Cont.]

'The Moorish Bride,' is the title of a new play by the lady of professor Howe, for which she has received the premium of six hundred dollars, offered in 1844 for the best written tragedy. It is now being performed at the Theatre, and has been forwarded from the Theatre.

TALES.

[From the New England Review]
THE WIFE

'I have been with thee in thy hour
Of glory and of bliss—
Doubt not its memory's living power
To strengthen me, through this!'

She was a beautiful girl, when I first saw her. She was standing up at the side of her lover at the marriage altar. She was slightly pale—yet ever and anon as the ceremony proceeded, a faint tinge of crimson crossed her beautiful cheek like the reflection of a sunset cloud upon the clear waters of a quiet lake. Her lover, as he clasped her delicate hand within his own, gazed on her for a moment with unmingled admiration, and the warm and eloquent blood played upon his cheek, shadowing at intervals his manly forehead and melting into beauty on his lip.

'He stood in the pride of his youth—a fair form,
With his feelings yet noble, his spirit yet warm—
An Eagle to shelter the dove with his wing,
An elm where the light twining tendrils might cling.'

And they gave themselves to one another; and every heart blessed them as they went their way rejoicing in their love.

Years passed on, and again I saw those lovers. They were seated together where the light of a summer sunset stole through the half closed and crimson curtains, lending a richer tint to the delicate carpeting, and the exquisite embellishments of the rich and gorgeous apartment. Time had slightly changed them in outward appearance. The girlish buoyancy of the young wife had indeed given place to the grace of perfected womanhood, and her lip was somewhat paler, and a faint line of care was slightly perceptible upon her beautiful brow. Her husband's brow too was marked somewhat more deeply than his years might warrant—anxiety, ambition, and pride had gone over it, and left their traces upon it—a silver hue was mingling with the darkness of his hair which become thinned around his temples almost to baldness. He was reclining on the splendid ottoman with his face half hidden by his hand, as if he feared that the deep and troubled thoughts which oppressed him were visible upon his features.

'Edward, you are ill to-night'—said his wife in a low, sweet, and half-inquiring voice, as she laid her hand upon his own.

The husband roused himself from his attitude slowly, and a slight frown knit his brow. 'I am not ill,' he said somewhat abruptly, and he folded his arms upon his bosom, as if he wished no interruption of his evidently bitter thoughts.

Indifference from those we love is terrible to the sensitive bosom. It is as if the sun of heaven refused his wonted cheerfulness, and glared down upon us with a cold, dim and forbidden glance. It is dreadful to feel that the only being of our love refused to ask our sympathy—that he broods over feelings which he scorns, or fears to reveal—dreadful to watch the convulsing features and the gloomy brow—the indefinable shadows of hidden emotion—the involuntary signs of a sorrow in which we are forbidden to participate, and whose character we cannot know.

The wife essayed once more. 'Edward,' she said slowly, mildly and affectionately, 'the time has been, when you were willing to confide your secret joys and sorrows to one, who has never, I trust, betrayed your confidence. Why then, my dear Edward, is this cruel reserve. You are troubled, and yet refuse to tell me the cause.'

Something of returning tenderness softened for an instant the cold severity of the husband's features, but it passed away and a bitter smile was his only reply.

Time passed on and the twain were separated from each other. The husband sat gloomy and alone in the damp cell of a dungeon. He had followed Ambition as his God, and had fallen in his high career. He had mingled with men whom his heart loathed—he had sought out the fierce and wronged spirits of his land, and had breathed into them the madness of revenge. He had drawn his sword against his country—he had fanned rebellion to a flame, which had been quenched in human blood. He had fallen—miserably fallen—and had been doomed to die the death of a traitor.

It was his last night of life. The morrow was the day appointed for his execution. He saw the sun sink behind the green hills of the West, as he sat by the dim grate of his dungeon, with a feeling of unutterable horror. He felt that it was the last sun that would set to him. It would cast its next level and sunset rays upon his grave—upon the grave of a dishonored traitor!

The door of his dungeon opened, and a light form entered and threw herself into his arms. The softened light of sunset fell upon the pale brow and wasted cheek of his once beautiful wife.

'Edward—my dear Edward,' she said, 'I have come to save you. I have reached you, after a thousand difficulties, and I thank God that my purpose is nearly accomplished.'

Misfortune had softened the proud heart of manhood, and as the husband pressed his pale wife to his bosom a tear trembled on his eye lash. 'I have not deserved this kindness,' he murmured in the choked tones of convulsive agony.

'Edward,' said his wife in an earnest, but faint and low voice, which indicated extreme and fearful debility, 'we have not a moment to lose. By an exchange of garments you will be enabled to pass unnoticed. Haste, or we may be too late. Fear nothing for me, I am a woman, and they will not injure me for my efforts in behalf of a husband dearer than life itself.'

'But, Margaret,' said the husband, 'you look sadly ill. You cannot breathe the air of this dreadful cell.'

'Oh, speak not of me, my dearest Edward,' said the devoted woman. 'I can endure every thing for your sake. Haste, Edward—haste, and all will be well,'—and she aided with a trembling hand to disguise the proud form of her husband in a female garb.

'Farewell my love, my preserver'—whispered the husband in the ear of his disguised wife, as the officer, sternly reminded the supposed lady that the time allotted for her visit had expired. 'Farewell—we shall meet again,' responded his wife; and the husband passed out unsuspected, and escaped the enemies of his life.

They did meet again; that wife and husband; but only as the dead may meet in the awful commings of another world. Affection had borne up her exhausted spirit, until the last great purpose of her exertions was accomplished in the safety of her husband, and when the bell tolled on the morrow, and the prisoner's cell was opened, the guards found wrapped in the habiliments of their destined victim, the pale but still beautiful corpse of the devoted wife.

THE HAUNTED HOUSE.

By Mrs. Hemans.

I seem like one
Who treads alone
Some banquet-hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled,
Whose garlands dead,
And all but he departed.—Moore.

Seest thou yon grey gleaming hall,
Where the deep elm shadows fall?
Voices that have left the earth
Long ago
Still are murmuring round its hearth,
Soft and low;
Even there: yet one alone
Hath the gift to hear their tone.

Guests come thither and depart,
Free of step and light of heart;
Children with sweet visions blessed,
In the haunted chambers rest;
One alone unslumbering lies—
When the night hath sealed all eyes,
One quick heart and watchful ear,
Listening for those whispers clear.

Seest thou where the woodbine flowers
O'er yon low porch hang in showers?
Starting faces of the dead,
Pale yet sweet,
One lone woman's entering tread
There still meet!
Some with young smooth foreheads fair,
Faintly shining through bright hair;
Some with reverend locks of snow—
All, all buried long ago!
All, from under deep sea-waves,
Or the flowers of foreign graves,
Or the old and bannered aisle,
Where their high tombs gleam the while,
Rising, wandering, floating by,
Suddenly and silently,
Through their earthly home and place,
But amidst another race.

Wherefore unto one alone
Are those sounds and visions known?
Wherefore hath that spell of power,
Dark and dread,
On her soul a baleful dower,
Thus been shed?

Oh! in those deep-seeing eyes
No strange gift of mystery lies!
She is lone where once she moved
Fair, and happy, and beloved!
Sunny smiles were glancing round her,
Tendrils of kind hearts had bound her;
Now those silver cords are broken,
Those bright looks have left no token,
Not one trace on all the earth,
Save the memory of her mirth.
She is lone and lingering now,
Dreams have gathered o'er her brow,
Midst gay song and children's play,
She is dwelling far away;
Seeing what none else may see—
Haunted still her place must be!

BIOGRAPHY.

BIOGRAPHICAL MEMOIR OF BOLIVAR.

Don Simon Bolivar was born in the city of Caracas, in the year 1785, of Don Juan Vincente Bolivar, and Donna Concepcion Palacio. The noble origin of the family of Bolivar is authenticated in the history of Oviedo, and Banos, as one of the most illustrious in Venezuela, and by the circumstance of one of the ancestors of Bolivar being chosen in the year 1589, to represent the Province as Procurador-General at the Court of Madrid. Bolivar was very young when death deprived him of his father and mother. Don Feliciano Palacio, his maternal uncle, was intrusted with the guardianship of the orphan, and with the administration of an immense fortune which his parents had bequeathed to him. Tenderly beloved by his uncle, young Bolivar received from his paternal care the best education America could then afford to a child of his rank. The first years of his life were devoted to the elements of the mathematical sciences, to history, geography, and the humanities. His early studies were not marked by any striking progress, except in history, which appeared to absorb all his attention. It was, however, neither from want of energy, nor from a love of the amusements of his age, that young Bolivar neglected the study of literature and the fine arts. On the contrary, he was indifferent to all the sports and pleasures of childhood, and constantly absorbed in reflection; he exhibited a maturity, the grave and melancholy cast of which was singularly contrasted with his youthful appearance. 'I know not what is the reason,' said his uncle, one day, 'but that child is not happy, it seems as if the air of his native country was too heavy for him, and oppressed his soul:'—prophetic words, which revealed that loftiness of spirit, and that innate love of liberty, which already agitated the childhood of Bolivar, and promised the world one of the most illustrious defenders of the independence of nations!

Bolivar soon obtained from the Spanish government the permission so rarely granted, to proceed to Europe for the completion of his studies. A young Spanish lady of noble birth and extraordinary beauty, made a deep impression upon that heart which had hitherto beat for glory and liberty; she was the daughter of the Marquis d'Ustaris, a countryman of Bolivar, and a brother of the Marquis del Toro. Bolivar loved her to idolatry; he obtained her hand, and hastened to enjoy his happiness in his native land. But, alas! a blow as sudden as terrible awaited him—a fever of a few days swept off the friend and companion to whom he hoped to consecrate his whole life. To a young man of twenty two, under the influence of the most pure and ardent passion, such a loss is overwhelming. Bolivar was stunned, heart-broken, but his courage did not forsake him; the love of his country took entire possession of a heart closed against all other attachments; and that passion for liberty which he seemed to inherit from nature, acquired new force and activity from his private calamity. He set out a second time for Europe, and visited successively Spain, France, Italy, England, and a great part Germany. During his residence at Paris, he was particularly assiduous in his endeavours to acquire all the knowledge requisite for the warrior and the statesman; he formed connexions useful to him in the prosecution of his inquiries; he became the friend of Humboldt and of Bompland, from whom he imbibed profound and enlightened views on political economy and internal administration. He also acquired a decided taste for the study of languages and history, ancient and modern. Active, temperate, frugal, devoting the night to labor, whenever a part of the day had been passed in pleasure, the saviour of America silently formed himself for the awful work of the destruction of Spanish power in America. The coronation of Napoleon Buonaparte, as Emperor of France, at which Bolivar was present, appeared to him to threaten an approaching revolution in the political affairs of Europe, the consequences of which must necessarily extend to America. Under the influence of this vague presentiment, he set out for Spain, when having learnt, at Bordeaux, that General Miranda was in the United States, forming an expedition for the deliverance of his country from the Spanish yoke, he hastened to share the perils of the glorious enterprise, and to place himself under the banners of the independent chief. He arrived too late; the expedition had sailed when he reached the United States, and, in a few days, he heard that it had failed in its attempt. As, however, the real object of his voyage to the United States had escaped the inquisitorial eye of the Spanish police, he was at liberty to return to South America. This he accordingly did, just at the moment when the successes of Madrid and Bayonne, the abdication of Ferdinand and of Charles, and the occupation of the Peninsula by French troops, occasioned the first interruptions of the customary relations between the metropolis of Spain and her colonies, and caused the general insurrection of the New World. General Miranda made a new attempt, which failed. Bolivar served under him, Miranda was treacherously seized, and died in the prisons of Cadiz. From that period Bolivar became the chief warrior of his country, to the service of which he gave the whole of his immense wealth. We have not space to follow him through all his military exploits.—His career, however, was most brilliant. His successes annihilated the power of Spain. As Dictator, some inconsistencies might be laid to his charge, but his ambition was always, governed by a sincere love of his country.—[Falmouth Cornubian.]

MISCELLANY.

[From the Charleston S. C. Patriot.]

POWER OF INTELLECT.

An octogenarian nobleman, having invited Lord Shaftesbury and another friend to dine with him, took occasion immediately on the removal of the cloth, to say that his object in asking them to dine was that he might obtain their opinion as to the propriety of marrying his housekeeper. Oh! my Lord said Shaftesbury, you may as well not keep us in suspense, we see you are married, pray present us to her ladyship.—Well replied the noble host, I am indeed married, but I wished before informing you of it, to hear your opinion. On retiring, Lord Shaftesbury was asked by his companion how he could have divined as he did that their entertainer was married. 'Because,' was the sagacious reply, 'no man who had not already committed such a folly would have asked advice concerning it.' The second illustration was from the memoirs of Cardinal de Retz, and related to the famous Turenne and his great compeer Conde, then in the Spanish army, and were in face of each other, the Spanish strongly entrenched. On a given day Turenne gave out to his council of officers, that on the next day, at one o'clock, he would attack the Spanish camp at a given point, which was the strongest of the line. An officer, expressing his surprise at the hour and point of attack designated, was thus answered by Turenne; 'It is true, another part of the camp is weaker, but the command of that point is confided to Conde who never sleeps, whereas the strongest point is commanded by the Spanish General who will, at the hour named, be taking his nap. When our attack is made an officer will be despatched to arouse him. He, relying on the strength of his position will not believe the account, or think it only a feigned attack, and will send for further information; by the time that reaches him, we shall have carried the defences.' The event fulfilled in every particular this calculation of a master mind. The last illustration was from our own history, and from one of its great names, Judge Chase. This eminent individual presiding at Baltimore at a trial of some rioters, at the close of the proceedings in a very crowded court, directed the Constables to convey the prisoners to jail. The Constables, appalled by the aspect of the assembled multitude, after some hesitation, told the Judge it was more than their lives were worth to execute his order. Judge Chase immediately sprung from the bench, directed the Clerk to enter Samuel Chase as constable, and then approaching the prisoners bid them follow him ordering the crowd to make way for their constable—and conducted them, without opposition or difficulty, through the mass of astonished citizens to their place of confinement. In all these cases, superiority and success were founded upon the close observation and study of the human mind, and of the causes which affect or control its operations.

A SUBSTANTIAL APPARITION.

The celebrated historian, De Thou, tells the story of his experience in apparitions, nearly as follows: He was startled from a sound sleep, in the dead of the night, by an extraordinary weight upon his feet. The moon was shining into the window, and he distinctly perceived a tall person, with a very ghastly countenance, standing by his bed side. He at first thought he was dreaming, but by a process of reasoning, soon became satisfied that he was awake. He summoned up resolution to inquire, in God's name, what it was. 'I am the Queen of Heaven' was the reply, in a hollow voice which would have unstrung the nerves of many a stronger man than De Thou. He however sprang from his bed, and seized the figure with great violence. Two heavy blows upon his head soon convinced him that he had hold of no inconsiderable piece of flesh and blood. Lights were brought, and he was discovered with a female lunatic, who had escaped from her keepers, in his arms.

FORCE OF HABIT.

A servant was despatched a few days ago to apprise a surgeon who had attended his master, that the poor man expired in the course of the day. The servant meeting the surgeon, delivered his doleful message thus:—'Please, sir, my master's compliments, and he's dead.'

BOSTON MASONIC MIRROR.

SATURDAY MORNING, JUNE 25, 1831.

Directions for Invigorating and Prolonging Life; or, the Invalid's Oracle. Containing Peptic Precepts, Pointing out Agreeable and Effectual Methods to Prevent and Relieve Indigestion, and to Regulate and Strengthen the Action of the Stomach and Bowels. By Wm. Kitchiner, M. D. Author of the Cook's Oracle and House-keeper's Manual, &c. &c. From the sixth London Edition, Revised and Improved, by T. S. Barrett, Licentiate in Medicine and Surgery, Fellow of the New York Medical, and Philosophical Society, &c. &c. New-York: Published by J. & J. Harper, 52, Cliff-street.

We have perused, with pleasure, the above quoted, queer work, and do not hesitate for one moment to recommend it to our friends as a valuable acquisition to their medical libraries; but, at the same time, if we may be permitted to express our opinion, we would say that we think the book might be more condensed and many very trivial things expunged therefrom. We are inclined to think that if a man were to follow all the directions given, for prolonging life, he might accomplish his end and live, as the Spaniards wish all friends, 'a thousand years;' but then this desirable aim must be brought about by years of abstinence, and self-denial of every thing the palate may crave, that is nice or delicious: a man must confine himself to old mutton, roast-beef, and stale bread one day, and on the next to stale bread, roast-beef, and old mutton—he must not drink all water, because it may produce gravel and a train of diseases; nor all wine, because it is 'twice spoiled before drinking,' and may be the cause of this, that, and the other; but he may drink, moderately, of each, mixing them as occasion may require;—but above all things the valetudinary must refrain from brandy that poison of the mind and body. In fact we think the whole work might be summed up in this one paragraph, the very essence of our living in a healthy and agreeable condition—for the advice we charge nothing.

Keep the body gently open—go to bed early rise early and walk before breakfast—eat nothing but that which agrees with the stomach—keep the head clear, the body clean, and the feet warm—take plenty of exercise—sleep on straw, and with your window open, regulating it by the weather—refrain from all passions—and eat nothing heating.

But as people judge of the worth of a book by its size, the author has very knowingly and kindly interspersed his book with many useful hints and entertaining anecdotes, to make it sell well, and, at the same time, give to the purchaser his 'money's worth' of knowledge.—We think, the book well worthy of patronage, and we would, if our limits permitted, give sundry amusing extracts, but that not being available, the reader, the swimming reader, is referred during this abominable hot season to the following cooling article by the American editor of the work, on

BATHING.

Perhaps it will not be improper for the American editor to introduce in this place a few remarks on bathing, as an important part of the 'Art of Invigorating and Prolonging Life.' This, indeed, seems to be the more necessary as our ingenious author has said so little on the subject. Bathing, it is generally known, was a practice in frequent use by the ancients as a means of preserving health and prolonging life; and though they could less easily dispense with the bath on account of the frequency of their athletic exercises, &c., yet in our days it would be better if the use of baths were more general and more frequent. Considered as a species of universal domestic remedy, as one which forms the basis of cleanliness, washing, in its different forms, may be pronounced one of the most extensive and beneficial restorers of health and vigor. But the utility of bathing depends much on a clear and accurate knowledge of the properties and effects of the different baths, and also on their correct application to the constitutions of the persons who make use of them. It will be necessary, therefore, to notice the two principal classes, viz. the cold and the warm baths, separately.

The valetudinary should consider, that the effects of bathing are not the same in every condition of the system, but that they derive their character more from the varying circumstances of those who use them than from any intrinsic properties which they possess. Heat and cold are neither strengthening nor debilitating in themselves, but become so merely in consequence of certain states of the body at the time of their application. The same application which in a strong person produces increase of strength, may tend immediately to debilitate the feeble; and that which is a stimulant when used with moderation, becomes rapidly destructive to vital power in an over-dose.

I beg leave to state, that the uniformity of the temperature in the human body is sustained entirely by the vital powers, and the process appears to be carried on with the least expenditure of force when the atmospheric air indicates 60 degrees. Every material deviation from this point, whether by increase or diminution of temperature, if long continued, draws equally upon the vital power, and produces relaxation proportioned to the extent and duration of the cause; so that, in this sense, both heat and cold are directly debilitating powers to the human constitution. These facts prove that neither the cold nor the warm bath should ever be had recourse to by those who are in ill health, without the advice of some considerate and able professional man.

Of cold Bathing. The sensible properties of the cold bath in general consist in its power of contracting the solid parts of the body, which contraction is followed by a general reaction, indicated by a salutary glow of the whole surface. Any part of the body which is exposed to the sudden contact of cold water experiences at the same time a degree of tension and contraction, and becomes narrower and smaller. Not only the larger blood-vessels, but also the small capillary tubes, are liable to this contraction and subsequent relaxation. Application of cold, when made to suitable habits and proper states of constitution, is obviously attended with an immediate tonic effect, from the general glow which takes place through the whole body, and the accompanying feeling of renewed strength, which indicate an increase of action of a salutary nature in all the vessels of the system; and this increased vigour of action is a test to the propriety of the application of cold, and explains the manner in which it is beneficial. It shows that the nerves, blood-vessels, and all the organs of the body are excited to a more healthy and energetic performance of their functions; and when this reaction does not take place, the failure is a sufficient proof of such a weakness or other state of the body existing, as precludes the further use of the cold bath.

Cold bathing is of the greatest service in all disorders originating in or connected with simple weakness and relaxation; that is, in debility unaccompanied with any disease of structure, or positive injury in an important organ. In the scrofulous complaints and general weakness of children, in the debility and languor following fever, intense study, sedentary occupations, grief, or debauchery, it is often employed with the best effects; since the debility in these cases directly arises, for the most part, from unhealthy habits, depressing passions, or the long continuance of feverish action. In these cases, the cautious application of cold proves bracing and salutary; but in case of positive injury to the structure of some important organ, the employment of cold is always improper; it is too great a shock to the system and the part diseased, and the patient is then benefited only by the use of warm bathing. Indeed, in complaints which call for the use of the cold bath, it is generally an excellent practice for the patient to commence with tepid bathing at about 90 or 95 degrees, which he may resort to three or four times for the first week or two, and then try the cold bath. This rule should always be observed in cases where the weakness of the patient is extreme, or where the debility has been of long continuance.

Whatever may be the complaint for which it is resorted to, every cold bath applied to the whole body ought to be of short duration; since all the advantage depends on the first impression which is made on the skin and nerves. The head should be always first wet, either by immersion or by pouring water upon it. The immersion ought always to be sudden, not only because it is less felt than when we enter the water slowly and timorously, but likewise because the effect of the first impression is uniform over the whole body, and the blood in this manner is not propelled from the lower to the upper extremities. The shower bath possesses great advantages, as it pours the water suddenly upon the whole body, and thus in the most effectual manner fulfils the rules just specified. Gentle exercise ought to precede the cold bath, to produce some reaction of the vascular system on coming out of it; for neither complete rest nor violent exercise are proper previous to the use of this remedy. The morning or forenoon is the most proper time for cold bathing; and while in the water the bather should not remain inactive, but move about, in order to promote the circulation of the blood from the centre of the body to the extremities. After immersion, the whole body ought to be wiped quickly with a dry and rough towel, and moderate exercise in the open air is proper and indeed necessary.

The cold bath is, altogether improper in the following cases, viz. in general plethora, or full habit of body, and in the febrile disposition which attends it; in active hemorrhages, or fluxes of blood, that is, bleedings attended with a quick, hard, and full pulse, and other signs of an inflammatory tendency; in every kind of acute inflammation; in disease of the breast, difficult breathing, and short and dry cough; in gouty and rheumatic paroxysms; in most diseases of the skin; in a state of pregnancy; in palsy; in indigestion it is also hurtful, at least in the commencement of the treatment; and whenever it occasions chills, loss of appetite, languor, pain in the breast or bowels, or violent headaches; ought in such cases to be discontinued. These unpleasant sensations are the surest proofs that the actual state of the patient's habit is unfit to bear the shock; and that either the reaction of the heart and arteries is too weak to overcome the cold pressure on the surface, or that the determination of blood to the head, or some other vital part, is rapidly increased.

In general, the best method of cold bathing is in the sea or a river; but there are not a few instances where the shower bath merits a decided preference, and this is especially the case where there is a determination to the head. Although the shower bath does not cover the surface of the body so universally as the usual cold baths, yet this circumstance is rather favourable than otherwise, for those parts which the water has not touched feel the impression by sympathy, as much as those in actual contact with it. Every drop of water becomes a partial cold bath in miniature; and thus a stronger impression is made than by any other mode of bathing.

The shower bath for the following reasons, possesses advantages superior to all others:—1. The sudden contact of the water, which in the common bath is only momentary, may here be prolonged, repeated, and modified at pleasure. 2. The head and breast, which are exposed to some inconvenience and danger in the common bath, are here effectually secured by receiving the first shock of the water; the blood is consequently impelled to the lower parts of the body, and the bather feels no obstruction in breathing, or undulations of blood to the head. 3. The heavy pressure on the body, occasioned by the weight of the water, and the free circulation of the blood in the parts touched by it being for some time at least interrupted, is an unfavourable circumstance in certain cases. The shower bath, on the contrary, descends in single drops, which are at once more stimulating and pleasant than the immersion into cold water, and it can be more readily procured and more easily modified and adapted to the circumstances of the patient.

A proper and convenient apparatus for giving the show-or bath may be made by any means; but where a saving of expense is an object, may be easily supplied by the following easy expedient:—Fill a common watering-pot with cold water; let the patient sit down undressed upon a stool, which may be placed in a large tub, and let the hair if not cut short be spread over the shoulder as loosely as possible then pour the water from the pot over the patient's head, face, neck, and shoulders, and all parts of the body down to the feet, till the whole has been thoroughly bathed; let him next be rubbed dry and take gentle exercise, as has been already recommended, till the sensation of cold be succeeded by a gentle glow over the whole of his body.

When this kind of bath is first resorted to, it may be used gently, and with water having some degree of warmth, so as not to make the shock too great; but as the patient becomes accustomed to it, the degree of cold may be increased, and the water may be allowed to fall from a greater height, so as to make the shower heavier.

The external use of cold water is often of singular benefit in the commencement of fevers, in sprains, old swellings, and rigidity of particular parts; in which cases it may be applied directly to the affected parts, and its employments continued for almost any length of time.

I have known some delicate people to derive great advantage from daily washing the surface of the body with a sponge previously immersed in sea water at cold water. To rub the skin till it glows, with a coarse towel wrung out of salt water, will be found a modification of the cold bath peculiarly adapted to the case of some persons.

Before quitting this subject, I will make a few remarks upon the impropriety of plunging into the cold bath, after the body has been greatly heated by exercise. It may be safely asserted, that in the early stages of exercise, before profuse perspiration has dissipated the heat, and fatigue debilitated the living power, the cold bath is generally safe and useful; on the contrary, nothing is more dangerous than for a person to go into the cold bath after exercise has produced great perspiration, and terminated in languor and fatigue. The reason of this is sufficiently obvious. In the first case, the exercise is short of fatigue being just sufficient to produce an increased action of the vascular system, with some increase of heat, and thus secure a force of reaction under the shock which otherwise might not always take place. In the second instance, where the person waits till he is perfectly cooled, and some degree of languor follows as a necessary consequence, the heat is not only sinking rapidly, but the system parts more easily with the portion that remains, and on plunging into cold water, a sudden chillness is felt, which is both alarming and extremely dangerous. Hence, if an individual were compelled to go into cold water after very active exercise, he had better go in when hot than when cooling after having been heated.

It is generally proper to take a moderate degree of exercise after bathing; but the invalid should beware of prolonging the walk or the ride so far as to induce any degree of sensible perspiration or of lassitude.

If in consequence of going into the bath in an improper state of health, or of remaining too long in the water, the perception of cold and the convulsive shivering should continue so long as to become painful or alarming, the person ought without delay to be put into a warm bed, and a bladder filled with hot water should be applied to the pit of the stomach. This last-mentioned expedient is the most effectual method of restoring warmth to the living body in all cases where, from chance or necessity, it has been long exposed to intense cold. Independently of these circumstances, the practice of going to bed after bathing is always to be reprobated.

The frequency of bathing must be in a great measure regulated by the strength of the constitution. It is generally considered sufficient for those in health, to bathe on alternate days. Indeed daily bathing is found to be productive of lassitude, accompanied with manifest wasting of the body; but if no other bad consequences are perceived, these symptoms, on discontinuing the bath, will disappear, and be succeeded by increased alacrity and vigor.

Cold bathing is upon the whole to be considered as a remedy much more adapted to the early than to the more advanced periods of life. Those who have been accustomed from infancy to the use of the cold bath may perhaps, persevere in it during the whole course of life with safety, and perhaps with advantage. But persons after a certain age ought to be very cautious how they commence the practice of plunging into cold water. If they find that their constitutions are incapable of that reaction which gives rise to a glowing warmth on the surface of the body, they should by no means persist in the practice.

Warm Bathing.—The cold bath is as water at a temperature below 85 degrees, from 85 to 95 degrees is usually called the tepid bath; and from 95 to 98 it is called a warm bath. When the temperature of the water exceeds 98 degrees, it constitutes the hot bath, which is seldom used above 105 degrees. From 100 to 130 degrees is the vapour bath which degree could not be endured in the condensed state of the water. The tepid and warm baths are sedative in their effects. They excite the sensation of heat, lessen the frequency of the pulse, relax powerfully the skin and simple solids, diminish increased excitement, and prove very refreshing. The effects of the vapour bath are nearly similar, but it acts with much greater power than water in the liquid form. The hot bath is stimulant; it augments the action of the heart and arteries, renders the skin red, quickens respiration, and produces a copious flow of sweat. These effects prove that a hot bath would be very improper in any case of acute inflammation, though a warm bath might then be very serviceable.

The tepid bath is applicable to all diseases to which the cold effusion may be applied, and is generally preferred when there is any doubt of the strength being sufficient to react after a cold immersion. It possesses very considerable efficacy in reducing the general excitement, and in lowering and lessening the frequency of the pulse in fever; it is safe, in a high degree grateful, and may be extended to almost the whole class of febrile diseases, such as typhus, scarlet fever, small pox, &c. It is of great service in pregnancy and in infancy. During the time of puberty, that is, for about two years at that period, cold and sea bathing should be avoided, both in the case of boys and girls; but the tepid bath may then be used with great advantage.

The tepid bath is often of eminent utility in indigestion, bilious complaints, in the debility brought on by long residence in a hot climate, in languor, and extreme weakness occurring in persons of a delicate habit, for the pains and stiffness accompanying chronic gout or rheumatism, and in all cutaneous eruptions. It is likewise usefully employed as an introduction to the use of the cold bath.

The practice of pouring cold water upon the head while the body of the patient is immersed in the tepid bath is frequently resorted to with manifest benefit in insanity and threatened apoplexy.

Tepid bathing is particularly indicated in old age, the chillness, stiffness, and debility of which state it is well calculated to lessen and remove. Franklin, Darwin, and other eminent philosophers speak in high terms of the benefit they received in their advanced years from the frequent use of tepid bathing.

The best time of using it is in the morning, any time between ten and one o'clock; and gentle exercise should be taken afterward. In general, the period of immersion should not be less than twenty minutes, nor exceed one hour.

The warm bath is occasionally employed in acute rheumatism, inflammation of the abdominal viscera, of the kidneys, bladder, and in suppression of urine, and in the convulsions and other spasmodic diseases of infants arising from teething and other irritations. It may also be applied with safety and good effect in most diseases of the skin, in green-sickness, in slight cases of palsy, in St. Vitus's dance, and other spasmodic and convulsive affections, when the cold bath might prove too violent; in costiveness, intestinal obstructions, and other complaints of the bowels that seems to depend on an irregular or diminished action of any part of the alimentary canal, and in case of debility attending with nervous irritation. In all cases in which the constitution is injured, and a general state of debility induced, either by mercury, previous illness, intemperance, late hours, irregularity in diet or exercise, warm bathing is found to produce considerable advantage when pursued under proper restrictions, and sometimes, in such instances, it is continued for a considerable time with great benefit; at other times it is properly employed as a preparation for the cold bath.

When the warm bath is intended to produce increased perspiration, it is best employed in the evening, when the immersion should not exceed ten minutes, and the patient should be removed from the bath to a warm bed. When it is not intended to produce perspiration, any time from an hour after breakfast till dinner will be proper. In these cases the bathing may be protracted to fifteen or twenty minutes, according to the feelings of the patient. Gentle exercise in the open air should follow the bathing.

Warm bathing is peculiarly adapted for the purpose of promoting cleanliness, and consequently it tends to the prevention and cure of all diseases occasioned by nastiness, and the obstruction of the cuticular excretions. Early and continued attention to the important part of decency as well as of health would tend greatly to diminish the alarming number of infantile deaths in our weekly bills of mortality. It is devoutly to be wished that every mother would look well to this important means of prolonging the lives of her beloved children.

The writer of the Review of Mr. Rank's Letter would have the reader observe that the letter is published entire. There is not a word omitted. The peculiar character of the performance, requested this course. Otherwise, some who have not been privileged with a perusal of the letter might consider the review ungenerously severe.
